—It is just possible that, if Gail Hamilton had sought an interview with Mr. Fields immediately on learning the customary percentage allowed to authors, and frankly put it to him that she had not been receiving her dues from his firm, the "Battle of the Books" had never been necessary to ensure her indemnity for the past and full pay ever afterwards. She showed, instead, the utmost reluctance to meet her publishers, and preferred to conduct a correspondence at arm's length, and often indirectly at that, with the risk and the consequence of being aggravated by the delays inseparable from such a course. We have her apology that she is deficient in conversation and only feels self-confident on paper; and in a controversy of this nature, let us admit that too much could not be set down in black and white. Nevertheless, to avoid inevitable loss of time and temper was worth an effort which does not seem to have been made or even considered. The fact is, we suspect, that Gail Hamilton foresaw the end from the beginning. Her first letter to Mr. Fields was pitched in a key appropriate to the middle or almost to the climax of a wrangle, and it would appear, too, as if she were early convinced that her final appeal would be to the public, and that she prepared herself accordingly. Hence, if we are right, the short duration of the truce that was patched up, after unwilling interviews, and her readiness to reopen hostilities on the ground of defending others as well as herself. It then became a war to the death, and the result was the award to her, by arbitrators, of $1,250 in place of the $3,000 demanded, and this volume of nearly 300 pages. As regards the justice of her general claim there can be but one opinion, if her statement of facts is accepted as correct. In fairness, the public should wait to hear the other side; but has she compelled her publishers to answer her or stand convicted? Has she not rather relieved them of that necessity by her transmutations of names and dates? We think she has, and that both in a worldly and a literary point of view she has committed a serious blunder. One cannot praise the style in which she conducted her controversy and now lays it before the public, and yet neither can she be blamed for it since it is, by every mark, her own. She might, having strictly in mind her duty to other authors and to society, have presented her case in half the number of words, or she might have given it the amplification of the Memoirs of Beaumarchais. But in the first case she must have put away the thought of being, or of proving herself to be, "smart," or "spicy," or "vivacious;" in the latter, she would have had too much humor to be acharnée.

—In the discussion relative to the cost of publishing, we quite unexpectedly found a complete confirmation of the facts and figures of the importers whose memorial was lately so vehemently contested in these columns. On pages 48, 49 we have an estimate, from a publisher to whom Gail Hamilton had recourse for information, of the cost of manufacturing such books as hers—whose extra fineness Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are said to have alleged as the reason for reducing her copyright. At all events, they are much more expensively made than the average Bohn volume. The assumed basis is a book of 400 pages, and an edition of 10,000 copies. Each copy will then cost, says "Mr. Campton," whose pseudonym we do not penetrate:

"Paper and press-work,	24 cents
"Binding,	23 "
"Plates (total $500),	05 "
"Total,	52 cents."

It will be noticed that "advertising" and "editors' copies" are not taken account of above. "The advertising, etc.," says Mr. C., "are part of the usual machinery of all publishers." For the sake of comparison, we must also omit the item of plates, for reasons which appeared in our late discussion. But Mr. Campton further "says the books can be made at 15 per cent. less than these estimates, but he wanted to keep within bounds." Now, 15 per cent. of 47 (52 less 5), is 7 cents; and 47 less 7 is 40 cents. To which now add the copyright on a dollar-and-a-half book, 15 cents, and we have a total of 55 cents—or precisely that adopted by the importers for a book of very inferior quality. But let us make another approximation. Binding at 23 cents becomes say 20, at 15 per cent. off. Now we presume that the binding of Bohn would not cost more than 15 cents, and the difference between 15 and 20 we may, therefore, admit as representing the cost of the plates; and still the cost per volume does not exceed 55 cents. A similar reduction on the paper and press-work would give a still lower estimate, but we forbear to make it. We only ask such of our readers as are disposed to follow up the argument to read carefully pp. 42, 103, 104, 203, 204, and 205 of the "Battle of the Books," where it is proposed to heap upon the estimate for a given work the advertising; the salary of the person who attends to getting books "properly noticed in the papers;" the editors' copies; the discount to the trade; the Government tax on manufactures; the interest on stereotype plates; and, finally, the expenses of doing business. "Then, of course," says an "inspired" article in the Boston Transcript (?), after enumerating most of the above items,—"then, of course, store rent, clerk hire, and packing expenses, including paper, twine, and boxes, should be reckoned as part of the cost of getting up an edition of a book." And finally, see, on page 65, the offer of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields to "sell [not to give away] the stereotyped plates" of Gail Hamilton's works.

—We had been hugging to ourselves the pleasant fancy that we had originated the active verb "to interview," for the benefit of the reporters, who seemed to be suffering from want of such a word, and that the next edition of Webster or of Worcester would name the Nation as authority for inserting a vocable not to be found in the King James's Version of the Holy Scriptures or the collected works of Shakespeare or Milton. The gratitude of the "reportorial corps," we felt sure, would be ours in any event; but it now appears that we are to have even this laurel plucked from us. The Pall Mall Gazette—no doubt from a kindly feeling towards this country—undertakes to rescue our supposed offspring from the list of Americanisms, and says: "The verb 'to interview,' which has been lately conjugated in all its moods and tenses by American correspondents, is, it seems, not a transatlantic invention after all. It occurs in a passage in Hall's Chronicle, which was printed in 1542, and claims, therefore, a higher antiquity than the noun, which we use without hesitation." This, we must say, seems to us like misplaced erudition, and we would ask a suspension of the public judgment till our claim to the word can be fully established.

—An asylum for deaf-mutes will soon be the only place where a man with any sense of what is due to himself, and any respect for the public, will venture on forming acquaintances. And even then it will not be long before some "spicy paragraphist" or "brief jotter" will learn the sign language, and persons of reputation be driven to fall back for friendship on the village idiot, unless they are content to be taken for idiots themselves. To be saved from one's friends was always desirable; but it is nowadays more than ever necessary to look sharp after the understanding of one's admirers; everybody has access to the newspapers. Fancy, now, the feelings of Mr. Lowell and Mr. Page as they see this precious bit of imbecility making the rounds of the press: "Wendell Phillips has been sitting to William Page for his portrait. Last week, being in New York, James Russell Lowell visited the painter, and, on seeing the picture, said emphatically to Page, 'That is the best portrait that ever was or will be painted of that or any other man.'" Of course he said so. When left to himself that is how he talks. He constantly "slops over" in that manner. If there is one thing he is fond of, it is helter-skelter bosh of that kind, delivered emphatically. He would not make a bad editor of a good, earnest organ, such is his habit of making slap-dash general assertions mixed with prophecy. Mr. Page, too, who knows something of the past of portrait painting, and who, like ourselves and the paragraphist and Mr. Lowell, knows as much about the future of it as the late Mrs. Nickleby—he, too, must be highly pleased at seeing in print this judicious praise. To be serious, it is evident to those who know Mr. Lowell and Mr. Page, by their works or personally, that this speech represents not their opinions, but the opinions of some gentleman of the press who judges of the human mind by the workings of his own; and it is one more illustration of the beauties of that personal journalism against which society will have to devise some protection. It is a kind of journalism which no man will pursue who is fit to be entrusted with a journal, or with whom any ordinary method of dealing with men of decency will be effectual. We are not saying that it is one of the worst examples of this sort of—private war, we may call it. But it is in essence the same with much worse examples. All alike, the personal journalists, disregarding private rights, make that their own business and the public's which is purely the victim's own.

—M. Ernest Vinet, the eminent French archæologist, the accomplished librarian of the Bibliothèque de l'École des Beaux Arts at Paris, and the author of many valuable articles in the Revue Archéologique, the Revue des Deux Mondes, the Gazette des Beaux Arts, the Dictionnaire des Beaux Arts de l'Académie, and the Journal des Débats, has nearly completed a "Bibliographie des Beaux Arts," which promises to fill, in the most satisfactory manner, a long-existing hiatus in the literature of the fine arts. This work, which is to be prefaced by an introductory chapter, and to be enriched with important notes, will have its contents rendered easily available through a triple index. Its pages will contain more than six thousand titles of books upon art, translated from ten languages, and a synoptical table divided into three or four hundred sections.

—We quote below a paragraph concerning the probabilities of a future when art will be valued in America as it is in Europe, taken from that lively little French journal, the Chronique, which is always on the alert for the promotion of art and art reform in France. The leader from which it is taken expresses great regret that the administration of the Louvre stands aside during the Demidoff sale, indifferent to the expatriation of such French masterpieces as the "Death of Poussin" by Granet, and the "Satyr and Bacchante" by Pradier, and advises the expediency of securing for national and municipal museums in France all fine works by French artists of renown, lest, being more and more sought for by foreign countries, they should eventually become extremely rare. "Let us not wait," says the writer, "until America, recognizing in her turn the necessity of forming museums, shall enter into the lists, and thus give a still more enormous value to works of art. The day cannot be far distant when the United States will desire to form public collections; for it is impossible to admit that so intelligent a people can long continue to ignore the fact, that the fine arts make men moral by raising them to a comprehension of the beautiful, and that they increase the wealth of nations by developing good taste in their artisans." The narrow view of self-interest which dictated these lines is short-sighted, like all views founded upon such a basis. France may, indeed, lose a few fine pictures when the time which the writer fears, and we ardently hope for, comes in America; but she will gain a noble ally in a cause which is connected with the progress of mankind, and this will be a gain of such value as amply to counterbalance her trifling material loss.

MISS MITFORD'S LETTERS.*

Miss Mitford's life was one of high moral interest. Perhaps, if funeral orations and catafalques were bestowed on all who deserved them, and not confined, as they necessarily are, to a few representative cases of merit, she would hardly have been carried without pomp to her grave. Her mother was an heiress, too plain to be married for anything but her money. For her money the heiress was married by a physician, ten years her junior, and a man of extraordinary personal beauty. Dr. Mitford's character is thus frankly painted by the present editor of his daughter's letters:

"He had excellent natural abilities, and, though they had been but little cultivated, and his reading was not very extensive beyond Whig newspapers and party pamphlets, he possessed a certain kind of tact, by which he seldom failed to discern and appreciate merit in any work of literature or art. He had high animal spirits, and a joyous constitutional good-humor so long as he was pleased, but it was accompanied by a corresponding amount of irascibility if his wishes were thwarted. He was not devoid of generous emotions; and, partly from good-will, and partly from an irrepressible desire of action, was ready to volunteer his services for any neighborly, kind office. But he was, at the same time, utterly selfish at heart, and incapable of sacrificing the slightest inclination of his own for the welfare of his wife, or even of his daughter. His manners were easy, natural, cordial, and apparently extremely frank; but he nevertheless met the world on its own terms, and was prepared to allow himself any amount of insincerity which seemed expedient to the occasion. And, though a very brief career of dissipation had reduced his pecuniary resources to the lowest possible ebb, he was not only recklessly extravagant, but addicted to high play."

He soon ran through his wife's fortune, and was found living with his family in a poor quarter of London, and seeking a refuge from his creditors within the rule of the King's Bench. He however had wherewithal to buy a lottery ticket, and to that mode of redeeming his affairs, rather than to labor, he characteristically resorted. Under the influence apparently of a gambler's superstition, he made his little daughter choose the ticket; and it turned out a prize of $100,000. After telling his friends that he would settle the same on his daughter, he of course proceeded to squander the second fortune as he had squandered the first. As though to get to the end of $100,000 were impossible, he bought a beautiful old manor-house near Reading, pulled it down (the neighborhood not having in those days taste enough to lynch him), and built at great expense a frightful modern house in its place. At the end of his $100,000, however, he speedily arrived, and he and his wife were destitute. The duty of supporting them, as well as herself, devolved upon their daughter and only child, a spoilt, petted, and excessively conceited girl, who had figured as an heiress, fond of lounging, dress, and all the vanities of life, but with an aptitude for literature of which she had already made some essays, not unpromising though of a rather unimportant kind. She accepted the duty heroically, and through thirty years of unremitting literary labor, to which was added at last painful attendance on the infirmities of age, heroically discharged it. The secondary character of her literary gifts and the smallness of the measure of success within her reach only rendered her pious industry more admirable in a moral point of view. Her mother appears to have been an amiable and well-educated woman, though there is something in her closing scene suggestive of a lack of sentiment, and of a ruling passion for eating and drinking, strong in death. In her father there was nothing except the relics of his beauty and a superficial good-humor, which evidently failed when the means of animal enjoyment were withdrawn, to aid filial duty by exciting personal affection or respect. He evidently remained, in his callous selfishness, wholly untouched by his daughter's devotion, and ready to squander on his own low pleasures every penny of her earnings on which he could lay his hands. While she is sighing over her literary grindstone, he is at the county-town boozing with the squires, among whom, having been made a justice of the peace in his more prosperous days, he has managed to keep his place. After her mother's death, Miss Mitford has, in addition to her daily labor, to bear alone the depression, the occasional violence of an exhausted, distempered, and ruined man of pleasure—to wait upon him, to read to him, to play cribbage with him, to sit up at night with him watching for his fits of cramp. Yet, if she allows a word about his failings and her sufferings to escape her, it is only that she may again sacrifice herself to him by persuading her trustee to let her have a part of the little sum which was held in trust for her, to pay her father's debts. Nor did a bride ever bewail her husband, snatched from her in the marriage hour, with anguish keener or apparently more sincere than the anguish with which this most worthless and intolerable old man is bewailed by his daughter, when at last he departs in extreme old age, and leaves her to pass in peace the remnant of a shattered life. When Mr. Mill has dealt with the devotion of wives, he will have to turn his attention to the devotion of daughters.

If these two volumes of letters were, as the title-page implies, the record of this life, they would indeed have a singular value. But if the life had been recorded in letters it would itself have been spoilt; for it would then have been a life of moral ostentation, not of silent duty. Miss Mitford's history is told in the editor's preface, and a few words suffice to tell it. The letters contain occasional allusions which the facts known to us from the preface render pregnant and touching; otherwise they are merely the correspondence of a literary woman, clever and vivacious, but without genius, without any intellectual gift of special value, without anything specially interesting or important to tell us. In her own rural neighborhood, Miss Mitford was a literary lioness, and she enjoyed the satisfaction of complaining that she had seven carriages at once at the door of her cottage; but she very seldom went into the great world, and then only on the absorbing business of the representation of her own dramas; and the denizens of the great world very seldom came to her. Her letters, therefore, are gossip, social, personal, and literary, of a tolerably readable kind. Literary men and women—especially those who live by literature—keep their best thoughts for their books. The most pleasing, perhaps, of the letters are those which are most like the most pleasing of Miss Mitford's books—"Our Village," in which she has exhibited her graphic appreciation of what is beautiful in the country and country life, the only faculty of high value, in fact, which she possessed. These two passages, for instance, describing two cricket matches—the gentlemen's and the peasants'

* "The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, authoress of 'Our Village,' etc. Told by Herself in Letters to her Friends. Edited by the Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1870.

—and taken from different parts of the book, form a pretty and amusing pair of vignettes:

"'Pray, are you a cricketer?' We are very great ones—I mean our parish, of which we, the feminine members, act audience, and, though we do not play, o'erlook the balls. When I wrote to you last, I was just going to see a grand match in a fine old park near us, Bramshill, between Hampshire, with Mr. Budd, and All England. I anticipated great pleasure from so grand an exhibition, and thought, like a simpleton, the better play the more enjoyment. Oh, what a mistake! There they were—a set of ugly old men, white-headed and bald-headed (for half of Lord's was engaged in the combat, players and gentlemen, Mr. Ward and Lord Frederick, the veterans of the green), dressed in tight white jackets (the Apollo Belvedere could not bear the hideous disguise of a cricketing jacket), with neckcloths primly tied round their throats, fine japanned shoes, silk stockings, and gloves, instead of our fine village lads, with their unbuttoned collars, their loose waistcoats, and the large shirt-sleeves, which give an air so picturesque and Italian to their glowing, bounding youthfulness—there they stood, railed in by themselves, silent, solemn, slow, playing for money, making a business of the thing, grave as judges, taciturn as chess-players—a sort of dancers without music, instead of the glee, the fun, the shouts, the laughter, the glorious confusion of the country game. And there were we, the lookers-on, in tents and marquees, fine and freezing, dull as the players, cold as this hard summer weather, shivering and yawning and trying to seem pleased, the curse of gentility on all our doings, as stupid as we could have been in a ball-room. I never was so much disappointed in my life. But everything is spoilt when money puts its ugly nose in. To think of playing cricket for hard cash! Money and gentility would ruin any pastime under the sun. Much to my comfort (for the degrading my favorite sport into a 'science,' as they were pleased to call it, had made me quite spiteful), the game ended unsatisfactorily to all parties, winners and losers. Old Lord Frederick, on some real or imaginary affront, took himself off in the middle of the second innings, so that the two last were played without him, by which means his side lost, and the other could hardly be said to win. So be it always when men make the noble game of cricket an affair of bettings and hedgings, and, may be, of cheatings."

"I was this afternoon for an hour on Heckfield Heath: a common dotted with cottages and a large piece of water backed by woody hills; the nearer portion of ground a forest of oak and birch, and hawthorn and holly, and fern intersected by grassy glades; a road winding through; and behind us the tall trees of Strathfieldsaye Park. On an open space, just large enough for the purpose, a cricket match was going on—the older people sitting by on benches; the younger ones lying about under the trees, and a party of boys just seen glancing backward and forward in a sunny glade, where they were engaged in an equally merry and far more noisy game. Well, there we stood, Ben and I and Flush, watching and enjoying the enjoyment we witnessed. And I thought if I had no pecuniary anxiety, if my dear father were stronger and our dear friend well, I should be the happiest creature in the world, so strong was the influence of that happy scene."

The fox-hunt at Bramshill is another good breath of the freshest country air; it deserves to be taken into consideration in the controversy which is being carried on between Mr. Freeman on one side and Mr. Anthony Trollope and other literary sportsmen on the other, touching the moral effects and the lawfulness of fox-hunting. The following obituary of a British yeoman also claims attention when Tennyson's Lincolnshire farmer is in everybody's mind:

"I was greatly shocked last week, my dear Sir William, by the sudden death of a most kind and worthy friend, Mr. Newell, of Whitby Park, near Reading. He made a coursing-party for me on Thursday, and on Sunday he was in his coffin. Active, cheerful, hospitable, intelligent, he was one of the most respectable of that respectable class—the great English farmer. I never, indeed, knew any one so thoroughly English, in person, manner, and mind. Firm, stout, and upright as one of his own oaks, he had a countenance combining a great deal of weather-beaten, middle-aged beauty with a look of irresistible kindness, frankness, and good-humor—a voice that might have hailed a ship at sea without the assistance of a speaking-trumpet, and a heart that trusted to that voice every movement of its honest and generous feelings."

A power of painting is shown in this description of Southampton Water:

"I have just returned from Southampton. Have you ever been at that lovely spot, which combines all that is enchanting in wood and land and water with all that is 'buxom, blithe, and debonair' in society—that charming town which is not a watering-place only because it is something better? Do not be afraid of a long description. The scenery of the south of Hampshire is of all others the most difficult to describe; for it is not the picturesque, which may be thrown off in a few careless strokes, or the sublime, which with the wish to delineate it almost inspires the power, but the beautiful—sometimes in its gayest and sometimes in its softest dress—but always the beautiful, of which the prevailing and pervading charm is not the woods or streams or villages, nor even the sparkling ocean, but the exquisite arrangement and combination of the whole. Southampton has, however, in my eyes, an attraction independent even of its scenery, in the total absence of the vulgar hurry of business or the chilling apathy of fashion. It is, indeed, all life, all gaiety; but it has an airiness, an animation, which might become the capital of Fairyland. The very motion of its playful waters, uncontaminated by commerce or by war, seems in unison with the graceful yachts that sail upon their bosom; while the shores, fringed with oak to the very margin, and studded with the fairest vestiges of ancient magnificence and modern comfort, seem to connect the past with the present like the wild yet bewitching imagery of a poet's dream."

The "wild yet bewitching imagery of a poet's dream" almost spoils the whole passage; but take those words away and you have a good example of a description which gives the spirit as well as the form of a landscape, and presents not only the parts but the whole.

There is in these letters, of course, plenty of talk about the literary men of the day and their works. But the criticisms are ill-considered, impulsive, wavering; sometimes tainted with jealousy of greater reputations, sometimes with direct rivalry, for Miss Mitford betrayed in her literary character the human weakness which in her domestic character she either never knew or heroically repressed. The criticism on Dickens and Tennyson is self-contradictory. The criticism on Mrs. Beecher Stowe seems to us tainted with jealousy; there is a very angry allusion to the great fortune which Mrs. Stowe was said to have made. Direct rivalry, we fear, inspires the odious remarks on Talfourd, who had once been Miss Mitford's peculiar protégé and bosom friend. It is difficult for authors to criticise their competitors in the same department, even if they have the critical faculty by nature. But Miss Mitford had it not. She speaks of Addison as "Bacon much diluted," and of Johnson as "Bacon on stilts" Of Walter Scott, she says: "Besides being in his Life of Dryden and elsewhere as dull as the dull weed that grows on Lethe bank (he never could have written 'Guy Mannering,' I am sure, it is morally impossible), is the most egregious, unblushing flatterer that ever poured his slimy nonsense into a monarch's ear." Her criticisms on men are of as little value as her criticisms on books; she adores and hates with energy, but without reason. She is a vehement partisan of Napoleon and Lord Byron; and if the Stowe-Byron controversy had not happily run its unlovely course, she would probably be called into court as a witness for Lord Byron against his wife, though she has not a particle of real evidence to contribute. But in both cases her partisanship is based on nothing; it is the mere emotion of a Whig lady. Americans will note with interest her testimony, with which all other testimony concurs, to the immense sensation produced in England by Daniel Webster. One gentleman who had heard him speak at Oxford told Miss Mitford that he would go to hear him make the same speech over again—a compliment higher, probably, than any which an English orator ever drew from English lips.

The early letters are frightful specimens of precocity and conceit. In her eleventh year the girl writes to her father of her aunt: "I hope that I may be wrong in my opinion of my aunt; but I again repeat that I think she has the most hypocritical drawl that I ever heard." As she has said it before without effective rebuke, we know where the fault really lies. It is wonderful to see such a character as portrays itself here, and in the frivolity and apparent egotism of some of the subsequent letters, suddenly, on the arrival of overwhelming misfortune, reveal a latent strength, meet ruin without a murmur, write a strong business letter when you would have expected a fit of hysterics, and take up with serene cheerfulness the burden of a life.

Private letters or diaries ought never to be published while they can give pain to any living person; literature can never gain half what society loses by a violation of this rule; literature itself could lose greatly if a restraint were placed by the fear of publication on the intercourse of eminent men. The editor of Miss Mitford's letters seems to have recognized the rule and tried to observe it, but he has not always been quite successful. There must be living persons who will be greatly pained by the aspersions on Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Judge Talfourd, and Mr. Valpy, the eminent scholar and publisher, if anything can give pain which is marked as much by levity as by passion. One of the letters contains a frank and very honorable apology to a friend, whom in one of the outbursts of her temper Miss Mitford had justly offended. The editor should have given her credit for the right feeling which, upon reflection, would have dictated a similar retractation in other cases, and he should, at all events, have suppressed the names.

In point of composition, the letters have no merit. Frequent posts, telegraphs, and the publication of all the news, have nearly put an end to elaborate letter-writing; and probably the epistolary form of composition is becoming obsolete. But when it flourished it required, like every other kind of composition, literary effort to make it perfect, not the less because its peculiar grace is ease. The gods have given nothing to man without labor; least of all, the unlabored. If people believe that there is no literary effort in the letters of Madame de Sévigné and Horace Walpole, they never were more mistaken in their lives. Cowper avows that he was a paragon of the limæ labor, and that his manuscripts were masses of blotting and interlineation—a fact of which the delightful ease of his writings would in itself be sufficient to apprise us. If he did not compose his letters in the same way, we may be sure that those of them which charm us most were cast in his mind before they were written. Miss Mitford had not time to be a good letter-writer; her day was taken up, her brain was jaded by work of another kind. "I am now chained to a desk," she says, "eight, ten, twelve hours a day, at mere drudgery; all my thoughts of writing are for hard money." How, then, could she in her correspondence find mental power for the happy expressions, the graceful turns, and the artlessness so full of art, to which, no doubt, Madame de Sévigné's whole mind was given. The letters of Miss Mitford have no pretension to the character of works of art; they are mere medleys, such as one scrawls off in an odd half-hour to an uncritical friend; more, perhaps, because something must be said than because one has anything to say, and rather following one's pen than guiding it. We cannot say, therefore, materiem superavit opus: if interesting matter is wanting, the form will not atone for its absence.

To review Miss Mitford's other writings is beyond our present purpose. She had, we repeat, talent and facility, but no genius; she wrote for bread, chained to her desk all day long. She produced, under these adverse circumstances, dramas which had and deserved a temporary success, and one of which is even yet not dead. She produced, no doubt, a mass of contributions to periodicals, which have perished with the periodicals themselves. The best of her works, as we have said before, is "Our Village," and the next best is "Belford Regis," in which she photographs (for she had not imagination enough to paint anything but portraits) the life of a country town. In "Our Village" one finds, among other things, a religious enjoyment of the beauty of nature which, if we do not mistake the general cast of Miss Mitford's character, would scarcely have been expected by her friends, but which has its explanation and the warrant of its sincerity in the history of her devoted life:

"What a sunset—how golden, how beautiful! The sun just disappearing, and the narrow, liny clouds which a few minutes ago lay like soft vapory streaks along the horizon, lighted up with a golden splendor that the eye can scarcely endure, and those still softer clouds which floated above them wreathing and curling into a thousand fantastic forms, as thin and changeful as summer smoke, now defined and deepened into grandeur, and edged with ineffable, insufferable light! Another minute, and the brilliant orb totally disappears, and the sky above grows every moment more varied and more beautiful as the dazzling, golden lines are mixed with glowing red and gorgeous purple, dappled with small dark specks, and mingled with such a blue as the egg of the hedge-sparrow. To look up at that glorious sky, and then to see that magnificent picture reflected in the clear and lovely Lodden water, is a pleasure never to be described and never forgotten. My heart swells and my eyes fill as I write of it, and think of the immeasurable majesty of nature and the unspeakable goodness of God, who has spread an enjoyment so pure, so peaceful, and so intense before the meanest and lowliest of his creatures."

We will not insist on the theological form of expression if the Positivists object. But Nature, whether it be owing to anything divine in her, or merely to some physical correlation, yields no such gladness, no such cause for thankfulness, no such swelling of the heart or filling of the eyes, to any but those who are essentially pure in heart, and whose feet are on the path of duty.

Search for Winter Sunbeams in the Riviera, Corsica, Algiers, and Spain. By Samuel S. Cox, author of "The Buckeye Abroad," "Eight Years in Congress," etc. With numerous illustrations. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.)—Hon. S. S. Cox—whose name in full, we venture to suggest, might henceforward as appropriately be read Sunbeam-seeking as Sunset Cox—has travelled through a part of the ground described by Dr. Henry Bennet, of London and Mentone, in his work, recently introduced to our readers, on "The Riviera, Mentone, Italy, Corsica, Sicily, Algeria, Spain, and Biarritz, as Winter Climates." A part of his journey he made in company of that physician himself. While the learned doctor searched for winter climates, the pursuit of the learned Congressman "was for Winter Sunbeams." We have no hesitation in saying "learned Congressman," strange as the association of the two words may appear, for the Hon. author, whose exceptional attainments are well known, actually opens his book with a Hebrew quotation, "Yehi or vayehi or," printed in real Hebrew letters—evidently for the benefit of the Hebrew portion of his "constituents of the Sixth Congressional District of the City of New York," to whom he has "the honor and pleasure of dedicating these 'Sunbeams of travel.'" And this learned and sacred quotation is immediately followed by a remark taken from the Greek of that "heathen teacher, Longinus"—teacher of Zenobia, Queen of the East, let us add, in order to prove our own scholarship—which is not given in original Hellenic, probably because Mr. Cox numbers few Hellenes among his constituents. Then comes, in the third line of the book, an allusion to a tender illustration of "the poet Campbell," and on the fourth page we already read of grave "discussions which Hippocrates, Newton, Mead, Jackson, Lardner, Brewster, Lindley, Balfour, Draper, Hammond, Page, Herschel, Arago, Florence Nightingale, Sanson Alphonse, and Dr. Forbes Winslow have considered in elaborate treatises." And if anybody still doubts the extensive lore of our author, let him advance as far as page 10, where, in a few lines, he can read of "prehistoric and historic nations;" of "Phœnician, Hebrew, and Egyptian; Greek, Roman, Goth, and Moor; Frank, Spanish, German, and English;" of "Homer and Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, and Milton;" of "Joshua, Charlemagne, Abderrahaman, Bonaparte, and Wellington;" of "Mahmoud [meaning Mahomet, we suppose], Henry IV., Charles V., Lorenzo the Magnificent, and Gonsalva;" of "Columbus, de Gama, Angelo, Murillo, Gutenberg, and Newton."

We must, however, hasten to add that Mr. Cox has also had the less learned portion of his constituents, and of the public at large, in view when writing his book, for it is not in every part as fully stuffed with scholarly reminiscences of a more or less hoary past, but also abounds in descriptions—here and there plain, instructive, and full, more often humorous, racy, and seasoned with puns—of things seen and seeable in the interesting and so widely diversified countries washed by the Western Mediterranean. It has also a full supply of fine and very characteristic illustrations, some of them taken from other books on the same subjects. The descriptions may be said to be readable throughout, even after Dr. Bennet's much less witty and funny, and therefore generally much better, sketches of the same localities and things. Mr. Cox is a keen and diligent observer, and would make an excellent tourist were he not apt to drown his observations in floods of humor, and that a humor more often indifferent or bad than felicitous and tasteful. Few will relish a description of an amphitheatre of rocks "likened to a grand granite Congress," the rocks "silent as Congress is not," "their postures rather stiff for eloquent gentlemen;" among them "one half-boulder, half-granite sort of member, whom . . . all agreed was a general as much renowned in debate as in war, in discussion as in concussion;" upon whose "bald head" the traveller clambered, when "the surf below bellowed its applause," "the lizards, which were lobbying around, came out to see," and "an occasional goat looked down from the galleries," until "down came the gravel"—an allusion to the Speaker's gavel—"and down came" Mr. Cox, as funny as ever. Nor do we find much beauty in a piece of Algerian history told thus: "The old Dey lost his temper, and slapped the consul in the face with his fan. It was 'all Dey' with him then. The consul retired without saying 'good Dey,' and (if I may be again permitted) the prospects of that Dey were not afterwards so brilliant." And still less can we admire that sketch of a scene in Algiers (p. 132), in which the words "rag," "ragged," and "raggedness" have been crammed more than twenty times into less than twenty lines. There are, however, some good puns—as when he speaks of the "date-palms in fruit and flower, and some so old they are without date"—and some good descriptions, though none better than the following:

"To an unaccustomed tourist, almost the first object on the route to Fort Napoleon [near Algiers] is the cactus. It is so common and so high. It is the hedge or dividing line between farms. . . . Lions, tigers, hyenas, and jackals, yet in plenty here, hardly dare attack a cactus fence. We perceive, also, some bamboo hedges. Upon the road we meet a team which smacks of the Yankee—a wagon drawn by two oxen, and a horse in the lead. It is driven by a Kabyle sometimes, but generally by a French colonist. We meet heavy wagons with ten horses or mules. The animals are feeding out of baskets as they go. Now and then, a big bird—the heron—dashes by us and lights in a distant marsh, or presents a good shot from the top of a haystack. Sheep and goats are seen. Charcoal in loads, in wagons, and on donkeys, passes by. In the early morn the blue smoke of the charcoal-burners is seen curling through the mists of the distant mountain. The Atlas range seems far upon out right and front. Great shadows hang down its sides, like the furrowed folds of a garment. The clouds to the south, towards Blidah and Milianah and the desert, lead us in our imagination thither, though our course lies towards the Kabyle land and breakfast. We pass by houses—long, one-story houses—walled in. In fact, they are known as 'fortified farms.' . . . In the fields of the Metidji Valley, over which we are rolling, we perceive the ploughs at work. Far up into the mountains, five, six, and sometimes ten ploughs are going on one farm. . . . You perceive in yonder field, walking with dignity, holding one handle—the only one—some Kabyle Cincinnatus, robed in his flowing burnous, every inch a Roman, clad in his toga."

Principles of Domestic Science. By Catherine E. Beecher and H. B. Stowe. (New York: J. B. Ford & Co. 1870.)—Montaigne tells us that Francis of Brittany replied to one who informed him that his contemplated spouse was home-bred and unlearned, that he liked her the better for that, since it was sufficient for a woman to distinguish between her husband's shirt and his doublet. It will be seen that our authors and this feudal duke entertain the same general idea of woman's province, but the difference in their view of its dignity and demands is the work of five progressive centuries. Woman's profession, they say, "is to sustain the many difficult and sacred duties of the family state."

Hitherto the professional assistance which women have received from books has been almost wholly confined to collections of receipts for the various departments of housekeeping. But as these receipts are simply rules of domestic art, to be memorized and employed for a stated purpose, they can never stimulate intelligence; whereas scientific principles, when once mastered, can be variously applied. These principles it is the aim of the work before us to elucidate. Thus, when its writers consider the subject of ventilation, they do not merely inform us where one register is to be placed and another is to appear, which would be simply a receipt for ventilation, but they give us the law which regulates the relation of hot and cold air—a law with whose aid an intelligent mind can solve many domestic problems not specifically treated, as, for example, why a fire consumes more rapidly in cold than in mild weather. Again, in their consideration of health, they give us the physiology of the skin, the lungs, and the stomach, the composition of the air and of food, and their relations to our organism; and in their chapter on Charity they confine themselves to no Jewish receipts for giving, such as tithes and first-fruits, but expound those principles which should govern all Christian benevolence.

We regret that a book which is almost original in its application of the only true scientific method to woman's profession should not have been written with exclusive reference either to school or library use. As it is, much of the work is too little compact for a text-book, and too elementary when regarded as a series of scientific essays for adult reading. But be this as it may, "Domestic Science" is a serious literary effort which is calculated to inspire women with reverence, taste, and capacity for their life work, and we trust that it will prove the pioneer of many more books of its kind—books which shall make women independent of empiricism, and teach them that their calling is above even an intelligent trade, and may be exalted to a learned profession—which shall show them that this profession, like all others, has its own code of etiquette and honor, and that they who undertake its responsibilities should feel bound to help the needy and those less skilled than themselves, to eschew all jealousy and slander of sister practitioners, and to keep good faith in every professional relation.

But, say the strong-minded, is a woman to have no thought beyond the four walls of home and the province of charity? We answer, is a merchant to enjoy no conception outside of his shop, or a lawyer beyond his reports? In truth, both men and women who would attain dignity and influence must seek the wide nurture of religion, science, politics, literature, and friendship, and with all the powers of this expanded being devote themselves to their profession.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Aguilar (Grace), Home Influence	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Bland (T. A.), Farming as a Profession, swd	(Loring)	$0 30
Büchner (Dr. L.), Die Stellung des Menschen in der Natur, Part 2, swd	(B. Westermann & Co.)
Commercial and Financial Register, 1870	(Wm. B. Dana & Co.)	1 00
Cowles (Rev. H.), Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, No. 25, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	0 50
Henderson (Rev. E.), Book of the Prophet Ezekiel	(W. F. Draper)
Hagans (Judge M. B.), Opinion in J. D. Minor vs. Board of Education, swd	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)
Kapp (F.), Immigration, and the Commissioners of Emigration of N. Y., swd	(New York)
Littell's Living Age, Vol. XVI., Jan.–Mar., 1870	(Littell & Gay)
Lanoye (F. de), The Sublime in Nature	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	1 50
Memoirs of Samuel Pepys, comprising his diary and correspondence	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Melvill (Rev. H.), Sermons, 2 vols.	(James Miller)
Merchants and Bankers' Almanac for 1870	(New York)	5 00
Preu (M. Th.), German Primer	(G. P. Putnam & Son)	1 00
Reason why Christians should read God's Word in Greek, 2d ed., swd	(John Wiley & Son)	0 25
Spooner (L.), No Treason: The Constitution of no Authority, swd	(Boston)
Sorrento, Wood-Carving, swd	(Loring)	0 25
Spencer (H.), Principles of Psychology, Part II., swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Smith (Dr. W.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XXV., swd	(Hurd & Houghton)	0 75
Sauzay (A.), Wonders of Glass-Making in all Ages	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	1 50
Spencer (C. H.), Americanism and Other Isms, swd	(New York)
The Bible in the Public Schools, swd	(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.)	0 25
The Six Cushions: a Tale	(Wm. V. Spencer)	1 00
Twenty-fifth Annual Report of N. Y. Prison Association, swd	(New York)

An Oxford Graduate and Good Business Man, thoroughly posted, by a residence abroad, on Foreign Affairs, who has had experience in this country in the Editorial and Reportorial departments, desires an engagement on some influential periodical. Is competent to manage a weekly. Satisfactory reference given. Address "Ajax," care Publisher of the Nation, Box 6,732, New York P. O.

DR. M'COSH'S LOGIC.

The Laws of Discursive Thought.

BEING A

TEXT-BOOK OF FORMAL LOGIC.

By JAMES McCOSH, LL.D.,

President of New Jersey College, Princeton; formerly Professor of Logic and Metaphysics, Queen's College, Belfast.

12mo, price..... .....$1 50.

JUST PUBLISHED BY

ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS,

530 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

1. The Method of Divine Government, Physical and Moral. $2 50.
2. Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation. $2 50.
3. The Intuitions of the Mind. $3.
4. A Defence of Fundamental Truth. $3.
5. Inaugural Address at Princeton. 50c.

 Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

A Life of the Great Lord Fairfax,

Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Parliament of England.

By CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, F.S.A.

With Portrait, Maps, Plans, etc.

8vo, $5.

The Land-War in Ireland.

A HISTORY FOR THE TIMES.

By James Godkin, Author of "Ireland and her Churches."

8vo, cloth, $3 50.

On Labor, its Wrongful Claims and Rightful Dues, its Actual, Present, and Possible Future.

By WILLIAM THOMAS THORNTON.

Second Edition, with additions, $4 50.

A System of Medicine.

Edited by J. RUSSELL REYNOLDS, M.D., F.R.S.

Vol. I. Containing General Diseases.

Second Edition, $8.

The Caged Lion.

By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE, Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe."

With Illustrations, $1 75.

Estelle Russell.

By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo."

2 vols. post 8vo, $3.

The Story of Pauline.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

By G. C. Clunes.

2 vols., $3.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

63 BLEECKER STREET, N. Y.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY

Cassell, Petter & Galpin,

LONDON, and 596 BROADWAY, N. Y.

The World of the Sea. Finely Illustrated, partly in colors and chromo-lithography. Cloth, $10.

Illustrated Travels Around the World. An invaluable work, edited by H. W. Bates, of the English Royal Geographical Society. Profusely illustrated with Wood Engravings of the highest class. Volume I., plain cloth, $7 50; handsomely bound in full gilt cloth, $9. This work is also published in Monthly Parts at 50 cents each.

Selections from the Choice Works of Thomas Hood. Illustrated by Doré. With Steel Engravings, $10; in Photography, $20.

Cassell's Illustrated Shakespeare. Illustrations by C. H. Sclous, painter of the great picture, "The Crucifixion." 3 vols. cloth, $17.

The World of Wonders Illustrated. An Epitome of the Most Curious Marvels in Nature, Science, and Art. Cloth, gilt, $5.

The Child's Bible. Beautifully illustrated throughout with fine original engravings. Bound in cloth, gilt, $12; bound in best Levant morocco, $18.

Æsop's Fables. Illustrated by Ernest Griset. This work is Mr. Griset's masterpiece, full of talent and of infinite humor. Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt, $7 50.

The Poets of Greece. By Edwin Arnold, of University College, Oxford. 8vo, cloth, $5.

The Scenery of Greece. Fifty exquisite Steel Engravings, by W. Linton. Cloth, gilt, $15.

NEW TECHNICAL SERIES,

AT ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Hand-Books of Science and Art, practically applied to the various branches of Skilled Workmanship. By E. A. DAVIDSON, of the South Kensington Museum.

Linear Drawing. Adapted to Trade Manufactures and Design. With about 150 illustrations. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Projection. Plans, Elevations, and Sections of Solids, and Development of Surfaces. For Masons, Carpenters, Builders, Architects, Metal-Plate Workers, Plumbers, and artisans generally. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Building Construction and Architectural Drawing. Plans, Elevations, Sections, Working Drawings, etc., etc. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Drawing for Carpenters and Joiners. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Systematic Drawing. Foolscap 8vo, $1.

Any Book on this List sent postage or express paid, on receipt of price.

Post-Office orders to be made payable to

ROBERT TURNER, Manager,

596 Broadway, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED
BY
Charles Scribner & Co.

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF THE ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY OF WONDERS.

I.

The Sublime in Nature;

From Descriptions of celebrated Travellers and Writers.

By FERDINAND LANOYE.

Illustrated with 48 Woodcuts. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

A large number of localities, famous for their grandeur and natural beauties, are described in this volume, and in the most charming manner possible, because the descriptions given have been selected from the writings of the most distinguished authors and travellers. The Illustrations, several of which are from the pencil of Gustav Doré, reproduce scenes in this country as well as in foreign lands.

II.

THE WONDERS OF GLASS-MAKING:

Its Description and History from the Earliest Times to the Present.

By A. SAUZAY.

With 67 Illustrations on Wood. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

CRITICAL NOTICE.

'All the information which the general reader needs on the subject will be found here, in a very intelligible and attractive form.—N. Y. Evening Post.

JUST PUBLISHED,

IN THE ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY OF WONDERS,

Each 1 vol. 12mo, beautifully illustrated, price $1 50 per vol.

THE SUN.	INTELLIGENCE OF ANIMALS.
WONDERS OF POMPEII.	WONDERS OF HEAT.
EGYPT 3,300 YEARS AGO.	WONDERS OF OPTICS.
GREAT HUNTS.	THUNDER AND LIGHTNING.

VOLUMES XI. AND XII. OF THE LIBRARY EDITION OF Froude's History of England.

2 vols. crown 8vo, price per vol., $3.

COMPLETING THE WORK.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"Yields to none of the previous volumes in interest and importance. . . . A masterpiece of laborious research, clear narrative, and vivid realizations. . . . As to his narrative, it must be admitted to be admirable by everybody. It has simplicity, energy, force, and clearness."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"The book is an acquisition to modern literature."—Philadelphia Age.

"This history is a monument of patient research and long labor. The story is told clearly, cleverly, and brilliantly, and the characters of history are made vital and clear to us."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

ALSO, JUST PUBLISHED.

MRS. JERNINGHAM'S JOURNAL. 1 vol. 16mo, price 75 cents.

VOLUMES VII. AND VIII. of the Popular Edition of FROUDE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. Each 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, price per vol. $1 25.

VOLUMES I. AND II. of MOMMSEN'S ROME. Crown 8vo, per vol. $2 50.

BIBLE ANIMALS. A Historical Commentary on the Holy Scriptures. 1 vol. 8vo, $5.

LIFE OF J. A. ALEXANDER, D.D. 2 vols. 8vo, $5.

LANGE'S PROVERBS. 1 vol. 8vo, $5.

These books for sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, by the publishers upon receipt of price.

CHAS. SCRIBNER & CO.,

No. 654 Broadway, New York.

THE
New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

 Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By John W. Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. In 3 vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, cloth, $3 50 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: A Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoölogy, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $2.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc., etc. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By James Orton, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, etc., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Mrs. William Grey. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General Garibaldi. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. Twenty-fifth Thousand. 8vo, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. C. Steele, Author of "Gardenhurst." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village," etc. Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth, $3 50.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Alton Clyde, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Lyman Abbott, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," etc. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Doré, Delaroche, Durham, and Parsons. 8vo, cloth, beveled edges, $3; gilt edges, $3 50.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Bound to the Wheel," "Martin Pole," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: A Book of Natural History and Adventure. By James Greenwood, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," etc. With 147 illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

KITTY. A Novel. By M. Betham Edwards, Author of "Doctor Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," etc. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, cloth, $5; sheep, $6.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 163 Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, bevelled edges, $3 75.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

NOVELS OF FRIEDRICH SPIELHAGEN.

In uniform style, 12mo, cloth, $2 per volume.

I. Problematic Characters.
Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere. Second Ed.

II. Through Night to Light.
Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere. Second Edition. Thoroughly revised.

III. The Hohensteins.
Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere.

PROF. RAPHAEL PUMPELLY'S NARRATIVE.

Across America and Asia.

Notes of a Five Years' Journey Around the World, and of Residence in Arizona, Japan, and China. By Raphael Pumpelly, Professor in Harvard University, and sometime Mining Engineer in the employ of the Chinese and Japanese Governments. Price $5.

The Mental-Photograph Album.

For Confessions of Tastes, Habits, and Convictions.

4to, cloth, gilt, $1 50; plain morocco, gilt, twice the number of pages contained in the copies bound in cloth, $4; rich Levant morocco, full gilt, three times the number of pages contained in the copies bound in cloth (an elegant book for presentation), $12.

 The Mental Photographs of Mark Twain and C. H. Webb (author of "Liffith Lank") will be sent gratis on application, enclosing stamp.

TAINE.

Italy (Florence and Venice). 8vo, $2 50.

Italy (Rome and Naples). $2 50.

Ideal in Art. 16mo, $1 50.

FISKE.

Tobacco and Alcohol. I. It Does Pay to Smoke. II. The Coming Man will Drink Wine. By John Fiske, Lecturer on Philosophy in Harvard University. 16mo, cloth, $1.

MARTINEAU.

Biographical Sketches. By Harriet Martineau. 8vo, cloth, $2 50,

LEYPOLDT & HOLT.

CONSOLIDATED!

Packard's Monthly

WITH

Phrenological Journal.

See APRIL NUMBER, containing:

Thomas H. Selby, Mayor of San Francisco, with Portrait—Yale Sketches—Mental Requisites of the Artist—Philosophy of Faith—Henry Bergh, with Portrait—The Double Adoption—Men of the Rocky Mountains—Life in China, with Illustrations—Art of Engraving—Nathan C. Ely, President Farmers' Club, with Portrait—Capital vs. Labor—S. S. Packard, with Portrait—Diet of Brain-workers—The Governors of New York—What Makes a Good Writer—"Cheek"—The Modesty of Genius—The Open Way, or Free Moral Agency—Fact or Fiction—A Plea for Bridget—The Swordfish, illustrated—Prayer and Phrenology, etc.

PRICE 30 CENTS, OR $3 A YEAR.

Newsmen have it.

S. R. WELLS, Publisher,
389 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1870.

The Week.

THE work of Wednesday week, by which Texas was admitted and the proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment procured on the same day, may serve as a sufficient apology for Congressional inaction during the past seven days. Not absolute inaction, of course, but no great thing accomplished. The Senate admitted the Texas Senators on Thursday, and Gen. Ames on Friday, the latter against the votes of the Judiciary Committee and of one or two others who thought the precedent not a good one. For the rest, it has chiefly discussed the Georgia Bill. On Friday, Senator Morton introduced a bill to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment. The Texas delegation in the House were admitted only after a "scene" in the case of one of them—a Mr. Conner, who proved to be the smallest sort of game, but who was, nevertheless, attacked and surrounded by three or four members, including Mr. Butler, who showed up the young man's immoralities and inhumanity, and called for his exclusion on account of them. A House which reckons John Morrissey among its members, and which has more than once received back an expelled member when re-elected by his constituents, absolutely declined to set up a standard of private character by which to qualify, and left Mr. Butler and Mr. Shanks in a ridiculous minority. Mr. Conner, on being allowed to speak, after admission, soon showed what sort of a constituency had sent him to Washington, and how little mischief he was likely to breed by his example or by his words. On Friday, Gen. Garfield closed the general debate in Committee on the Tariff Bill, which will now be discussed in detail till disposed of.

The Connecticut election took place on Monday, without the benefit of the negro vote under the Amendment, and in inclement weather, which has always in New England been favorable to the Democratic polling. The result is that Gov. English displaces Gov. Jewell, the rest of the Democratic State Ticket is elected, and only the House is Republican. We leave our readers to make the proper reflections on this event, and to judge for themselves how much it was due to the apathy of the Republicans, or to the reaction on the part of the weak-kneed against negro suffrage when it actually loomed up in the near distance, and how much to Democratic misrepresentations and tactics generally. The position of the negro a year hence, not only in Connecticut, but in every Northern State where his enfranchisement is reluctantly endured, will be something curious to observe, the law having done all for him that it can in the way of removing the senseless prejudice against him. If there is one thing more absurd than the late trifling in the Illinois Constitutional Convention about retaining the word "white" in the new instrument, it is the first of April conduct of the directors of the Philadelphia Academy of Music, in refusing to permit Senator Revels to appear there in a very popular and highly respectable course of lectures. These gentlemen are, we believe, all Republicans, with one exception, and he voted to admit Mr. Revels like any other of the lecturers. It is fair to say that public sentiment in Philadelphia is decidedly against the directors.

The Supreme Court, we are—for reasons we have given more fully elsewhere—very sorry to say, has decided to reopen the legal-tender cases. This result is of course ascribed, and doubtless correctly, to the votes of the new judges, and the application for a re-hearing to the knowledge possessed by interested parties beforehand of what the opinions of the judges on this legal-tender question is. The report is current that Judge Bradley, before mounting the bench, called a meeting of the Camden and Amboy directors—for whom he was counsel—at his office, and advised them to disregard the late decision of the Court. We do not believe this; but the very fact that such a story can get afloat and receive credence, is a sufficient illustration of the danger to the Court of the process through which it is now going. It will never long survive the loss of popular respect, and there is no surer way of destroying this respect than giving people reason to believe it can be packed for the purpose of procuring a particular decision on a particular question. There is some consolation in the fact—for such it is said to be—that the cases which are now to be argued are two old cases, which were passed on the calendar for the purpose of reaching that of Hepburn agt. Griswold, by the decision in which the legal-tender question, in so far as it arose in these two, was to be governed. So that what the Court is now going to do is to allow points which it was understood Hepburn agt. Griswold would settle, to be reargued in two other cases.

The arguments in the case of the contending Mayors of Richmond before the U. S. Circuit Court lasted an entire week, Judge Underwood having rendered his decision and granted an injunction against Mayor Ellyson on Thursday last. The facts of the controversy appear to be these: that the new State Constitution prescribes that the election of mayor shall take place in May by the people, but that after Gen. Canby remitted the State to the civil authorities the Legislature passed an enabling act, in accordance with which Gov. Walker appointed a new city council for Richmond, and this council chose Mr. Ellyson for mayor during the interim between March 17 and the May election. Mayor Chahoon held that this enabling act was unconstitutional, and that he was entitled to retain his office until a legally qualified successor was appointed. The jurisdiction of the Court to which he appealed for protection was the question first in order, and the most interesting and difficult. It was argued by the defendant's counsel with great clearness and force, and in a strictly professional manner. They properly bestowed their chief attention upon it, and treated as secondary the constitutionality of Ellyson's appointment. They denied that Chahoon was a Federal officer, or, if he was, that that afforded ground of jurisdiction to a Federal court so long as he was a citizen of the same State with the defendant; or that a title to office could be tried in equity, instead of at common law. They maintained that the plaintiff had his remedy in a quo warranto, which might be used as well by the incumbent as by the person claiming the office; or in a mandamus. But, in fact, he was not the incumbent, his office having been vacated under the Virginia code, which made him ineligible, as a United States Commissioner, to hold a State office; under the enabling act; and by the expiration of the Reconstruction acts.

The plaintiff's counsel manifested far less ability in this part of the argument, and indeed was saved all trouble by the undisguised leanings of the Judge. They neither met the point squarely nor improved all the opportunities which their side afforded, while the Judge himself simply dismissed the matter as not needing argument, giving no reason for his decision. On the other head—the constitutionality of Ellyson's appointment—the advantage was not so decidedly with his counsel, but both Ex-Governor Wells and Ex-Governor Wise disfigured their arguments with stump and street-corner oratory, and the latter especially bored the court—or would have bored any other than Judge Underwood's—with long-winded digressions, in which he frequently found time to announce that he was "a poor naked rebel, and still a rebel, too." In granting an injunction, Judge Underwood seemed to wish to put his action on the same ground as Gen. Canby's interference in behalf of the public peace, and he utterly refused to allow an appeal to be taken. He even closed his court and left the city, while the marshal sought to execute the injunction. After a counter-injunction from the State Circuit Court, the case has been carried up to the United States Supreme Court, on a motion to dissolve the injunetion; and, as we write, both mayors continue to exercise a distinct and separate authority as heretofore.

The Mormons held a mass-meeting at Salt Lake City last week, at which a long remonstrance against the Cullom Bill, now before the Senate, was drawn up. It is very strong and animated, and claims divine origin for the institution of polygamy, which, the remonstrants say, "was given by God, through Joseph Smith, to the Church of Jesus Christ's Latter-Day Saints." They denounce the bill, therefore, as a measure of persecution, as unconstitutional in a variety of particulars, as cruel, and as likely to encourage "prostitution and corruption." The provision that marriages must be celebrated as civil contracts before civil officers, they call "a discrimination against the officers appointed by Almighty God," and allege that the bill deprives them of "an ordinance, on the administration of which their happiness and eternal welfare depend." They then stand on their rights, as owners of a Territory settled and cultivated before the United States took charge of it, and cite the tolerant example of France and England in dealing with polygamy in India and Algeria. They are evidently thoroughly in earnest, and are ready to suffer for "the principle of plural marriage," as they call it. The only one of their arguments, however, which it is difficult to meet, is that drawn from the divine revelation to Joseph Smith. When a man says in a political discussion that he does a thing because he has been directed to do it by a message from on high, one has either to withdraw from his presence and leave him his liberty, or take a stick to him. There is no middle course, and the statesman must be guarded in deciding which course he will follow by a consideration of the probable result, and not simply by his own feelings about the character of the message.

General Logan replied very tartly last week to General Sherman's letter. The body of his speech was devoted to an attempt to show that his statements regarding the comparative size of "the staff" of the American army and of that of European armies were correct, but it was not successful. There is no doubt that in his first speech he did include under the term "staff" large numbers of persons who are not so included in European military nomenclature. He also fell, in the last speech, into a curious error about the English army, laying it down as the result of his investigations that not only "the colonel of a regiment is, in nine cases out of ten, a general," which is true, but "that the man who commands a regiment is for the most part called a general," which is untrue. "Colonel" is, in England, practically an honorary title, indicating very much the same relation to a regiment that the title of "proprietor" does, or did before 1866, in the Austrian service. "The man who commands the regiment" is the lieutenant-colonel, and he is a bishop about as often as he is a general.

General Logan says he went with his bill to the War Department before he introduced it, and went over it, section by section, with General Sherman and General Belknap, and that the former made only two objections—one of which was that it mustered out general officers; the other, General Logan did not state. The reason why he introduced the provision prohibiting all army officers from holding any civil office, however humble, in addition to their military rank, and thereby displacing the pure and enlightened patriots who now claim those places, was, it seems, that there are several officers in Virginia who now hold staff appointments in the army while drawing pay as State officers; he furnished a list of these villains, from which it appears that they number ten in all. The only portion of the speech which was really successful was his vindication of himself and the Military Committee of the House from the charge of cruelty or inhumanity toward the soldiers. He pointed out that they were all soldiers themselves who had seen hard service, many of them having been scarred or mutilated on the field, and all of whom had retired into civil life, without other reward than the consciousness of having done their duty, content to let others carry off the glory of the fields on which they had helped to conquer. In talking of all this, General Logan was simple, modest, and dignified, and at times eloquent; but at the very close he broke down, and became transformed once more into a War-horse, and reared up in defence of democracy against the British army, "titled nobility," "dukes," "marquises," and other pernicious persons. He snorted out an enquiry "whether this attack on him meant that this country was to be subverted into the hands of powerful military men, who are to become aristocrats here as they are in Europe;" "whether titles are to be established here;" and "whether a body of nobility are to grow up here?"

We are sorry to say, from all we see and hear, that the answers to these questions must be in the affirmative. It has been commonly supposed hitherto, by theoretical men, that "aristocracy" or "caste" was the result either of conquest or difference of race combined with conquest, or of long ages of turbulence, giving decided advantages to the strong hand and clear head. But it seems impossible to deny any longer that facilities for the growth of caste exist on American soil, such as the territory of the Old World has never offered, and that "a caste" can be got up here, even among men of the same race, within five years, such as paltry old Europe could not turn out in a thousand. The proofs of this we find in the widespread dread of aristocracy which exists among politicians, and politicians are usually shrewd men, who know what is in the wind. There is nothing for which they are so constantly on the watch, and against which they deem it necessary to take so many precautions. For instance, when a reform in the Civil Service was proposed in the House last winter, General Logan opposed it violently, on the ground that it would result in the establishment of an aristocracy; when, last summer, Mr. Curtis, of Boston, had a scuffle in the cars and pulled a man's nose, and had to go to jail for it, three or four hundred indomitable Massachusetts politicians petitioned the Governor not to pardon him, on the ground that he had pulled that nose with the design of "establishing caste in America." We find, too, that nearly every attempt to exact any test or qualification of anybody for the performance of any public duty, has to be given up through fear of "caste." All this shows that the air is thick with "caste," and that it only needs the turning of a hair to convert us all into noblemen and commoners. We are glad, therefore, that the politicians are keeping a bright lookout; but then we should be guilty of unpardonable deception if we professed to believe that they will succeed in warding off the catastrophe. "Caste," we fear, has to come; and when General Logan asked whether the generals "were going to become aristocrats," he may depend upon it he startled many a guilty conspirator in his gilded saloon. He alluded, and not inaptly, to General Sherman's "receptions." What do those "receptions" mean? Where does he get the money to pay the fawning caterer who supplies the suppers? What has a soldier to do with "receptions?" Do the hardy privates who won his battles for him give "receptions?"

The Boston press ought to take notice that its silence regarding the Hartford and Erie swindle, which is now fully exposed, is producing a very unfavorable impression in this sinful part of the world, and is shutting the mouths of those reformers who have been in the habit of pointing to Massachusetts, and especially Boston, as a place New York would do well to copy. The relations of the Hartford and Erie corporation to the Governor and State Legislature have been marked, at least, by extraordinary simplicity on the side of the latter, and most audacious rascality on the side of the former, and have now furnished subject for scandal, to which we have repeatedly called attention for over a year; but all the people have ever learnt of them through the Massachusetts press has come from the Springfield Republican. Now, people are very apt to believe the worst of a community whose press is silent about its abuses, the existence of the abuses being known, and we therefore invite our Boston brethren most earnestly to reinforce the Republican. It is a little late, we admit, and the Republican may not be willing to share its honors, but decency requires some little burst of indignation before the affair blows over.

Some evil-disposed person, writing in the Times on Sunday last, makes a most disgraceful assault on the Hon. Horace Greeley. Our readers may remember that Mr. Greeley had a controversy of a very animated kind some time ago with Mr. D. A. Wells about the wool-clip for the year 1868. Mr. Wells set it down, in his last report, at 177,000,000 lbs. For making this statement, Mr. Greeley, in the Tribune, heaped ridicule on him—called him a "Munchausen Special," and, sarcastically, "an accurate and accomplished Special Commissioner," and recommended his figures to the Committee on the United States Census, if they desired something "remarkable" for "the introductory remarks for the volumes of the Census Reports in 1870." To this Mr. Wells replied that he had taken his figures from the Report of the President of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, namely, that highly respected protectionist, Mr. E. B. Bigelow. The Tribune conscientiously refrained from publishing Mr. Wells's letter, and for a time did not even notice his reply, and, when it did so, gave Mr. Wells to understand that the learned and thoughtful conductors of that paper considered him an ass. The dastardly writer in the Times, however, has now gone and ferreted out the following passage from Mr. Greeley's great work on the "Science of Political Economy:"

"Mr. Erastus B. Bigelow, an eminent inventor of machinery adapted to the production of woollens, and President of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, reports our aggregate product of wool in 1868 at 177,000,000 pounds, or nearly thrice the amount we produced in 1860; while the value of our annual product of woollen fabrics is given by him at $175,000,000, against a like product of $68,865,963 in 1860. And this increase in value is made in defiance of a very considerable reduction in the average price of those fabrics since 1860.

"I have termed the above statements estimates, but they were founded on returns made to the National Association from the various manufactories throughout the country, with nearly all of which it is in correspondence. Their general accuracy is confirmed by the officially reported fact that, while our annual consumption has largely increased, our importation, whether of wool or woollens, is actually less in 1868 than it was in 1860."

The discreditable feature in this transaction is, that the Times makes no mention of the note in Mr. Greeley's volume, nor yet of the handsome editorial paragraph in the Tribune, in which he apologizes to Mr. Wells for insulting him and accusing him of falsehood and misrepresentation. Cannot the Times be fair to a great controversialist?

The farce known as the Red River rebellion has at last culminated in bloodshed, the pretender Riel having shot without trial—though with the forms of an examination before a non-English-speaking "court" or "jury"—and in the most brutal manner, one of his opponents by the name of Scott. The news of this outrage will strengthen the purpose of the Home Government to send out an expedition this spring to the Winnipeg country to reassert its supremacy; but the Government of the Dominion gives no sign of being roused even by this extreme of insult and cruelty on the part of "the young Napoleon of the Northwest." Its vacillation and hesitation and concessions through all this business have been thoroughly disgraceful, and its agents have only reflected the timidity and incapacity of the ministry.

The more detailed reports of the trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte which continue to come in, furnish curious reading for persons not familiar with French criminal procedure. The examination or cross-examination of witnesses by counsel is unknown in France, that duty being reserved to the Court, and dexterity in it is one of the qualifications of a good judge. But the result is that there are no "rules of evidence." Everything that has the remotest connection with the case is welcome, hearsay of all kinds included; and the witnesses mix up their opinions with their facts somewhat in the style of a parlor narrative, broken by attempts on the part of the judge to trip the narrator up, or point out the moral of what he is saying, or indicate the course which virtue ordained under the circumstances described. At the Bonaparte trial the excitement of the occasion led to nearly everybody having his say, the prisoner included, who from time to time gave the witnesses a piece of his mind, and was "sauced" by them in return. The "statesmen" of the Marseillaise covered themselves with glory. Rochefort was "quiet and dignified"—though one part of his testimony was that another man had once told him to beware of the Prince, because he was a sorry rascal. The hero of the occasion was, however, that renowned publicist, Paschal Grousset, also of the Marseillaise, whose challenge the unfortunate Noir was carrying, the cause being the Prince's having expressed a desire, in a Corsican paper, that the entrails, or "tripes," as he elegantly expressed it, of the persons connected with that organ, of whom Grousset was one, might be used as manure on the exhausted fields of the island. At the trial Grousset was hilarious; and being asked, as is usual, if he was a relative of the prisoner, replied gracefully that "his [the prisoner's] mother had so many lovers, he could not tell." He followed up this witticism by a vigorous denunciation of the Empire, and had to be removed by the police. Under the radical régime which was to have followed the overthrow of the Empire had the Flourens insurrection succeeded, this man would probably have occupied some high office in the government. Considering that every pains was taken to make the trial decorous and solemn, the report suggests some amusing speculation as to what would have been the nature of the proceedings had Rochefort's demand in the Chamber been complied with, and the Prince been "tried by the people"—that is, by a public meeting of Rochefort's friends and admirers.

As regards politics, it is many a year since France enjoyed so fair a promise of peace and good order. The Emperor has displayed a capacity for giving way which apparently has no limits short of abdication. The Ollivier Ministry, having got over the difficulty of which Jules Favre made so much, about dissolving the Chambers, and taking the sense of the country on the new régime, there remained only the reservation to the Senate of the right of proposing amendments to the constitution to be got rid of to make the Government really and truly constitutional, and this the Emperor has now surrendered. Count Daru's menacing letters about the doctrine of infallibility, which first saw the light in the London Times, have, it is said, been repudiated by his colleagues at least as expressions of the sense of the Cabinet—that is, they are not disposed to make any possible action of the Council a reason for withdrawing the French troops. The hopes of the Liberals with regard to the doings of the Council seem to decline as time wears on, and it is more and more doubtful whether anything can shake the Pope, and whether the dogma of infallibility will not after all be adopted, and "the thrones, principalities, and powers" left to make the best of it. The Jesuits argue that several such risings against the Papacy as that in which the Döllingers and Montalemberts and Hyacinthes are now engaged, have occurred already in the twelfth, thirteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, and, though powerful at the time, they came to nothing, while the Papacy lived on; and this, they predict, will be the result in the present case.

The troubles in Ireland seem to grow with the trouble taken to appease them. The murders and other agrarian outrages have risen steadily and gradually from 87 in 1866, to 767 in 1869, and they go on increasing in number. The Church Bill and the Land Bill, indeed, appear to stimulate the lawless classes to fresh activity, and not unnaturally. The absence of all serious attempts at Irish reform until the Fenian disturbances began has driven the people, by a very legitimate process of reasoning, to the conclusion that it was the disturbances which brought about the reform, and that, as a corollary from this, the more disturbance they make, the more reforms they will get. They evidently expect, now, as our English Correspondent has pointed out, the transfer of the land in perpetuity to the tenants, and are adopting what appears to them the only efficacious mode of bringing it about. O'Donovan Rossa, who appears to be as troublesome a customer as ever fell into a jailer's hands, has been sending to the Marseillaise a highly ornate account of his sufferings in prison, which, if true, would show that English prisons are managed on what might be called demoniacal principles. One of his stories is, that he was yoked to a two-wheeled cart, by a rope run round his neck, and attached to the end of a long pole; when the cart, being loaded with stones, was suddenly allowed to tilt up, with the evident design of hanging him. The prison authorities have published a reply, giving the foundation of this and some other stories, and denying some of his statements point-blank. He is evidently a not over-scrupulous gentleman; but then there is no excuse for treating political prisoners as ordinary convicts.

THE REOPENING OF THE LEGAL-TENDER CASE.

The Attorney-General has applied to the Supreme Court for a re-opening of the legal-tender case, partly because of the importance of the question involved, and partly because of the existence of two vacancies on the bench when the judgment was pronounced, and which are now filled. The Legal-Tender Act was pronounced unconstitutional by four out of seven judges; that is, by a majority of one—the opinion of this one thus outweighing that of a large majority of Congress and of the President, besides that of every State tribunal which has passed on it except one. Upon the decision of the Supreme Court, too, depend not only millions of money, paid or payable under contracts made between private parties, but the exercise by the Government of a power which many consider absolutely necessary to the national safety. Mr. Hoar, therefore, desires to have the question settled by the full Court after another argument, and the Court has granted his request.

Mr. Hoar is not a man from whom any intelligent persons will venture to differ lightly, and especially on a question of law; and even on questions of policy there is no surer or sounder guide. But, then, it is permissible to believe that in making his present application he is acting ministerially, in obedience to a decision of the Cabinet that it is the duty of the Government to sustain, by every means in its power, the presumption on which the legal-tender currency was issued. Moreover, his argument, or at least that portion of it which most interests the public, touched questions of general expediency rather than of interpretation; and we shall, therefore, venture to point out some causes of anxiety, on the part of a large portion of the public, with regard to the whole proceeding, which he has done nothing to remove.

That the Legal-Tender Act has been declared unconstitutional as regards debts contracted before its passage, by a majority of only one, seems an indifferent reason for asking for a re-hearing, inasmuch as the same result may attend the deliberations of a bench of nine. There is in the nature of things no greater reason for respecting a majority of five to four than a majority of four to three. It would, in the former case, be just as great a scandal as in the latter that the judgment of one man should be allowed to outweigh the decision of a majority of Congress, the approval of the President, and the judgment of nearly all the State courts. Indeed, if we come to estimate the judgments of the Supreme Court—as is growing more and more common—by counting the number of heads which concur in forming them, it is almost ridiculous to talk of a majority of eight being in any perceptible degree more respectable than a majority of one, especially if the Court is to be weighed against the Executive, the Legislature, the State courts, and the people. To the arithmetical lawyer or politician the full Court is, even when unanimous, a contemptible body. What are nine judges, after all, as nine objects, compared to the millions of voters to whose breath they owe their existence, and from whose pockets they draw their pay? Nothing; and on a count of noses it will always be absurd to ask the majority to pause and abandon its designs because even the whole Court pronounces an act unconstitutional. In short, popular reverence for, or confidence in, the Court cannot possibly survive the addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division which it has been undergoing during the last five or six years. It is only by treating it as a court, one and indivisible, and treating its judgment as the voice of the Court, whether pronounced by five, six, seven, eight, or nine judges, that its usefulness as an interpreter of the Constitution can possibly survive. We understand very well, as we said when treating this same subject two years ago, the position of a man who rejects in toto the theory that the Court can invalidate an act of Congress, but we do not understand the position of a man who frets and fumes and talks of resistance when only four judges declare a law unconstitutional, but declares his readiness to bow humbly to a similar decision emanating from five judges. There is nothing magical in the number five or in the number nine. Indeed, for mystic power three or seven has claims to respect to which no other arithmetical quantity can make any pretension.

The argument that the decision of the Court should be reconsidered because, when pronounced, two seats on the bench were vacant, would be a cogent one if the number of judges was fixed by the Constitution, and was, therefore, beyond the control of the very body which it is expected to restrain—the majority for the time being in Congress. But, for the very reason that Congress has in its hand the composition of the Court, and can increase the number of judges at pleasure, and that the propriety of increasing their number, by putting on the bench men whose opinions on certain prominent questions had been ascertained beforehand, as a means of reversing disagreeable decisions, has now for several years been talked of by politicians as a legitimate weapon of party warfare, or a legitimate means of evading troublesome constitutional restrictions, we cannot help considering Mr. Hoar's application to have a judgment reopened, for the purpose of getting at the opinions of two new judges, very unfortunate. Should it result in a reversion of the legal-tender decision, we may depend upon it the lesson will not be lost on that active body of gentlemen, in and out of Congress, who hold that all is fair in politics. If the judgment of the Court can be overturned by the advent of two judges to fill vacancies already existing, it can also be overturned by the advent of two, three, or four judges to fill vacancies created by Congress ad hoc. And we venture to predict that, should success attend the present move, persons now living will see this done. It may be that the results attained in this way will be useful; that what Congress seeks will always be better than what the Supreme Court thinks lawful; but there is no question that a court manipulated in this way would be one of the most debasing and perverting institutions ever inflicted on a free country. Not only would it make justice a mockery, and bring judicial proceedings into contempt, but it would carry the popular mind further and further away from that sound view of the judicial function and character which is not only one of the noblest and most precious elements in our jurisprudence, but which all calm observers concede to be, combined with popular education, the great, and indeed the only, safeguard of democratic civilization. We may add, he is not a wise friend of the Union who believes that respect for the Supreme Court, and the habit of bowing to its decisions, will play no part hereafter in preserving the Union. The authority of the Court overthrown, the law would often have no better claim on the respect of dissatisfied sections of a vast continent than what the brute force of an excited Congressional majority would give it; and we believe that, as the world grows in wisdom, the calm deliberations of trained interpreters will count for more in securing men's obedience, and the weight of numerical majorities for less, than it now does. We believe this because we believe God intends the human race to be governed finally by what is best in intellect, and not what is most voluminous in sound or most intense in feeling.

Lastly, we think large numbers of thoughtful men feel that Mr. Hoar enormously exaggerates the importance to the Government of the power of making paper a legal tender. He looks at it, if we may judge from his argument, with the eyes of 1862, when he ought to look at it with the eyes of 1870. Judged by history and principles of human nature, the power of making anything which has no intrinsic value a legal tender in payment of debts is one which no civilized community ought to concede to any government, and which no enlightened government ought to ask for. The history of the power in other countries is one of the grossest fraud. The exercise of it is in fact nothing better than legalized cheating, and has always produced the most calamitous effects on public and private morals and on industry; and the efforts of all jurists and politicians should be directed to building up and strengthening, and not to weakening, the presumption that it is neither necessary nor justifiable. Moreover, the very best minds in the country are now divided as to the effect of the legal-tender feature in keeping up the value of the Government notes. It is very doubtful whether the facilities it offered to knavish debtors for paying off their obligations at a heavy discount, in any considerable degree prevented the decline of the greenbacks, and whether they did not owe almost all the value they have at any time possessed to their cheapness as a circulating medium, and the popular confidence in their final redemption.

But however this may be, the magnitude of the evils they have caused, in lowering the tone of commercial morals and in deranging business, nobody denies, and considering how wildly remote the contingency is that the Government will again find itself in the straits which led to their issue, the question arises whether it is worth while now, by way of provision for it, to break down the Supreme Court, in order to obtain a decision that the perpetration of gigantic fraud is amongst the "necessary" powers conferred by the Constitution on the Government. Why not, in the interest of good faith and of financial order, act on the maxim, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof?" The question may never come up again; let us hope it never will. But if it does, let us labor that the Government may have at its back, in dealing with it, what it had not in 1862—the confidence of the world that when it issues promises to pay they will be redeemed. We may depend upon it that if it should ever issue greenbacks again, the discount they will suffer will be regulated not by what the Supreme Court now says as to its powers of making paper a legal tender, but by what men will remember of its manner of paying its present debts.

It is an immense delusion, to which we are sorry to see Judge Hoar lending his countenance, that the value of Government paper can ever be made dependent on anything but the state of Government credit, i. e., the popular confidence in its honesty. "We care nothing about its legal right to issue this paper," owners of commodities will always say: "what interests us is, whether it is likely to redeem it at par."

SOME CONSIDERATIONS FOR PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIALISTS.

The controversy about the Bible in the schools is rapidly spreading. In this State it promises to furnish, before very long, one of the most exciting political issues we have ever had, owing to the unscrupulousness displayed by the Catholics in obtaining from the Albany Legislature large votes of money—amounting in the present year to half a million of dollars—for the support of their schools. Their success in this sort of operation, too, not unnaturally renders them less disposed than ever to aid their Protestant neighbors in the discovery of a modus vivendi on the school question. They do not care whether Bible-reading in the public schools is abandoned, and, indeed, show some signs of being as much opposed to it as the High Protestant party, who consider the Bible-reading one of the most important parts of the school curriculum. As long as the Bible is read at the opening of the school exercises, and is read for the reasons assigned by Judge Storer in the recent decision of the Superior Court in Cincinnati, and by some Protestant clergy, the priests have an argument in favor of separate Catholic schools such as nothing else could furnish them. All the good which, according to the Protestant view, a Catholic child gets by listening to the Scriptures is, according to the Catholic view, so much poison; and, the more eager Protestants show themselves for its administration, the more frantic are Catholics bound to become in escaping from it. The reason, too, is obvious—it is drawn from the very constitution of the Catholic Church. She is, on the Catholic theory, the sole teacher of truth. Nothing which reaches the soul through any other channel, however respectable, is instruction in righteousness. She knows nothing of morals apart from dogma. She recognizes no man as good who is not a good Catholic. The Bible is a good book in the hands of a priest, expounding it in the manner directed by the church; in the hands of a layman, and, above all, of a heretic layman, it is nothing but a snare and stumbling-block.

There are some Protestants, we are sorry to say, into whose heads it seems impossible to hammer a proper comprehension of the Catholic position on this subject, and who, nevertheless, as might be expected, insist on taking a heated and active part in the pending controversy, and never open their lips without making a settlement of it more difficult and more remote. They talk of the Bible as if it occupied the same position in Catholic that it occupies in Protestant theology, and as if the differences between the two churches were simply differences of interpretation—the fact being that the Catholics do not, and never have acknowledged it as a final authority, or as the sole basis of the claims of their church to the respect and obedience of Christendom. All they draw from it is corroborative evidence as to the correctness of the church's own account of its origin and history. For instance, Christ's well-known declaration to Peter, so often cited in support of the supremacy of the Roman See, they treat simply as a corroboration of what has "always, everywhere, and by all" been received and acknowledged as Catholic truth, or, in other words, of ecclesiastical tradition. It is this distinction which gives an air of positive self-stultification to a large number of the arguments in favor of compulsory Bible-reading in the schools, which one hears both from the platform and the bench and the press. Nobody has a right to attack a position, or, at all events, nobody can attack it with success, without understanding it. It is melancholy to listen, as one has nowadays sometimes, to a long string of reasons for not yielding to the Catholic view, every one of which helps to confirm the Catholic in his view—the Catholic being the only person who needs to be convinced, or who is giving any trouble.

The very first thing to be done by Protestants before engaging in the warfare which is now apparently before them, is to strengthen the one weak point in their own case, and that is the removal from the state education of the one feature which prevents it being really and truly secular education simply. It must be remembered that it is not enough that Protestants should acknowledge that the common-school education is simply secular; Catholics must acknowledge it; and Catholics cannot be expected to acknowledge it, on the Protestants' own showing, as long as Bible-reading forms part of it. The very tenacity with which Protestants cling to it they justify on the ground that it is religious instruction, and, of course, religious instruction of a Protestant complexion; without it, Judge Storer says the children would be "left without a God in the world;" or, in other words, without a religious creed. The whole system of school instruction should be such that no sect can say that it contains anything likely to help to spread the tenets of any other sect. It will, doubtless, still be said that schools in which no religion is taught are "godless schools," but this we cannot help; for the "godlessness" of schools all sects have a ready remedy by teaching religion at home, or by clerical instrumentality out of school hours. If a system of this kind does not satisfy all, nothing will. No nearer approach to a satisfactory system of state education can ever, in the existing condition of the human mind, be made; and when we have got it into working order, we have the consolation of knowing that it cannot be assailed by any argument which does not touch its very existence; that, in short, there is no pretence or deception about it.

The second thing Protestants have to do, if they mean to bring this controversy to a reasonable and satisfactory settlement within the lifetime of the present generation, is to avoid talking of and treating Catholics as necessarily enemies of free government, and their religion as incompatible with true allegiance to the state in which they live. One hears a good deal of this just now from the pulpit as well as from the platform, and it is both misleading and inexpedient. Nothing can be more absurd, for instance, as well as unfair, than Mr. Hepworth's performance in citing the Pope's Encyclical and the appended Syllabus by way of proving that Catholics are not likely to be good citizens, or are likely to bear divided allegiance, or, in case of a conflict of authority, to side with the Pope rather than with the American Government. All that the Encyclical proves, in the eyes of the best observers, is what the proceedings at the Œcumenical Council are proving every day, that the Pope is a very simple-minded and somewhat fanatical old monk, in the hands of very bad advisers, composed, in the main, of Roman Jesuits. The anxiety the most enlightened Catholics feel about his course is due not to their fear that he will reduce the Catholic world to slavery, but to their fear that he will alienate the Catholic world from religion itself. Nothing can be more preposterous than the assumption that any government is afraid that the Syllabus will weaken its authority, though many Catholic governments do fear that it may complicate their relations with the Catholic clergy, already made very troublesome by the process of secularization through which even the most bigoted Catholic states are passing before our eyes. In no countries is the Papal authority so weak at this moment as in Catholic countries —countries which the Pope has had for ages at his feet. If the Syllabus be a laughing-stock in France and Austria and Bavaria, and even in Spain, and the greatest Catholic theologians of the European continent make light of Papal pretensions, it is a little too bad to have it used as a red rag in American pulpits to rouse the Protestant bull into fury. The Catholic laity have never in any country, or in any age, accepted the ecclesiastical measure either of the province of the church or of the dues of the state, and they are not likely to make a beginning in the United States. But there is one striking example in history—perhaps the most awful of all the lessons history has to offer—of the folly of treating Catholics as if they did believe all the worst and wildest doctrines that could be dug out by controversialists from the ponderous tomes of Catholic theologians and canonists, and that is Ireland. Ireland is what she is to-day because Protestant England has persisted for two centuries in legislating for her on the hypothesis that everything the Pope said, Irish Catholics believed, and that any order he chose to issue they would surely execute. We all see the result; pleasant and successful, is it not?

We do not believe that a true and satisfactory reconciliation of the Catholic Church, as its doctors define it, with modern society will ever be effected. This reconciliation is a dream in which many great Catholics of recent times, from Lammenais to Montalembert and Father Hyacinthe, have sought refuge from distressing internal doubts and conflicts; but one has only to read even a moderate statement of the church's claims, and take even an imperfect view of the condition of modern states, to feel that a dream it must for ever remain. The relations of the Catholic clergy to the state must always be, as they are now, marked by hostility and aggressiveness on the one side and suspicion on the other; but this furnishes no excuse for attempts to drive the Catholic laity into their arms, by pretending to regard them as being in all things the humble and submissive sheep the priests would like to have them. The way the Catholic Church gets along in modern society is by letting the laymen manage politics pretty much as they please; and the only true and statesmanlike course for American Protestants to adopt in dealing with the Catholic laymen is to treat them as men like ourselves, permeated like us by the modern spirit, treading the solid ground of utility in dealing with secular affairs, ready to argue and open to conviction, and not as a parcel of devotees, led by the hand by the monks, fed on legends, and requiring to be followed to the polls by a spiritual director.

We say this on the supposition that no Protestant gentleman has as yet discovered any short and speedy method of getting rid of the Catholics, and that we have to live with and make the best of about 8,000,000 of them, who, if not educated or attached to the Government somehow, are pretty certain to furnish a considerable supply of robbers and murderers, and a disturbing element in our politics of no mean power. But, if anybody has hit on any plan of rooting them out before the next Presidential election, of course we are willing to see it tried, provided it be not too inhuman or treacherous, or does not involve the slaughter of young children. These can, of course, be saved, and brought up in the common schools as indomitable Protestants.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, March 18, 1870.

SINCE I wrote to you, the two great measures of the session have been introduced, and we can form some estimate as to the success by which they are likely to be attended in Parliament. What will be their ultimate effect upon the country is another and, I need not say, a far more difficult question. I will, however, confine myself for the present to the indications thus far afforded by the debates that have taken place. The first point which is obvious is that we have no longer an Opposition. The demoralization of which I have already spoken has shown itself in the most unequivocal manner. The debate upon the Irish Land Bill was simply the dullest that has taken place for many years upon any important topic. Mr. Gladstone succeeded in working himself up to what I may call peroration pitch, and concluded with an elaborate passage, which, partly from its contrast with the dead level of previous oratory, struck most people as a little too highflown in its language. The debate had been rather a conversation; it had resembled a technical discussion between a party of land-agents rather than an animated parliamentary struggle, and, accordingly, Mr. Gladstone's appeal to justice, which would have been effective enough at the critical moment of a protracted contest, fell a little flat. Mr. Bright's absence (which I fear is likely to be prolonged for some time) was, of course, a great injury to the discussion; but the real fact was, that it was a sham battle, and that nobody—not even an excited Irish member—could demean himself quite as if it was the real thing. Mr. Disraeli's assault had lost its usual point, and he confined himself chiefly to some rather harmless epigrams, and to one unlucky suggestion, which Mr. Gladstone easily exploded. There was no heart in the fight, and the insignificant minority of some twelve members could hardly make head to any purpose. The same phenomenon has not quite reproduced itself in the education debate, which is expected to close to-night; but here, too, there is a want of any marked animation. Mr. Forster, to whose rising influence I have more than once called your attention, spoke in his usual style of rough, honest sincerity, which always seems to be specially attractive to the House of Commons, and a few other old stagers came out in their ordinary character; the House, however, was for the most part only half attentive, and was chiefly occupied by the performances of some of our youthful Radicals. None of them, with the exception of a Mr. Winterbotham—who speaks as the representative of the dissenters, and produced a considerable effect—had a very decided success; and, in short, so far as talking is concerned, the session may be said to have been hitherto very dull. The effect of the late Reform Bill seems to be that the House has an unusual proportion of men of business rather than orators; and the atmosphere seems more congenial than of old to quiet, matter-of-fact discussion, and less fitted for bursts of rhetoric. This, however, may be merely apparent; and, if no great vivacity has been hitherto exhibited, there are evidently the seeds of future discords.

To explain this, I will attempt to point out what is, in my opinion, the true position of the Government. They have, as you know, an overwhelming majority, and Mr. Gladstone is probably more omnipotent than any minister has been since the days of the younger Pitt, unless Sir R. Peel's administration before the corn-law difficulty be an exception. Moreover, a very large number of members are specially pledged to the support of Government, and, indeed, of Mr. Gladstone personally, owing in a great measure to his extraordinary popularity throughout the country. Finally, the independent Liberals have suffered from the elevation of Mr. Bright, and the absence of any good leader in his place. The consequence is that Government may do pretty much what they please. Two main courses, however, were open to them. They might have relied upon their majority to force through strong liberal measures, with the possible danger of encountering a strong opposition in the House of Lords. They may also rely upon their strength to neglect the Radicals instead of the Conservatives, with the danger, in this case, of separating themselves from the most energetic and thoroughgoing members of their party. As a matter of fact, it is this last course which they have chosen, and I do not say that they are wrong. The advantage is that, by offering a fairly effective measure, though not one calculated to please extreme politicians, they are certain to get something done. The Conservatives will accept their offer, for fear of something worse behind; and a knot of discontented Radicals can do nothing but grumble and appeal to the future. In the Education Bill, the main points at issue have been two: Shall we have compulsion? and shall we have denominational or secular schools? Government would have satisfied the Radicals by going in distinctly for universal compulsion and for a secular system. They have preferred to shelve the responsibility by leaving the question in all cases to the districts concerned. The Conservatives see that this will give a great advantage to the Church of England schools, which are the chief body now in possession of the field, and which, resting as they do upon the support of the clergy and the richer classes, will probably be able in most cases—especially in country districts—to secure the support of the proposed school-boards. Accordingly, bigoted Tories such as Lord R. Montagu and Mr. Beresford Hope have accepted the Government measure, and were its warmest supporters in the debates. The Radicals have been furious, and have moved an amendment upon the second reading (rather an unusual course), with a view of expressing their own views. Their amendment will, of course, be rejected by an overwhelming majority; but there is a strong and growing feeling in the country in its favor. The desired alterations, or something equivalent to them, will perhaps be carried in committee, for Government seem to show themselves tolerably squeezable; but, if they should be thrown out in the House of Lords, Government can hardly reject the measure in the form in which they originally brought it forward. Accordingly, it is highly probable that, in this education matter, the ultimate result will be the passing of a bill which will cause great dissatisfaction to a large number of the Liberal party, and may possibly lead to a continued agitation. Without, however, going more fully into the question, it is, I think, clear that even the present scheme will be a great step in advance; and I could not condemn Government for having rather secured what was practicable than aimed at an ideal perfection.

The course pursued in regard to the Irish Land Bill is substantially similar, though the body of malcontents will not be large. The measure is accepted even by some extreme Radicals, such as Mr. Maguire and The O'Donoghue, subject to certain proposed alterations in committee. The Irish national party in Ireland itself, of course, continue to protest, and I do not fancy that they are likely to be soon appeased. I asked a very experienced Irish land-agent, the other day, what effect the bill would produce amongst the peasantry, and his answer was very simple: "They will not be satisfied. And why? Because their rents may still be raised." That is about the long and short of it. The peasantry really wished to get hold of somebody else's property. Whether they were right or wrong is more than I can say; but no measure which did not amount to giving it them would really meet their demands. They required confiscation, and they have merely got a simplification and improvement of existing rights. There is also the fact that evictions will be rendered much more difficult, and, in this way, some of the scandals which have previously caused so much indignation will be avoided for the future. As a general rule, however, landlordism will still be maintained in Ireland, though some of the more offensive manifestations of the landlord spirit will be restrained or annihilated. People whose object it was to get rid of the landlords will therefore not be satisfied. I think that any plan which would really have gone any way towards satisfying them would have been impracticable without something like a revolutionary spirit in England. Mr. Mill's scheme would have done something; but, short of that, all that we can anticipate is that a measure of reform will gradually commend itself to the people, if firmly enforced by the authorities. In this case, as I have said, little or no Parliament opposition is to be dreaded. On the other hand, the feeling in Ireland continues to be extremely unpleasant. Government have been forced—and it is an unpleasant coincidence with the proposal of pacificatory measures—to introduce a bill for preserving the peace. Numerous murders have lately been committed, and no convictions have been obtained. The agrarian offences of all kinds, which in 1866 were 87, were in 1867, 123; in 1868, 160; and in 1869, 767. Since 1852 and 1847 there has not been so much crime, and even then the agrarian crimes were not so numerous. To meet this, it is proposed to add a special force of detective police, to put the sale of arms and ammunition under very severe restrictions, and to give powers for proclaiming certain districts as disturbed, in which these rules and the right of searching houses will be made more stringent than elsewhere. There will also be additional powers for examining witnesses, arresting suspicious strangers, and, in certain cases, sentencing culprits in a summary way to short periods of imprisonment; of trying them in places beyond the range of local intimidation; and, in some cases, of raising compensation for injuries from the districts in which they occurred. Finally, additional powers are asked for the suppression of treasonable newspapers.

This measure is, it must be confessed, a tolerably strong one; but the case is one which will not admit of temporizing. Government will, I have no doubt, be supported in their policy, and I hope it may produce a good effect. Meanwhile, it is plain that Ireland is not yet pacified by the reforms we are trying to carry out. A dark and troubled future is still before us, though we may hope for an ultimate improvement with the removal of the worst grievances. Upon this, however, I will not dwell. I have tried to point out the present attitude of our Government, and I must leave the task of commenting upon it to your readers. I will content myself with saying that they promise to do a good deal of work, but whether that work is as thorough as might be desired is a matter for much discussion.

Correspondence.

STEEL RAILS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The reputation of your journal for intrepid facing of facts shall be my apology for asking space to reply to the article in your number of March 10 called "The Secret of the Rise on Steel." You say that A. S. Hewitt, in his report, remarks that he found "the vilest trash which could be dignified by the name of iron went universally by the name of the American rail." You then say that Americans not only risk their lives upon this trash, but insist upon paying more for it than other nations pay for the best rails, and you add, "Patriotism demands a disregard of danger. . . . . American industry must be protected even at the price of periodical railway slaughters."

This appears exactly fitted, if not intended, to convey the idea that Mr. Hewitt declared rails of American manufacture to be universally regarded as the vilest trash, that such American-made trash is the cause of railway slaughters, and that the protectionists, by their success in maintaining a duty upon iron and steel rails, have forced the country to use this home-made trash, and are thus responsible for those slaughters, as also for the costly transportation brought about by accidents and by speedy destruction and renewal of roads.

I will now quote Mr. Hewitt's own words, of which you give but a part (see his Report, pages 10, 11, and 12): "In the Welsh iron-works it is notorious that the quality of the article produced is directly proportioned to the price paid for it, and in my visits to those gigantic establishments which have grown up in the mountains of South Wales, it was humiliating to find that the vilest trash which could be dignified by the name of iron went universally by the name of the American rail. This is no fault of the Welsh iron-master, but has arisen from the almost universal practice of late years on the part of American railroad companies and contractors of purchasing the lowest priced article that could be produced." To the stupidity and reckless extravagance of those customers more than to any other cause, Mr. Hewitt says, "is due the necessity of almost annual renewals of rails in the United States, and the financial troubles of so many of our leading lines of railway." The Welsh iron-masters, he continues, would greatly prefer to make good iron. "But the inexorable law of competition and the unremitted cry for cheap iron in America have left them no choice."

Further on, Mr. Hewitt says that there is no difficulty in making in America the best qualities of iron and steel "with as little expenditure of human labor as the most favored countries of Europe. But the problem presented for solution to the American iron-master has not merely been to procure this labor at as low a cost as it is obtained in Europe (a requirement utterly impossible to be met), but to produce the highest grade of material in competition with the price of the poorest foreign article." "For the difference in the price of labor a remedy may be found in the tariff, but for the other exaction there is no remedy but greater intelligence on the part of the consumers," and responsibility at law.

Having thus shown what your own witness really says, I state of my own knowledge, as director in an American iron company producing rails, what is well known to all makers and consumers of rails in this country, that the Welsh-made "American rail" is being driven out of use in this country by the superior American-made iron rail, by a "guaranteed" English rail of really good quality, by European steel rails, and lastly by American steel rails. American-made iron rails have all along commanded a higher price here than the Welsh-made rails, and have been habitually used by those companies which had the common sense to prefer and the means to pay for them, as, for instance, the Pennsylvania Central; while other companies not possessing those advantages, as, for instance, the Erie, bought the English-made rails of which Mr. Hewitt speaks, and which have been latterly known as the regular Erie rail. Several of the worst accidents upon American roads (among them, I believe, those very Carr's Rock and Long Island slaughters which you charge by implication to the tariff) have been clearly traced to the breaking of cheap English rails, and the Erie Company at least has since been laying down both American and English rails of better quality.

Permit me to say that you entirely misapprehend the question when you conceive that the proposition to set a duty of 2 cents per pound upon steel rails is inspired by fear on the part of American rail-makers of the effects to flow from the expiration of the Bessemer patent, and is advocated by none but those selfish and bloated American rail-makers. I have now before me a copy of a memorial to Congress, signed by twenty-one presidents of leading American railroad companies and by other prominent men interested in American roads, showing that until the Americans seriously undertook the making of Bessemer rails, the English charged $150, gold, per ton for those rails; that the American competition has brought down that price to $79, gold, per ton; that the railroads of this country cannot afford to see the American works destroyed; and finally urging upon Congress the imposition of this specific duty of two cents per pound which has so excited your wrath. Jay Gould, the President of the Erie Railroad, having been applied to for his signature to a memorial asking for the removal of duty upon steel rails, refused to sign it, on the ground that such a tariff ought to be levied as would permit them to be made here.

The fact is that the English expected to derive great spoils from this country by the sale to us of Bessemer steel; they have had but limited success, and now see the sceptre departing from them. "Hinc illæ lachrymæ." The process was so novel, it involved so many points of chemistry which were abstruse if not mysterious, it required so great a plant of capital, the suitable materials were so comparatively rare, that a dawning monopoly opened to the English gaze, and no means were spared to fortify that monopoly. One of the devices employed was the reiterated assertion that certain peculiar substances were indispensable to the manufacture: the refractory English ganister, the German spiegeleisen, ores and coals free from phosphorus and sulphur. This was a very effective bugbear, as I well remember, for my company intended to make Bessemer rails, and the chemical questions involved were usually laid before me. We could afford the outlay, we could master the construction, a refractory material to replace ganister could be found, spiegeleisen could be imported, ores and coal nearly free from sulphur were plenty enough, but phosphorus—there was the rub. All accessible American ores contained phosphorus in excess of the very limited percentage which English authorities declared to be fatal. As I had, in introducing another industry, encountered and overcome similar gloomy prognostications, the great phosphorus ghost did not greatly abash me, and it was at last laid when a railroad company sent to our mill to be punched a large quantity of the most approved Bessemer rails: an average sample of the bits of steel punched out contained by analysis a percentage of phosphorus far in excess of the orthodox limit. My company finally decided, however, not to adopt the Bessemer process, believing that better results could be attained by other methods which we are now building for, and this fact may aid in showing the irrelevancy of your idea that the approaching expiration of the Bessemer patent alarms American rail-makers into calling for a higher duty. I have never heard that reason suggested except by you.

The buyers of steel rails desire, as has been shown, to have the duty of two cents per pound levied upon them when imported, and this for the purely selfish reason that they know the maintenance of American establishments at a fair profit to be the only means of escaping from the exactions of foreign rail-makers. Another fact, demonstrating in like manner the substantial unity of interest which American consumers and producers have in sustaining a protective policy, as the condition of low prices to the former and of reliable hold upon life to the latter, may interest you, since you speak also of pig-iron. When it became known that the Committee of Ways and Means had reported a Tariff Bill proposing a reduction of the duty upon pig-iron (ostensibly that the great consumers of pig-iron, the rolling-mills, might have relief), the American Iron and Steel Association addressed to every important rolling-mill which was accessible to them the simple question whether such a reduction was desirable.

Among more than a hundred of answers, only one replied favoring the proposed reduction. Not only did all the others oppose any reduction, but many of them took the pains to express most emphatically their conviction that in no other way was cheap pig-iron to be had in the present or in the future than by maintaining the duty, and thus tempting capital into extending the manufacture of it. Be it remembered that these were the answers of the largest consumers of pig-iron, who were not interested in its production, who know as well as most men upon which side their bread is buttered, and who, looking merely to their own interest as permanently wanting abundant and cheap pig-iron, opposed the moderate reduction of $2 per ton from the import duty which the committee had proposed. On the other hand, I know that certain colossal producers of pig-iron felt quite indifferent, if not indeed distinctly favorable, to the reduction, on the ground that it would, by checking some of their smaller rivals, bring about a better future for themselves.

This communication is already so long that I will abruptly conclude it with the remark that the protectionists who are practically interested as producers in the maintenance of a strong tariff are surprisingly undemonstrative. They feel well assured that the common sense of the country will not permit its industries to be ruined for the benefit of its principal rival and enemy; resting in this assurance, they look upon the attempted free-trade reaction as a rather harmless pastime, not hurting them, but amusing the free-traders, and therefore make little active resistance.

For my own part, I echo the desire you expressed in your number of March 3, that the vexed question may now be arranged in such manner as to remain undisturbed for some years at least.

A Metallurgist.

[The above is but one of a number of communications of like character called forth by the article criticised. As it is of general interest and value in other than its tariff aspects we publish it, one for all. If our language was "exactly fitted, if not intended," to convey the idea that all American-made rails were vile trash, we certainly were very unfortunate in expressing ourselves. Not only are as good rails made in America as anywhere in the world, but, in the passage criticised, we expressly limited our remarks to what is made and known in Europe as the "American rail." No one but our correspondent, we imagine, misunderstood us. That rail he denounces as severely as we. To it he attributes the Carr's Rock and Long Island slaughters. Well, that rail, truly called "vilest trash," under our tariff system probably cost the American people as much as steel rails are now selling for in Liverpool. We know, as well as our correspondent, something of that now famous memorial of railroad presidents in favor of the increased duty on steel rails. Is our correspondent aware how many of the signers of that memorial were themselves interested in making steel rails? Does he know who declined to sign it, and how many signed it out of sympathy for old friends caught in a bad scrape? Does he know how many railroads have sent in officially strong protests against that curious document? If he has information on these points, we are somewhat surprised at his reference. We are equally surprised at hearing him quote Jay Gould as an authority on any subject relating to the honest management of railroads. Mr. Gould is a very able man, we believe, and also quite an astute one; we have never heard of his being peculiarly noted for disinterestedness.

The fundamental fact on which we insist is this: steel is essentially a raw material. In the form of rails, it is the raw material of transportation; in other forms, it is a raw material essential to innumerable manufacturing industries. That raw material, on which both life and prosperity so intimately depend, it is proposed to heap all over with taxation. That taxation is directly responsible for the loss of their foreign markets to those who outnumber the producers of steel fifty to one; that same taxation, by making us pay for the refuse of foreign foundries what other nations pay for the highest class of rails, is directly responsible for those slaughters to which we have referred. This is no question of protection or free trade, properly speaking. The protectionist bases his whole argument on the encouragement of industry, which cannot be reached by the taxation of the raw material which is essential to that industry. Steel is especially such a raw material, and to tax it is contrary to every cardinal principle either of free-trade or of protection.

As for the "harmless pastime" to which our correspondent refers in his closing paragraph, he is welcome to his little joke; only we beg to assure him that certain unfortunate makers of edged tools, etc., to whom we could refer, and who represent more American capital and American industry than all the steel producers of the country told three times over, regarded that rise on steel against which we protested as anything but a "harmless pastime."—Ed. Nation.]

OPPOSITION OF WOMEN TO FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the Nation of March 24, an article headed "The Vexed Question" demands some notice, though evidently written by one who has not kept pace with the history of the times or with the question which has claimed his reluctant attention.

It is no new assertion, nor is it denied, that "there is almost, if not quite, as much opposition to women voting among women as there is among men," though it would be difficult to prove it. Ignorant and superficial and frivolous as so many women are under the operation of unjust laws, shut out from so many avenues to improvement, and anxious only to please men, is their opposition strange? Many, even of those who did think, were unwilling to subject themselves to contumely and ridicule by a demand for suffrage, and the right to help to make the laws under which they were taxed and imprisoned. Was it any argument against emancipation that the slaves were contented and did not wish for their freedom?

At a woman's rights convention, held in Syracuse in 1852, the following resolution was offered by Lucretia Mott:

"That as the imbruted slave, who is content with his own lot, and would not be free if he could (if any such there be), only gives evidence of the depth of his degradation; so the woman who is satisfied with her inferior condition, averring that she has all the rights that she wants, does but exhibit the enervating effects of the wrongs to which she is subjected."

The writer in the Nation asserts that "not an instance is known in the country's history in which women, duly authorized to speak for their sex, have asked for legislation and been denied." For more than twenty years "women duly authorized to speak" have reiterated their demands, which, except in a few instances, have been denied or ignored. He who denies or ignores this fact reads our country's history to little purpose.

In the first Woman's Rights Convention, held at Seneca Falls, in 1848, James Mott, of Philadelphia, in the chair—Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and others assisting in the deliberations—the following resolutions, among others, were adopted:

"Resolved, That all laws which prevent woman from occupying such a station in society as her conscience shall dictate, or which place her in a position inferior to that of man, are contrary to the great precept of nature, and therefore of no authority.

. . . "Resolved, That it is the duty of the women of this country to secure to themselves their sacred right to the elective franchise."

At the Worcester Convention, in 1850, it was

"Resolved, That every human being of full age, etc., who is required to obey law is entitled to a voice in its enactments; that every such person, whose property or labor is taxed for the support of government, is entitled to a direct share in such government. Therefore,

"Resolved, That women are clearly entitled to the right of suffrage, and to be considered eligible to office; the omission to demand which, on her part, is a palpable recreancy to duty, and the denial of which on the part of man no longer to be endured; and that every party which claims to represent the humanity, civilization, and progress of the age, is bound to inscribe on its banner, 'Equality before the law, without distinction of color or sex.'"

In that convention many women, "duly authorized to speak for their sex," asked for legislation, but asked in vain.

In the Worcester Convention for 1851, one of the resolutions claims "that, while we would not undervalue other methods, the right of suffrage for women is, in our opinion, the corner-stone of this enterprise, since we do not seek to protect woman, but rather to place her in a position to protect herself." Another: "That it will be woman's fault if, the ballot once in her hand, all the barbarous, demoralizing, and unequal laws relating to marriage and property do not speedily vanish from the statute-book."

I will not take time to quote from the many admirable resolutions passed at that time, and subsequently, from year to year, enforced by petitions to State and national legislatures, and advocated by many women "duly authorized to speak for their sex," who still ask that the word "male" should be stricken from every State constitution, but ask in vain. It seems very clear, then, that "men, as men, are responsible for the exclusion of women from the polls."

The "thoughtful sceptic," who is unconvinced by Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Stanton, Lucy Stone, Mrs. Livermore, and others, and who fears that the heavens will fall if justice is done, is still distressed lest politicians of the lowest type, men and women, would for ever rule, and believes, or seems to believe, with some of the subjects of monarchical governments, that "every one who applies to be registered as an elector should be required to copy a sentence of English in the presence of the registering officer, and to perform a sum in the single rule of three." The same fear has always beset "the ruling classes" when the question of equality has been under discussion, but the results, so far as tried, have proved their fears to have been groundless.

"Our ship of state has taken on a heavy load," it is true, but her timbers are staunch, and when she is fairly on her right course, we must trust that she will float smoothly into safe waters, so that timid souls need no longer quake.

It is yet to be proved that we have, "under pressure of necessity, lowered the tone of American citizenship by admitting 400,000 ignorant voters at the South." The ignorant slaves, men and women, knew enough to be loyal, which was more than their masters did, and it is paying a poor compliment to the schools and press and pulpits of our land to imagine that our ship of state must inevitably sink under its load of ignorance and crime, if the principles of republican government are fairly carried out. Let us hope, then, that our timid sceptic may have more courage and a fuller faith.

M. C. W.

[The space accorded to the above letter had been set apart for the conclusion of the series of our Orange correspondent, which is now, however, postponed till next week. After that, we must ask to be spared discussion on the woman question, in order to give proper attention to other topics of immediate and perhaps not less importance.—Ed. Nation.]

MINORITY REPRESENTATION—OBJECTIONS TO THE BUCKALEW PLAN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The question of minority representation has of late been discussed with such earnestness and candor, and the principle, wherever it has been tried, has worked so well, that the time cannot be far distant when an experiment will be made on a large scale, and a chance given to prove the adaptability to our institutions of some one of the many schemes which have been brought forward—all with the intention of giving the minority in politics a chance to be heard and felt in executive, judicial, and legislative proceedings. Assuming that the principle is correct (though many politicians will deny this on the start), it only remains to decide which of the various methods which have been proposed is best adapted to the use of the people of this country.

The method proposed by Mr. Buckalew, and which he calls the "free and unrestricted vote," is perhaps as simple as any, but still does not have all the advantages which he claims for it. A voter needs to be of more than average intelligence to be able, without assistance, to "cumulate" his votes properly so as to subserve his party ends. And here is where this system must inevitably fail. In the first place, it will be necessary to inform the great mass of voters what is to be done, and to direct them how to perform the mere manual labor; and, secondly, it will be found that the whole cumulative process must be directed by one head. For, let us suppose that, in a State where 500,000 votes are cast, of these one party polls 260,000, and the other 240,000. If, then, 150 members of Assembly are to be elected, the first party should be represented by 78 members, the second by 72. Now if the first party, either presuming on their strength, or from want of a concerted understanding in regard to their action, should attempt to elect the whole of the 150 candidates, each candidate would receive 260,000 votes. If, at the same time, the second party, strictly obeying orders, should concentrate their votes on 138 candidates, each of these candidates would receive nearly 261,000 votes, and would thus be elected, while their opponents, though in a majority, would have but 12. This is an extreme case, it is true, but yet one not unlikely to occur, if the cumulative process is left to the individual voter. But a further case will make the failure of the system no less evident, by enabling a minority of the people to elect a majority of the legislature. Let the parties and number of votes thrown be the same as before. If then the first party should attempt to elect 85 candidates, each of these 85 would receive nearly 459,000 votes; while the second party, voting for 78 candidates, would give each of them 461,000 votes. Thus, 78 of one, and but 72 of the other party, would be elected, thus reversing the true proportion. This would be "minority representation" with a vengeance. And by just as much as parties approach equality in numbers, just so much more chance is there that such a state of things might occur.

Now, what is the remedy? There is but one, and that is a perfect subordination to a general headquarters or committee, who should issue orders as to how many and what candidates should be voted for. Thus, the right to choose on whom to confer a vote would be practically taken away from the individual voter; and where the right of choice is denied, all interest in voting would soon disappear. Every man would be compelled to vote as the central committee might dictate, for fear of injuring or destroying the power of his party. Some advantage would be gained by making the districts in which a general ticket was to be voted on as small as possible; but still the central committees of these districts must needs have almost supreme power. And, even after surrendering his right of choice in all but local elections, the voter might find that, by a carelessness or rashness on the part of the central committee—as, for instance, by ordering a larger number of candidates to be voted for than it was in the power of the party to elect—the surrender of his rights had produced only evil effects.

The general expenses of elections would also be increased; as, in a population like ours, always open to new ideas, and ready to adopt the most opposite principles in close succession, the vote in an election which took place a year before would not be sufficient to decide on the relative numbers of political parties. Extensive and careful canvasses must be made, at great trouble and expense, in each year, and under the superintendence of the controlling committee.

Moreover, it has been found that corruption steals into politics more easily when the power is in the hands of a few than when it is distributed among a large number. The tendency towards corruption in elections already calls for the interposition of some barrier against the powerful few; and if, instead of interposing this barrier, and calling on the people to exert their rights, and to overthrow the oligarchy, which rules by cheating, and cheats by ruling, more power than ever is placed in their hands, where the power must be placed if the principle of the cumulative vote is to prevail, no one can tell to what depths of degradation politics may be brought.

B.

PROTECTION TO ALL INDUSTRIES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I must confess to considerable amusement in reading your comments on my last communication. You free-traders cannot understand logic. When I say that the most effectual way to protect American shipping is to prohibit by law all carriage, whether of freight or passengers, to or from American ports, except in American bottoms, you, with a comical air, as if this time you had propounded a clincher, reply, "Want of familiarity with international usage, not unpardonable in a mere littérateur, has led him, perhaps, to overlook the little circumstance that if we exclude foreign vessels from our ports, foreign nations will exclude our vessels from their ports." My dear sir, it is just here that the logic of protection comes in. This is just what we radical protectionists want. On the point of limiting the carrying trade to and from our own ports to American owned and manned vessels we are, I admit, a little in advance of public opinion; not so in regard to non-intercourse. Repeatedly and fearlessly has Mr. Greeley maintained of late years in the Tribune that it would be a blessing to this country if all imports could be shut out for the next ten years. The contingency which you so complacently assume I "overlook" would accomplish this very result. "Mere littérateur!" Let me assure you, sir, logic on this question has no terrors for me.

Let foreign nations shut us out, and let us shut foreign nations out. What other or better protection can we protectionists desire? This goes to the root of the free-trade fallacies, and secures American industry from competition with pauper labor. Whom, I ask, would this harm? Would it harm America, with its boundless production of food, merely shut off from exchanging it for European luxuries? Not much, I opine. The free-traders would doubtless say that the agriculturist would not raise food if he had no market to which to send it. Another fallacy! Why need he raise food which he cannot sell? These things settle themselves if they are but left alone. Let him turn his industry to smelting pig-iron. He will do it fast enough if it is as profitable as Mr. Wells asserts. Give the country but protection enough, and it will not lack industries. It seems to me as if the Nation did not understand the versatility of the American character. There are to-day hundreds of branches of industry which do not spring into life simply because they are kept out of existence by the blighting influence of European pauper labor.

I do not, for one, believe in silence on these subjects; nothing in the long run is gained by blinking one's logical convictions. However it may be with others, I have not studied and pondered Carey and Greeley in vain. I want protection that is protection. I want it for myself against the Grub-street hacks of London. I am willing to concede it to all others against every form or result of foreign industry. Taking this position, I raise my voice everywhere and at all times against the existing dilution of a good strong draught. I want the iron people, the coal-miners, the wool-growers, the cotton-spinners, the salt-producers, all and each, and as many more as come, to have full and satisfactory protection; I ask the same for myself. I use their iron and wear their fabrics and season my food with their salt; do they read my books? I would not take from them, why should they not give to me? My profession of author is to-day the worst paid and least protected method of earning one's bread which any American can select; I have myself worked, and done good work, for the wages of a hod-carrier at the very time that my publisher (bitter mockery lurks in the expression!) was coining money by stealing the labors of foreign authors to drive me out of the market. Is this right? is it fair? No, sir; protection is like Mr. Bob Sawyer's punch: if it does you any harm, it's because you fell into the vulgar error of not taking enough. Protect everything, say I; and what more efficacious way of doing this can be suggested than by bringing about that very non-intercourse which you supposed I had overlooked?

That the good day is near at hand when America may be reserved wholly for Americans, is the confident hope of

A Poor Author.

Boston, Mass., April 4, 1870.

A CRUEL HOAX.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I was not a little amused at your reception of the communication from "A Poor Author" in your last issue. The New York Times indulged in a good laugh the other day at our English cousins, some of whom had accepted sundry of our political sarcasms as veritable statements of fact or opinion. Clearly, my dear sir, you have been very neatly "taken in and done for" after this fashion by this "Poor Author." I am very well aware that a Boston "protectionist" is a most absurd creature. But "you may bet your bottom dollar," as they say out West, that he is not equal to quite so sublimely absurd a thing as that letter in dead earnest. You have been victimized, and I have no doubt this perfidious "free-trader" is at this moment chuckling over the success of his operation.

Yours sympathetically, A. B. Hervey.

Peabody, Mass., April 4.

[We have received several other warnings against this "Poor Author." If he has really taken us in, and is simply a free-trader, all we can say is that he ought to be ashamed of himself, and that we pity him. The real sufferer in cases of fraud is not the victim, but the heartless perpetrator.—Ed. Nation.]

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH AND ENGLISH EMIGRATION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In commenting on my letter on the subject of emigration, you speak of it as addressed to the London Daily News. I think it right to state to you that it was addressed not to the Daily News, nor to any journal, but to a friend; and that it was not intended for publication.

Yours faithfully, Goldwin Smith.

Ithaca, March 31, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. began, with No. 15 of their illustrated Every Saturday, the new story by Mr. Dickens, called, not after his usual fashion, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." Along with the advance sheets, they have also—and we think wisely—secured the English illustrations drawn by Mr. Fildes under Mr. Dickens's supervision. No American artist is competent to this task, or could be. As if to prove this, Mr. Sol Eytinge, who made the designs for the "Diamond Dickens" of this house, furnishes a cartoon, "Mr. Pickwick's Reception," for the number of Every Saturday referred to. Mr. Pickwick, seated on a little knoll, passes in review the legion of Mr. Dickens's characters, with Sam Weller at his side to point them out. The familiar faces are neither Mr. Eytinge's nor Mr. Dickens's; they are the creations of Cruikshank or of "Phiz," and not to have borrowed them would have been simply impossible. In them the novelist and the artist have a curious "divisum imperium" and joint immortality.——Of late there have been published by respectable physicians several medical treatises, designed for popular reading and instruction, of notably good intention, if not in all cases to be entirely approved for judgment or scientific accuracy. To this class must now be added, apparently, a work announced by Messrs. Wood & Holbrook: "Talks to My Patients; or, Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well." The author is Mrs. R. B. Gleason, M.D., of the Elmira Water-Cure, and, as is natural, it is her own sex that she undertakes to instruct in the knowledge needful to women as a preparation for marriage, and a guide afterwards. We believe the book is the first of its kind written by a woman, and if well done, it will probably effect more good than any written by a man of equal attainments could do.——It will be good news to everybody who has "wept at the grave of Adam" in company with Mr. Mark Twain, and has laughed everywhere else with that light-minded young man, to hear that he is going to edit a department of the Galaxy—or rather that he is going to write a department of the Galaxy. We do not hear that he is to have any assistants or contributors, though that he should is perhaps to be desired.

—We have not infrequently called attention to various modes of advertising by which the human mind is sought to be seduced into purchasing this or that man's wares or services. None of our readers but has seen the colored lithograph or oil print of the insurance company, the illuminated calendar of stationer or tradesman, the colored perspective of the "only feasible metropolitan railway," the hatter's mock gold coin which serves as his card, the photograph of the new building of the daily paper—in short, the thousand-and-one devices appealing to our love of art and of the beautiful. In the midst of these lately appeared the advertising sheet of the Aldine Press, which at first was chiefly remarkable for the quantity of ink lavished upon the blackest of Doré's designs, and for typographical inaccuracies in the text. It has since improved in these respects, though its faith in much ink is still strong, and though the toned paper on which it is printed is calculated to deceive the unskilled as to the character of the press-work. From the University Press at Cambridge has been issued, within a fortnight, a still more novel illustrated advertising sheet called American Enterprise, consisting entirely of full-page engravings—all the work of Mr. Linton, after Hennessy, Darley, and Bellew—without other text than the legends affixed to each plate; it being left to a plain supplement to describe the enterprise more particularly, and set forth the merits of each advertiser. These elaborate cartoons are not given away, but sold at a moderate price. We commend the press-work of them to the proprietors of the Aldine Press.

—A late number of Nature describes an important undertaking of the Geographical Society of Bombay. It is nothing less than a complete geographical index of India, "in vernacular and English spellings, with memoranda—geographical, etymological, antiquarian, and statistical." How vast and minute the scheme is will appear from the first section, which embraces "names of towns, villages of any size or note, railway stations, etc., with the taluka and district or state in which each is situated, its longitude and latitude; the population; name of the river or stream on which each is situated; altitude above the sea-level; the dates and names of founders; the etymology of the name, the Sanskrit or ancient name; notes of connected events, peculiar products or manufactures; places of note, temples, commemorative pillars, etc., in their vicinity, with references to fuller descriptions already published." Shrines, rivers, springs, mountain ranges and peaks, valleys, plateaux, tribes, sects, etc., etc., are other objects of the proposed census which, if it ever be carried out, will produce a gazetteer such as no other country can pretend to. Naturally, geography and etymology will be first in the Society's thoughts, and the combination of these enquiries certainly offers one of the most fascinating pursuits a scholar can engage in. What might be done in this country, Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull has shown in his recent pamphlet. In France, we observe that M. Joseph Garnier, keeper of the archives of the Department of the Côte-d'Or, published at Dijon last year a "Nomenclature historique des communes, hameaux, écarts, lieux détruits, cours d'eau et montagnes" of the department just named. His particulars are almost as numerous as those of the Bombay Society's schedule, while his method has been first to treat of the communes, arranged according to arrondissement and canton, giving their population, area, with distances from the capital or county-seat, etc., etc.; then to trace the nomenclature of basins and water-courses, with the ancient names when discoverable; and, finally, to present, in two alphabetical tables, the ancient and modern names of the inhabited and uninhabited places previously described. He has, of course, shed a good deal of light on mediæval geography, while providing philologists with interesting and highly suggestive material.

—The learned world is justly excited by the discovery, within a few months, of "the very oldest Semitic lapidary record of importance," as Mr. Emmanuel Deutsch proclaims it, in a letter to the London Times, of March 4. This is a stone stela, originally about a yard high, and the sides a little more than half a yard wide, found at Dhiban, the ancient Dibon, by M. Clermont-Ganneau, dragoman of the French consulate at Jerusalem. By this gentleman, and by Captain Warren, of the Palestine Exploring Society, "rubbings" and "squeezes" of the stone and its fragments have been sent to Paris and London; but it will require considerable time, and probably the aid of the photograph, to decipher the inscription, and to settle the proper arrangement of its parts. Nevertheless, it is considered certain that the stone celebrates the victories of Mesha, King of Moab, over the Israelites, and enumerates several well-known Biblical cities which, after taking, he "built"—meaning, perhaps, fortified—as he repeatedly says. This is the substance of the record, in which there are many lacunæ. Whether Mesha is the king of the same name mentioned in 2 Kings iii. 4–27 is uncertain, though probable. The historical importance of this discovery is quite secondary to the philological. "The gain to Palæography and Semitic science is," says Mr. Deutsch, who has been eminently cautious in forming his judgment, "already enormous." "Nearly the whole of the Greek alphabet is found here, not merely similar to the 'Phœnician' shape, but as identical with it as can well be." The letter Ξ, supposed to have been a comparatively recent addition to the alphabet, occurs along with the digamma in the form of Υ. Another fact elicited is that "the more primitive the characters, the simpler they become; not, as often supposed, the more complicated, as more in accordance with some pictorial prototype." Those on the Moabite stone, according to a French authority, are quite small and not deeply graven; the words are separated from each other by dots, and the sentences by vertical bars. Dr. Neubauer states that it appears that "the Moabites spoke a pure Hebrew, with a slight infusion of Arabic or Nabatean, acquired, no doubt, from their proximity to Petræa."

—We find in the last Exposé de la Situation de l'Empire some interesting statistics bearing upon the spread of popular education in France. During 1868, the number of school libraries was increased by 1,296; the number of volumes lent was 206,161. (This, to be sure, is only 7,186 more than were lent in 1869 by the public library of one American city—Boston, to say nothing of those read in the building.) Of the 12,713 school libraries now existing in France, it appears that more than half were founded by the Minister of Public Instruction, and of the 988,728 volumes which they possess, 678,000 were the gift of the state; the remainder were purchased by the communes, which in the first six months of 1869 spent 96,480 francs in this way. One would like to know what sort of books are purchased, what are read most, and what classes of people read them. The Government appears well satisfied with the experiment. One hundred thousand francs were appropriated for this purpose in 1869, and before July 1 books had been distributed to 1,500 new libraries.

—When France, in the course of the last century, had lost her colonies, there was a great falling off in her publication of books of foreign travel. With the exception of the impressions de voyage of a small number of tourists, generally men of letters or men of wealth, the works of missionaries, such as the "Lettres édifiantes," the adventures of some Father Huc, or the translation of German and English books, the Paris press rarely issued a work of French travel. Of late years there has been a notable change, however, and French accounts of foreign countries have greatly increased. Besides those mentioned in previous articles in the Nation, we notice among the latest publications the following: (1) "L'Italie et Constantinople," by Charles Asselineau, who comes to the sensible conclusion that nothing more remains to be said on Italian scenery, art, or monuments, and therefore occupies himself with men—contemporaries especially. (2) "Orient et Italie," by Maxime du Camp, which we take to be not a veritable book of travels, but the result of the author's reading and study. (3) "Voyages dans les royaumes de Siam, de Camboge, et autres parties centrales de l'Indo-Chine," by Henri Mouhot. This work is edited by F. de Lanoye from the notes of M. Mouhot, who may be fairly counted among the martyrs of science. In his zeal for research in natural history, he lost his life among the unhealthy forests of Siam. The natives in his service carried his manuscripts to Bangkok with the announcement of his death. M. Mouhot speaks with enthusiasm of the beauty of the vast architectural ruins he found in the depths of the forests of Siam, and in particular of the magnificent remains of palaces and temples at Angkor. (4) "Aventures d'un Voyageur en Australie: Neuf Mois de séjour chez les Nagarnooks," by M. H. Perron d'Arc. Our English friends have been so liberal in their supply of books on Australia that we begin to look at such works with a rather languid interest. M. Perron's experience, however, is somewhat out of the beaten track. He was a gold-hunter on Swan River, when a fancy seized him for a taste of savage life, and he joined the tribe of Nagarnooks, remaining nine months with them. His account of the Australian native is much more favorable than the average English estimate. (5) "Le Liban, la Galilée et Rome: Voyage en Orient et en Italie;" a scholarly work by the Vicomte de Basterot. (6) "L'Italie et Rome en 1869," by M. le Comte de Warren, contains some interesting pages on the late discoveries made among the excavations of the Cata-combs and at other points in Rome. (7) "Cochin-Chine Française et royaume de Camboge," by Charles Lemire, discusses well and intelligently Egypt, Suez, Aden, and the province of Annam. (8.) "Le Montenegro—le pays et-ses habitans," by Dr. Alfred Boulougne. The author went to Montenegro on a scientific mission, and remained in the country as the physician of the reigning prince. The book is very satisfactory and quite readable. (9) "A travers l'Amérique: Le Far West," by Madame Olympe Audouard, lately among us with her "conférences." (10) "L'Amérique actuelle," by Émile Jonveaux. The intrinsic value of this work is enhanced by an introduction from the pen of Edouard Laboulaye, who says that books on the United States are now sought for with avidity. America is à la mode, "and in my opinion the fashion is likely to endure." "We admire the American people," he continues, "not only because they have conducted a civil war that has no precedent, but also, and above all, because America presents us the spectacle of an all-powerful democracy whose greatness and whose prosperity are due to herself alone." M. Jonveaux's work is not so much a book of travels as a disquisition on American institutions; the author devotes himself mainly to the consideration of the three great elements of American political existence—liberty, education, and religion. He presents a fair appreciation of the condition of the South, of slavery, reconstruction, and the future of the negro, and gives a chapter on the Shakers and the phalanstery at Oneida Creek. (11) "Le Grand Ouest des États-Unis," by L. Simonin, a mineralogist of distinction and well known as the author of "L'Histoire de la Terre," "Les Merveilles du Monde Souterrain," and "Les Pierres." At the Paris Exposition of 1857, he made the acquaintance of Mr. Whitney, commissioner for Colorado, who invited him to pay a visit to the Rocky Mountains. M. Simonin did so, writing letters home, and giving his experiences and impressions day by day. Of these letters the volume is made up. As to mineral wealth, he says that he finds all the dreams of Law realized.

THE NEW EDITION OF BROWN'S "CHOATE."*

Rufus Choate has been made the subject of two biographical works, of which one is very bad, and one is to be called good, but both of which it is well to have if it is desired to estimate him exactly. Of the men who are not by nature always of necessity important and interesting to their fellow-creatures, but who, nevertheless, had success in their day in making themselves a name, it is particularly worth while that we should have various accounts; because in the case of such men we desire information concerning the people who called them great as much or more than we desire it concerning the men themselves. Mr. E. G. Parker's book about his master and guide has, then, a real value. It is a help to any one who is making up his mind about Choate and Choate's contemporaries, albeit there can hardly be in the world another book at once so friendly in intention, and, in fact, so unfriendly, as the record which makes it manifest how untaught and weak were many of the people on whose authority we are asked to reverence Mr. Choate. The book before us, President Brown's "Life," now and again does its subject the same ill turn that is constantly done him in the reminiscences of his pupil—making "foolish, fond record" of things which subserve the truth of history rather than reflect credit upon the man of whom they are told, and forcing on our attention the fact that much of our American biographical literature bears witness to the secondariness of American biographers and readers rather than to the firstrateness—if such a word is permissible—of the men whose biographies we write, and read, and applaud. What, for instance, is the kind of man who, out of admiration, sets down in the life of his hero this?

"Attending the opera on one occasion, and being but indifferently amused by the acting and music, which he did not understand, he turned to his daughter and said, with grave formality, 'Helen, interpret to me this libretto, lest I dilate with the wrong emotion.'"

It is not so bad as Mr. Parker's lauding his chief's familiarity with the Latin, and then, when he had talked himself hoarse, letting out that the "brilliant scholar," the son of Dartmouth who had so astonished his mother, did not know the quantity of the penult in Neptunus. But though not so bad as the Neptunus story, the opera story really is not essentially different from that performance of the Colonel's, so far as regards the light it casts on Mr. Choate and his admirers—or, to speak more correctly, on our American society of twenty or thirty years ago. Another such rather injudicious tale is this one, related to President Brown, with impressiveness, by some acquaintance of Mr. Choate's: "The qualifications of a certain office-holder being discussed in his presence, Mr. Choate said, 'Yes, sir, you may sum them up by asserting that he is self-sufficient, all-sufficient, and *in*sufficient.'" Conversational strokes of this kind do not strike into admiration the generation of Americans now in being.

It was inevitable that Mr. Choate should suffer from this undiscriminating admiration. Not only were we undiscriminating, but he was a man to conciliate affection. He had a tender and excellent heart, so that it was impossible to know him and not feel for him personal affection; he had the glittering brilliancy of mind which dull men and untutored men value at so high a rate; and his profession laid on him the necessity of making constant displays of his peculiar abilities—or, rather, gave him the opportunity of doing so; for to be rhetorical was his nature. De Quincey himself hardly had in a higher degree the passion for rhetoric, pure and simple—even seemingly had it in a less degree, his mind was so much richer, and subtler, and better trained, and better stored than Choate's, and so constantly makes itself perceived, even when it is most elaborately painting. Whether he was in the Senate or before a half-dozen railway directors or a country jury, Mr. Choate was for ever "driving his substantive and six" adjectives, and making people stare at intellectual pyrotechny. For this his reputation now suffers, and is indeed a reputation that one does not like to think of as that of so able and good a man. That he was an astonishingly able lawyer, as well as the most effective and brilliant of advocates, there would seem to be no doubt. Webster said of him: "As a mere dry lawyer, he was equal to himself as an advocate." Mr. Richard H. Dana said: "He was the greatest master of logic we had among us. No man detected faallacy so quickly, or exposed it so felicitously, as he. Ask those venerated men who compose our highest tribunal, with whom all rhetoric is worse than wasted when their minds are bent to the single purpose of arriving at the true results of their science—ask them wherein lay the greatest power of Rufus Choate, and they will tell you that it lay in his philosophy, his logic, and his learning." His learning in the law was, as of necessity such learning must be, the result of untiring, wearing study, and a chief merit of this book—a better thing about it than any of the things in it which may seem more important—is the lesson which a young lawyer may learn from it of the carefulness and laborious industry with which Mr. Choate laid the foundations of his fame and usefulness. When, at the age of thirty, he was elected to Congress, he made a memorandum of facienda ad munus nuper impositum, which begins as follows:

"1. Personal qualities. Memory. 'Daily Food' and Cowper dum ambulo. Voice; manner, exercitationes diurnæ. 2. Current politics in papers—cum notulis, daily. Geography, etc. 'Annual Register,' past Intelligencers. 3. District: Essex South, population, occupations, modes of living, commerce—the Treaties—and principles on which it depends. 4. Civil History of the United States in Pitkin and original sources. 5. Examination of pending questions: Tariff, Public Lands, Indians, Nullification. 6. American and British eloquence—writing, practice."

Then follow, says the editor, "more than twenty pages of the closest writing, with abbreviated and condensed statements of results drawn from many volumes, newspapers, messages, and speeches, with propositions and arguments, for and against, methodically arranged under topics, with minute divisions and subdivisions; as, for example, a discussion under the head of "The Tariff," beginning with an analysis of Hamilton's report, made in 1790, followed by a history of internal improvements, a statement of their cost, a discussion of the constitutional power of making them, and a history of the legislation affecting them. A good deal of worse rhetoric than Choate's would be required to overlay such preparation as that.

Choate's political career, ending as it did with his alliance with the Democrats, whom he had all his life been fighting, though never acrimoniously, appears to have been governed throughout by that sentiment which was so ardent in all the politicians and statesmen of his generation, except the moral reformers—and, indeed, we are not justified in excepting them, equivocal as was the position taken by some of them when the conflict with slavery was at its hottest; the sentiment, namely, of extreme attachment to the idea of the union of the States. There need be no doubt now that in the breasts of Webster, Choate, Everett, Clay, Jackson, Pierce, Cass, and their contemporaries—the men whose fathers had seen the Revolution—Americanism, patriotic pride in their country and warm affection for her, burned with an intensity for which not all of us were, ten or fifteen years ago, giving them full credit; and this partly because we did not quite understand them. Probably some of us had a rather less acrid love for the Union, and a rather less uneasy faith in its permanence, than the men who, in old Federalist and Republican days, had been charging each other with desiring the overthrow of the Union, for the sake of introducing in its place British monarchy and French anarchy respectively. Choate we suppose to have been perfectly honest in his belief that the

* "Life of Rufus Choate. By S. G. Brown." Second edition. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1870.

Union was in danger from the Free-Soilers, and that it was infinitely better to keep the Union safe than to free negroes. He was one of the kindest of men, but was not a humanitarian in any sense of the word, and, indeed, was not a wise politician. Perhaps nothing of a political character that he has left behind him is so likely to do good, or rather so capable of doing good, as his frequent exhortations against that school of thinkers who wish for "government by the first shriek of the people," so to speak; the school which, like a Boston blatherskite in the Springfield Republican, avow a "willingness to submit themselves in all cases to a show of hands," no matter what the problem may be on which "the sense of the meeting" is to be taken. This to a man of Choate's turn of mind seemed the worst possible mode of government, and he was never tired of urging on his professional brethren the duty of the bar to make itself the vigilant antagonist of such "democracy run mad." Here are some remarks, sensible and witty, upon the "hundred-handed assembly" which in Athens grasped all the powers of the state:

"I wonder how long that incomprehensible democracy would have hesitated upon our Spot Pond, and Long Pond, and Charles River water questions. This intolerable hardship and circumlocution of applying to a legislature of three independent and co-ordinate departments, sitting under a written constitution, with an independent judiciary to hold it up to the fundamental law—the hardship of applying to such a legislature for the power to bring water into the city; this operose machinery of orders of notice, hearings before committees, adverse reports, favorable reports rejected, veto of governor, a charter saving vested rights of other people, meetings of citizens in wards to vote unawed, unwatched, every man according to his sober, second thought—how long do you think such conventionalities as these would have kept that beautiful, self-willed, passionate Athens standing, like the Tantalus of her own poetry, plunged in crystal lakes and gentle historical rivers, perishing with thirst? Why, some fine sunshiny forenoon you would have heard the crier calling the people, one and all, to an extraordinary assembly, perhaps in the Peiræus, as a pretty full expression of public opinion was desirable, and no other place would hold everybody; you would have seen a stupendous mass-meeting roll itself together as clouds before all the winds, standing on the outer edges of which you could just discern a speaker or two gesticulating, catch a murmur as of waves on the pebbly beach, applause, a loud laugh at a happy hit, observe some six thousand hands lifted to vote or swear, and then the vast congregation would separate and subside, to be seen no more. And the whole record of the transaction would be made up in some half-dozen lines to this effect—it might be in Æschines—that in the month of ——, under the archonate of ——, the tribe of —— exercising the office of prytanes ——, an extraordinary assembly was called, to consult on the supply of water; and it appearing that some six persons of great wealth and consideration had opposed its introduction for some time past, and were, moreover, vehemently suspected of being no better than they should be, it was ordained that they should be fined in round sums, computed to be enough to bring in such a supply as would give every man equal to twenty-eight gallons a day; and a certain obnoxious orator having enquired what possible use there was for so much a head, Demades, the son of the Mariner, replied that that person was the very last man in all Athens who should put that question, since the assembly must see that he himself could use it to great advantage, by washing his face, hands, and robes; and thereupon the people laughed and separated."

In religion as in politics, Mr. Choate held to the ancient landmarks, being a Calvinist of the ordinary New England type; and in literature his taste was that of the Dartmouth College of his day. Shakespeare he admired; but we may suppose Byron, Scott, Campbell, Moore, and their brethren to have been a little closer to his heart than any other writers, except perhaps Burke. He seems to have been a sedulous and multifarious reader rather than a good scholar in any department of learning or a man of delicate taste. On the whole, it is as a lawyer that he has his best title to respect and remembrance; but it is only as the skilful and fluent advocate that he will in fact be remembered by most—a fame fleeting and vague. The men are now living who will see an end of the little procession of sea-side pleasure-seekers who each summer visit the solitary farm-house on the island in Essex River, where, in the sound of the sea which he loved so much, he was born and nursed. President Brown's book, however, ought to keep his name alive in the ranks of the legal brotherhood, and prolong the influence of his example.

MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

The Catholic World for April we confess our momentary unfitness to criticise. That periodical, of which we have our own opinion, calls us "the wise critic of the Nation;" and the state of rancor we are in may be imagined. Yet we scorn injustice too, and wish to deny flatly that we have ever at any time said that "a young man ought to be like a ship, and devote his existence to sailing about on the boundless ocean of infidel nonsense." If we know our own heart, we shudder as much when we hear nefarious sentiments as any of all the Catholic World's staff of contributors We did, we admit, say something about its being as well, if one is a ship, to keep afloat as to beach one's self on the "Rock of Peter;" but we are much too shrewd to think of arguing in tropes. It is Saint Cyril of Jerusalem, and not we at all, who says, "And now I will convince you by a figure"—and then does n't do it, by-the-by. We merely made the passing remark above quoted by way of reply to an equally inept piece of metaphor in the article under review. It is not over and above honest in our contemporary, we must think, to call us "wise" when we had been doing nothing out of the way. Our readers may fancy, then, the pleasure we got on reading along into the essay which thus raps our knuckles, to find that we knew a deal more than the essayist. That purblind creature, if he will allow us to call him so, is actually ignorant of the notorious fact that Mr. Baring-Gould, whose book he is abusing, is what is called "a bad case of Ritualist," and as far as Cardinal Antonelli himself from being "a materialist." In fact, he would, no doubt, make a rather extreme Catholic if the Vatican Council should assert the validity of English orders, and should refrain from asserting the infallibility of the Pope. Rejoiced we were, too, when we found another contributor to the Catholic World so led away of the Adversary as to lay down the rule that "under Protestantism there is and can be no freedom of conscience;" and another declaring roundly that the school fund must be divided; and another advising the New Englander "to subject, in future, the articles of its unfortunate correspondent, of whom it is evidently ashamed, to the revision of a professor of mathematics;" and another, first boasting that every portion of the world is represented in the Council, and then citing as representatives of the "East" such imposing hosts as "the Chaldeans, Maronites, and Armenians."

However, it is the duty of the reviewer, as of man, to forgive, and not to rejoice over the calamity of enemies, so we will say that the number of the Catholic World now before us, while marked by some of the pitiable subterfuges and some of that polemical discourtesy and bad temper which always interfere with our enjoyment of this magazine, nevertheless contains some good writing. Aubrey De Vere has a beautiful poem, "To the Rainbow," which, of course, is made to do duty for the Virgin; but the transformation, so to call it, is managed with surpassing skill. Mr. Miles Gerald Keon, the author of a striking story called "Dion and the Sibyls," which is out of print in England, permits the Catholic World to reproduce it in this country. It is a severely classical tale, and weighted cumbrously with erudition; but it opens promisingly with a striking scene, which introduces to us Tiberius Cæsar, Sejanus, and other famous personages, and gives us an extremely effective bit of sword-play. "The Iron Mask" is of the nature of a review of M. Topin's new book, and is worth reading, though the reader may find the work reviewed in a livelier manner—in a manner a shade too vivacious, perhaps—in the current Hours at Home, where Colonel Meline treats of the mystery. Other articles of interest are "The School Question;" "Religious Liberty;" an attack on the New Englander, which has been praising Protestant morality; a translation of the "Stabat Mater" into Greek and English; Father Hecker's Roman letter, and several lesser matters.

A better subject for a magazine writer than the English governess in Siam has got hold of, it would be hard to find; and we hope future numbers of the Atlantic will tell with fulness the story of the remarkable life of the court. Some tales we have heard of events occurring in the palace which would make the fortune of a poet; and, judging from the pages before us, there must have been nearly as much that was amusing as there was of the terrible and pathetic. Another Oriental article in this number of the Atlantic is "The Gods of Wo Lee," which is civil to the Chinaman, who, however, is not, Mr. Andrews thinks, the coming Perfect Servant that some have been fondly imagining. "A Lumberwoman" is to be commended to the attention of the aimless woman, who is anxious about her rights, for it is radical and conservative and sensible. Likewise the unregenerate disbeliever in woman's rights, if he has any taste at all, will be pleased with it for its liveliness and pleasantness. Mr. Parton has been "doing" Virginia, and into a short article, called "Reviving Virginia," he puts the ordinary information concerning that State, but seems to have nothing new to say. As for the April Atlantic poetry, everybody will be pleased with Mr. Whittier's verses, entitled "My Triumph," in which the poet is as benignant and cheerful and unassuming as always. Less would have to be said in praise of the other poets of the number.

Lippincott's for April is a much better than average number of this magazine, which is apt to contain so many pieces that are slight and that appear to be the work of unpractised writers. "Luck in a Shadow," and "How I became a Pagan," are both agreeable little stories; "Two Old

Up to '59, Only 3 graduates had ranked "1 no 1". Choate was the 1st. Prof. Putnam 2d + W.H. Field, new Assistant Sec. 3d Heads," by Grace Greenwood, is a chat about that aged profligate, Prince Corsini, and about a very different character—the son of the Albert and Lotte of Werther; pleasant in the same way is Mr. Lewis Gaylord Clark's paper of reminiscences of Noah Webster; "Our Credit Abroad" is calculated to do good wherever it is read. For the rest, Lippincott's has a tale by Mrs. Harding Davis, the end of Trollope's "Vicar of Bullhampton," and a promise that the May number shall begin a new novel by the same perpetual story-teller; a funny article, called "About Hogs," by Mr. Donn Piatt, who seems to have a sort of an attachment for the unclean beast; a full and loud confession by Mr. Edward Pollard that he has all his life been mistaken in thinking that free negroes must of necessity slip to destruction, moral and material; a few pages of gossip about Washing ton society; some poetry, and a little very good book-noticing.

Hours at Home opens with a well-written story by Mr. N. S. Dodge, who relates the adventures of the ship that first entered Czar Peter's new port of St. Petersburg. "How I became a Scout" is an exciting chapter—and a true one we take it—of the secret History of the War, and has not, we think, been surpassed in interest by any of the numerous similar narratives which the war has called forth. "The Literature of our Sunday-schools" we continue to praise, and we sincerely hope all of the papers, of which this is the last, may be read and pondered. Much that Mr. Bacon has said is profitable for instruction and reproof to other writers, as well as those who debauch the minds of the children, and ought to get a large circle of readers. Not unprofitable is the last of the twelve essays on "Books and Reading," and these, we suppose, are sure to reappear as a book. It will be a book that will do some good, though probably it will not greatly increase its author's weight with the critics. Dr. Holland perhaps meditates a new volume of poems. Last month we had from him that gem in which the mother decides that the "limb" of her babe shall not be the place for the dimple; this month, from the same excessively delicate lyre, we have "Merle the Counsellor." If we are virtuous we shall be happy, it appears. The piece is worth looking at, as a perfect marvel of commonplaceness.

Any one who is taking much interest in Mr. Charles Reade's Grace Carden and Henry Little and Jael Dence is probably in rebellion and wrath against that author for the villany he has perpetrated in the last Galaxy. The hero is away in America, the heroine is just married to the wrong man, and the breathless reader who has hurried with the good doctor to prevent the wedding, and arrives just a minute too late, is left waiting for a month to know whether Mrs. Grace is going to lynch the designing Coventry or make a violent end of herself. But for that matter, people are beginning to care as little for Mr. Reade's later personages as he apparently does, whether or not they care as much as he does for his incidents. Association with Boucicault seems to have corrupted him thoroughly. "Ten Years in Rome" is still good Protestant reading, of which a certain portion we swallow out of hatred and contempt for the Pope of Rome, but all of which we do not find ourselves receiving as sworn evidence. Mr. Fechter of course comes in for notice in the Galaxy as well as in other magazines of the month, and his Galaxy critic, who seems very intelligent, appears to have a better opinion of the great actor than Mr. Grant White, who in his "Case of Hamlet the Younger" declares "the thoughtful, sensitive, graceful, and courtly impersonation of Edwin Booth" to be first among the "Hamlets" of our day. We do not see the need of the "odious comparison;" but now that it is made it becomes necessary to say that there are many people to whom Mr. Booth's "Hamlet" seems in almost every way so inadequate as to make the witnessing of it a serious trial to the feelings; while Mr. Fechter's, mistaken as no doubt it is, yet, as Shakespearian criticism, is at times so intelligent, not to say subtle, as almost to redeem the actor's misconception of the Prince's character, and his acting has at times a force which makes comparison of it with the prettinesses of Mr. Booth's picturings and posings seem almost ludicrous. A criticism of Fechter which more nearly than any other that we have seen accounts for the pleasure which the actor gives is Mr. Woods's article in the April Old and New. Besides these writers and pieces in the April Galaxy, Mr. L. J. Jennings writes well about the late Mr. Raymond; Mr. Justin McCarthy writes in his accustomed manner of the French Empress, for whom he shows more respect than do most people who talk of her; Mr. Anthony Trollope begins a story entitled "The Spotted Dog;" there is some more of the very pleasant "Letters from Havana;" "Philip Quilibet" writes energetically about officers' pay; and there is various other matter.

Putnam's contains several articles which are readable—the one which is perhaps most so being Mr. Vila Blake's collection of stories about old sensation preachers. Good too is the account of a horrible "night on the Mississippi when most of a castaway party of soldiers perished miserably of cold." "American Dress" is one of the cleverest of Professor Schele de Vere's very numerous essays. Any one who wants to read a "vigorous" article on the American doctrine of neutrality and in favor of Cuba may find one in the April Putnam's. The new "Editorial Notes" make a parlous beginning by taking, of all topics in the world, that dismal old topic of "American writing," "more boldness," "independence," "incisiveness," "individuality," "intensely individual life," "new life," "turbulent forces," and so forth. All this we seem to ourselves to have heard ten hundred thousand times before. The "turbulent forces" young man also, who writes to the editor asserting that "the time has come to give us a new and bold expression in narrative fiction" we seem to recognize, and if it were any affair of ours we should warn the editor to look out for such. The "ideal which ennobles every outbreak and lessens the harm of every transgression" wears a dangerous look, and hints at certain little dangerous deviations into that indecorous field of narrative fiction which is "ideal" chiefly in the sense of being not real except when really dirty.

As we have said, Mr. Woods's article upon Fechter in Old and New is a good criticism; though perhaps there is not in it anything so acute as a point made in Mr. Grant White's Galaxy article, where he remarks that the ghost which the Prince thinks he sees when in his mother's closet he does not really see, for it wears not the elderly Hamlet's armor, as the true ghost did, but the dressing-gown appropriate to the place where the Prince at the moment was when his excited fancy conjured up his father. The other papers in Old and New are on "Man and Mankind," by Dr. Bellows; "New England," which defends that region of the earth against certain wicked aspersions; "The Universalist Centenary," by Mr. J. M. Atwood; more of Elise Polko's story; some fairly good reviews of books; and a dozen short essays composing the "Record of Progress," of which the most noticeable is Mr. Sidney Andrews's "Views at the Capital"—a record which partly shows how useful might be a perfectly fearless, courteous account of the proceedings of the men whom we send to Washington.

Harper's has for its most interesting article a sketch of the last few years of the life of a Mr. Fuller, who has been going "around the world on skates"—that is to say, travelling here and there and everywhere as the whim took him, and paying his way by giving exhibitions of skating on wheels. The narrative does scanty justice to the extraordinary adventurousness and adventures of the "showman," but it will be found amusing, and will leave readers wishing for more. So, perhaps, will General McMahon's "War in Paraguay," which is illustrated profusely, and somebody's "Otto von Bismarck;" but not all readers. Still, both of these articles appease the American citizen's desire for information, more or less useful; and a desire for that very useful information which nobody ever uses may be satiated by a long pictorial article concerning the silk-worm. The "Editor's Easy Chair" is noticeable for some remarks called forth by the death of Mr. Wesley Harper. Nothing could be at once more graceful and more feeling than what Mr. Curtis says of his friend.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
A Woman Cannot Practise Law or Hold any Office in Illinois, swd.	(Chicago)
Allen (Dr. N.), Population: its Law of Increase, swd.	(Lowell)
Bergeret (Dr. L. F. E.), The Preventive Obstacle.	(Turner & Mignard)	$1 50
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 26, swd.	(T. Ellwood Zell)	0 50
Christine Thornton: A Child's Story.	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Duffield (S. W.), Warp and Woof: Poetry.	(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
Draper (Dr. J. W.), History of the American Civil War, Vol. III. and last.	(Harper & Bros.)	3 50
Flagg (W. J.), Hand-book of the Sulphur-Cure for Vines, swd.	(Harper & Bros.)
Hamilton (J. A.), Martin Van Buren's Calumnies Repudiated, swd.	(Chas. Scribner & Co.)	0 75
Holtzendorff (Dr. F. von), England's Presse, swd.	(Berlin)
Hymns to Jesus, from the Early English.	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Huntington (Rev. W. R.), The Church Idea.	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Lyman (T.), Papers relating to the Garrison Mob, swd.	(Cambridge)
Markham (C. R.), Life of the Great Lord Fairfax.	(Macmillan & Co.)
Mulock (Miss D. M.), A Brave Lady: A Tale.	(Harper & Bros.)	1 50
McCosh (Prof. J.), The Laws of Discursive Thought.	(Robt. Carter & Bros.)	1 50
Patterson (A. W.), Onward: Poetry.	(A. Roman & Co.)
Quincy (S. M.), The People's Banks of Germany, swd.	(Little, Brown & Co.)
Rogers (Prof. J. E. T.), Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, 2 vols.	(Macmillan & Co.)
Schieferdecker (Dr.), Horrors of Vaccination, swd.	(Am. News Co.)
Strawberry Hill: A Child's Story	(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Thomas (Dr. J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, Part 5, swd.	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)	0 50
The Christmas Tapers, and Other [Child's] Stories.	(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Tales of European Life, swd.	(Loring)	0 50
Taylor (S. H.), Classical Study.	(Warren F. Draper)	2 00
Townsend (G. H.), Everyday Book of Modern Literature.	(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Whately (Archbishop), Peculiarities of the Christian Religion, and Historic Doubts concerning Napoleon.	(W. F. Draper)	2 00

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1870.

The Week.

SINCE the General Deficiency Bill was passed in the Senate, on Wednesday week, and sent to a committee of conference, Congress has done no business that calls for especial mention. One step has been taken in the Senate towards settling the interpretation of the law providing for the income tax, by a joint resolution authorizing the Internal Revenue Department to collect the tax for the past year. In the House, the tariff has continued to undergo revision, and on Thursday the Diplomatic Deficiency Bill was passed. It was the day before that Fernando Wood started up to make a "personal explanation," which turned out to be a formal arraignment of General Howard. He accused that officer, in brief, of making himself rich by employing the funds of the Freedmen's Bureau in various religious and educational enterprises, and in land and building speculations at the expense of the Government; of having discharged his duties as Commissioner "with extravagance and negligence, and in the interests of himself and family and friends;" and of being in favor of the Freedmen's Bureau ring, and connected with all the machinery in the Southern States which has served "to devote the official authority and power of the Bureau to personal and political profit." The founding and management of the Howard University furnish a large part of this formidable indictment, which the House entrusted for examination, not to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, as Mr. Wood desired, but to the Committee on Education and Labor. If the investigation should reveal abuses on the part of employees of the Bureau, we should not be surprised; but that General Howard's personal integrity will be impeached we do not believe, however he may have conducted the finances of his bureau, or however much his subordinates may have failed to imitate him, or he may have been deceived in selecting them.

The week has been remarkable for a great number of rejoicings over the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment by the colored people, and their white friends and champions. The Anti-Slavery Association has celebrated the event by disbanding, after thirty-seven years of existence. Its founders, a large proportion of whom have, with rare good fortune, not only lived to see its extinction, but to see the object for which it was established accomplished, had little expectation of witnessing the abolition of slavery; and during the greater part of its existence felt that they were rather bearing testimony for the sake of their own souls than achieving results. Its leaders, however, during the last five years, have enjoyed the luxury of feeling that they were doing the whole work of securing the fruits of the war, and were mainly instrumental in preventing the restoration of the peculiar "institution," and procuring the passage of the Amendment. So that in the dissolution of the Association they have tasted both the "pain and bliss of dying." Their forces will now be transferred to other fields of reform. The woman's suffrage movement will probably receive the greater portion of them, and they will, no doubt, be divided pretty evenly between the three camps into which the friends of that cause are now found. We do not pretend to give the exact titles of the three divisions; but roughly, they may be described as the Revolution Society, of which Susan B. Anthony is the head; and the Cleveland or National Association, of which Henry Ward Beecher is the head; and an association of which Mr. Theodore Tilton is the head, and which is the result of an abortive attempt on the part of that gentleman to unite the other two. We are sorry to see that, judging from their public addresses to each other, Mr. Tilton's association is the only one which feels kindly towards the others, and there promises to be warm work between them all during the coming summer.

The Cincinnati municipal election on Monday week resulted in the choice of the entire Republican ticket, and, what was the chief bone of contention, in placing a majority of Bible men on the School Board. The vote on the latter issue, however, was a very close one, and if the Board had been chosen at large there would actually have been a popular anti-Bible majority of 1,500. In fact, considering that the colored voters, some 1,200 strong, generally supported the Bible candidates, and in at least three wards held the balance of power, it is not too much to say, as the Commercial does, that the Bible majority in the Board is due to them. It is also pointed out that the colored people, being confined to separate schools, should properly have taken no part in voting for other trustees than their own; so that, subtracting them altogether from the canvass, it appears that the legal constituents of the old board show a majority of nearly three thousand out of twenty-five, in favor of the action condemned by the court, and that the accidental triumph on Monday is calculated to inspire serious reflections in the winning party. Already the Gazette "would adopt such rules with reference to the use of the Bible in the schools, and what is called religious instruction, as to remove all ground for reasonable objection on the part of any class." The day following the Cincinnati vote, an effort was made in St. Louis, where the Bible has long been excluded from the schools, to get a division of the school-fund in favor of the Catholics. It was defeated, however, with some éclat; but the Gazette does not draw from this result the obvious moral, which is, not that the Catholics or their priests are likely to be placated by secularizing the schools, but that when sectarianism can find nothing in the schools to object to but their non-sectarianism, the attacking party is at its weakest, and the ground of the defence as solid as it can be made.

We find very little difference of opinion in the press as to the gross impropriety, to use a very mild term, of the reopening of the legal-tender decisions in the Supreme Court. It is, in every way one looks at it, a blunder, and, moreover, a criminal blunder. What aggravates it is, that the interests affected by the decision are really found on examination to be very small in amount or importance. There are now very few securities extant which were issued before 1862, and are, therefore, under the decision, payable, either principal or interest, in gold. Most of the obligations of that date, national, State, municipal, or railroad, have been paid off or converted, so that the rehearing has not even the poor excuse of being called for as a relief to debtors. There has been an unseemly squabble on the bench in open court as to the understanding between the judges touching the legal-tender point.

The Chicago Tribune speaks very slightingly of the Funding Bill, characterizing it as "a piece of charlatanry—a mere game of swapping jack-knives, and an attempt to circumvent the laws of political economy and repudiate the National Republican platform." The bill is stuck fast in the House, partly because of the little contraction of the currency it does, and partly because of the fierce opposition of the National Banks. It is said, and we believe correctly, that the Government has the legal right to force the banks into the conversion of their bonds at a lower rate of interest, which is one of the principal features of the bill, but then it has also the legal right to repudiate the whole debt, interest and principal. What throws discredit on the whole scheme in short is, that one-quarter of the bonds proposed to be issued are to be forced on people who don't want to take them. This, of course, is injurious to the Government credit, and lays the plan open to all that the Chicago Tribune says of it; but Senator Sherman has long had a hankering after a compulsory mode of improving the public credit, and he is probably now as near success as he will ever get. It is said that the Committee of Ways and Means now wants to sugar the pill for the banks by offering to relieve them from State and municipal taxes if they will only submit to the reduction of their interest. In this way the credit of the Congressional "funders" would be saved in the eyes of innocent people, and it would seem as if they were really putting off bonds in the market, as they said they were going to do, at four per cent. interest. In reality, they would be simply robbing Peter to pay Paul, or drawing out at the spigot to pour in again at the bung. But this has really been the great aim of most of the financial schemes introduced in Congress this session.

It begins to seem as if something was coming to an end in Cuba—whether the rebellion or not, we cannot say. General Rodas telegraphed on the 8th instant that the war was over, and Spanish columns appear to have traversed the insurrectionary districts or whatever they are without seeing any enemy; and Quesada has left the country; and it is said that Cespedes is leaving; and Col. Ryan is said to have fought a duel with a Cuban warrior; and, in fact, the whole thing—whatever it be—looks blue. The New York Tribune requested its readers on the 8th to suspend their judgment over the Rodas despatch, but nothing has since come to light to throw doubt on its correctness. There has been a curious discussion going on between the Christian Union and the World and other papers about our treatment of Cuba, in which the Union takes ground which amounts in substance to saying that each nation defines the extent of its international obligations, and that when we want to learn what are our duties as neutrals we have only to look in our own statute-book, and if we don't like what we find there, we have only to alter the statute to suit ourselves; all of which, or something like it, was asserted boldly by the English crown lawyers during the Alabama controversy, but the American Government steadfastly and wisely refused to admit it.

Mr. Vanderbilt was asked to sign the petition of railroad presidents to which our correspondent "Metallurgist" recently referred, asking Congress to substitute a specific duty of two cents a pound on steel for the present ad valorem duty. He refused, on the ground that, though he can see very well what American steel-makers would gain by the change, he is at a loss to see what interest railroad presidents can have in it. Their business, he says, is to get steel rails as cheap as they can, and to increase the duty is to place them in the hands of "home extortionists, who would undoubtedly be as exorbitant in their demands as foreign manufacturers would be, were the same protection given to them." A monopoly in steel rails, he says, would often compel them—the railroads—"to take an inferior article at any price the monopolists might please to put upon it;" and he insinuates that it looks to him as if the signers of the petition—thirty-three out of the thirty-six being representatives of roads located in or running through Pennsylvania—were more interested in the manufacture of steel than in the laying down of steel rails. To this the Tribune replies, that if Mr. Vanderbilt knew what was good for him and for the hundred million dollars' worth of railroads over which he presides, he would not only help to shut out foreign steel rails, but make his own; but he, being a simpleton, and not understanding his business half as well as Mr. Greeley, will probably go on doing as he has been doing—that is, buying his steel rails where he can get them cheapest and best. This suggests the question, Why not force Vanderbilt and the like of him by law to make rails, whether they like or not? Why not oblige him to lay every mile of his tracks with his own manufacture? Of course, he will try to sneak out of the job, and, as he is rich and unscrupulous, he will probably be somewhat successful; but the people will yet bring him to justice. Mr. Felton, who asked Mr. Vanderbilt to sign the paper, replies, coherently, if not forcibly, that the proposed duty would not keep any foreign rails out, would encourage the production of American rails, and would lower prices, in which case it would certainly be the most wonderful tax ever devised, and everybody ought to favor it.

The contest in Albany over the New Charter, or rather arising out of the Democratic attempt to restore "self-government" to the city, has at last come to a close, ending in the complete triumph of the Ring, and leaving Tweed, the head centre, a more powerful man than ever. The high hopes which were excited some weeks ago by the uprising of the "Young Democracy," headed by O'Brien, whose appearance in the character of a reformer was a curious spectacle, and cheered on by the World, which really made heroic efforts, have all been dashed. The plans of the Ring were at last carried out with extraordinary unanimity. The causes of this were various, but the principal one was that, the reformers not being a whit better than the "corruptionists," reform was impossible. The "Young Democracy" were of exactly the same cloth as the Ring, differing from the members of that body simply in being generally poorer. A quarrel of this kind among thieves would have promised some advantage to honest people, in an age when political passions run high; but a real quarrel among knaves is now almost unknown. Politicians have no passions now. They occasionally simulate hate and fury, but only for the purpose either of imposing on the simple-minded bystanders, or else of raising their price when they come "to sell out" to the opposite party, which they always do eventually. The spectacle of honest reformers trying to cheer them on to the assault is always a curious mixture of the sublime and the ridiculous. The World appears to have really thought that the "Young Democrats" were close behind it as it was yelling on the assault, the fact being that they were already drinking in the trenches with Tweed, and arranging the price for which they would cry quits. The bargain closed, the opposition vanished like a mist, and we have a New Charter which is really not bad, and which the Mayor has put in operation by a set of, on the whole, creditable appointments.

It is quite within the bounds of probability that Tweed may now do better than the "Young Democrats" would have done, inasmuch as he has made his fortune, and is on the lookout for what even to the worst of men is sweeter than fortune—consideration. The Union League Club has fared nearly as badly in the affair as the Young Democracy. They drew up a really excellent set of amendments to the Charter, and sent a deputation, with Mr. Greeley at its head, up to Albany to urge their adoption. On hearing the deputation, however, the Senate almost immediately and unanimously passed the Charter as it stood. Mr. Greeley has since been savagely attacked for his manner of executing his mission, on the ground that he really threw his constituents overboard, and said the contrary of what he was directed to say. His opinion of the Union League Club is so low, and its adulation of him so unceasing and unreserved, that it would be nothing wonderful if its instructions made little impression on him.

Amongst the latest accessions to the woman's suffrage movement in England is Mr. Maurice, the well-known Broad Church clergyman, and now a professor of Oxford. He has given in his adhesion on the special ground of woman's great conscientiousness, which is probably the very strongest ground its advocates can take; and it is ground, too, justified by experience of actual life. Mrs. Fawcett, the wife of the professor, has also, it is reported, been delivering some very able lectures on the subject, and the cause has been helped indirectly, but very opportunely, by some really powerful argumentation from her sister, Miss Garett, against the Contagious Diseases Act, the ladies' attack on which was growing very feeble, under the influence of the à priori declamation of which the denunciations of it largely consisted. Mr. Mill, too, has been making one of his longest speeches in support of the suffrage. By the bye, we wish he knew the mischief his book was working here, in satisfying numbers of slenderly equipped people that, he having spoken, there is no further need on their part for thought or logic, and that they may devote themselves to what, in the old stage directions, is called "excursions and alarms." His theory, that, owing to the ingenious tyranny of man, we know nothing of the nature of woman, and that, therefore, the fact that she has never done a thing ought not to raise a presumption that she is incapable of doing it, has opened up a field of wild speculation, which we are sure would grieve him could he look upon it, and which his teachings on the method of reasoning in sociology ought to have rendered impossible.

Some of his followers are now boldly defending ignorant suffrage, and scoffing at the notion that an educated man has any more value in politics than a man that is not educated; a result for which he can hardly have been prepared, as he writes recently (Oct. 20) to a member of the Social Science Association in Boston:

"The great desideratum in America, and, though not quite in an equal degree, in England too, is the improvement of the higher education. America surpasses all countries in the amount of mental cultivation which she has been able to make universal; but a high average level is not everything. There are wanted, I do not say a class, but a great number of persons, of the highest degree of cultivation which the accumulated acquisitions of the human race make it possible to give them. From such persons, in a community that knows no distinction of ranks, civilization would rain down its influences upon the remainder of society, and, the higher faculties having been highly cultivated, the most advanced part of the public would give forth products and create an atmosphere that would produce a high average of the same faculties in a people so well prepared in point of general intelligence as the people of the United States."

We are bound to say that this reads very like a proposal "to establish caste in America." The phrase "raining down influences" strikes us as peculiarly suspicious. If he had said "raining up" or "raining around," we should have less hesitation in accepting his theory. But we fear, if his highly cultivated class were allowed to rain things down on "the poor man" when Congress was not sitting, they would crush him.

A vast movement is going on at the South, almost unobserved except by travellers who are brought in contact with it, by which the white population is transferring itself from the east to the west bank of the Mississippi, and more particularly to Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. The place of the class that thus migrates is partly filled by negroes from Virginia and the Border States—Virginia alone having sent more than five thousand over one road during January and February—and partly by settlers from the North; and a year or two more of these substitutions will cause marked changes in the political aspect of the South. The report of the Emigration Commissioners of Louisiana, for the past year, estimates the white exodus from the Southern Atlantic States, Alabama, and Mississippi, to the trans-Mississippi regions, at scores of thousands, and attributes it to the natural reluctance to cultivate worn-out cotton-fields and clear the forests in the rich river-bottoms, when fertile prairies lie beyond, all ready for crops of cotton, sugar, rice, and fruit. Louisiana has retained but a small portion of these wanderers, but her population has been swelled in a noticeable manner by other streams. From abroad, direct to the port of New Orleans, there have come, since March of last year, nearly four thousand emigrants; and of Germans, Swedes, and others, some three thousand by way of the West. The colored people, either hired or settled in the State from other States, make about five thousand, and the estimated number of native white immigrants is ten thousand. There were also not less than three thousand transient laborers from the West, commencing a practice familiar in Europe—as between Ireland and England, for example—but comparatively unknown here; that is, after the wheat harvest was closed at the West, the labor released found itself in demand to pick cotton and help to take care of the cane in Louisiana. Besides an agreeable change of employment, a not less agreeable change of climate attends a winter trip to the Gulf.

It is interesting to learn from the same report that there are about two hundred Chinamen in Louisiana, some of whom are registered voters. They are chiefly to be found in two colonies of Catholics from the Philippine Islands, who "live in comfortable cabins, and have thrifty patches of corn, cotton, and rice, but subsist mainly by fishing for the New Orleans market." The stragglers are employed as plantation hands. The commissioners pronounce the attempts to introduce Chinese laborers on a grand scale perfect failures, and, for the present, in decided disfavor. In fact, the warning lately extended by the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society against this Southern enterprise has proved to be hardly needed. Still, it may be well to remember that all the precautions and stringent regulations of the British Government in regard to the coolie traffic have not availed to prevent kidnapping, oppression, and fraud, and that coolie mortality on shipboard rivals that of the African slave-trade. Above all, it ought to be borne in mind that involuntary emigration excludes females, and hence directly feeds the worst forms of immorality and vice, by creating an abnormal numerical disparity between the sexes.

The latest reforms in the French Constitution are not to be carried out, it seems, without serious convulsions in the ministry. The Emperor's letter to M. Ollivier, of March 21, expressed his desire to have all "required reforms adopted at once, so as to put an end to the immoderate desire for change which exists in certain minds." He accordingly ordered the ministry to prepare a Senatus-Consultum which was to divide the constituent power between the two chambers, instead of confining it to the Senate, as at present, and this the Senate was of course expected to adopt, nolens volens. Thereupon arose dissensions both in the ranks of the ministry itself and between the ministry and the Senate, as to what the Senatus-Consultum was to contain. One party wanted simply to have the Senate give way to the extent of giving back the election of mayors of municipalities to the people. Another wanted almost a complete recasting of the constitution, leaving the Senate little or nothing of its present power or dignity, and indeed reducing it to the position of the Chamber of Peers before 1848. The Senate, on the other hand, headed, and, it is said, egged on by M. Rouher, its president, the well-known ex-minister of the personal régime, is trying to surrender as little as possible, and Rouher is said to have still the ear of the Emperor. Another cause of dissension in the Cabinet is the unwillingness of the advanced section to leave in the hands of the executive that power of appeal to the people, known as the privilege of ordering a plébiscite, as being in reality a covert right of making coup d'état, but this the Emperor hesitates about giving up. So there is, according to the latest news, a crisis pending, which has already brought about the resignation of M. Buffet, the Minister of Finance, and threatens that of Count Daru, the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The question on which the country is most strongly excited is the 57th article of the constitution, which gives the Government the power of appointing anybody it pleases mayor of a municipality; the moderates would be content with a compromise by which the Government would have to confine its choice to persons nominated by the municipal councils, while the advanced section insist on the relegation of the choice to the council or the people.

Affairs at Rome have become highly interesting. The French Government held off from any interference touching the deliberations of the Council for a long time, and, beyond Count Daru's private letters to the Marquis de Banneville, gave no indication of its feeling about the dogma of infallibility. On the report of the ambassador, however, that the dogma was making rapid headway, and that Antonelli even, who is not supposed to be burdened with much religious enthusiasm, had gone over to it, a Cabinet Council was held, at which it was determined to announce to the Pope that the French Government would send an ambassador to the Council, in accordance with the earlier practice. The ambassador hesitated about presenting the letter, but did present it; and, when he called for a reply, was put off by Antonelli, who had the gout. The same day, a protest was signed by the French bishops, and was threatened by the German bishops, against a new rule of procedure still further curtailing their liberty of debate, and the three things combined provoked the Pope into the issue of a decree containing the proposed form of promulgation of the much talked-of dogma, and a copy was promptly served on every bishop. The form of the dogma is said to confine the infallibility to matters touching "faith or morals"—terms which, of course, are capable of indefinite expansion—and it contains no ex-cathedrâ proviso. So the Pope under it can be infallible whenever he pleases, and there will be no outward sign by which the human eye can tell whether he is acting in the capacity of a god or only of a man. That he will be a somewhat narrow-minded and capricious deity may be inferred from the fact that he forbade Montalembert's funeral mass being celebrated anywhere but in one of the smallest and most obscure churches in Rome, out of revenge for his having denounced the great dogma before his death. The latest report is that, all things being now ready, the dogma will be adopted by acclamation on Easter Sunday.

POPULAR GOVERNMENT AND HIGH TARIFFS.

THERE is one view of the tariff controversy which is every day taking hold of a larger proportion of the community, and which we earnestly commend to the consideration of thoughtful protectionists, and that is, that the uncertainty in which, under a popular government, a high tariff involves all commerce and industry, renders the thorough trial of the protectionist experiment almost impossible in this country. Granting everything that Mr. Carey and Mr. Greeley or any of their disciples claim for their theory; granting that if we kept on excluding foreign products by high duties, we should eventually build up native manufactures which would be able to hold their own without protection, does not the experience of the last ten years justify us in concluding that it is useless to make the effort, that the people will not submit to it, and that it involves a derangement of the machinery of business which nothing but the extraordinary material wealth of the country enables it to bear up under, and which even this will not enable it to bear up under long? To all arguments drawn from the one or two successful attempts made to naturalize branches of industry by means of state fostering—such as the beet-root sugar industry in France—it is a sufficient answer to say that these are examples of what a despotic and highly centralized government, exempt from the control of public opinion or only slenderly influenced by public opinion, can do if you give it half a century to work in. We might nearly as well cite the spectacle of the half-million of men which France or Prussia keeps constantly under arms in support of the theory that we could draft and maintain a similar force here. The American tariff is, on the other hand, the work of a large popular assembly, the composition of which almost completely changes in the course of eight or ten years, and which every two years receives from its constituents a fresh set of moral and mental impressions. The trial of an experiment requiring an indefinite period of time for its completion, and inflicting on the bulk of the community during the whole time a present and perceptible loss as the price of a remote and invisible good, it is useless to expect from such a body. It is with great difficulty that even small institutions, the advantage of which to the community is immediate and evident, but which entail more or less expense, such as the naval and military schools, the Coast Survey, and the army and navy, are kept on foot from generation to generation. Every decade sees an attempt from some quarter to get rid of them; that immense monopolies from which all the immediate benefit is seen to go to individuals, while the public is put off with promises, can fare even half as well, it is useless to expect.

To the element of uncertainty created by the fluctuations in public opinion and in the character of the governing body, must be added the still greater ones created by the very nature of the protective policy. To one of these we have more than once alluded—namely, the impossibility, when you put a heavy duty on any commodity extensively used in a highly complex commercial society like ours, of foreseeing all its effects. The result you aim at is pretty sure to be only one of a hundred produced; what the other ninety-nine will be, you can hardly ever tell beforehand. For instance, you tax foreign iron heavily in order to build up the manufacture of native iron, and this your tax may succeed in accomplishing; but iron enters largely into nearly every branch of human industry; it furnishes the tools of all trades, and in our day is the great instrument of locomotion. Your tax, therefore, produces most important effects on a great variety of manufactures, of which the legislator, perhaps, never thought when he was imposing the duty, but which, after it has worked a year or two, he finds clamoring round his door for revision. Sometimes, too, a duty on one commodity strikes others with which it does not seem to have the remotest connection, thus producing a result which nobody but a very thoughtful expert could have foreseen—as in the case cited by Mr. Wells, in which the duty on copper, to the astonishment of everybody, nearly ruined the manufacturers of wall-paper, owing to their having begun to use an alloy of copper and zinc, called "Dutch metal," for their decoration. The extended application of chemistry to the arts, of which modern industry is full, and the close interrelation which science is establishing among all the arts, prepare multitudes of these snares and surprises for the financial legislator. Some of them might be avoided if the tariff were committed, both for its preparation and enforcement, entirely to the hands of a commission of scientific experts holding office for life, as the judges do under the Constitution, and sitting constantly to watch over and revise it. To expect the Committee of Ways and Means, the House, and the Senate, and the lobby, all pulling in different directions, to avoid them, is simple folly.

Another element of uncertainty is due to the tendency of every tax imposed on one article to diffuse itself over all other articles. The rapidity with which this diffusion takes place depends on the extent to which the article enters into general consumption, and to which it is difficult to dispense with its use. A tax on iron or leather, for instance, is felt with great rapidity in the price of all commodities; a tax on tea or sugar, much less rapidly and less perceptibly. The result of this diffusion is, however, always to render the protective effect of the tax very brief. The rise of the cost of other things which it creates speedily puts the protected industry in much the same relation to its competitors in which it previously stood, and makes a still further rise in the tax necessary. The consequence is that a protective tariff is never a finality; and in default of the acquisition of some extraordinary natural or mechanical advantages, protected industries are never found either content with the protection they have or ready to do with less. This is true of protection in all countries in which it has been tried. The history of the tariff during the last ten years affords a remarkable illustration of its truth in this country. Every year since 1860, every protected interest in the United States has had a lobby at Washington clamoring for higher duties, and showing that unless they got an increase it was all over with it; and every year the tariff has been overhauled and modified, and always in the same direction.

Now the overhauling and changing of the tariff, which is now as regular as the return of the spring, means a change in prices of nearly every article of commerce and industry—of all the more important ones, at all events. It means the subjection of every trader's and manufacturer's operations to the control of secret agencies, over which he has no control, and the operations of which he cannot calculate or foresee, and which may ruin him, particularly if his business is one of those in which the returns on investments are slow, and the combinations need long periods of time to be worked out. The meeting of Congress, therefore, actually produces on industry some of the effects of war. In December, after the representatives of the various "interests" have assembled at Washington, in that city rumors begin to circulate as to what the committee are going to do, which naturally excite more or less alarm and uncertainty all over the country, and consequently exercise a more or less repressive influence on enterprise. Then the committee settle down to the revision of the tariff—that is, to the work of lowering the value of some kinds of property, and raising that of others—with as much equanimity as a farmer sets to work at his spring ploughing, although their action in its general effects resembles nothing so much as the appearance in the populous districts of a strong body of hostile cavalry, moving swiftly and plundering as they go. As their work goes on, of course the anxiety and uncertainty of the business world increase, under the influence of the reports from the committee-room. The attention of the great industrial chiefs is called off almost completely from their callings, and transferred to Washington. Some go on there, and harangue the committee and buttonhole the members, and write letters to the newspapers; others stay at home, and prepare for the worst, by restricting their operations to the narrowest limits—"making things snug," as it is called, till "the new tariff bill" is either killed or passed; but this rarely happens before June. Six months of the year, therefore, business is kept in a kind of semi-paralysis, as it is at this moment; those who go on at the old rate have to have the hearts and heads of gamblers.

We have no wish to depreciate Congress unduly. We have no doubt its desire to do right is generally underrated by the newspapers, but nobody claims for the great body of the members familiarity with financial history or political economy. There is nobody, too, who has ever attempted to master these subjects, or who knows anything of the lives of the great explorers of these fields of political science, who is not aware that proficiency in them is only to be bought by years of laborious study and constant observation of all their phenomena at home and abroad. Now, as Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, pointed out the other day as the result of his own sad experience, members cannot, in the present condition of the Civil Service, give even the smallest amount of serious attention to the great economical problems now before the country. All the time they spend out of their seats is devoted to interviews with the worthless class who are hunting for offices, or to correspondence with constituents on the subject of "claims." They are, consequently, as helpless in the presence of tariff speculators as a band of untutored savages in the presence of a body of skilled riflemen, armed with repeaters. And yet the re-valuation of the property and business of every man in the community is committed every winter regularly to this body. At the present moment, it is not only engaged in rearranging the whole system of taxation, but in providing for a total change in the nature and value of about $1,200,000,000 worth of securities now in the money market; and, to add to the uncertainty thus created, and weighing heavily on the business world, the Administration has called the Supreme Court into the field, and is getting it to reverse a decision only a few weeks old, and which affects the value of the whole circulating currency of the nation. In other words, the taxation, currency, and a large proportion of the marketable securities of the country are at this moment afloat on an ocean of uncertainty.

We have no desire to see any violent measures taken towards any industry which the tariff has either called into existence or forced into unnatural activity. All violent changes are dangerous and unjust; but the high-tariff men must make up their minds that the present state of things cannot continue; that the country is growing disgusted and will soon insist on getting down to "the hard pan" somehow, and having the tariff element of uncertainty taken out of its affairs. If protectionists are wise, they will prepare for this change; it depends on them whether it will be sudden and violent, or gradual and smooth. They might have saved themselves years ago, by letting the tariff alone, and giving the business community at least certainty; but it is now doubtful whether even the chance of compromise has not passed away.

WHAT "THE SHIP OF STATE" NEEDS.

Harper's Weekly, speaking, a fortnight ago, of the confirmation of Sickles's nomination by the Senate, on the report of Mr. Charles Sumner, dwelt in very strong terms on the serious nature of the injury done to the Republican party, whose strength has been so largely moral strength, by such open denial of the value of good character to public men, or, in fact, of the existence of any relation whatever between morals and politics. Of course, the confirmation of such a man as Sickles, on the cordial recommendation of such a man as Mr. Sumner, brought out in the most striking possible way the curious ethical position into which the party has gradually worked itself; but the importance of the incident lay, after all, mainly in its value as an illustration. The state of things which it brought prominently before the public eye is now of old date. The party managers began to cultivate unscrupulousness, and laugh over objections to the character of "faithful men," and cry up "soundness on the main question," almost immediately after the close of the war, or at least as soon as they found they were going to have a tussle with Andrew Johnson. Previously, they had passed a large portion of their time with their Bible or Epictetus on their knees, and relied a good deal on the "mill of God" and its slow grinding, and were apparently content to wait an indefinite period for the triumph of truth and right. Dirty tools and dirty tricks they eschewed vigilantly. The struggle against slavery did undoubtedly raise those engaged in it into a serener and purer air than the merely party politician has often an opportunity of breathing. During the war, too, the heart of the country was too deeply stirred, and too much of the work of Government was done by the army and the Executive, to leave much room for mere intriguing. But what did most to preserve Republican morals during the war was the fact that the powerful reinforcement of knavish politicians which it received from the ranks of the Democratic party, after the secession of the South, was mainly in the field, either fighting or going through the motions of fighting. When peace came, these worthies came back home, and not only had to be provided for, but began to take an active part in the management of the party.

The change they brought about very speedily in the Republican moralists was very curious to witness. The contest with Johnson once begun, they rapidly taught them all their best tricks, and in particular taught them the old Democratic drill and discipline, and especially that very marked feature of the old Democratic discipline—indifference to personal character of "fellow-soldiers." It was very interesting to watch the Republican saints after they began to wink at each other, and grin, and point with their thumbs "over the left," when simple-minded persons called their attention to the fact that A., whom they had just nominated to high office, was given to having drunken sprees in brothels; or that B. was not generally believed on his oath, and had certainly been guilty of trover and conversion, as the lawyers say, with regard to C.'s funds; and that D. had committed a murder, robbed a till, and acted for some years as a professional pimp—not to speak of various minor delinquencies. They were much too 'cute to attempt refutations of these charges or even to take any notice of them. They simply were silent when they were mentioned, or laughed, and called for a vote. If they did notice them, it was much in the style of a henchman of a prominent New York politician, who, defending his chief, some years ago, when candidate for mayor, against some unpleasant charges in the nature of forgery and embezzlement, met them with the simple declaration that they "were an eternal lie against humanity." There was nothing more amusing, however, than their mode of dealing with cases of intemperance. The party, and especially the party managers, have always had a leaning to temperance, and, if not ready to legislate against intoxication, have always shown strong sympathy with the teetotal sentiment of the country. But, of course, it was impossible to prevent cases of drunkenness occurring in their own ranks, and even among leaders, and drunkenness is not so easy to overlook or cover up as theft or fornication, nor could it be fairly set off by loyalty or hatred of "the traitor in the White House." So they issued certificates that the accused had never been seen drunk by this or that prominent man. In one case the accused person's habit of drinking to excess was so notorious that his failure to get drunk could only be accounted for on the supposition that liquor did not affect persons who were "sound on the main question."

In the Butler contest in Massachusetts in 1868—the most serious danger threatening the country being, as was plainly to be seen, repudiation of the public debt, and the party being on the question of reconstruction firm and united as a rock—the managers deliberately aided in every way in their power in returning to Congress one of the foremost and most unscrupulous apostles of repudiation, who has ever since been engaged in breaking down the public credit—i.e., in preventing the funding of the public debt at a lower rate of interest and the reduction of taxation—and thus diminishing the defensive power of the Government in all future wars or rebellions. At that time Mr. Sumner had made such progress in the new code that he laid down the doctrine, as an excuse for not using his influence against Butler, that the senators and members of the House were "officers of the party" and not officers of the whole people, and therefore bound to stand by each other—probably as debasing and mischievous a view of a legislator's position as could well be propounded. Of course, under it all things are lawful.

Mr. Sumner has ever since acted under it. He canvassed actively for Ashley after the publication of the Cox correspondence, which showed that Ashley had actually entered into a formal partnership to trade in lands in the Territories, on the strength of the knowledge which he acquired as member of the House Committee, and has left nothing undone since to whitewash that worthy—the moving consideration being apparently the noisy zeal which he displayed in Andrew Johnson's impeachment, so that the confirmation of Sickles is in reality but the legitimate result of a process of degeneration long going on.

We recur to the subject, which is not a pleasant one, and which we have already discussed frequently, for the purpose not only of corroborating what Harper's Weekly says as to the extent to which the Republican party is dependent on its morals for its strength, but of pointing out that the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment, and the failure of the party thus far to exhibit much skill or courage in the treatment of financial questions, renders good morals more than ever necessary to its existence; and the only effective way in which any party can show the goodness of its morals, in the present condition of the country, is in the choice of public officers, or, in other words, in the purification of the Civil Service. The laws are all good enough; at all events, they will do for the present; what we need is better men to execute them. In the present stage of the voyage "the ship of state"—to use an old and well-worn simile—has had prayers and articles of war read on the quarter-deck often enough; we now want good seamen to work her and keep the reckoning. With eighty-odd members of the Legislature of South Carolina unable to read or write, and in nearly every other Southern State adventurers of the lowest class fighting for the possession of the government, under the superintendence of Congress, it is clear that it is not so much declarations of principles we need as the recognition in practice that the Government requires, in every department, upright, honorable, and instructed men to do its work, and has absolutely no accommodation either for penitent rakes or ignorant old hacks in search of an easy living.

BABY SUFFRAGE.

It would seem as if there was no way in which a man of reformatory turn could do as much just now for humanity as by contriving some mode of giving the ballot to babies—that is, some mode of enabling them to get the ticket into the box. Of their fitness to vote, in all other respects, it is happily not permitted to us any longer to doubt. According to the arguments by which many great men and still greater women have been for the last five years advocating the extension of the suffrage, a voter does not need to have the power of judging of measures or of forecasting consequences. He does not need to know how to read, write, or cipher. All he does need is the capacity of liking certain men and disliking others; and this is compatible with the very lowest condition of the human intelligence, nay, is not entirely incompatible with idiocy. When, for instance, our correspondent, "M. C. W.," said last week, using one of the stump phrases in common use during the war in support of the theory that a voter does not need education, "that the ignorant slaves knew enough to be loyal, which was more than their masters did," what she meant was, that the negro disliked the people who kept him in slavery and flogged him, while he liked those who he believed were going to deliver him from that condition. Now, of this like and dislike of persons, of a partiality for those who give them food and fondle them, and of a repugnance to those who do not give them food and pinch or spank them, there is no denying that the mass of babies are fully capable. Amongst very young babies, we admit, this power of discrimination is not always apparent; but it would be wonderful if it were. The cause of their indifference is to be found in the fact that, up to the present, they have had no motive for exercising the faculty of discrimination. Let them like or dislike ever so much, it could make no change in their condition. The detested nurse was still sure to be left in charge of them; they were allowed no liberty of choice among possible nurses; so they very naturally fell into the habit of making the best of their lot, or, when badly used, indicating their dissatisfaction by apparently senseless and inarticulate cries. We say "apparently" senseless and inarticulate; to those who have studied the problem of the baby's condition in society, those cries always have been full of very deep meaning.

The way to induce the baby to occupy itself seriously with the character and qualifications of those who have charge of it, is, as it seems to us, to furnish it with some formal and organized means of indicating its preferences. The means of exercising the faculty of discrimination once supplied, the faculty itself, there is good reason to believe, will show itself, and will grow rapidly. That very young babies have never shown this faculty hitherto seems rather a poor argument against the theory that it exists. Nothing, or very little, is as yet known, let us say, about the nature of babies. Their condition is what women have made it. Swaddled, cabined, cribbed, and confined from the moment of their birth, and deprived of the power of speech, it has been open to their mothers and nurses to spread and perpetuate any notions they pleased about their needs and capacity. Give them the ballot—that is, a legal means of indicating to whose hands they wished to be entrusted, with what kind of diet they wished to be sustained, and of what process of training they wished to be the object, and, our word for it, the literature both of physiology and of education would be greatly enriched, and the mawkish stuff which one meets with so much in books and periodicals, and in society, about baby "innocence," and "prattle," and "dimples," and "sweetness," and "pretty ways," would be heard no more. Moreover, we should have an end of the corrupt jargon known as "baby talk," in which mothers and nurses now so largely indulge, and which, as it consists simply in the debasement of the popular speech, and is used freely in intercourse with children who either understand no language at all or understand correct English perfectly well, is plainly used as a means of retarding the development of the infant mind, and thus strengthening and protracting adult ascendancy.

It is, however, when we come to consider babies as a class affected by maternal control that the necessity for arming them with some means of protecting themselves against their mothers becomes most apparent. It is constantly said that we can rely on the natural instinct of parents to have justice done to the offspring; and that this may be relied on in a great number of cases is no doubt true. The babies of sensible, intelligent, and kind parents of course need nothing more, but what about that immense class of babies whose parents are neither kind, nor sensible, nor intelligent, and who, far from desiring or loving children, feel them to be a burden and a nuisance? That the number of adults who do not like or want children grows in every country, and grows, unhappily, in the ratio of the culture and thrift of the community—or, in other words, in the ratio of its civilization—is unhappily too true. It is what statistics tell us every day. Ministers are preaching about it, philosophers discussing it, and doctors denouncing it every week. In short, it looks more and more as if babies would shortly be not only the one class in the community unprotected by legislation, but the class most needing legislative protection.

Their position in all ages has, it is true, been unfortunate. The mortality among the babies of the poor of civilized countries has always been tremendous, and indeed furnishes the one painful feature in the rapid increase of population which is set down as one of the signs of national strength and prosperity. In old countries, this increase is kept up solely by keeping a steady pressure of numbers on the means of subsistence; and those who are nearest the barrier, and they are mostly young children, leave their bones on the ground in enormous numbers. Parents have always pushed them out in the advance, and they have consequently been the first to succumb. Passing over all this, however, and passing over, too, the awful stories of child mortality in the old foundling hospitals, and coming down to our own day, and to that country in our own day in which woman has succeeded in securing the most prominent part in the transaction of the active business of life, we find some very powerful arguments for baby suffrage. The custom has long prevailed in French cities, and particularly in Paris, of giving babies out to be nursed in the country by peasant women. It originated ages ago, and was the subject of Government regulation as early as the fourteenth century, but it is only in our time that it has grown into a flourishing industry—so flourishing that it affords a subsistence in Paris to a large body of baby-brokers, who bring nurses and parents together. The Government, too, has a great nurse-bureau in Paris, in which it provides nurses, and guarantees their health and good character to the parents, and guarantees the nurse a certain sum per month in case the parents fail to pay, and keeps up a mild inspection of the children in their rural homes. But the greater part of the business is done directly between the parties. The mortality amongst the infants thus sent out is, as might be expected, tremendous. It is the subject of an elaborate article in the Revue des Deux Mondes of March 15, from the pen of M. Léon Le Fort; Dr. Berthillon has just written a book about it; it has been of late vigorously discussed in the Paris Academy of Medicine, and is shortly to be brought before the Corps Législatif. According to Dr. Berthillon, in the seven departments round the capital a third nearly of the children under a year old perish annually, and the proportion goes on increasing, and has increased greatly within the last twenty years.

The custom of handing over the babies in this way, as soon after birth as they can leave their houses, to strange and ignorant peasant women, to be carried off, often in the depth of winter, to filthy, ill-ventilated homes, to be treated in such manner as these ignorant peasants may think proper, with one chance in two of perishing miserably, and seeing father and mother no more, all the authorities agree, is now all but universal amongst all Parisian women who can afford to pay the customary four dollars a month. Some do not nurse their own children because it is not the fashion; others because they are not strong enough; others because their professional duties will not permit it—they have to be in the store or counting-room. The reason why the children are sent away, instead of the nurse being brought to the house, is that it costs less and saves room, and relieves families of the impudence and exactions of a most impudent and exacting class. The fate of the little unfortunates, after they reach the nurse's home, as described by M. Le Fort, is enough to draw tears from a gorgon; and, considering the enormous number of them who die, the practice affords a striking illustration of the way in which we manage, in modern times, to be decent in our cruelty. When Romans were as careless as the French about their children's lives, they simply flung them down on the roadside; if nobody picked them up, their agony was soon over; but, nowadays, we respect the convenances of Christianity too much for anything of this kind.

Nevertheless, there are no mothers who, if their children manage to survive babyhood, are more tenderly attached to them than the French mothers. None make greater sacrifices for them; none take greater pains with their education, and make greater efforts to establish and push them on in the world. They are, in fact, apparently ready to do anything but nurse them—that is, care for them at the age when nobody's but a mother's care will do. A better illustration than this affords, therefore, of the necessity of arming babies with the power of protecting themselves, of forcing mothers and fathers to do their duty, of putting down the scores of barbarous practices by which infant life is cut short, and against which the church thunders in vain, we need not ask for. Those who are disposed—and we fear there will be many such—to laugh at the idea of giving them the suffrage, and tell us we must rely for the amelioration of the condition of infants on the cultivation of humane instincts, on awakening the sense of the sanctity of the various social obligations, and, above all, those arising out of the family state, and some of which are just now in a bad way, can hardly be in the habit of listening to the various accounts of the properties of the ballot which may now be heard nightly from hundreds of gifted lips. Nobody is too young, or too old, or too stupid, or too ignorant for it to do him good. For those who are in any way dependent on other people, there is no other help under the sun; and they cannot use it very long without becoming a blessing to every one who has to do with them. The effect of infant suffrage on mothers and nurses would be even greater than on the infants themselves. Colic would certainly yield to it, and so would most of the troubles of teething. The Seventeenth Amendment—for so we take leave to call it—once passed, the sound of wailing which is now heard nightly from Maine to California would die out; thousands would go calmly to bed who now walk to and fro. That mothers will oppose the movement is to be expected; power long held is never lightly relinquished. That Mrs. Winslow will oppose it, too, there is little doubt; for no child armed with the ballot would ever again allow itself to be made a receptacle for the "Soothing Syrup;" but that infant life would be made broader, freer, nobler, and more beautiful by it, and that it was ordained before all worlds that babies should vote, no candid woman, in our day, will we trust venture publicly to deny.

Correspondence.

THE VEXED QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I alluded in my last to the extensive use made of the name of Mr. John Stuart Mill by the advocates of woman suffrage. This is not unnatural, and within proper limits it is right; for undoubtedly Mr. Mill's name is a tower of strength to the cause of woman everywhere. But the question in controversy is not one to be settled by authority; if it were, the advocates of the new doctrine, even with this great name on their side, would be at a serious disadvantage. Neither is authority, even when it can be justly claimed, to be made to sanction more than it distinctly covers. That Mr. Mill sympathizes with the woman's rights movement in this country, from the very bottom of his heart, is most clear, and that he wishes well to the suffrage effort now making in that behalf is equally clear; but beyond this the public have no explicit information. It may be that private letters from his pen have been received, expressing, or distinctly implying, approval of the suffrage movement in gross and in detail, and it is not impossible that, if he himself were here, he would fully identify himself with it; but certain it is that some of his admirers in this country, including persons who defer much to his authority, fail to find anything in the quotation of his name which on this point serves the purpose of an argument. On the contrary, looking at the question in the double light of Mr. Mill's writings and example, they rest in the conviction that they can be more useful to all parties concerned by occupying themselves with some other mode of action.

Mr. Mill's doctrine on the subject of voting is that the suffrage should be universal, including men and women; that where it is not universal there should be an educational test requiring, at the very least, ability to read, write, and cipher; and that, when it shall become universal, it shall be on the condition that each elector shall have a larger or smaller number of votes in proportion to his intelligence. To an unskilled laborer he would give one vote; to a skilled laborer he would give two; to a foreman "perhaps three;" to a farmer, manufacturer, or trader, "three or four;" to a professional man, artist, public functionary, or other of high intellectual grade and attainments, he would give "five or six." Because, he says, "where all have votes, it will be both just in principle and necessary in fact that some mode be adopted of giving greater weight to the suffrage of the more educated voter; some means by which the more intrinsically valuable member of society—the one who is more capable, more competent for the general affairs of life, and possesses more of the knowledge applicable to the management of the affairs of the community, should, as far as practicable, be singled out and allowed a superiority of influence proportioned to his highest qualifications." Such is Mr. Mill's doctrine of universal suffrage. It requires as a condition precedent that the "class lowest in the educational scale," to use his own language, shall "recognize a right in the better educated, in virtue of their superior qualifications, to such plurality of votes as may prevent them from being always and hopelessly outvoted by the comparatively incapable."

So much for the doctrine; now for Mr. Mill's example. He sympathizes with all classes aspiring to a better condition, and with all struggling nationalities, and has a good word for them all; but he devotes his time and talents chiefly to efforts for improving the character of the Government of which he is a subject, and putting it on a solid foundation of integrity and usefulness. "Charlatanerie" in office and rogues in power are his detestation, and he deals with both unsparingly. He strives to elevate the tone of public sentiment and raise the standard of English politics, his end being to make the English Government available for all the beneficent purposes for which governments are established. He advocates popular education for the masses, and university education, or its equivalent, for those who make and administer laws. Holding that "government and civil society are the most complicated of all subjects accessible to the human mind, and that he who would deal competently with them requires not only a general knowledge of the leading facts of life, both moral and material, but an understanding exercised and disciplined in the principles of sound thinking;" and maintaining that "statesmanship of a high order can only be looked for in persons who devote themselves to it as an art," he uses his pen and his power to build up a public opinion and provide supports for its continuance which will ensure the reduction of these views to practice.

To some of the admirers of the great English radical, therefore, the quotation of his name may, and in fact does, suggest other modes of working for the benefit of woman and of all concerned which, to their minds, promise more valuable results than that of an organized agitation for the ballot, and some of these even go so far as to fancy that, if Mr. Mill were here on the spot, an American citizen, sharing in all the responsibilities of the situation, he would find problems of sociology not more important, perhaps, in their nature, but more imperatively demanding instant and universal attention, than that of doubling by one swoop the present number of the Republic's electors. For Mr. Mill is understood to hold that democratic governments depend for success upon democratic institutions, which institutions are popular political rights and popular education; and he is further understood to have said that in a great reformatory movement there are only two courses for a rational man to pursue: one, where things are ready and the movement too slow, to accelerate it; the other, where the movement is going fast enough and things are not ready, to prepare for it. One would think that in this country, at the present time, there was something to do in the way of preparation. For, while it has been admitted that our "body politic can take in and digest and assimilate an immeasurable amount of raw material," it ought also to be submitted that, after the meal of freedmen and coolies, with the extra large dessert of European foreigners, which has just passed through the political gullet, the body politic ought to be allowed to breathe awhile before bolting another of still greater dimensions. The gastric solvents of a democratic body are powerful, but they should not be presumed to be miraculous. And as for acceleration, it is submitted that, if there be one duty of radical reform which more than another is not at this time imperatively required, it is just that duty. When everything is in motion, and some things are going with a whiz, your accelerator can be spared for some other line of effort. It is fancied, therefore, by some that, if Mr. Mill were here just now, a resident and a citizen, he would find it in his heart to sympathize and labor with another class of reformers—a quieter class, whose radicalism has an element of conservatism in it, and who hold that the duties of eradicating tares and conserving the wheat are of equal obligation. But whether this be so or not, the question in hand is not one to be settled by authority.

There is another difficulty which embarrasses some honest minds in regard to women's taking an equal part with men in the duties of citizenship. It is of a physiological character. With some it refers itself to those partially disabling conditions of maternity which precede and follow the "august martyrdom," alternating through that prime period of woman's life which in man is made subject to the state for military duty. With others it is predicated chiefly of the sensual passions—those insubordinate and eccentric forces which have baffled the skill of statesman, lawyer, and moralist from the beginning down to the present day. Now, be it noted, the difficulty, as here set forth, is not alleged by the coarse and grovelling—the impure to whom all things are impure; nor by the fastidiously modest or the traditionally conservative—to which latter class, perhaps, belong the Quakers, who, holding that the sexes are equal and that in Christianity there is "neither male nor female," nevertheless separate the women from the men even in their churches; and the Presbyterians, who denounce "promiscuous dancing;" and people of other sects, and none, who are opposed to waltzing; and the Oberlin professors, though their conservatism is not traditional, who after much experience have adopted a rule requiring the female students to be in their rooms at half-past seven o'clock in the evening. To none of these classes belong the persons here referred to; on the contrary, they hold what would be called "advanced opinions" on the subject of the sexes. They know the difference between prudishness and modesty, and believe that excessive caution tends to promote the evil it would prevent. They are friends of art galleries, and are of opinion that forms of beauty refine the moral as well as the æsthetic taste. In short, they would gladly, if they could, break down all the barriers between the sexes which have been interposed by a false education. Nevertheless, looking at the present condition and existing arrangements of political society, they prefer that their sisters and daughters should assert their rights and perform their duties as citizens outside. When reminded, as they sometimes are, that Paul said there is "neither male nor female," they reply promptly: Yes, but that is "in Christ Jesus," which was Paul's mystic and oriental way of saying under the reign of truth. Of course, under that reign or to the extent to which people are under that reign, should sex be ignored, but under the reign of penal law or to the extent to which people are under the reign of penal law, a recognition of sexual difference would seem to them to be both decorous and necessary. At any rate, when they think of sheriffalties, arrests, ejectments, executions, capiases, posses, habeas corpuses, constables, jails, scaffolds, and all the long array of forceful appliances which terminate at last in the army and navy, they cannot see that woman can take an equal part with man in administering the government. Equal rights in the sense of equivalence they believe in and demand; but equal rights in the sense of identity are to them not an object of present desire.

The physiological difficulty derives much, possibly most, of its force from the fact that it is one which cannot be freely talked about. To discuss it before a promiscuous audience would require a degree of skill in the use of words which few can pretend to. A doubter on this point would have to be a perfect master of synonym and euphemism to do full justice to his convictions. It is only with those who are part of himself or with whom he is so completely en rapport that a remote suggestion will serve all the purposes of a distinct statement, that he can express himself with satisfactory freedom. Now this difficulty may argue weakness on the part of those who entertain it, but it is one which embarrasses many good people, and which cannot with wisdom be treated with contempt or dismissed with a sneer. It must be discussed openly and proved to be groundless before the question as it is now put can be settled in the affirmative. The women of England have at this moment a similar difficulty to contend with, and bravely are they confronting it. That the obnoxious "acts" against which these ladies have combined will be repealed is not to be doubted, nor is it less certain that their discussion of the subject, conducted as it is with dignity and decorum, will do much to rebuke impurity and promote the best interests of national morality. The physiologies of the suffrage question in this country must be treated with the same frankness and discussed in a like spirit if those interested in it would realize similar results. It will be as decorous and ought to be quite as easy to do this as to say as much as is said by indirection, sneer, or partial statement about the sensuality of men, and the inability of women to set bounds to sensual grossness because of their exclusion from the polls. There are exaggerations on this subject not warranted by the facts nor calculated to promote the interests of virtue. The public sentiment of this country which assures respect to woman everywhere and on all occasions is a reality and not a sham. A man who is known as a seducer is as much abhorred by his own sex as the other. If his victim, real or alleged, shoots him dead in the streets, she is acquitted after the merest form of trial. For broken faith, with even the slightest wound to the affections, our juries make men pay damages sometimes almost fabulous. Still, that the number and misery of the "fallen" class is largely due to men's bad legislation is not to be denied; it is fondly believed by many that the feminine element introduced into the direct administration of the government would greatly diminish the evil. But on neither of these points can anything be affirmed with practical advantage. On the latter we have no precedent; in the former, no statistics. The tables and reports laid before the women of England in the controversy now going on there are full of instruction, but not on the point here referred to. Of man's brutality and woman's inhumanity to woman they testify loudly. The extent to which mothers make base merchandise of their daughters, and sisters debauch the purity of those of whom they should be guardians, is something appalling. We need no tables to convince us that the number of women who have fallen through men's baseness is enormous, but until we shall have ascertained the proportionate number of those who have been preserved through men's forbearance, we cannot with profit make the matter a subject either of declamation or argumentative allusion. The equality of the sexes, sad to say, finds its illustration in the infirmities as well as in the virtues of our common nature.

Another difficulty—and it shall be the last here mentioned—which stands in the way of the suffrage movement with some honest and sensible people is that which is created by such letters as "M. C. W.'s," in last week's Nation. If—these people say to themselves—advocates of the cause, high in standing both in and out of the movement, of acknowledged ability, and far above the reproach of not having "kept pace with the question" can reason so inconsequently, can treat facts with such apparent indifference, and show such a serene confidence in the deft use of words, there must be something, either in the doctrine or in the movement based upon it, which is essentially befogging. Else such writers could not thus talk about "the contentment of the slaves," or say that the self-constituted woman's rights conventions held twenty years ago were "duly authorized to speak for the sex," or quote with grave approval the silly resolution which declares that "all laws which prevent women from occupying such a position in society as her conscience may dictate [sic] . . . are of no authority." A gentleman of high reputation and conscientious devotedness to good works, writing to a friend, thus speaks of "M. C. W.'s" letter: "It is one of a class of letters which I find are gradually breeding in me, and many others who stood well affected to the movement two or three years ago, hostility to the whole agitation. . . . They show on the part of some of these leaders mental conditions and characteristics which give the experiment an awful look."

This letter is too long, as were its predecessors, but as I have never troubled you before and do not expect to do so again, I hope to be pardoned.

M.

Orange, April 8.

THE PHILADELPHIA PARK.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I trust it may not be out of place in your journal to call attention to the way in which Philadelphia is managing a most important and difficult enterprise. In 1867 and 1868, the city bought a great tract of land for a park, covering 2,700 acres, on both sides of the Schuylkill, connecting Laurel Hill with Fairmount Park, and stretching on to the lovely valley of the Wissahickon. To confirm its selection, it called in eminent professional advice from Boston and New York, and was satisfied that it had the means of making the noblest park in the country. To secure a wise and careful expenditure of its money, it engaged a large number of lawyers and engineers, combined them with certain city officials, and committed the whole matter to them. Two years have passed, during which the Commission have been busily occupied with their duties, but in spite of their glowing report, lately published, the public have derived little pleasure, and the city but scanty credit, from their labors.

Apparently the Commission have taken no pains to inform themselves as to similar enterprises in other cities, but have acted as if they were born to knowledge which comes only with patient study and long practice. Neglecting the well-established principles for the laying out of public grounds, they have produced, when they have produced anything, results which are so unsatisfactory even to themselves that they call their work temporary, and expect to undo it. Not one of them, if he were building a house for himself, would take a single step towards it till he could see the end from the beginning; and yet, as if it were a simpler matter to construct a park than a dwelling, they have sunk two years' labor in the grounds before a careful preliminary survey—which ought to have preceded the moving of a shovelful of earth—has been brought to completion. Such a topographical survey, if made by competent engineers, by contract, would have consumed about three months' time, and cost from eight to ten thousand dollars; whereas the city has, under its chief engineer, been for two years dawdling over the surveys, they are not yet completed, and have cost $26,975. Instead of laying out the work according to a comprehensive plan, the Commission have, by way of pleasing the people, made a few avenues and drives, of which one, the Lansdowne Drive, for miles squirms in and out amongst the trees and around the hills, to catch this or that view, or to dodge some old elm or hickory, in the most tortuous fashion, and is so narrow withal (only forty feet wide) that any gala-day will crowd it with carriages. Yet this avenue, and others like it, have cost from two to three hundred thousand dollars; and we are told, when we criticise it, that it is only intended to be used whilst the Commission are making up their minds what to do!

Let us see what the Commission have saved the city by this economy: Plan of improvements, $15,000; two years of professional service, $20,000; total, $35,000. Against which we must set: Wasted in surveying, $15,000; in trial roads, $300,000; total, $315,000—making a total loss, so far, of $280,000, with a fair prospect of increase. As this need never have been, so it should at once have an end, and every dollar spent hereafter should count in the permanent construction of the work. The Commission have, in fact, been playing at park-making, and it is time that some one should tell them that a park is a work of creative art; that it has three principal elements—the conception or plan, based on topographical surveys; the execution, as matter of detail and professional supervision; and the financial management—and that the proper business of a commission is to attend particularly to the finances, and to make sure that the best talent is employed, and so sustained as to be able to carry out well the best possible design. No city can afford to pay for the blunders of a commission exceeding its sphere, and striving by experiment to learn how parks are made.

Our commissioners ought to be willing to accept facts as they stand, choose from amongst themselves the hard workers, who can and will give the requisite time to the machinery of the task, and then trust the conception and execution to those who are fitted for it by lifelong study and professional application. The Commission, in their late report, say that they mean to employ outside talent to create the park; but, in the meantime, they have loaded the land with trial roads, fancy architecture, and little ponds, and have added unnecessarily to the artist's perplexities and to the final bill. Better have given, or now give, a pension for life to the chief engineer and any other of the paid officials of the park, to let alone all but the topographical surveys, and leave the naked surface to whoever is to treat it, than to have consumed time and money in doing work to see how it will look. Our commissioners are devoted to their gratuitous service; every one of them gives freely time that would count in dollars or pleasure, if otherwise expended; they are unselfish and patient, and no one can reproach them with not wishing to do well for the city; but these virtues would shine all the more in their legitimate exercise, as already suggested, and the possession of them seems only to blind the Commission as to what is and what is not possible to simple good-will.

FAIRMOUNT.

April 7, 1870.

CONFESSION OF THE IMPOSTOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My jest was, perhaps, at best a poor one; at any rate, it would not bear too frequent reiteration. I plead guilty to the charge; I am a free-trader. While doing this, however, I wish distinctly to take issue with Mr. A. B. Hervey on two points in his letter to you: 1st, That a Boston protectionist is either more or less absurd than his brethren in the faith of New York or Philadelphia; 2d, That there has been in the propositions I have, with grave irony, advanced anything "so sublimely absurd" as that which I almost daily see published "in dead earnest" by Mr. Greeley in the Tribune. I will not go far for my proof, as the game is hardly worth the candle. The same mail which brought me your paper, containing Mr. Hervey's letter, brought me also a copy of the Tribune. I will not rummage back files; I take the first paper which comes to hand, and in that I look for something even more "sublimely absurd" than that which Mr. Hervey declares could not be advanced "in dead earnest." I leave it to him whether I discover it.

The paper is a semi-weekly Tribune of April 8. In it I find, and he will find if he looks, an article entitled "The Farmer and the Locomotive." Half-way through the article I find this proposition: "When a railroad brings artisans to the door of the farmer, it is a blessing. When it takes the wheat, the flesh, the corn, and the cotton to a distant manufacturing centre, a locomotive is an exhauster, its smoke is a black flag, and its whistle is the scream of an evil genius." In other words, the railroads which have opened up to the Valley of the Mississippi the food-market of New England have been to the farmers of the Valley an "exhauster," a pirate, and an "evil genius."

I do not propose to crowd your columns by a continuance of this discussion. I drop it here. I merely in closing ask of you and of Mr. Hervey, or any other reasoning being, have I dared—would any man dare—no matter how deeply moved by a spirit of irony, to propound anything so "sublimely absurd" as this proposition gravely advanced within a week to its hundred thousand readers by an influential journal?

It only remains for me in closing to thank you for the space you have given to the poor humor of A POOR AUTHOR.

BOSTON, MASS., April 10, 1870.

NATIONAL SUPERNUMERARIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The strongest argument against a Civil Service upon such a basis as that of the army, is the danger of getting a host of supernumeraries on our hands. I am in favor of such a Civil Service system as you advocate, with, however, a very distinct and emphatic proviso that the servants of the Government are to cease to draw pay when they cease to do work, and an equally distinct understanding that the Government is under no moral obligation to make work for its servants. Ought not the army officers to be in the same position? I do not endorse the doctrine that the genius of our people annuls the laws of nature, but I believe that the conditions of our young society are such as to render it unnecessary to keep any public servants after their labor becomes needless. Even an army officer can take care of himself. Of course there should be sufficient notice of discharge, and a year or two of extra salary might be an equitable mode of adjusting that. I have seen only telegraphic abstracts of the Army Bill, but these give me the impression that it meets the fair demands of equity. I believe our rotation system to be bad, but personal observation has convinced me that unlimited life-service and life-pay for all who can once get into these offices is a very much worse system for any people, especially for the American people. Two generations of our politicians would get every man, woman, and child in the country on the national pay-roll, if their abuses of it did not overthrow the system sooner.

I think you might promote the Civil Service reform by carefully setting forth what you believe to be the equitable claims of a faithful servant of the nation, making such distinctions between clerks and colonels as you may discover. DAVID HILTON WHEELER.

CHICAGO, April 6, 1870.

[The only reason we can give for advocating fixity of tenure in office is, that it will secure better and cheaper service than rotation; but we happily do not need to give a better one. We make no distinction between clerks and colonels. All we say is, that if a nation gives a colonel to understand that, if he devotes his best years to soldiering in its service, and thus sacrifices his chance of a good start in other callings, it will provide for him for life, it is estopped from afterwards turning him out with a year's pay and telling him to provide for himself as best he can, or reproaching him with wanting to live on the public. We say the same thing, mutatis mutandis, of clerks and bondholders. A government is bound by its promises, express or implied, just as individuals are, and cannot set up the promisee's ability to stand up under a breach of faith in bar of its obligations. Let us promise as little as we please, but let us promise whatever is necessary to get good servants or the loans of which we have need, and then let us keep our word; and don't let us begin to haggle, and whine, and wriggle, and plead poverty, like a sneaking and tricky pedlar, after we have got out of our scrape.—Ed. Nation.]

"MORAL PROGRESS."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: For the third time I forward you a copy of the National Prohibitionist, published in this city, and once more call your special attention to the original articles on its first page.

If it is all right, and not new to you, very well. I buy the Nation quite often, and having noticed the remarkable coincidence a dozen or a score of times, I thought to do you a favor by calling your attention to it.

Yours truly, —— ——

Chicago, March 31, 1870.

[Accompanying the above is a copy of the National Prohibitionist, a large quarto, with the first page almost entirely filled with a "Review of the Week" copied bodily from the Nation without acknowledgment. The Prohibitionist, we are pleased to see from the title, is "a family paper devoted to the Maintenance of Right Government and Moral Progress," but is specially taken up with the advocacy of a prohibitory liquor law and abuse of tobacco and light wines. The "tobacco-user," it says, "is by confession a sinner," and "prohibition is both the philosophy and life of law, and has its tap-root in reason." It is especially severe on the Advance, whose "religion" it sneers at witheringly, and indeed seems to have a very poor opinion of the whole non-prohibitionist press, secular and religious. What excites our interest in it most, however, is that it is the second temperance paper we have caught in the commission of a kind of small theft, not specially mischievous, but indicating a singularly low state of the moral sense, and made somewhat ludicrous by professions of extreme piety. The other was our namesake in Boston, which appropriated wholesale certain commendatory notices of the Nation (New York), and published them as bestowed on itself, while calmly declaring in an adjoining column that it was engaged in "a war between Heaven and Hell," and in another warning little boys and girls against "small lies." We do not like to generalize rashly, but we must say that if we come on another case of this kind, we shall be almost driven into the conclusion that "prohibition" has its "tap-root" elsewhere than "in reason," and that "tobacco demonism," as the Prohibitionist calls smoking, is not the only variety of "demonism" now vexing the world.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press, among other works already announced by us, a new and revised edition of Gen. H. W. Halleck's "Elements of Military Art and Science;" "Life of the Rev. Thomas Brainerd, D.D.," by M. Brainerd; a "Memoir of J. D. Paxton, D.D.;" and a "Reply to John Stuart Mill on the Subjection of Women," by Donald McCaig. The same house, in connection with British publishers, are about to undertake the reissue of Chambers's Encyclopædia, with such modifications and improvements as have become necessary from the lapse of time, and in a finer style of manufacture. There will be eighty parts, averaging one hundred and four pages each; the illustrations to consist of about four thousand engravings and forty maps, and a series of from eighty to one hundred elegantly engraved plates relating to natural history. The work will be sold only through agents. Another joint enterprise is the series of monthly volumes called "Ancient Classics for English Readers"—not an imitation of Bohn, but a sort of substitute for a general classical education, which shall explain who the great writers of antiquity were, and what they wrote; "give, wherever possible, some connected outline of the story which they tell, or the facts which they record, checked by the results of modern investigations; present some of their most striking passages in approved English translations, and illustrate them generally from modern writers; and serve, in short, as a popular retrospect of the chief literature of Greece and Rome." The Rev. W. Lucas Collins is the editor, and he has already issued the Iliad and the Odyssey.——Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce more of the works of Grace Aguilar: "Mother's Recompense," and "The Vale of Cedars;" and "The First Book of Botany," designed to cultivate the observing power of children, by Miss Eliza A. Youmans—a work which will greatly disappoint us if it does not prove one of the very best of its kind.——Macmillan & Co. announce a similar introduction to another branch of natural history: "The Population of an Old Pear-Tree; or, Stories of Insect Life," by E. Van Bruyssel, from whose German it is edited by Miss Yonge; "The Morning Land," by Edward Dicey: and "The Depths of the Sea." This last is an account of the deep-sea dredgings conducted in 1868–9 by Dr. W. B. Carpenter, J. Gwyn Jeffreys, and Dr. Wyville Thomson (who acts as editor), the results of which have caused scientific men to revise their opinions of the extent of animal life, and to engage in new speculations as to the earliest and simplest forms of it.——Mr. Henry Carey Baird offers a new edition of the "Manual of Social Science," which is Miss Kate McKean's condensation of Mr. H. C. Carey's "Principles of Social Science;" in which, as we need not say, protection plays a leading part. Miss McKean, like Miss Youmans and Miss Yonge, is deserving of praise for her effort to give weight to the opinions of women on other subjects than that of the ballot; and it occurs to us to ask here why no serious attempt is made to establish a periodical in which these and women like them should be heard from time to time on special topics of general interest, scientific as well as social and political. We call to mind Miss Mitchell in astronomy, Miss Grace Anna Lewis in ornithology, Miss Hosmer and Miss Whitney in art, Miss Blackwell in medicine, Mrs. Bradwell in law, Miss Dix in social science, and others, in other fields, who would naturally be among the contributors and conductors of a monthly or quarterly designed to show what cultivated women are thinking about. Such a periodical would fix the attention of the public, now sceptical as to the solidity of women's attainments, and could be made readable and attractive. Of course we advocate this chiefly as a temporary expedient for winning the esteem of the other sex, and whatever consequences would flow from that; but we think it would also be likely to stimulate women to special pursuits, and thus again prepare the way for civil emancipation and political responsibility.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son have published in pamphlet form the two articles which appeared in their magazine last year with the titles, "Our Established Church," and "The Unestablished Church," and which were very generally noticed at the time on account of their vigor, and provoked sharp criticism from the Catholic World. The need of exposing the relations of the Catholic Church to our rulers in this State has not, we apprehend, been seriously diminished in the meantime, and the republication of these articles may therefore still be regarded as timely. Their author we understand to be Mr. Theodore Bacon, a lawyer of Rochester, and an occasional contributor to Putnam's and the Atlantic.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, who have removed to 13 Astor Place (with an entrance also on Eighth Street), announce "Holy Matrimony," by the Rev. James A. Bolles, Rector of the Church of the Advent, Boston; and "Soap, or the Hygiene of the Night," by Dr. W. W. Hall.——Messrs. Nichols & Noyes announce "The Private Life of Galileo," with selections from his correspondence and that of his daughter. ——Messrs. Harper & Bros., in issuing the third volume of McClintock and Strong's "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature"(E, F, G), announce that its publication will in no way be retarded by the death of the lamented senior editor. The work was nearly completed in manuscript before composition was begun upon it, and the chief care of Dr. Strong and his associates will now be to revise and bring up to the latest information the articles yet to be printed. Three more volumes are expected to contain the remainder of this original and highly useful dictionary.

—What has most amused us about Punchinello has been the first impression it contrived to make, that it was a rather successful approach to the ideal comic journal never yet vouchsafed to our national humor. Even its paper and presswork and engraving were praised, but this must have been from sheer good-nature in the critics, for as if to show how far it might be carried, Mr. Stephens's drawing was pronounced admirable. There would be no accounting for taste if all this had been said in earnest. To be sure, something may be said for Mr. Stephens's originality, because whatever he appropriates from other designers he makes his own by murdering. Thus, the Punchinello of the cover is confessedly Meissonnier's, though Mr. Stephens has put his name to it; but the Punchinello of the Preface is not and could not be anybody's except Mr. Stephens's. This habit of borrowing was well enough when carried on on a grand scale, and from Kaulbach's Reineke Fuchs, but we find no sufficient excuse for Mr. Stephens's making a fashion-plate figure do duty in his very first cartoon. Admiral Porter's unnatural and impossible attitude in the second cartoon gave us a momentary shock, till we reflected that Mr. Stephens had probably been unable to procure any other than a full-face portrait for a side-view body. Punchinello may possibly survive these distressing caricatures, but if it allows the artist to choose the subjects of his cartoons, we may be sure that it will follow the fate of Vanity Fair as a political jester upon the wrong side.

—As we just now said, the undiscriminating judgment bestowed on the poor drawing in Punchinello is difficult to account for, and shows that the multiplication of illustrated papers has not tended perceptibly to elevate the artistic sense of the community. To ninety-nine men out of a hundred, there would be nothing to choose between the original plates of the Graphic and the same as reprinted in Every Saturday, or re-engraved in Harper's Weekly and Hearth and Home ; and there have been frequent opportunities to compare the same picture in several or all of these journals. We think it not doubtful that the direction given to wood-engraving in the last ten or fifteen years has been calculated to confuse rather than to enlighten the public as to the true nature of the art, and to divert attention from the details to the general effect. This is a question, however, that we cannot now stop to discuss. The great variety of the styles of drawing and engraving on wood which are at present in vogue, is very well shown in the sketches of that versatile artist, Mr. A. Boyd Houghton, whom the Graphic has just sent over to depict American scenes and people and customs. Clever as he is, however, his first drawings leave much to desire in point of accuracy, and it will be curious to observe if his subsequent practice enables him to represent our national and local characteristics without admixture. Clearly, this he has not done in his sketch, or rather caricature, of a squad of policemen filing round a corner on Broadway, who are as untrue to the reality as are the two ladies and the negro woman on the same sidewalk; while the young ruffians who ride with hands in their pockets upon a dray are like nothing this side of London and the haunts of the Artful Dodger. Mr. Houghton's dramatic sketch of a Tammany procession is so purely a product of the imagination that it does not call for criticism. The "glorious Democratic victory" which purports to have been the occasion of it was probably felt to be too remote to wait for.

—From the "Minutes of the Sixth Annual Meeting of the Board of Managers of Swarthmore College" it appears that there have been received into the institution since its opening on the 8th of November last one hundred and ninety-nine students, nearly one-half of whom are girls. The initial difficulties have been overcome, and the enterprise may now be considered to be fully under way. The Board of Managers say—in a report made on the 7th of December—that expectation has been exceeded "in the progress made by the several classes, and by the order and discipline which already prevail," and add: "This has been much promoted by the influence of the sexes upon each other, by which many of the disadvantages usual in boarding-school life are prevented." The course of instruction contemplates a period of three years in the preparatory department, and six in the collegiate, and includes a liberal and judicious variety of studies. It is to be hoped that the managers of the institution will resist all tempation either to lower the tone or shorten the term of its course. Better a few good scholars than many indifferent ones. As bearing on the question of the coeducation of the sexes in our higher institutions of learning, the first report from Swarthmore is deserving of attention.

—The school-book trade long ago taught us a lesson which we are slowly beginning to learn in the case of transportation by railroad, that competition offers no sure advantage or protection to the public, but, on the contrary, is often productive of great oppression and injustice, and attended with widespread demoralization. A month ago the school-book publishers, to their honor, met and agreed that the condition to which their business had been reduced by competition was no longer tolerable, either on prudential or moral grounds; and after discussing in the frankest manner the evils of the agent system for publishers, teachers, superintendents, and committees, and the retail trade, they organized a Publishers' Board of Trade, to define the modes of introducing school-books and the rates of discount, with power to decide by arbitration any disputes that may arise under the very stringent rules adopted by the convention. Agents are abolished at one stroke, and that alone would be a reform worth having and mentioning; but all the avenues of corrupt influence are carefully closed, and the publishers have left themselves few resources beyond the intrinsic merit of their books. This is as it should be, notwithstanding the advantage which the parties to the status quo have over new and especially small competitors. The text-books now in use have, of course, the start of all that may be hereafter brought against them, and give almost a monopoly to the proprietors. But we do not see how this could have been helped, and it does not mar the intense satisfaction with which we regard this self-regenerative action of the trade, the like of which we would give much to see in other branches of business, and, if it were possible, in politics.

—A correspondent wishes us to "denounce a corruption to which writers in the leading daily papers are giving their sanction, namely, the use of an adverb between the to and the infinitive of the verb;" as when a Herald correspondent writes—"to satisfactorily and peacefully adjust." "The like of this," adds our correspondent, "I cannot find in Addison, Macaulay, Dickens, Thackeray, Prescott, or the Nation." We fear, however, that he has not been so diligent in reading the Nation as he should have been, for we distinctly remember having used this corruption on several occasions, though not without a certain reluctance to which we now confess. This might excuse us from denouncing it, but the fact is, we have always found it easier to defend debatable forms of English speech than to quarrel with them; and if we were to say that we sustained "is being done" against Mr. Grant White's assault upon it, from sheer laziness, we should not be guilty of a flagrant untruth. But we have another and probably a better reason, which is that time and space would fail us to pursue all the perpetrators of grammatical inelegancies, or to perform all the services to the public of which a decent paper is capable if it will take the pains. How often have the makers of piano-fortes besought us to mention their peculiar patents, "not as an advertisement, but as a matter of general interest." For the sake of the rapid development of the country, and to promote the right sort of immigration, brokers of railway bonds have entreated of us an article, in the most general terms, on the great mineral resources and endless fertility of the region through which this or that Pacific route was to be constructed. Insurance companies have asked us solemnly how we could help writing about the beneficent institution by which widows and orphans are snatched from want and degradation; were we doing our whole duty as journalists? "We do not care," they said, "to have you mention names. Draw attention to the subject." We very easily concluded that if we gave heed to all these requests the drain upon our philanthropy would destroy our usefulness for everything else. We can now sincerely congratulate ourselves that by the timely announcement of and adherence to our inflexible purpose, we have escaped the worst of these importunities, from which, it appears, ministers are not more exempt than editors. Here is an instance of what Mr. Beecher had to endure, in the form of a public letter from an impudent and illiterate truss-maker, whom he has since annihilated with a "first-rate notice:"

"A few days since Mrs. C., a lady of distinction and merit, within the prescribed limits, I believe it is, of Brooklyn, was the subject of rupture for twenty-five years. . . . . What a warning! Three days from life's brightest hopes to its final ending, from robust health to the grave, by what this poor lady had regarded as a harmless little rupture. How many thousands are to-day in the same predicament, and from their carelessness will meet the same deplorable end.

"Would there be any impropriety in relating such an incident, couched in appropriate language, from the pulpit, as a reproof to those similarly afflicted and heedless?

"Might you not, Mr. Beecher, in canvassing the dangers of life, enumerate among them quaintly, if not forcibly, hernia? . . . . I trust you will bear this in mind, assuring you that any person whom you may direct to me shall be carefully provided with the necessary attention and requisites for a speedy cure." ha! ha! ha!!

—Among recent English announcements we notice a "Biography of Baskerville of Birmingham," the eccentric printer, by Mr. Southward, the compiler of the "Dictionary of Typography." Much more important, and in the same line, is "Bewick's Wood-cuts," to consist of nearly two thousand impressions from blocks engraved for the most part by Thomas and John Bewick, with an introduction, including a descriptive catalogue of the blocks, by the Rev. T. Hugo. Collectors have here a rare opportunity to obtain the works of the fathers of wood engraving in England, and need not fear that previous usage has rendered first-rate impressions impossible. Bewick's blocks have been remarkably well preserved, owing to his original habit of lowering the more delicate parts, and thus avoiding the necessity of "overlaying." All students of the history of art and all practical wood-cutters would profit by owning this collection, which will be arranged chronologically. But two hundred and fifty copies will be printed, and for subscribers only. The volume will make an imperial quarto of five hundred pages, and will cost those whose names are sent in before the 30th of April the sum of five pounds five shillings sterling. L. Reeve & Co., London, are the publishers.

—Germany's striving after unity has brought into prominence the legend of the Emperor Barbarossa (Frederick the Red-beard), whose awakening from his cavernous slumber is to remove the dissensions and divisions of the empire, and make of it once more a whole, as under the rule of the Hohenstaufens. Rückert's well-known poem, aided by Silcher's beautiful arrangement of it for singing, has kept the legend alive during the present century, and the Barbarossa is now frequently alluded to even in the higher political talk of the day. Like another hero, Roland, however, this drowsy monarch of the enchanted mountain, who, seated on an ivory stool, his chin sunk upon a marble table, through which, in the lapse of ages, his fiery beard has grown, asks once a century of his dwarf if the ravens still wheel about the mountain, and must sleep there, with his armed knights about him, till they have flown away—Barbarossa too dissolves, when critically examined, into the prolific mythology of the north. In the April number of the Cornhill Magazine, Karl Blind, in a popular manner, and probably not as an original investigator, since he makes no references to the sources of his argument, discusses this interesting legend and identifies Frederick with the Wild Huntsman, numerous local huntsmen of the same description, Goethe's Rat-catcher of Hameln, and all together with Father Wodan or Odin. Barbarossa, moreover, was not the only spell-bound emperor who was expected some day to break forth and make a general settlement between the good and the bad in one stupendous battle. Charlemagne and Charles V. both had the honor of being, as Herr Blind says, "enmountained;" and he shows that Barbarossa had no claim on the affection of posterity.

—Two of the five vacant seats in the French Academy have been filled by the almost unanimous election of MM. Jules Janin and Émile Ollivier. It has been rumored that Mme. Sand has been designated for a third by no less a personage than Eugénie. One of the evidences adduced is a supposed similarity between one of the subordinate characters of the novel called "Malgrétout," just finished by Madame Sand in the Revue des Deux Mondes, viz., a beautiful Spaniard, Mlle. d'Ortosi, and the Empress. This young lady is made to describe her own character and aspirations in a way which certainly suggests the correspondence inferred, but is not, on the whole, so flattering either to the subject or to human nature as to create a debt of gratitude payable only with an Academic chair, supposing that to be obtainable even by an Empress. The novelist may have had the latter in mind when she lets Mlle. d'Ortosi say that she has set her cap for a man of power—a king, an emperor, or at least an heir presumptive or a reigning prince:

"I have studied; I possess erudition and political science; I know the histories of dynasties and peoples. I know the secrets of diplomacy and all the naïvetés of every sort of ambition. . . . The day will come when I can be as useful to a sovereign as I could be to-day to a woman who might ask my advice about her dress. . . . . I intend, after having played a brilliant part in the world, to shine for ever in history. . . . I am eager for great struggles, or great perils; even the scaffold has a strange fascination for me. . . . I will never be caught or brought back on the road to Varennes. . . . If, after all, the populace grows angry, if it wearies, it may carry my head on a pike. So be it! that will be the day of supreme splendor, and my pale head, doubly crowned by martyrdom, will remain for ever stamped in the memory of mankind."

But this reads less like admiration or flattery than like the freedom now being taken with the history and character of both the Emperor and the Empres, except, of course, that it is devoid of coarseness and brutality.

—Sainte-Beuve's library, lately sold at auction in Paris, consisted of between five and six thousand volumes, not including his collection of works relating to Port Royal, which it was hoped would be disposed of intact to some European Government. A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette describes it as possessing little that would be prized by the lover of rare and curious editions, but as being the tools of a working man of letters. The autographs contained in some of them lent to such an exceptional value, and there were some collections, as of the poets of the sixteenth century, which, if they could have been kept together, would have commanded a considerable price. The most precious volumes of all were those which Sainte-Beuve had annotated with his own hand, and the correspondent cites an early judgment on Fénelon's "Telemachus," which the great critic, as he grew older, twice recanted on the same page. At twenty-one he pronounces the composition "mean and commonplace," the maxims "sickly," "the characters devoid of truth, which find no compensation in the harmony and richness of some of the descriptive parts," and the whole book "utterly insupportable" for Sainte-Beuve's generation. Seventeen years later, in 1842, he condemned these statements as proceeding from the fierceness of youth; and, later still, he more formally disavowed them, saying that "youth is too ardent to acquire taste. For its acquirement it is not sufficient to have within one's self the faculty of appreciating and enjoying the beautiful and sweet delights of the Spirit. Leisure is also indispensable. . . . Repose is required—silence and freedom around one."

—In a communication to the Augsburg Gazette, under date of March 9, the learned and now famous Dr. Döllinger examines the rules of procedure recently imposed on the Œcumenical Council, and of course finds a great deal of fault with them. They sanction decisions by bare majority, contrary, as he shows, to the uniform and conspicuous practice of the earlier Councils, which adhered rigidly to the "ubique, semper, (and especially) ab omnibus." These rules, though parliamentary in form, have a very opposite nature. Parliaments governed by majorities do not, like councils, bind those which follow them, or make ordinances for all time that cannot be revised. Their regulations, too, are contrived in the interest and for the protection of the minority; the present Council's for the advantage of the majority. Bishops criticising the scheme may be interrupted at any moment and confuted by the deputy bishops—i. e., the bishops on committees, as de fide, for example. No pamphlet or other publication is permitted to be circulated by any member of the Council in aid of his views. In short, there is neither freedom of opinion nor of speech provided for, and the majority that will prevail is certain to be not of one composition to-day, and another to-morrow, according to the question, but constant, and, in effect, a packed majority. As to what the Council may rightly declare and establish, Dr. Döllinger says that it cannot invent any new revelation, or any new articles of faith, in addition to the body of doctrine committed to the Church from the beginning. It may make dogmatic decrees only concerning things which, as is shown by scripture and tradition, have already been universally believed by the Church, or which are clear and obvious corollaries of the principles already received and inculcated. But when, as in the case of infallibility, we find an opinion contested for centuries with all the weapons of theological warfare, and consequently having ever been at least unsettled, it can never by Council be elevated to the dignity of a divinely promulgated doctrine, or stamped with the customary "hæc fides Patrum;" nor can there be any logical development from the one to the other—from the admitted freedom to err of the whole church to the infallibility of an individual.

See Appleton's Jour. No. 34, Vol. 2. Sketch of life & Portrait.

MICHAEL FARADAY.*

THE two volumes prepared by Dr. Bence Jones contain a rich store of material for a life of Faraday, but the life itself remains to be written. We have read the book, not for the pleasure it has given us, but to see if it would be possible to make an analysis of its contents, and we have found the task wearisome and tedious in the extreme. To the layman the perusal of the book is rendered impossible on account of the long discussions upon abstruse scientific discoveries, and to the man of science much of the matter is superfluous, as he has had it long ago in the journals, and we do not know of any class to whom the work will bring unalloyed satisfaction. And yet, scattered through Faraday's letters, in the extracts from his lectures, in the records of his brilliant discoveries, in the lovely religious character of the man, there is so much that could be made into a popular and useful biography that we trust the day is not far distant when the task will be properly done.

Michael Faraday was born at Newington, in Surrey, September 22, 1791, and died at Hampton Court, August 25, 1867. The son of a blacksmith, spending his childhood over a stable in an obscure quarter of London, he died in a royal dwelling given to him by the Queen of his country, the most honored, the best loved of any man of science who ever flourished on British soil. So far as worldly advantages were concerned, everything was against the boy when he started in life. His grandfather was a stonemason, his uncles and aunts common people, his father a poor, hard-working blacksmith. There was apparently no better future in store for him than for any other child picked up out of the streets of London. The father died October 30, 1810, while Michael was still at bookbinding, but the mother lived until 1838, long enough to see the name of her son made illustrious through the land. We hear very little about Faraday's two sisters and only brother, who followed the father's trade, and can only infer, from all the associations, what position in society they probably filled.

* "The Life and Letters of Faraday. By Dr. Bence Jones, Secretary of the Royal Institution." 2 vols. 8vo, pp. 427, 499. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870.

It was in 1805 that he was indentured as an apprentice to a bookbinder and stationer, and, four years later, his father wrote, "He has a very good master and mistress, and likes his place well." Here he not only bound books but read them, and, among other treasures, was particularly captivated by Mrs. Marcet's "Conversations on Chemistry" and the electrical treatises in the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He ever afterwards entertained feelings of gratitude to Mrs. Marcet, and was in the habit of sending her copies of all his works. He made a few simple experiments in chemistry, the cost of which was partly defrayed by his blacksmith brother, and at the same time constructed an electrical machine. The proprietor of the shop was a kind-hearted man, and was evidently impressed by the mechanical skill and scientific tastes of the boy, as he showed the electrical machine to one of his customers, Mr. Dance, a member of the Royal Institution, who at once took an interest in the apprentice, and invited him to four of the last lectures of Sir Humphry Davy, in February, March, and April, 1812. Faraday made full notes of these lectures, and "interspersed them with such drawings as he could make," and afterwards sent them, with a note, to Sir Humphry Davy. "The reply was immediate, kind, and favorable," says Faraday; and he was soon afterwards installed as assistant in the Royal Institution. Previous and subsequent to this appointment, Faraday carried on a correspondence with Benjamin Abbott, a Quaker clerk, in which we are impressed with the variety and extent of his knowledge at that early day. These letters are written in a verbose, inflated style, very different from the charming simplicity of his later productions. They appear like exercises in composition for his good friend Abbott to criticise and correct; yet, through them all, we read the humility, honesty, and shrewdness of the man.

Faraday was now fairly started on the career in which he was destined to win so many laurels. He had a room in the top of the building, a salary sufficient for his modest wants, and an ample field for study and experiment. During the years 1814, 1815, he went abroad with Sir Humphry Davy. This was an episode in his life no doubt of advantage to him in some particulars, but attended by many personal discomforts and indignities. Lady Davy had a temper that was not always under control, and, as the valet had left her before their departure from England, it was convenient for her to call upon Faraday for services that properly belonged to that character rather than to the amanuensis. And Davy exhibited his weakness by declining to dine with De la Rive, in Geneva, because the secretary was also invited. De la Rive sent back the manly reply, "He was sorry to be obliged to give two dinners."

In 1816, at the age of twenty-four, Faraday gave lectures on chemistry at the City Philosophical Society, and published his first paper, "An Analysis of Native Caustic Lime," in the Quarterly Journal of Science. Many years afterwards, he collected his minor contributions into a volume, and appended the following exquisite note to the paper on "Caustic Lime:"

"I reprint this paper at full length; it was the beginning of my communications to the public, and in its results very important to me. Sir Humphry Davy gave me the analysis to make, as a first attempt in chemistry, at a time when my fear was greater than my confidence, and both far greater than my knowledge; at a time, also, when I had no thoughts of ever writing an original paper on science. The addition of his own comments, and the publication of the paper, encouraged me to go on making, from time to time, other slight communications, some of which appear in this volume. Their transference from the Quarterly into other journals increased my boldness, and, now that forty years have elapsed, and I can look back on what successive communications have led to, I still hope, much as their character has changed, that I have not, either now or forty years ago, been too bold."

It was very natural that Faraday, following the example of Sir Humphry Davy, should at first take up the study of chemistry, especially of electro-chemistry; and he worked long enough in this direction to show that, if he had remained in that field, the harvest would have been as great as it afterwards proved to be in the department of physics. He discovered benzol, "to which," says Hoffmann, "we virtually owe our supply of aniline, with all its magnificent progeny of colors." In 1821, he condensed a number of gases, and proved them to be simply the vapors of volatile liquids. But Faraday was forty years of age before his real work was begun. In 1831, he published his first series of "Experimental Researches in Electricity," and the same year discovered electrical induction, the grandest discovery of his life. The researches in electricity and magnetism are so numerous that it would be impossible, in the short space of a review, to give an analysis of them. They were concluded in 1855, and extended over a period of twenty-six years, and undoubtedly constitute his greatest and noblest work, whose value may be inferred when we state that, without it, we should have no electro-metallurgy, no electric light, no submarine cable, no telegraphy, and no electricity in medicine; and yet these researches were carried on in penury and with the humblest means.

Although Faraday was very busy with his work at the Royal Institution, he yet had time to fall in love, and we are favored with several letters, displaying the philosopher in the guise of a lover. In one of these epistles he says:

"I want to say a thousand kind and, believe me, heartfelt things to you, but am not master of words fit for the purpose; and still, as I ponder and think on you, chlorides, trials, oils, Davy, steel, miscellanea, mercury, and fifty other professional fancies swim before and drive me further and further into the quandary of stupidness.—From your affectionate MICHAEL."

He was married on the 12th of June, 1821, and twenty-eight years afterwards he wrote, referring to his wife: "The union has nowise changed, except in the depth and strength of its character." His whole married life was one of unalloyed happiness, although he never was blest with children. A month after his marriage he made confession of sin and profession of faith before the Sandemanian Church. When his wife asked him why he had not told her what he was about to do, he only replied, "That is between me and my God."

It was a remarkable trait in Faraday to distinguish between matters of faith in religion and matters of evidence in science. In a memorable lecture, delivered in the Royal Institution, when he was sixty-two years of age, at which Prince Albert was present, occurs the following language:

"Before entering upon my subject, I must make one distinction, which, however it may appear to others, is to me of the utmost importance. High as man is placed above the creatures around him, there is a higher and far more exalted position within his view; and the ways are infinite in which he occupies his thoughts about the fears, or hopes, or expectations of a future life. I believe that the truth of that future cannot be brought to his knowledge by any exertion of his mental powers, however exalted they may be; that it is made known to him by other teaching than his own, and is received through simple belief of the testimony given. Let no one suppose for a moment that the self-education I am about to commend in respect of the things of this life extends to any considerations of the hope set before us, as if man by reasoning could find out God. It would be improper here to enter upon this subject further than to claim an absolute distinction between religious and ordinary belief. I shall be reproached with the weakness of refusing to apply those mental operations which I think good in respect of high things to the very highest. I am content to bear the reproach."

These are remarkable words to come from a man who all his life had been accustomed to weigh evidence, and to believe nothing that was not capable of experimental demonstration. As he said himself, "Facts were important to me, and saved me; I could trust a fact." In science he believed nothing without the facts; in religion he accepted all on faith, and without a murmur. This trait of his character made him so unlike nearly all scientific men who have ever lived, that it forms a prominent feature in the study of his life, and ought to be made the subject of a special extended notice.

Faraday had ninety-five titles and distinctions conferred upon him. One of them, namely, that of F.R.S., was sought for; all the rest were spontaneous expressions of respect and good-will from the societies named; but, after all, his best title was that of a true gentleman. All men spoke well of him. Although of humble birth, he never sought social distinctions; although born poor, he never coveted riches. In this respect he was very different from Sir Humphry Davy, who had vast ambition, and was eternally pining after rank. According to Sir Wm. Thomson, "Faraday had great kindness and unselfishness of disposition, clearness and singleness of purpose, brevity, simplicity, and discreetness—sympathy with his audience or his friend—perfect natural tact and good taste—thorough culture, and an indescribable quality of quickness and life." De la Rive, in an admirable discourse on the life and works of Faraday, thus compares the great English and French electricians:

"Ampère and Faraday—two names which will always be united by the intimate relation of their works to the history of the science of electricity, in which they have opened such new and vast horizons; and yet, minds as dissimilar in their mode of proceeding as similar in the power of their genius. Both eminently endowed with that faculty of divination which generates great discoveries, but one of them, Faraday, arriving at them by impression, by a kind of instinct which never deceived him—the other, Ampère, advancing with a more certain step, having as his instrument those calculations which he handled with such remarkable ability, and thus arriving at results which he hardly required experiment to confirm, so certain was he that this would not contradict him."

As a lecturer, Faraday had no superior in England. His voice was full of melody, and so modulated that each individual in the audience could fancy that he was talking to him alone. He spoke with fluency and elegance, without sacrificing anything to exactness, and made the subject so clear that the dullest mind could follow every step. He was playful as a child over his jars and chains and plate-machines, and, while talking all the time, never failed in an experiment.

In June, 1862, he gave his last discourse at the Royal Institution, and prepared the following notes to be used on the occasion of his retirement:

"Personal explanation—years of happiness here, but time of retirement; LOSS OF MEMORY and physical endurance of the brain.

"1. Causes—hesitation and uncertainty of the convictions which the speaker has to urge.

"2. Inability to draw upon the mind for the treasures of knowledge it has previously received.

"3. Dimness, and forgetfulness of one's former self-standard, in respect of right, dignity, and self-respect.

"4. Strong duty of doing justice to others, yet inability to do so.

"5. Retire."

"For thirty-eight years," says Dr. Bence Jones, "his lectures were the life of the Royal Institution," and now they must be brought to a close. It was a scene long to be remembered when he took leave of his audience with the words:

"I have long desired to retire, as I think every man ought to do before his faculties become impaired; but I must confess that the affection which I have for this place is such that I hardly know when the proper time has arrived."

The declining years of Faraday were tenderly watched and cared for by affectionate relatives and devoted friends; and to one who asked him at this time how he was, he replied, "Just waiting." On a bright day in August, as he sat in his arm-chair at his study window, looking out upon the green grass and majestic trees of Hampton, patiently waiting, the summons came, and he passed peacefully away. His funeral, by his verbal and written request, was strictly private and plain, and he was buried in Highgate Cemetery, where a simple slab, bearing his name and the dates of his birth and death, is all that marks his grave.

HEDGED IN.*

THE story of "Hedged In" is briefly this: Nixy Trent, an untaught, wretched orphan girl of the street, who lives in a crowded room of one of the most miserable of tenement-houses, becomes the mother of an illegitimate child. She herself was but a child when she was seduced, being only fifteen years old. Fearing that she will be sent to the jail or to some asylum, hating the people by whom she is surrounded, and without any definite plans for her future, she runs away from Thicket Street as soon as she is able to walk, and, while still very weak and sick, goes wandering blindly about the suburbs of the city, carrying her baby in her arms, and begging work—for she has determined to be honest—which everywhere is denied her. At last, however, after some weeks of suffering, she is taken in by a widow lady of great refinement and goodness, and, though not without many misgivings on the part of her benefactress—for Mrs. Purcell has for a daughter a girl in her teens—she is adopted as a sort of parlor companion, is carefully educated, and grows up to be both good and beautiful. Meantime, her baby, which, in her distress, she had abandoned, and which has been put into a foundling hospital, lives, and is well-cared for, while its mother is increasing in knowledge and becoming fitted to be an excellent teacher. Not only does Miss Trent—now Miss Eunice Trent—increase in knowledge, but she comes to be a devout Christian as well as an accomplished woman; and, as Mrs. Purcell, her patroness, has convinced herself that true Christianity commands that a repentant unfortunate should be held by all genuine Christians to be just as good for all purposes as anybody else, Miss Trent, encouraged by Mrs. Purcell, goes to the hospital, claims her son, and, "in the face and eyes" of the village, brings him home, leaving it to the church members of Gower to say what they like. These latter, of course, say a good deal, for they are horrified at the revelation made by their grammar-school teacher's proceeding. Many parents at once remove their children from the school presided over by such a principal, and most of the members of the committee manifest a strong wish that Miss Trent should resign forthwith. They will not turn her out, but she ought to go, they think. Mrs. Purcell, however, is firm and argumentative; she has on her side a Mr. Hobbs, the eccentric but influential Chairman of the Gower Educational Board; she vigorously preaches to her friends and the school committee the example of Christ, who willingly drew water for a dissolute woman of Samaria, and who saved the life of a woman taken in adultery. Being efficiently supported by the singularly beautiful life of Miss Trent, she wins her cause, and convinces Gower that it cannot do better than to keep the teacher in the school. Miss Trent therefore remains; she continues to teach the children, who all are very fond of her; now and again she walks hand-in-hand with her boy to the schoolhouse, but her character is so irreproachable and so lovable that there is no one who the less respects and admires her; her boy soon dies of scarlet fever, and by-and-by, while still in the prime of youth, she herself dies suddenly of a disease of the heart—a disease which appears to have been brought on partly by the mental pain caused her by the social condemnation under which she at one time rested, but chiefly by the misery caused her by her own belief in the enormity of her offence and in the justice of the severity with which it was visited.

Thus it is that Miss Phelps deals with the baffling question which she has chosen to consider—the question just now everywhere troubling the legislator: "What else is there that can be done with the fallen woman besides allowing her to go to complete ruin, and so to disappear as soon as possible? How shall we make good, and keep good, the woman whom no man wants?" That is to say, Miss Phelps's method of dealing with the most difficult of social problems is to evade it. Like Miss Anna Dickinson, who, when she wished to assert the propriety of white people's marrying negresses, made her colored heroine a person to all intents and purposes white, so Miss Phelps makes her stained woman a person whom it is not improper to call a model of purity. Nixy Trent, nominally an unvirtuous woman, is such a fallen woman as perhaps ten out of a thousand fallen women may be, and such as nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand are not. She is a poor, innocent young girl, of remarkably good natural disposition, who ignorantly meets with a sad misfortune, but who after her slip, as before it, is as clean in mind and soul as any one well could be. Uninstructed in religion, knowing of Christ—to use our author's words—only as "him they sang about in the 'sylum and him they swears by in Thicket Street;" born as her own child was, and always without the care of father or mother, the associate of ruffians and thieves, no sooner is she ill than of her own motion she resolves on seeking for some of "God's folks"—to use again some of Miss Phelps's not very pleasing language—endeavoring to do her duty by her child, for whom she can feel no love, and striving to lead a pure life, though of purity of life she has never seen nor heard anything. And in these good intentions she perseveres, and perseveres under every discouragement. It is not for us to say that such a being is a mere invention of the fancy; for that there are not girls of like sort in the slums of every city in the world is more than we could prove, and less by a good deal than we are ready to hear proved. Nevertheless, if one is treating of "the social evil," and of the means of reclaiming the women who need reclaiming, it is not Nixy Trents whom one must make up one's mind to work with. Strong religious feeling; natural refinement, unimpaired by the meanest, most degrading circumstances; shuddering hatred of incontinence; unusual mental ability; a capacity for self-sacrifice; superiority to every feminine weakness—it is not these that the reformer of unhappy women will meet with in his labors. And whoever leads any one to think that the field is anywhere so white to the harvest as it is depicted in the story of "Hedged In," or that any such reaper as Mrs. Purcell, though he should do all that Mrs. Purcell did, is often going to come home rejoicing, bearing his sheaves with him, simply misleads by misstating.

Thus, then, the facts of human nature being so utterly disregarded in it, "Hedged In" becomes worthless as a discussion of the social question which it undertakes to discuss. When the average fallen woman is anything like being a Nixy Trent, the average Mrs. Purcell may wisely and Christianly make her an honored inmate of the family, and may, without danger to the young daughters and young sons of the house, take her in and attempt her reform. Of how far, at the bottom of their hearts, the Mrs. Purcells are still really from thinking it yet safe to adopt this course, Miss Phelps's treatment of Nixy is a curious proof. Innocent as the poor creature was, holy as she grows to be, there is nothing for it but she must die. She may satisfy herself with a heavenly love—the "white cross in the little gray room" she may have to fall before, and from which to get help now and hope for the future. But as for rehabilitation in this world, as for anything more of wholesome happiness—these her friend and biographer sees no clear way to let her get.

Probably it is aggrandizing it to speak of the story before us as being really a discussion of the grave question which it calls up. We suppose that the true cause of its existence is not to be found in the fact that "the social evil" is now demanding so much attention, but is to be sought elsewhere. Most readers of our American authoresses, greater or lesser—we may say Eastern authoresses, for what other American authoresses are there?—most readers have noted in most of these songsters and story-tellers an uncontrolled tendency to dwell upon what is morbid and painful in life. The "luxury of woe," among other luxuries that their painful and laborious grandfathers earned for them, we of to-day commonly see our literary female contemporaries indulging in; and, really, "enjoying bad health" sometimes seems to be almost a necessary prerequisite to enjoying a deal of the literature that is furnished us by our New England women. Discontent one would find in it sooner than much cheerfulness or courage or simplicity; and a seeker for self-tormentors, living the life of the feelings, would be rewarded sooner than a seeker for something that should be healthfully bracing in feeling and stimulative of thought. Miss Phelps, with all her kindness of heart and cleverness, has been one of the worse offenders in this respect; and we do not know a book or a story of hers that would not harm a reader inclined to indulgence in morbid feelings. "Gates Ajar," though it more plainly testifies to the trivial, vulgar character of the conceptions of the spiritual life which are entertained by certain sections of the American and English religious world, is yet a conspicuous illustration of the radical fault to which we refer. Certain chapters of that work might safely be taken as affording an example almost unequalled in our literature of the selfish wilfulness of grief and of self-consciousness unconsciously exhibited. So, too, of the "Men, Women, and Ghosts," which contains Miss Phelps's best writing, writing of which some is legitimately powerful in its effect upon the feelings, and such as to enforce respect for its author. But its open attack upon the feelings, its determination to harrow us at all costs, is certain to arouse some resentment on the part of the reader, and to make him regret that so much cleverness should expend itself for so poor an end. Even the little stories for children, those in the "Trotty Book," for instance, do not escape the same condemnation, and the heart of the youngest child Miss Phelps wrings as remorselessly as if children had not, at the best, trouble enough before them without literature's being invoked to sadden them prematurely. "Hedged In" follows in the track of its predecessors. It is in occasional passages very touching; there is more than one remark that is true and telling; it shows a very good heart, if not an especially well-instructed mind; it contains evidence sufficient that a personage not made up of her own traits of character is beyond our authoress's reach; and the chief impression that it makes is that there must be those who love to indulge themselves in wanton grieving and who enjoy a laceration of the heart more or less real.

* "Hedged In. By Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1870.

A COMPARATIVE GEOGRAPHY.*

According to Herr Kapp, earth and mankind are in the same relation to each other as nature and mind, as body and soul. Man is not only the highest organism on earth, the culminating point of its development; he is its aim, the original ideal type of all telluric creations; his mind is the truth of nature. "There is not a ready-made earth and a variety of typical formations shaped to suit it; but there is an imperishable eternal idea—the idea of mankind—towards the embodiment of which our planet in its plan, its cosmic life, its geological structure, its external appearance, and productive activity, is invariably impelled to tend." The various organisms that people the earth do not owe their existence to the varying formations of the earth's surface; they are unavoidable links in an immense chain of inorganic and organic creations, of which man is the completing type, and to the demands of which the surface of the planet had to adapt itself in endless variety. Man, the end-type, is in close inner union with the whole of nature; he is, indeed, "the concrete microcosm." But while destined to rule the earth, man, in his gradual development towards mental independence and power, continues to be the child of the soil, the peculiarities of which form the varying characteristics of his race, though only to a degree, and not absolutely. "The Swiss highlander, the Dutch coast-dweller, the oceanic Briton, the continental Slav, the volcanic Italian, the archipelagic Greek, the Bedouin of the desert, the Nomad of the steppe"—they are all, so to say, the personifications of their earthly abodes. To show the influence upon man, in his development, of the earth's surface in its endless and complex diversity, and to show at the same time the agencies which aid man to disentangle himself from nature's swathing-clothes, is the vast province of the comparative geographer. To show all this in a comprehensive and philosophical way, is, in fact, to write a partial history of mankind.

The foremost agent of development and cultivation in the natural history of mankind Herr Kapp sees in the water—that shaping, bounding, separating, isolating, but yet most effectually connecting, exchanging, communicating, and above all fertilizing, vivifying, bracing, and invigorating physical power. In the shape of rivers, it led man from the plateaus of Central and Anterior Asia to the more or less perfect and fertile "mesopotamias" east, south, and north-west of the Himalayas and south of the Armenian mountains—the original seats and centres of Chinese, Hindu, Bactrian, Babylonian, and Persian civilization—and from the highlands of Abyssinia to the valley and delta of Egypt, where arose Thebes, Memphis, and Sais. As Mediterranean Sea—a sea in many a way intermediate and mediating between lands, continents, nations, and civilizations—the thalassa of the Greeks—it formed that unique focus of ancient, mediæval, and modern universal history into which the Nile and the slopes of Syria and Asia Minor carried the physical and intellectual treasures of the Egyptian, the Phœnician, and the Hebrew, and of the Persian, who had absorbed the Bactrian, the Mede, the Assyrian, and the Chaldee; which, assimilating, perfecting, and centralizing what it received, created Tyre, Carthage, Athens, Ephesus, Rome, Massilia, Gades, Alexandria, Constantinople, Genoa, and Venice; and the periphery of which, gradually conquered and extended by the central nation, the Roman, eventually formed the mightiest and most centralized empire the world ever saw. As ocean, it is the all-connecting, all-distributing, equalizing, harmonizing, and liberating element, lavish of rewards to enterprise, energy, and boldness, hostile to stagnation and isolation, and destructive of artificial bonds and barriers, of privileges and tyranny. The civilization of the ancient Oriental nations our author therefore designates as potamic, the civilization of the classical world as thalassic, and that of the modern occidental nations as oceanic. The main divisions of his Political Geography—to which, as the most comprehensive part, we restrict our remarks—are accordingly the "Potamic World," the "Thalassic World," and the "Oceanic World." Geography in its noblest sense and history in grand outlines are closely interwoven; the fulness of description and historical illustration harmoniously agree with the historical importance of each land and its nation. While Siberia, whose vast rivers flow into an ice-bound ocean, is barely noticed, and the southern continents, whose history is made arid by their tropical position, are treated in rapid sketches, little Hellas, the masterpiece of thalassic formation, and little England, the central isle of the oceanic world, are depicted and illustrated in grand tableaux.

It would be an idle undertaking to attempt within the narrow limits of this review anything like a real analysis of the contents of this "Comparative Geography." The systematically complete character of the book, which illustrates the development of every historical country—fully and vividly—by its position, climate, inner formation—in all its variety—and native wealth; by its connection with neighboring lands and peoples through open plains, valleys, mountain passes, and chiefly through water-courses; by its greater or less proximity and accessibility to seas or the ocean; and also by the influence upon it, from within or from without, of the human intellect in its mastery over nature—these combined produce a richness and manifoldness which baffle all approximating reproduction in abridged form or extracts. Of course it need not be told that the work does not pretend to originality in a narrow sense of the word. On the contrary, its value is enhanced, and its generally pleasant diction often diversified, by striking observations and extracts drawn from the greatest German writers. The spirit that pervades the whole of it is one of candid enquiry and undogmatic liberalism. A kind of philanthropic optimism adds a pleasing warmth to the animation and often poetical loftiness of its diction, which is, however, not everywhere free from that frequent defect of German style, cumbrousness. German leanings, too, are here and there perceptible. With true German comprehensiveness, almost everything slightly bordering on the sphere of the subject is drawn into it, not excluding the latest and newest discoveries, inventions, and philosophical speculations—the work being, in its second edition, in great part rewritten.

*"Vergleichende allgemeine Erdkunde in wissenschaftlicher Darstellung. Von Ernst Kapp." Zweite verbesserte Auflage. Braunschweig: 1868.

La Bible dans l'Inde. Vie de Iezeus Christna, par Louis Jacolliot. (Paris. 1869. 8vo, pp. 391.)—This book has in a very high degree all those bad qualities which we are accustomed to call, more expressively than courteously, "Frenchy." It is jerky, dogmatic, pretentious, impudent, and empty—a mere tirade from beginning to end. Its author has spent some time in Southern India, where he has imbibed a certain amount of superficial acquaintance with Indian institutions, an immense conceit of superior knowledge with not a particle of real learning, and the most intense prejudice against Christianity, in every part and particle. Thus equipped, he sets out to prove that Moses and Christ, in common with all the other great names that history knows, are weak copies of ancient Hindu originals. His method of argument is to point out certain resemblances between Jewish and Christian institutions and utterances on the one hand, and alleged Hindu ones on the other; and then to assert triumphantly, in view of the universally confessed and immensely superior antiquity of the latter, the derivation of the former from them. We say "alleged," because the greater part, at least, of his citations and abstracts are palpably unauthentic. It is charitable to suppose that he has, in regard to them, been made the dupe of interested and cunning Pundits—as other scholars, of more zeal than discretion or learning, have been before him. His Indian opinions stand fully upon the old, exploded basis of fifty years ago, when notions of the immemorial age and unimpeached originality of everything written in Sanskrit were prevalent—when people could believe, without losing all credit for information and insight, that European and Asiatic languages and mythologies and philosophies emanated from the valley of the Ganges. The world in general has grown wiser since then, but M. Jacolliot has, somehow or other, escaped the improvement; and so, while Sanskrit scholars are discussing, for example, whether the Laws of Manu are older or younger than the Christian era, he pronounces them incontestably as ancient as 3,000 years B.C., and treats them as the sources of the Pentateuch. Of course, the Vedas are to him the ne plus ultra of human productions, in age, in wisdom, in sanctity. He is just as weak in philology as in literary history. Witness his etymologies on pp. 25–27, which remind us of the good old times, when comparative philology was not, and when any one man who could spell out the words in an Oriental dictionary was as good a word-historian as another. Here is an example or two: Hercules is Sanskrit hara-kala, 'hero of combats;' Orestes is o-raksa-ta, 'devoted to misfortune;' Pelasgi is palaça-ga, 'pitiless fighter.' One of the queer things about these is that no Sanskrit scholar can find any such etymons; instead of being Sanskrit, they are pure Jacolliote. Such trifles as that he writes Maha-barada for Mahabharata, Bagaveda-gita for Bhagavad-gita, and so on, are hardly worth noticing. When it comes, however, to his twisting Krishna into Christna, asserting it to mean 'sacred,' instead of 'black,' and prefixing to it, of his own sweet will, the epithet Ieseus (which possibly is meant for yâyya, 'worshipable'—we can think of nothing else which it should represent), the evident purpose makes the act dishonest instead of merely inept. It is impossible for any one to be more out of sympathy with the scholarly and scientific tendencies of the time than is M. Jacolliot; he is nothing more than a pretentious ignoramus. Those who sympathize with him in his fundamental views of Christianity should be the last to wish his volume currency, for it can only bring shame and confusion upon the cause which it undertakes to defend.

The work is so entirely beneath serious criticism that we should hardly have taken any notice of it, and certainly should not have spent so many words upon it, except that it is now being pushed into prominence before the public. It has actually found a translator into English and an English publisher, and a "cheap reprint" of it in this country is already in circulation—an evil which we cannot but sincerely deprecate, and would gladly by our influence have helped to prevent.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Aiken (Miss. L.), Memoirs of the Court of Elizabeth	(G. P. Putnam & Son) $2 00
Brother and Sister: A Child's Story	(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Bryant's Casket of Musical Gems, swd	(R. M. De Witt) 0 50
Bulletin of the Essex Institute, Vol. I.	(Salem)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 27, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Edwards (Amelia B.), Debenham's Vow: A Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Gen. Fitz John Porter's Reply to Hon. Z. Chandler's Speech, swd	(Morristown, N. J.)
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), The Lost Daughter: A Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Hurlbut (E. P.), Secular View of Religion in the State and the Bible in the Public Schools, swd	(Joel Munsell)
Harland (Marion), Helen Gardner's Wedding-Day: A Tale	(Carleton) 1 50
Hughes (T.), Tom Brown's School Days, swd	(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Jacolliot (L.), The Bible in India	(Carleton)
Johnson (J. E.), The Monks before Christ	(A. Williams & Co.) 1 25
Koner (Prof. Dr. W.), Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, No. 25	(L. W. Schmidt)
McClintock (Rev. J.) and Strong (J.), Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, Vol. III., E, F, G	(Harper & Bros.)
Peck (J.), Influence of Liberty on Taste in the Ages of Augustus and Louis XIV., swd	(Hurd & Houghton) 0 50
Ross (C. H.), and Clarke (A.), Story of a Honeymoon	(Carleton)
Stearns (Rev. E. J.), Afterpiece to the Comedy of Convocation, swd	(Baltimore)
Smiles (S.), Self-Help, new ed	(Harper & Bros.) 1 00
The Workshop, No. 3, swd	(E. Steiger) 0 50
The Bazar Book of Decorum	(Harper & Bros.)
Who is My Neighbor?—A Child's Story	(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Wood (Mrs. H.), George Canterbury's Will: A Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 50

SPIELHAGEN'S NEW NOVEL.

The Hohensteins,

By the author of "Problematic Characters" and "Through Night to Light." The three in uniform style, 12mo, cloth, $2 per vol. Copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, New York.

Now Ready.

The Court and Times of Queen Elizabeth.

BY LUCY AIKEN.

1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, $2.

 Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,

ASSOCIATION BUILDING,

Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, New York.

ECHOES FROM FOREIGN CAPITALS.

FRENCH-GERMAN

Worman's Conversation Manuals,

FOR SCHOOLS AND PRIVATE STUDENTS.

1. "Echo de Paris," or French Echo, $1 25.
2. "Deutsches Echo," or German Echo. $1 25.

ON AN ENTIRELY NEW PLAN.

Older Methods	The "Echoes"
Of teaching permit and lead the student to translate his thoughts as he speaks. The results are want of confidence, hesitation and embarrassment of utterance, and a laborious exercise of the mind which almost forbids original thought.	Require the learner to speak and think in the same language as he does when he uses his own, and make him entirely self-reliant from the first by removing all artificial hindrances to easy proficiency. They also teach manners and customs.

 Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price. To teachers, for an examination, half-price.

A. S. BARNES & CO.,

111 and 113 WILLIAM ST., NEW YORK.

LONDON SATURDAY REVIEW.

Subscriptions, for any time, at publication price, can be made with B. F. STEVENS, 17 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London.

The Annual Subscription, including postage, is £1 10s. 6d. or $7 50, gold, and may be remitted direct or paid to the New York agents of B. F. Stevens, Messrs. IRVING & WILLEY, 34½ Pine Street, New York.

All other British Periodicals supplied at publication prices.

Now Ready.

A NEW EDITION

OF

Fair Harvard.

A TALE OF AMERICAN COLLEGE LIFE.

1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

"What could be more astonishing than the description of a football game with which the book opens? . . . The chapter, indeed, reads like a book of the Iliad. Is this really true to fact?"—Spectator (London).

"There is no part of the book in which the genuine twang of college life and learning is not evident."—Overland Monthly.

"The wrath excited by this unfortunate work seems only to increase by time."—Harvard Advocate.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

G. P. PUTNAM & SONS,

Y. M. C. A. Building, Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1870.

The Week.

THE sectional character of the vote reducing the duty on pig-iron, on Monday, was exactly reversed on the same day, on the vote increasing the apportionment of Representatives from 240 to 275, by which the West will be the gainer. In the Senate on Friday Mr. Sumner introduced a substitute for the bill abolishing the franking privilege, which has the merit of coupling the reform with a general recasting of rates; but we fear it will resemble some other of Mr. Sumner's measures in obstructing rather than forwarding the object of it by distracting attention. Mr. Drake came up first on Monday with a rival Sixteenth Amendment to Mr. Julian's, designed to authorize a more speedy interference by the President in domestic disturbances in the several States, without waiting for the call of either Governor or Legislature. Congress is to specify the occasions, and to provide appropriate legislation in support of the amendment. The Georgia Bill, having been debated in the most wearisome manner, was finally brought to vote on Tuesday evening, and the bill sent back to the House in a shape in which its best friends will fail to recognize it. It orders the election of a legislature this year, keeps the State a military district, authorizes the President to suppress domestic violence there, and provides for the organization and employment of the Georgia militia.

We have made a feeble attempt elsewhere to give the general reader an idea of the way in which the industry and trade of the country are "regulated" every winter by the House of Representatives, and of the amount of knowledge and public spirit a large proportion of our high-tariff men bring to the work of raising and lowering the value of the property of the entire community. To talk of their performances as "a system" or as "protection for native industry" is an abuse of language. It is neither more nor less than a "grab game," in which each man gets all he can out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of a small number of persons in his own district, and of the effect on the fortunes of others in other districts he evidently cares little or nothing. The amusing surveys of the condition of the rest of the globe, and the historico-philosophico-economico-metaphysical disquisitions on the moral, social, and political phenomena of other civilized countries by which the demand for higher duties is generally prefaced, are merely a ponderous congressional way of throwing dust in people's eyes. There never was anything of the kind more comical than the devices by which they have been trying to reconcile the Southerners to dear cotton bagging. First they told them that the thick bagging had lowered their insurance; but on its being shown that it was not this but the substitution of iron ties that had done it, they fell back on the weight of the bagging as tare, for which the cotton-planter made no allowance; which was another way of saying, Buy our heavy bagging at our price, and we will assist you in cheating the people who buy your cotton.

The success of the protectionist efforts to keep up the duties on bagging, however, is said to have had the effect of disgusting the Southerners, as the bagging is a Western "interest," and the East does not care much about it—witness Mr. Schenck's rending of his garments—and, consequently, the result of the bagging debate was generally believed last week to be fatal to the tariff bill, although pig-iron, which is its critical point, had not been reached. The battle royal on this came off on Monday, and owing to the stout resistance of the Western men, aided by Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, the $7 duty of the bill was cut down to $5—a reduction of $4 from the present rates—but by a majority only of sixty-six to sixty-four. Still, small as the majority is, it indicates that turning in the tide which has for some time been plainly inevitable, and for which, we repeat, the protectionists have nobody to blame but themselves. They have had everything their own way for ten years, and the result is general indignation and disgust. No nation will long bear with such performances as theirs have been from any government which it can make or unmake. Colbert succeeded, but Colbert had no press or public opinion to face, and could imprison a man for life or send him to the galleys without trial.

We find in a recent speech of Mr. Daniel J. Morrell, of Pennsylvania, on the tariff, delivered in the House of Representatives, that "it is settled and determined by the people themselves, from whom there is no appeal, that the wages of labor shall be maintained at a higher rate in this country than in England or other competing countries." We are very glad to hear this, because if "the people" can do this, they can make wages whatever they please, and the "labor problem" may be considered solved. All we have to do now, to put an end to the eternal bickering between the capitalist and the laborer, is to have the rate fixed once a year or so at the State elections by a popular vote. Moreover, this gets rid of the great question of finding work for the unemployed. Why should "the people" not indicate by a vote on a general ticket the number of men each employer should hire, as well as how much he should pay them? What keeps men out of work now is, that employers say they cannot afford to engage them; but if "the people" said they could afford it, what employer would venture to deny it? The danger of capitalists running away, when "the people" begin to raise or lower wages, might be obviated by erecting wire fences, of native manufacture, such as are used in monarchical countries for the confinement of deer in the parks of the bloated aristocracy.

The St. Thomas treaty expired by limitation last week, and thus have ended negotiations begun by us more than five years ago, persisted in till the reluctance of the Danish Government was overcome, and then, when presented in definite shape to the Senate, neglected and postponed as if at least positive and prompt action were not imperative in the circumstances, and finally lapsing, after two renewals, in a manner discreditable to the United States and mortifying to Denmark. The loss of two coaling stations is of no consequence whatever, but with them we have forfeited the confidence of foreign powers in similar dealings, and that must indirectly affect our standing in all that concerns the good faith of the nation. However, we are not beyond the possibility of gain even from this defalcation—gain, we mean, other than the saving of seven and a half millions of dollars. It will be, if not particularly consoling to Denmark, a considerable compensation to ourselves if the San Domingo treaty shares the fate of the St. Thomas, not from senatorial caprice, but in obedience to a public sentiment, which may fairly be said to exist, in opposition to further annexations, especially of territory not contiguous to this country. And we shall be still better off if the principles and risks of international treaties under our Constitution become fully understood by foreign governments, and if the discussion of them in the Senate can be made of necessity public. Until then the people will never fully realize their responsibility for the national honor, and our ministers of state will never proceed with the caution that belongs to such difficult and delicate enterprises.

The Chicago Tribune, which seems to hold the Mormons in a good deal of horror, warmly supports Cullom's bill, and ridicules the notion that their polygamy is entitled to any forbearance because they practise it as of divine ordinance. It asks scornfully whether, if a band of horse-thieves were to appear professing to have a divine revelation directing them to practise horse-stealing as an institution, we should pay any attention to their religious scruples, or should not hunt them down and string them up with as much rigor as if they stole horses through "pure cussedness" and not as a means of grace. Now, this is not a parallel case, and is therefore delusive, and for this reason, among others: In polygamy all parties concerned are consenting parties. The arrangement is what the civil lawyers call consensual. In other words, there is nobody in it calling herself or himself a victim, and appealing to us for protection. When horses are stolen, on the other hand, the owner is aggrieved and demands our aid, and we are bound to give it, just as we should be bound to give it to any woman whom the Mormons sought to abduct vi et armis. If, however, a sect made its appearance, like the Shakers, for instance, and settled in a secluded district, and practised as a religious rite, commanded by their prophet, the custom of carrying off each other's horses in the night-time, and were ready to endure torture sooner than stay in their beds and let their neighbors' horses alone, or if, when they got up in the morning and found all their horses untouched in the stable or the pasture, they looked on it as a sign of lukewarmness in the church, we think it would be very doubtful indeed whether Government ought to interfere with them. The nearest approach to a precedent for the proposed action of our Government towards the Mormons is the dealings of the English Government in India with the Thugs, who held it to be a religious duty to murder and rob. But then they did not practise the rite on one another, but on Gentiles, who were utterly opposed to participation in it, and were therefore entitled to have the Thugs exterminated. We may add, too, that on the simple ground of feasibility there is a wide difference between regulating the sexual relation and any other. Any relation of the sexes generally approved of by public opinion cannot be restrained by law. The law can only strike at it through the rules of inheritance, by declaring children illegitimate; but if the parties are not frightened by this, it is in vain to forbid whatever does not disgrace them in the eyes of their friends and neighbors.

The last story about the Legal Tender Case is that Judges Bradley and Strong have "qualified" themselves to sit on the re-hearing, and take part in the decision, the one by "assigning" his interest in the stock of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, and the other by assigning his interest in the stock of the Pennsylvania Central. Both these great corporations have a strong interest in the decision, as a reversal of the late judgment of the Court will enable them to cheat their creditors to a considerable amount on contracts made before 1862. The Pennsylvania Central, in particular, would make about a million and a half if the swindle were legally authorized. The great railroad corporations have long owned State legislatures, and have lately begun to own State courts, but until now the Supreme Court may be said to have been beyond their reach. Should the addition of Judges Strong and Bradley to the Court result in a decision favorable to their interests, we may count on two things: one is, a loss of all confidence, on the part of the public, in the Court, in all cases in which great corporations are concerned; and another is a steady refusal on the part of the corporations to accept any decision as final until they have tried their hand at "filling vacancies" on the bench. We do not mean to say or insinuate that either Judge Bradley or Judge Strong is going to do anything that is wrong in the matter, but they must remember that it is as much the duty of a judge to be above reproach as to be pure. Precedents and right reason prescribe to a judge who is personally interested in a cause, or will be personally affected by its result, strict abstinence from all participation in deciding it. This is the rule. "Assigning his interest" for the purpose of qualifying is forbidden, for the simple reason that in the hands of a bad man the expedient may be a mere farce. There is nothing to prevent either of these judges having his stock reassigned to him the day after his judgment has added twenty per cent. to its value. The country ought to speak out boldly against these disgraceful beginnings.

The disgraceful attacks on the Honorable Horace Greeley, of which we have already more than once spoken, continue. The New York Times, the other day, pointed out that he had said in his great work, "What I Know of Political Economy," the very same thing about the wool clip of 1868 for saying which, in a report, he had abused Mr. Wells, as a "humbug" and a "Munchausen Special" and an ignoramus, but it failed to mention the foot-note in the book, or the paragraph in the Tribune, in which Mr. Greeley, with his usual candor and conscientiousness, had acknowledged the injustice of his attack on Mr. Wells, and apologized for it. We have called the attention of the Times to this oversight on its part, and it is still silent. Such is the way in which a partisan press treats our leading scientific men. More recently, the Herald and other sheets have spread abroad the report that Mr. Greeley had, before and during his visit to Albany, as the ambassador of the Union League Club, opened negotiations with the Honorable John Morrissey and other members of the "Young Democracy" for an alliance against the Tweed charter, in consideration of which Mr. Greeley was to have the support of the "Young Democrats" for the Governorship of the State. And now the Committee of the Tammany Society, appointed to enquire into the late conflict at Albany, report that these negotiations were actually carried on as aforesaid. The result of them is that the "Young Democrats" received at the Tammany election 23 votes, to the 242 cast for the Tweedites, which is certainly a very lame and impotent conclusion to our latest attempt at reform. Misfortunes, of course, never come singly. The Sun, which has for more than a year supported Mr. Greeley ardently both for the Comptrollership of the State, for the Mission to England, and, if we are not mistaken, for the throne of Spain, throws him overboard, and declines to recommend him further for any office of dignity or emolument.

The annual "Fenian Scare" seems once more to be impending, and the Canadians are making somewhat ridiculous preparations to meet it, including the organization of a small army of regulars and volunteers. The Fenian force, we need hardly say, is nowhere visible; and the truth about the Fenian movement seems to be this: A certain number of Irish gentlemen, of vivid imaginations, limited means, and unlimited brass, and a small amount of education, have, ever since 1866, got a living by keeping up a simulacrum of a "government," making purchases of arms, and pretending to be getting an "invasion" ready. By means of the impression this outward show makes on the Irish servant-girls and laborers in various parts of the country, they have succeeded in getting an annual revenue, varying in amount with the degree of excitement they are able to create, and this they divided amongst themselves. The first batch of "statesmen" started in fine style on Union Square, in 1866, but had to go shares with "the men in the gap," as their confederates in Ireland were called, and came to grief after having committed some robberies in Canada and hauled down the flag of one English schooner in Buffalo. They were then deposed, leaving about $200,000 unaccounted for, and a fresh batch took their places, and began once more "organizing," and holding "councils," and threatening Great Britain, just enough to keep the money coming in. In the regular course of things, when the receipts decline, the party in power have either to "invade Canada" or resign and let others have a chance, and their successors then go on threatening and holding "councils," till the servant-girls get sick of them too. One such crisis seems now to be pending, and the chief officers of the brotherhood have either to "invade" or retire into private life; and as they are said to be entirely dependent on their salaries, it may be readily understood that they would rather "invade." So they are distributing arms in houses along the Canadian frontier accordingly, and seem to be very much in the mood towards the Canadians of the man who, being insulted in a private room, requested his enemy, significantly, to "step down into the street and wait till he came."

The press of the Canadas is as completely devoted to the interests of this or that Canadian politician and placeholder as was the press of this country in old Federalist and Republican days, or Jacksonian and anti-Jacksonian days, when hotel-keepers used to refuse a feed to the horse of a traveller of opinions opposed to their own, and men's wives spoke to each other or cut each other accordingly as their husbands agreed or disagreed in politics. It is for the interest of Canadian politicians—a class that has nothing to learn from the worst politicians of this or any other country—that their fellow-citizens should see in the United States a vulgar, greedy, unscrupulous, scheming enemy, so hungry for Canada and so enviously hateful of England that nothing would please it better than to turn loose on the other side of the border a horde of Fenian murderers. The assembling, therefore, of the Fenian Congress at Cleveland has been a godsend to them, and one is disposed to think they will do little to allay the agitation into which it has thrown the Dominion. Meantime, as if to help in explaining Sir J. A. McDonald's speeches and the action of the Dominion Government, the annexation movement in the maritime provinces increases in strength and is expressed fearlessly, Annexation Leagues being in existence in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and every league having behind it a body of opinion, acquiescent or actively favorable, in comparison with which the actively loyal opinion of the native Provincial communities is feeble.

Miss Virginia Penny, who has done a good deal in her day for woman's wrongs, writes a long letter to the Cincinnati Commercial making sundry charges against the more prominent woman's rights women. She says they never, in their historical sketches of the movement, or in their mutual eulogies, make any mention of Ann McDowell, who established the Woman's Advocate, and was last seen, twelve years ago, living miserably in a garret; or to Dr. Maria J. Dewnett, who established the Women's Journal in 1854, and died working for it; or of Emily Howland, of whom the late Thomas Brady (J. T. ?) said she was as well versed in the law as most male practitioners, and to whose personal exertions at Albany it was owing that the bills were passed which first in this State gave women a right to their earnings, and boarding-house keepers a right to detain the baggage of delinquent and departing boarders. Miss Penny asks what has Miss Susan B. Anthony ever done for her sex which can compare for one moment in real value with these two enactments. She is also very severe on Mrs. Stanton, Parker Pillsbury, Theodore Tilton, and other brethren and sisters, against whom she openly brings a charge of "great cry and little wool," or words to that effect. The sum and substance of her accusations is, that they all advocate the suffrage, as something which will bear an indefinite amount of speech, but avoid practical reforms, which need a great deal of work, and speech only in small degree.

Mr. Charles Levi Woodbury, a leading Democrat of Massachusetts, has recently made a speech urging the abolition of two provisions of the State constitution which are much disliked by the Democrats, namely, that which imposes on the intending voter the necessity of paying a poll-tax before his name can be put on the voting list, and that which excludes from the ballot-box the vote of a citizen unable to read and write. The figures which Mr. Woodbury gives are of some interest. The whole number of legal voters in Massachusetts is 262,120. Strike out of the constitution the clauses above-mentioned, and there would be admitted to the polls 55,050 additional voters—45,050 now excluded for non-payment of taxes, and 10,000 who cannot read and write. If the former seems a large number, the second certainly seems small when it is recollected how large a percentage of the population of the State is foreign-born. But we must add to this 10,000 a large part of those 9,000 inhabitants who are excluded on the ground of alienage alone, and for whose exclusion there is probably the other reason also. Moreover, it is to be remembered that in the practical application of the reading and writing test there is often much that is farcical; for the places are not few in Massachusetts in which a lively faith in the value of the test is decidedly wanting, and where a man secures his right to vote by about as much knowledge of reading as used to be required for saving a criminal's life by the reading of the "neck verse." The largeness of the number —45,050—who are excluded from voting by the non-payment of taxes is rather more surprising, at first sight, than the fewness of the illiterate; but doubtless the figures mainly represent "town poor," and do not reflect so severely as might be supposed on the energy and enterprise of the party managers, who in Massachusetts, as elsewhere, have no extreme delicacy of scrupulousness as to robbing the cradle and the grave when the exigencies of the campaign require it. Mr. Woodbury's arguments are not so interesting as his statistics, the enormity of allowing "a two-dollar poll-tax and a reading and writing clause to stand between the citizen and the ballot-box" not being made patent by the speech. On the practical point, on the facts as they are, on the practical working of the Massachusetts system, no doubt a forcible argument adverse to the system might be made. But of the ballot-box in its capacity of magician and miracle-worker it is easy nowadays to hear quite enough without calling in the abilities of able lawyers.

There is at last no doubt that Lopez has been killed, and that hostilities in Paraguay are over. We do not know whether it will now be easier or harder to get a just view of the character of this dictator, who has been painted in all colors, and concerning whom two United States ministers, of sound minds, have made the most opposite and contradictory reports. All the positive testimony of English and American victims as to the horrible barbarities practised by Lopez has failed to convince a large body of his admirers that he was anything but a hero and a patriot, or that the "lost cause" of Paraguay differs from that of Poland. But this is by no means singular. Thousands of intelligent and cultivated persons still believe in the Christian meekness of Jefferson Davis, in the righteousness of the rebellion, and the superior humanity of its supporters. In spite of the notorious atrocities of Belle Isle and Libby Prison, Mr. George Long would prefer to dedicate his version of Marcus Aurelius to the leader of the Confederate armies rather than to any other American. For our part, we are content to place Lopez in the same category with Davis. The significant fact of his overthrow, it seems to us, lies in the suppression of a race of tyrants of whom Francia, Rosas, and Quiroga were examples, and who being made impossible for the future, Spanish America of the South is free to develop in the spirit of the highest civilization of the age. Uncertain as is the destiny of Brazil, the colonization of that Empire from Europe, and especially from Germany, is heaviest in its southern provinces; and these, if ever the freedom to commerce of the Plate River is to be disputed again, are likely to play an important part in keeping open that international highway. On its side, the Argentine Republic, so long as President Sarmiento is permitted to direct it, will work for the same end. The Pacific railway which it is now contemplating will, if completed, of itself ensure the navigation of the Plate to all comers.

There have been rumors for some weeks that the relations of France and Prussia were growing "delicate," and these rumors have been in some degree strengthened by such small incidents as the arrival of the Grand-Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin at Vienna on a visit to the Emperor of Austria. The Duke is a firm friend of Prussia, and it was given out that he came on behalf of that power to make arrangements for a closer understanding between Austria, Prussia, and Russia, in case things took an unexpected turn in Paris. Count Daru, however, as well as other members of the French Ministry, have been "interviewed" on the subject, and they unite in declaring that the intentions of France have never been more pacific, and that she has reduced her army by 100,000 men; and that as war cannot now be declared without the consent of the Chambers, it has not been less probable any time these twenty years. They acknowledge, however, that any attempt on the part of France to hug Southern Germany any closer would wound French "susceptibilities;" and well-informed observers and speculators agree in considering Luxembourg still a bone of contention, which nothing but the self-restraint and prudence of the rival dogs prevent from being dangerous, and over which the fight may yet be renewed. Viscount de la Guéronnière spoke enigmatically in the Senate on Monday in regard to the peace of Europe, saying that Europe was tranquil only when France was satisfied, and in order that France may be content each Power must be in its proper place.

A DEBATE ON THE TARIFF.

One unfortunate result of the refusal of our daily papers to report the proceedings of Congress in full is that the people has little or no idea of what its representatives are doing, or, indeed, of what manner of men they are. Verbatim or even extended reports of the debates are only to be found in the Globe, and the Globe is only to be found in newspaper-offices and reading-rooms, and, we greatly fear, hardly anybody reads it except under the pressure of stern necessity. The consequence of this is, that the public has only the very vaguest notion of the mode in which the Tariff Bill is every year debated and retouched, or of the arguments by which this tremendous annual interference with the prices of commodities and the profits of industry is justified, and of the information or ability possessed by the gentlemen engaged in the work.

We have been for some time on the lookout for a debate long enough and serious enough to deserve notice as a specimen of the way the work is done; but although the tariff has now been under discussion for some weeks, we were not so fortunate as to light on what we wanted till last week. In the Globe of Friday, April 15, will be found a perfect sample of the way in which artificial stimuli for native industry are constructed and put into force. Thirty-three gentlemen took part in it, and the subject was hemp and its substitutes, jute and other vegetable fibres, gunny-bags, gunny-cloth and cotton bagging, hemp and jute carpets and matting, vegetable mats and matting, and hemp and jute yarns—all articles with a certain amount of relation to each other.

The first point was, whether it was fair to the Emperor of Russia—who all agreed was entitled to as much consideration as any living potentate, both on account of his friendly conduct during the war and the tremendous number of slaves he had emancipated by his "fiat"—to let in Manila grass at $25 the ton when Russian hemp was taxed $40 the ton, Russia being entitled by treaty to the treatment of the most favored nation. The discussion on this point took a philological turn, the question being whether the term "hemp" covered the "Manila grass." Mr. Schenck showed they were botanically different things, and that the "Manila hemp" had always been called "Manila grass" till now; but Mr. Morgan showed he was mistaken, the tariff of 1842 speaking of it as "Manila hemp." A paper in the nature of a protest from Mr. Catacazy, the Russian minister, characterizing this distinction as a "lexical subtilty," and which Mr. Banks read to the House, called down severe animadversion as an attempt on the part of Russia to "dictate legislation," while Mr. Beck, of Kentucky, said that to lower the duty on hemp would be an "outrage on humanity," owing to the number of poor men in Kentucky who found employment in manufacturing it. Mr. Johnson, of California, announced that it was universally conceded "that every gentleman on that floor represented the interests of his immediate constituents as nearly as he could, and that, in this matter of regulating duties, he was influenced, like other gentlemen, by selfish and sectional considerations." He then showed triumphantly that unless the duty on hemp was reduced a certain ropewalk in San Francisco would have to go down, being unable to compete with similar establishments in Kentucky and Missouri, and asked whether "that Congress was prepared to say that the people on the Pacific coast should not manufacture hemp into rope or anything else." He then quoted the Sacramento Union, to show that San Francisco had 6,000 men out of employment to-day. The attempt to lower the duty on Russian hemp failed, letting the ropewalk go to the wall; but when the duty on Manila hemp came up Mr. Cox opposed it altogether, because of its injurious effects on shipbuilding, while Mr. Logan sought to have it raised from $25 to $40 a ton, "to test the sincerity" of the high-tariff men, but he was not successful.

The most interesting part of the discussion was that on "jute butts," however. Jute butts is the lower part of the bark of the jute-tree, and it comes largely from Calcutta. The committee recommend that it be taxed $10 a ton; Mr. Strong moved the substitution of $6, and the opposing forces closed. As to the use of jute butts in the arts, Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, informed the House that "its main use was to make bunches for woman's hair, in accordance with the present fashion;" that "it adapts itself to every possible color;" and that should a lady drop her chignon in the street, and you pick it up and set fire to it, "you will not catch the odor which would be given by the burning of human hair or other animal substance." This account of jute butts, however, did not tally with that given by Mr. Strong, who read a letter from some Connecticut paper-makers, showing that it was used extensively by Manila paper manufacturers in this country, who were all in a bad way, and wanted the duty entirely taken off; and he further added, that it was used in the manufacture of gunny-bags (a very delicate subject), and ought to be taken off for the sake of the gunny-bag men. This caused him to receive a severe castigation from Mr. Schenck, who said "it was the hardest thing in the world to get a Connecticut or other New England manufacturer to understand that raw material produced in other parts of the country was entitled to protection as well as their manufactured article. They will not be satisfied with less than from thirty-five to eighty per cent., while they are not willing to let the West have twenty-seven per cent. for their flax tow and flax straw."

The mention of gunny-bags and gunny-cloth raised a terrible storm. General Butler said we must have cheap jute butts in order to have cheap gunny-bags to move corn, which heats in a cotton, flax, or hemp bag. Mr. Schenck, however, said jute butts was never made into gunny-bags at all, and that corn was never now moved in bags of any kind; while Mr. Kelley, without committing himself on the question of the mode of moving corn, said also that jute butts was never made into gunny-bags, and added that "gunny-bagging is unfit to cover grain," and he was opposed to making any further concession to the paper-makers, who now, he said, are sufficiently favored by having Esparto grass, paper waste and paper cuttings, and rags admitted duty free. Mr. Banks, on the other hand, said the paper-makers in his district were all discontented and were opposed to this mode of dealing with jute butts; which caused Mr. Schenck, figuratively speaking, to dash his hat on the ground, and to exclaim "that he could not find an Eastern manufacturer but what thought his product ought to have the highest possible protection, and everything he made it out of come in free; and this he had heard so often, that, as he had said there one day before, it almost drove him into free trade to listen to what he heard on this subject."

At this stage, a triangular battle ensued over the jute butts. The paper manufacturers want it let in duty free; and so does the Southern planter, who wants cheap covering for his cotton bales; but the Western flax-tow and hemp-tow men say he ought not to have it, because they are entitled to supply him with all the cotton bagging he needs. Their cotton bagging, Mr. Kelley said, was the best because it protected the cotton against "spontaneous combustion." Mr. Schenck said it was the best because, being thick, it protected the cotton from "thieves, and from sparks on steamboats," and thus reduced the rate of insurance one-third; and because, as the cotton planter makes no allowance for tare, the heavier the bagging the more he gets for his cotton—on which principle, let us add, a law taxing cotton so much per pound, and allowing the planter to put a big stone in the centre of each bale, would be defensible. Here Mr. Buckley intervened, however, and (politely) informed Messrs. Kelley and Schenck that they did not know what they were talking about; that insurance had gone down on cotton not because the bagging was thicker, but because iron ties are used in baling instead of rope, and that what the planter gained in tare on the thick bagging he lost through the protective duty; and Mr. Butler informed Mr. Schenck that "the question with reference to gunny-bags, gunny-cloth, and jute butts had nothing more to do with flax than he (Mr. Schenck) had to do with the East Indies." However, the duty was cut down to $6 per ton.

The jute butts trouble was renewed in the evening, when the gunny-cloth, gunny-bags, and cotton bagging came up. Mr. Schenck wanted protection to the extent of about 35 per cent., and made another bitter attack on the Eastern men for their niggardliness in according protection to the West, and particularly the "flax interest" of that region. Mr. Buck protested in behalf of the cotton interest of the South, and Mr. Butler again floored Messrs. Kelley and Schenck on the cause of the decline of insurance on cotton, alleging that he came from Lowell, where a good deal of cotton is used, and therefore he knew "how the thing operated," and battled against the duty on bagging as a tax on cotton. Mr. Schenck, however, stoutly resisted, and again assailed the New-Englanders for claiming from 70 to 80 per cent. protection for themselves, and not being willing to allow more than 25 per cent. to others. About this time Mr. Arnell rose to oppose any reduction, and said "he knew all about this matter of cotton baling," and he was going "to upset all the fine theories of the gentlemen from Alabama" (Messrs. Buck and Buckley). It required, he said, "two and a half yards of bagging to put up a bale of cotton;" but here several gentlemen informed him that it took six yards, and then Mr. Arnell confessed he "did not remember the precise number of yards," but he did know that the cotton grower got twice as much in tare as he paid for his bagging. Mr. Logan here cruelly asked him if he knew how much gunny-cloth we manufacture in this country, and Mr. Arnell admitted that he did not, and the hammer providentially falling, he sat down.

General Butler now laid down the doctrine "that where manufactures flourish agriculture goes down;" which caused Mr. Schenck to declare "that he was now prepared for almost anything in the way of political economy from that gentleman," and exposed the New England members for holding five contradictory opinions with regard to gunny-bagging, and again attacked them for their selfishness about protection. Mr. Winans and some other members here made some very magnanimous remarks, to the effect that the proper thing to do was to protect all interests equally, and then there would be no heart-burning: every man was to give every other as much as he got from him, and then all would be happy and prosperous, though how anybody could be "protected" in this way was not explained. The duty on bagging, however, was not reduced. A curious little surprise marked the close of the debate. The bill proposed to tax matting made from linden-wood bark 15 per cent., and Mr. Schenck said they were very cheap goods, not made in this country, and therefore no protection was needed. But up jumped Mr. Banks, and demanded 35 per cent. on these articles for the benefit of a gentleman named Wakeman, in his district, who made mats out of the pith of the rattans used in making chairs. Mr. Schenck was momentarily overcome by this discovery, but, rallying, pointed out that this paragraph would not apply to Mr. Wakeman's pith matting; but the next, which taxed all "vegetable matting" 30 per cent. ad valorem, he hoped would meet Mr. Banks's case. But it did not. The rattan pith for the Wakeman mats, it is true, costs nothing, but he has to use coir yarn and cocoa-nut fibre with it to make it manageable in spinning, and, these articles being prepared solely by savages, who have "the knack" of it, he demanded that they be put on the free list, and, the House agreeing as to cocoa-nut fibre, he sat down happy. But coir yarn coming up separately, he had another stout fight over it, and got it on the free list too. Thirty thousand yards of the rattan-pith matting are manufactured every year, and as the raw material is now to be had for next to nothing the manufacture bids fair to last for ever, unless some Western man should try to turn American pith to account in the same way, in which case we advise Mr. Wakeman to look out for his rattan pith and his cocoa-nut fibre and his coir yarn.

THE REFORMS IN FRANCE.

The approaching termination—for so, it would seem, we may call it—of the struggle between the French Emperor and the Liberals is chiefly valuable as an illustration of the great advances the French have made within the last eighteen years in the political art. They have shown an amount of steady persistence and a reliance on moral weapons which they have never in any of their struggles shown before, and there is no doubt that the success of their exertions now must exercise a very great influence on the future political progress of the Empire. Beyond this, however, the struggle has done very little for French society. It has settled no vital question. As regards political liberty, it does not even carry the country quite back to where Louis Philippe left it, in spite of the existence of universal suffrage. The victory is essentially a victory of the bourgeoisie once more, thus showing how completely the middle classes rule France, and how impossible it is for any government to hold its own which does not possess their support. Parliamentary institutions, as they are called—that is, legislation by deliberative bodies, with a responsible ministry and a free press—are middle-class contrivances. They have never got any hold in France on the minds either of the peasantry or workingmen. The peasantry since the Revolution have wanted, in the way of government, a power that would secure them in the possession of their freeholds, with a strong hand, and with as light taxes and as little conscription as possible. About its form they were not very particular, but naturally preferred something simple, and nothing is simpler than a dictator. The workingmen of the towns, on the other hand, while preferring "a democratic and social republic" to any other form of government, do so solely because they consider it the only form of government under which that total reorganization of society, which has been their dream for eighty years, can be carried out. They want a more equal division of property, if not the abolition of property, or, at all events, the reduction of society to a sort of partnership with unlimited liability, and equal share in the profits for all; and any government which promises this they are willing to support. But for freedom of speech, and the ordinary "constitutional guarantees," as long as the rule of competition is allowed to prevail in trade, and distinctions of class and comfort in society, they care little or nothing. They distrust almost any liberal with a black coat, and look with horror on that "free play of the individual faculties" which the Favres and Olliviers make the goal of their striving.

Now the coup d'état of 1851 was an attempt to throw aside the middle class, with its writers, talkers, and "thinkers," and to set up an empire with the aid of the peasantry and workingmen. The peasantry were kept in good humor, partly by security and partly by an alliance with the priests, and the workingmen by means of a lavish system of internal improvements, set on foot with loans, made annually, and almost without responsibility to anybody. Curiously enough, the very centralization which made the scheme possible, and for a while successful, ultimately proved its ruin. One of the results of the long-protracted concentration of the powers of government in Paris has been that the brains of France are concentrated there also, and the opinions of the educated class—that is, of the men of intellect merely—have a force such as they possess in no city in the world. Moreover, opinions find expression through social life as they find it nowhere else, and the Emperor discovered, after he had successfully accomplished the coup d'état, that his own residence was in the midst of enemies from whom there was no escape, whom he could not silence, or dazzle, or hoodwink. The Parisian literary men, lawyers, students, shopkeepers, accordingly went to work at him, and, after eighteen years of incessant fire, they have broken him down. The army and the peasantry could not save him; and, as his friends died off, and the new generation, taught in the nursery to hate him, began to fill the colleges, and courts, and newspaper offices, he perceived himself unable to continue the game, and has retired from the field. The possession of a wife and child of course made him trebly sensitive—how sensitive we may conjecture from the fact that Paul de Cassagnac, a brutal bravo, is a favorite at court, owing to his readiness to fight duels with the newspaper enemies of the Bonapartes. No civilized beings, not driven to bay, could make such a man welcome in the family circle, and there are not many communities in which somebody would not by this time have felt it his duty to dispose of him as a wild animal. He owes his life, worthless as it is, to the French reverence for "the code." In South Carolina and Mississippi, he would long ago have been taken off from behind a tree.

The recent reforms, known as the Senatus-Consultum, are in reality a restoration of the parliamentary régime, and therefore—until the peasantry take a different part in politics from what they do now—of middle-class government. Even the great towns show no fancy for the extreme radicals, owing to their late excesses: Fonvielle, fresh from the trial at Tours, has just been defeated by a large majority at Lyons; and the peasantry will, for a long time to come, always send to the legislature local magnates, lawyers, landed proprietors, and successful manufacturers. The Emperor is trying to cover his defeat by insisting on submitting the Senatus-Consultum to the people, by ordering a "plébiscite," on the question: "Do the people desire constitutional reforms in 1870 which assure liberty, placing it under the guarantee of the Empire and the dynasty?" Should the majority be in the affirmative, as it certainly will, it will take away from the transaction the appearance of a surrender on the part of the personal government, but its failure and overthrow will be none the less real.

The burden of dealing with questions of social reform, which are still, as they were in 1848, the serious question of French politics, and which troubled the Republic even more than they troubled the monarchy of Louis Philippe, is now thrown back once more on the shoulders of the bourgeoisie, and it is hard to see in what respect they are better fitted to deal with them than they ever were. They have, it is true, the basis of government greatly broadened, and a vast body of the population armed against socialistic revolution, who, in 1848, were indifferent, and they are sensible of the necessity of pushing on the work of education to a much greater degree than their predecessors were. On the other hand, the socialist organizations were never so strong, or their influence so widespread, or their confidence in their doctrines so deep, as now. Moreover, the dynastic question may any day, by the death of the Emperor, assume an aspect of tremendous gravity. The Emperor's reign has unquestionably killed the Bonapartist sentiment in France, by exhibiting to the country a large tribe of Bonapartes who are not fighting men, and, indeed, excel in no art except that of spending money belonging to other people. Its place has been taken amongst the young men of all classes by positive hatred and contempt; and the succession of the Prince Imperial, therefore, becomes exceedingly problematical, and the parliamentary majority which has to deal with it will also probably have to decide, not only who shall be the next monarch, but whether the government shall continue to be monarchical. Those who know the French character best insist that there is in this matter no room for choice; that whatever in Frenchmen's eyes represents the French nation must be dignified, well-dressed, pompous, and ceremonious; that a cheap and plain government must always excite their scorn and ridicule; and that if they have a republic they will always surround the executive officer with the trappings of royalty, and with temptations to make himself king.

PLAIN DEALING WITH THE RECORDER.

LIKE our daily contemporaries, we are dying to express our opinions on the McFarland case. We had our minds made up after the first day, and have only refrained from speaking out about it from a regard for the decencies of our position, which forbid comments on a case still in possession of the jury. The hardship of having to contain ourselves so long is, however, obvious, and constitutes the strongest objection to the course pursued by the defence. With so many journalists waiting eagerly to sum up, the production of so much evidence is worse than a blunder. Feeling it to be impossible to let the affair alone any longer, however, we have looked carefully at it with the view of discovering something in it which we might single out for comment, without touching on the merits of the case, and, after much deliberation, have come to the conclusion that the Recorder himself was the safest topic we could select. He is not engaged on either side, and has no interest in the issue. Moreover, we help to pay him for acting as Recorder on this and divers other occasions; and, though he is nominally responsible to "the people" for his official behavior, the people is so busy that it is quite willing to let anybody abuse him that likes to take the trouble. What we decided might be said to him, without prejudice either to the prosecution or defence, was something of this kind—and we give notice to our daily contemporaries that, as it is intended to carry us along until we get a chance at the whole case, including McFarland and all the witnesses, it must not be reproduced till the trial is over and we have again delivered ourselves:

"You are employed by the people of this State not simply to decide points of law as they arise in causes heard before you, or to charge the jury, or fix the punishment of criminals, but to preserve order in court. By preserving order in court is not meant the enforcing of good behavior on the part of the audience simply, but on the part of the bar, and especially of that portion of the bar which is engaged in the case on trial, on one side or other. The faithful discharge of this particular part of your duty is rendered all the more imperative by the fact that the bar, unfortunately, has been left without the means of enforcing any discipline of its own. It cannot expel, censure, or in any manner punish any of its members, however offensive or disreputable their conduct may be, which is the more to be regretted, as of course nobody but lawyers can understand or administer the ethics of the profession, or become thoroughly acquainted with the misdeeds of their colleagues. The judges, therefore, are saddled in this country with the task of seeing that the peculiar privileges which the law accords to advocates speaking in open court shall not be abused. If a blackguard assails me with billingsgate in the City Hall Park, I can knock him down, or, if I consider a proceeding of this sort imprudent, hand him over to a policeman. If he tries to blacken my reputation, I can prosecute him criminally, or sue him civilly, or do both, just as I please. But if he should happen to be a lawyer, and come into your court, and say of me, in the discharge of his official duties, what he had been saying of me outside, I lose all my remedies. If I knocked him down, you would commit me for contempt; if I appealed to a policeman, he would laugh at me, and turn me out of the court-room for making a noise; if I sued him, he would plead his privilege. Consequently, I have no protection but what I get from you. If I should happen to be a woman, I am doubly defenceless. If I am a man, I may, when the trial is over, disregarding the sacred character of my assailant, and the privileged nature of his communications, cowhide him to the best of my ability; but if I am a woman, I can only go home and cry, which, when one has been insulted by a ruffian, is but a poor satisfaction. It is thus very plain that your manner of discharging the duty of preserving order in court is a very important and delicate matter, not only to those who are mixed up in the cases tried before you, but to everybody in the community. We may any of us, any day, be mixed up in a criminal case. I may have a friend who commits a forgery, and my letters being found in his trunk may convert me into a witness as to some of the circumstances connected with his crime. Or I may be walking down Broadway, and suddenly and unawares see a nose pulled, by a person desirous of "establishing caste in America." I go to the police court, as my duty is, to testify, and finally come into your court—a perfectly respectable, innocent, and public-spirited man. You are bound to see that no greater injury is done either to my feelings or reputation than the necessities of the case require; that neither the counsel for the defence, nor the counsel for the prosecution, uses me, either to harrow up the feelings of the jury or as a corpus vile for the gratification of his own love of vituperation. In short, I have rights of which you are the guardian.

"Besides this, as a criminal judge of considerable experience, you are tolerably familiar with the members of our criminal bar. The leaders, in particular, of that select and venerable body you know well. Of their learning, fidelity, scrupulousness, and delicacy it is not our purpose here to speak. They have, however, a dark side to their nature, with which you are as familiar as anybody can be. You know how hard a struggle with it they have most of the time, and how often it gets the better of them; and probably nobody is as much surprised by decent behavior on their part as you are yourself. You know, too, that when engaged in a notorious case, they find decent behavior next to impossible; that the depraved love of notoriety by which they are all devoured gets completely the better of them; and that it is more than they can do to avoid turning your court into a political meeting, and occupying the day with harangues, addressed one-third to the jury, and two-thirds to their brother-blackguards in the crowd outside the railing. You ought, therefore, to help them to be decent. You cannot improve their rhetoric or their law; you cannot prevent their making fools of themselves; but you can see to it that they do not assail the character of persons who are not in the case; and, at all events, that they do not assail anybody's character grossly on the strength of proof still to come. You have no right to let a poor rowdy, clothed with the functions of an advocate, get up in court, and, opening his case, speak of me, a witness or outsider, as a thief or perjurer, on the strength of evidence he has still to offer, and which he may never offer at all. Your permitting such things—and you have permitted them—places everybody at the mercy of the most unscrupulous and foul-mouthed class in the community.

"There is, we admit, one excuse for the stolidity with which you have witnessed some of the scenes in your court-room during the last few days. One of the jurisconsults, whose fantastic freaks you have tolerated, is not simply an Old Bailey lawyer, with the weaknesses peculiar to that well-known forensic type, but also a prominent political leader. He is, moreover, a leader of the party which numbers in its ranks a large part of the 'intelligence and virtue' of the city, and which has nothing but scorn and reviling for the poor, ignorant Irish, who follow the lead of Tweed and Sweeny and the like. You have probably recently seen an engraving in Harper's Weekly, representing them landed like slaves, branded on the wharf, and then whipped to the polls, and you must confess there was a good deal of truth in the picture. But then, we fear, you have occasionally, you sly fellow, stolen out on an election evening to the Cooper Institute, or other place of political gathering, and watched the proceedings of the Republicans there, when wrought up to the highest pitch of rejoicing or anxiety by the arrival of the returns, and you must acknowledge that a more intelligent or respectable-looking audience you never saw. It is a long while since your eye rested on anything like it in Tammany Hall. You must have noticed that, on all these occasions, the foremost man, the director of the exercises, the man who touched our heartstrings, was that old vituperator with whose tricks in the criminal courts you are so familiar, and for which, in the present instance, you are responsible. We fear, from the roguish look in your eye, that you were there, too, the night he led us in the Doxology, and you must have wondered, as some of us did, what the Lord thought of the performance, and why he did not let the roof down on us, and put an end to it. You are aware, too, that the same worthy is a very active and prominent member of the 'gangs' who now direct the operations in this city by which we Republicans 'save the fruits of the war' and defend 'the rights of man,' and you were, doubtless, aware that he was opposed to the passage of the late judicial Amendment to the Constitution, and, by way of marking his disapprobation, neglected to provide ballots for his Republican brethren, and thus deprived it of thousands of votes in this city. Knowing all this, and seeing what a high place he still holds in our councils, I am afraid you laughed in your sleeve when he was blackguarding Republican writers and ministers in your court the other day, and making decent Americans blush, by telling us what bloody deeds he would commit if his wife should so far forget herself as to play him false; but then you must remember you are, after all, a judge. La robe oblige. Have your joke, but not in court."

ENGLAND.

LONDON, April 1, 1870.

THERE generally comes a period of the Parliamentary session at which the zeal of our legislators begins to fail, and preparations are made for abandoning some of the work which they had undertaken in pure gaiety of heart. A crisis of this kind has come on rather prematurely. Men's hearts are failing within them at the thought of the labors which will be necessary to pass the Irish Land Bill, the Education Bill, the University Tests Bill, and the various other bills which have been promised. Meanwhile, the Peace Preservation Bill has suddenly occupied a large space of time, and, though it has been pushed through the House of Commons as rapidly as possible, has occupied six or seven precious days. Mr. Gladstone had, consequently, to make a speech last night, proposing to lengthen the daily sittings—an expedient generally reserved for a later period of the session. The great majorities at the disposal of Government give them unusual powers of pressure; and we may hope that, in spite of all difficulties, some really good work will be performed this year.

Meanwhile, however, certain troubles, of which I have more than once spoken, do not seem to diminish. The measure for enforcing peace in Ireland passed almost unanimously, and with nothing but the inevitable protest from a few of the more extreme members; and, painful as is the necessity, I do not think the bill could be seriously blamed. A strong government is simply essential in such circumstances, unless we are to give up government altogether. The state of feeling, however, which rendered the measure necessary is serious and significant. It implies that the Land Bill, however gratefully it might have been accepted some years ago, is not about to conciliate Irishmen speedily or thoroughly. The Roman Catholic bishops have pronounced against it; rather, I suspect, against their will, but unable to resist the pressure brought to bear upon them. It would seem, in fact, that, after the bill is passed, Ireland will, for the time at least, be as much disaffected as ever, and we shall again have to adjourn our hopes of improvement to the slow operation of time and firm government. We have, in a sense, made our last bid, and the existing agitation will be deprived of one of its pretexts; but as it will hardly be suppressed for many years to come, it will most likely appear in another shape. Probably the next demand may be, in one form or other, for the repeal of the Union, and a troublesome future is undoubtedly before us.

In another direction there is a difficulty, which may be surmounted or which may be the precursor of more serious troubles in future. The Government have not pacified the English radicals, and they are beginning to wax warm in the matter of the Education Bill. Mr. Mill made his first appearance since last year at a great meeting in St. James's Hall, and announced a very uncompromising hostility to certain provisions in the Government bill. The question most eagerly discussed is that which bears upon religious instruction; and the radicals, headed by Mr. Mill, demand substantially that no school aided in any way by the public funds shall give any religious teaching whatever. They do not, in general at least, object to the use of school-buildings by members of the different sects, but they declare very emphatically that neither directly nor indirectly shall taxes be imposed for the benefit of any form of dogmatic teaching. Government has held out hopes of accommodation, which will probably surmount the immediate trouble; but the dispute is one of which we shall not for some time hear the last. The difficulty is, in one sense, common to England and to most other countries where there is any system of national education; but there are circumstances which here give it a special significance. The existence of a national establishment, which scarcely represents even a majority of the nation, causes an additional feeling of jealousy; and the battle over denominational education may be, and I believe that it is, the first symptom of a direct attack upon the establishment. It is often said, and with great apparent truth, that it can matter little what doctrines are taught to children, who will most certainly never appreciate the difference between the dogmas of the Church of England and other Protestant sects. Teach them any creed you please, and the results will practically be much the same. But, if this is true, it fails to meet the real point of the difficulty. The struggle is, not as to the dogmas to be inculcated upon the children, but as to the body which is to derive all the influence naturally accruing from the management of education. The national clergy say in substance, Let us manage the schools, and we will make any provision you please to secure the consciences of the children; they shall be allowed to absent themselves from the religious part of the instruction, or even to receive it in our schools from the teachers of their own sects. The dissenters feel that, as long as the Church has substantially the management of the schools, it will also possess a strong additional claim upon the nation at large; and the sense that this is so, though not often avowed, gives additional bitterness to the dispute. I will not now go into the way in which the special provisions of the bill would affect this question; the case is rather complicated, and I shall have to refer to it in future. At present, I will only say that, whereas the Church of England has hitherto had almost a monopoly of the schools in rural districts and a preponderant influence elsewhere, it is likely enough to be deprived of this in great measure, and the position of the Church will, in consequence, be very seriously affected.

Meanwhile, there is manifestly a growing jealousy of the Church from without, and many forces are working towards its disruption from within. One curious symptom is a bill which has lately been introduced, called the Burials Bill. A clergyman is compelled to bury dead dissenters, except in certain special cases—as, for example, if they have not been baptized; but he reads the Church service over them, to which in some cases the relations may object. In the towns the difficulty seldom occurs, owing to the provision of cemeteries and the shutting up of the old churchyards. But in the country, and especially in Wales, where the dissenters are in a vast majority, there is occasional trouble. The dissenters now declare that they have a right to the churchyards, and claim to be buried there with such ceremonies as they may choose to adopt. So long as they do not give wanton offence to their neighbors, the claim seems to be reasonable enough. It goes, however, by obvious implication to much greater lengths. If a dissenter has a right to a churchyard, why not to a church? The theory of the English law is, that every English subject is a member of the national church. Formerly, he might be punished for not attending the services or conforming to its rites. The struggle, which lasted for centuries and is not everywhere perfectly settled, was to get rid of these penal laws, and a man may now do just as he pleases in almost every respect. But the struggle is gradually assuming a different shape; the dissenter, being relieved from the negative disqualifications, is beginning to assert a right to the positive advantages. He says, and all liberals agree with him, in theory, that the national church is part of the national property, and should be used for the good of the nation at large. He applies this principle to the case of churchyards, and, in one shape or other, his request will be probably conceded; but he will naturally apply it before long to matters which touch us more nearly, and then we may look out for some very lively contests. The Burials Bill is a trifle; but it is one of those trifles which show in what way the wind is beginning to blow, and I have therefore thought it worth a few lines.

In one other direction, the radicals have lately been indulging in a grand field-day. The advocates of women's rights have been holding a large meeting to advocate female suffrage. Various ladies made speeches, which were not very brilliant contributions to the question, but curious as indications of sentiment. The chief orators were Mrs. Grote, the wife of the distinguished historian, Mrs. Fawcett, the wife of Professor Fawcett, member for Brighton, and one of the most conspicuous of our younger radicals, and Miss Taylor, the stepdaughter of Mr. Mill. Mrs. Fawcett was, perhaps, the best speaker, though I think the general opinion was that the ladies had not shown such powers of eloquence as to make us very deeply regret their present exclusion from political power. The arguments were such as are tolerably familiar in America, though put forward, if I may venture to express an opinion, with rather less extravagance than is sometimes noticeable in similar productions on the other side of the Atlantic. I will not say anything about the merits of the movement, merely confessing, to avoid any unfair inferences, that I am what may be called an imperfect sympathizer. I think, that is, that we are in need of great changes in the matter discussed; but I do not think that women would be much, if at all, the better for votes. The way, however, in which the discussion is here conducted deserves a little attention. In the first place, it is clear that the advocates of women's rights have made very considerable progress. They cannot be said to have public opinion with them; but it is not very decidedly against them. Many conservatives go a long way with the ladies, and the old tone of unsparing ridicule has pretty much fallen out of use. I believe that I am right in saying that even Mr. Disraeli is considered as more or less in favor of female suffrage; and it is remarkable, in reading the arguments upon the subject, to notice that, whilst the advocates of women's rights take up a very strong and definite position, and argue it with considerable ability, their opponents are generally content with expressing a kind of inarticulate dislike, but rather shrink from adopting any decided ground of hostility. I do not expect any legislation in the present session, but it seems at least possible that before long the zeal of the reformers may prevail over the rather uncertain opposition of conservatives, and that we may have ladies voting for members of Parliament. I do not, as I have said, regard the proposal with much favor, and there is a considerable majority, at the present moment, who would regard it with very great dislike; but I must admit that the current of opinion at the present moment seems to me to be rather towards the change than against it. The radical zeal will, as I calculate, be more than a match in the long run for the conservative indifference and dislike.

I mentioned, some time ago, a rumor that the surplus for the present year was to be six millions. That was a very large sum, but it seems that I was not so far wrong as might be supposed. The national income for the year was £75,434,252, and the national expenditure £66,208,334; from this surplus, a sum of £4,600,000 has to be deducted for the Abyssinian war, and, making certain other allowances, it seems that the actual surplus will be something over £3,000,000. Starting from these figures, it appears that the surplus for next year may be reckoned at more than five millions. We are naturally anxious to know what is to be done with the sum, and what taxes are to be reduced. Our doubts will be cleared up on Monday week, and meanwhile it is pleasant to note the symptoms of a gradually returning commercial prosperity.

Correspondence.

THE LEGAL-TENDER QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It seems that the Attorney-General, Mr. Hoar, whom you characterize, no doubt justly, as an able lawyer, has succeeded in his effort to have a reargument in some form of the legal-tender question before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Editor, how can any person versed in the history of the times of the Constitution of the United States, and of that instrument itself, have any doubt with reference to the power of Congress to make paper money a legal tender? Is it a granted power? Certainly not; for there is no expression in the Constitution that favors such an assumption. Is it an incident of any granted power? That is another question; but it was settled in advance by those who made the Constitution, if they were competent to settle anything against construction. In support of this, I refer you to what took place in the Convention in relation to giving Congress the power to issue paper money.

On the 6th of August, 1787, the committee of detail (as it was sometimes called, and sometimes the grand committee, and to which had been referred the several propositions or features of organic law) made a report of a plan of government, the seventh article of which contained a statement of the powers to be conferred upon the national legislature, one of which was "to borrow money and emit bills, on the credit of the United States" (vol. v. "Elliot's Debates," page 378.) On the 16th of that month, when the plan was before the Convention for consideration, the following took place (page 434):

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out 'and emit bills on the credit of the United States.' If the United States had credit, such bills would be unnecessary; if they had not, unjust and useless.

"Mr. Butler seconds the motion.

"Mr. Madison.—Will it not be sufficient to prohibit the making them a tender? This will remove the temptation to emit them with unjust views; and promissory notes, in that shape, may in some emergencies be best.

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris.—Striking out the words will leave room still for the notes of a responsible minister, which will do all the good without the mischief. The moneyed interest will oppose the plan of government, if paper emissions be not prohibited.

"Mr. Gorham was for striking out without inserting any prohibition. If the words stand they may suggest and lead to the measure.

"Mr. Mason had doubts upon the subject. Congress, he thought, would not have the power unless it were expressed. Though he had a mortal hatred of paper money, yet, as he could not foresee all emergencies, he was unwilling to tie the hands of the legislature. He observed that the late war could not have been carried on, had such a prohibition existed.

"Mr. Gorham.—The power, as far as it will be necessary or safe, is involved in that of borrowing.

"Mr. Mercer was a friend of paper money, though, in the present state and temper of America, he should neither propose nor approve of such a measure. He was consequently opposed to a prohibition of it altogether. It will stamp suspicion on the government to deny it a discretion on this point. It was impolitic also to excite the opposition of all those who were friends to paper money. The people of property would be sure to be on the side of the plan, and it was impolitic to purchase their further attachment with the loss of the opposite class of citizens.

"Mr. Ellsworth thought this a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischiefs of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind, and had excited the disgust of all the sensible part of America. By withholding the power from the new government, more friends of influence would be gained to it than by almost anything else. Paper money can in no case be necessary. Give the government credit, and other resources will offer. The power may do harm, never good.

"Mr. Randolph, notwithstanding his antipathy to paper money, could not agree to strike out the words, as he could not foresee all the occasions that might arise.

"Mr. Wilson.—It will have a most salutary influence on the credit of the United States to remove the possibility of paper money. The expedient can never succeed whilst its mischiefs are remembered; and, as long as it can be resorted to, it will be a bar to other resources.

"Mr. Butler remarked that paper was a legal tender in no country in Europe. He was urgent for disarming the Government of such a power.

"Mr. Mason was still averse to tying the hands of the legislature altogether. If there was no example in Europe, as just remarked, it might be observed, on the other side, that there was none in which the government was restrained on this head.

"Mr. Read thought the words, if not struck out, would be as alarming as the mark of the beast in Revelation.

"Mr. Langdon had rather reject the whole plan than retain the three words 'and emit bills.'

"On the motion for striking out, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia*, ay, 9; New Jersey, Maryland, no, 2.

* "This vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, so far as they could be safe and proper; and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a legal tender, either for public or private debts."—Note by Mr. Madison.

"The clause for borrowing money was agreed to nem. con.

"Adjourned."

Now, it would seem as if the above extract from the debates in the Convention ought to be conclusive to any fair mind that the power to issue paper money, as currency even, much less to make it a legal tender for any purpose, is not among the incidents of any granted power. It therefore has no valid existence whatever.

How can it be possible, in view of the above evidence from the debates, that Mr. Hoar can hope for a reversal of the late judgment of the Supreme Court? To my mind the wonder is, that the Court could find any reason for deciding in effect, as they did, that any contract payable in lawful money could be discharged by the tender of Government promissory notes, though called lawful money. C.

April 11, 1870.

A WORD FOR DR. TEMPLE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Knowing as I do many of your readers who take deep interest in all Dr. Temple's actions, I hope you will allow me to take exception from this side of the water to what your London correspondent says in your number of March 3. With all that your correspondent says of Dr. Thirlwall and of the situation of the English Church, I more or less agree; what he says of Dr. Temple I feel sure is calculated to mislead. After absolutely declining during all the agitation, which continued unceasingly against him from the moment of his recommendation to the moment of his consecration at Westminster, to say one word which could imply that he disagreed with the writings included with his own in the volume of "Essays and Reviews," he was at length induced to make a private statement to a friend of one of his archdeacons, that he did not mean to publish any more editions of his essays. This archdeacon, bursting with the news, gets up, as you say, in Convocation, and there announces that he is "authorized to declare that the essay will be withdrawn from any future edition of 'Essays and Reviews.'" Authorized, I would remark, not by Dr. Temple, but by Dr. Temple's less discreet friend. Your correspondent possibly had not time to make it clear that it was on the next day Dr. Temple expressed his deep regret at such an announcement having been made, and added that he believed "Essays and Reviews" had done a very important work in the Church. I believe that he feels, and rightly feels, that the book per se is no more worth preserving than is the celebration of the 5th of November. And I do not the least believe that Dr. Temple at all confesses that he has been wrong in permitting his essay to be published hitherto. If he did, I should agree with your correspondent, and say that he is not free from the fault of bigotry or effeminacy. So much as regards the withdrawal; on the question of Dr. Temple's speech and the terms in which he spoke of the bishops, I would say but few words. The generosity of Dr. Temple's nature is so great that he is incapable of playing a game. Whilst Head-master of Rugby, he was systematically opposed, socially and officially, by a large body of the trustees of the school. And yet when the proposal for altering this body came before the Public School Commission, Dr. Temple went up personally to declare that it would be impossible to find a better set of trustees than the very men whose one aim has been, before and since, to thwart his labors.

If generosity is effeminacy, Dr. Temple is effeminate. But surely there are not many men in the world who, with their opinions orthodox, would have stood out such a clamor as Dr. Temple did in order to test the full strength of the law in his favor. The fact remains that Dr. Temple has forced the English clergy to accept an "Essayist" on the bench of bishops.

I do not doubt that he will be equally liberal and broad-minded in his conduct as bishop. And his conduct is all the more manly because personally he is so orthodox, and that broadening of church tests which he insists upon so forcibly will afford him individually no relief. I must apologize for thus attacking your correspondent, whose opinions on our politics I regard with the greatest respect. But his account of the events in Convocation makes much of Dr. Temple's speech, and has hitherto omitted the explanation forced upon him by the previous action of an injudicious subordinate.

And, as I said before, I know many of your readers to whom Dr. Temple is more than a name, and to whom, I may add, Dr. Temple himself would be very sorry to seem to have deserted the liberal cause.

Henry Lee Warner.

Rugby, March 20, 1870

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son have in preparation and will shortly issue the following reprints of English works: "The History of English Poetry, from the Eleventh to the Seventeenth Century," by Thomas Wharton, D.D., in one volume octavo; "A New School History of England," by the author of "Annals of England;" "The Diary and Correspondence of John Evelyn;" "Geology and Revelation, or the Ancient History of the Earth," by Gerald Molloy, D.D.; and Charles Kingsley's "Madam How and Lady Why." They have also ready for publication a volume of essays by Mr. Parke Godwin, to which he has given the title, "Out of the Past."——Mr. P. O'Shea, of this city, will publish in June Lacordaire's Conferences, delivered in Notre Dame, making one octavo volume, handsomely bound, and containing a steel portrait of the distinguished author. ——Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. publish next month a work called "Lifting the Veil," which is another attempt to anticipate the hereafter, not without reference to the duties of this life. Hours at Home, it is announced, will shortly make public for the first time a long series of letters of Charlotte Brontë, which will undoubtedly be read with interest.

—Almost all of the magazines have lately been taking steps to add to their attractions, and we believe none has not succeeded. The Galaxy has just laid hold of Mark Twain, who will make a department which will be very widely read and doubtless much liked; Harper's has recently begun to give a very fairly good digest of scientific news from all parts of the world; Hours at Home wisely prints Mr. Welford's bibliographical literary letter from London, and besides shows improvement in its "Leisure Moments;" the Catholic World grows perceptibly lighter and more literary, and what with Aubrey de Vere's poetry and the new classical novel it may safely promise itself a good degree of attention; Putnam's has a new editor whose "Editorial Notes" will no doubt be much copied and liked by many people; and now comes the Atlantic proposing a desirable change. How good were the Atlantic's book-notices in the first days of the magazine many readers will remember very well. Almost for the first time in the history of our magazine literature our books and authors then had passed on them enlightened, careful, and impartial judgments, serviceable to the writing fraternity as well as to the reading world. Then after a year or two there was a time of rather feeble reviewing, and people no longer turned to the Atlantic's book-notices with expectation of benefit and pleasure. Following this period came the present period, during which, in the hands of Mr. Howells, the critical department has had very nearly its ancient value, and perhaps even more than its former capacity of giving pleasure. It is the intention of the publishers that this department shall be considerably enlarged—an intention which we feel sure will be heartily welcomed by a very great number of the readers of the magazine; indeed, we should not blench greatly at saying that there is not one reader of it but could put his finger on twenty or thirty pages of each number for which he would not most cheerfully see substituted reviews like that of Mr. Jarves's last book or Tennyson's last volume of poetry. Every man knows his own business best; at any rate that is the received opinion; but we take the liberty of saying that the projected change might be greater than it probably will be, and still be in all ways of advantage to the magazine. Whether or not people are wrong in holding that Boston notions de omnibus rebus, etc., are no longer the best, the belief is still prevalent that the Bostonian opinion of books and literary men is worth conning. All Americans—Illinoisans, Californians, dwellers in the isles of the sea—have great faith in Boston's critical ability; and perhaps even a larger faith than in her productive powers. So then, should the Atlantic discuss with all the ability and vigor at its command the important books of every author and of every publisher in the country, neither sparing any unjustly nor abusing any unjustly, we are persuaded that its publishers would find it and themselves in a position more enviable than even the position which it and they now hold. Certainly no other publishers of magazines could hope to compete with them, and the Atlantic would once more have a distinct field and be a periodical which would not be disregarded.

—A complaint which readers may justly bring against publishers in general is that books so often, by neglect or intention, mislead one as to what, for want of a better term, may be called their history. For instance, to begin with the least of this species of offences, our holiday literature is almost always post-dated, so that a book now making with a view to its appearance in October or November will bear the imprint of 1871 instead of 1870. That is to say, the whole transaction, from manufacture to sale, will be credited to a year which had nothing whatever to do with it. As a rule, this falsification has no appreciable evil consequences, though these might without straining be imagined; and perhaps it is to be referred to the same motive which post-dates the magazines and the illustrated papers. Coming to books which are no longer new to the market, it is to be regretted that the word "edition" is used with so much laxity as it is. The custom of the trade, indeed, is to base the estimates of cost, selling price, and profits on a first issue of one thousand copies; but this is an arbitrary number, and the first edition of a well-announced work by a popular author may be several thousand, according to the orders received before it has gone to press or while it is on the press. As for subsequent editions, there is absolutely no standard, and an unscrupulous publisher may unduly promote the sale of a book by dignifying the issue of a mere hundred or two with the name of edition. This term is naturally hugged for works of feeble and limited circulation, while those which sell freely prefer the reckoning by thousands. Deception also lurks, or is apt to lurk, in the phrase "new and revised edition," sometimes even when the word "thoroughly" is inserted to strengthen it. An annual publication we have in mind solemnly professes each year to have been corrected in this manner, and brought up to the latest information in all its parts. Yet we have known it to be three years in taking notice of one of the most important events in modern history. Not unfrequently one sees this claim of newness and revision prefixed to books which have undergone actually no change whatever, being reprinted from plates with all the original errors and imperfections.

—There is still another practice which is especially irritating to librarians, and that is the revival of old and forgotten books under a new title, without any warning to the public. This frequently occurs when some kindred work is meeting with remarkable success, and it is hoped that the interest thus awakened in the subject will float any book ostensibly connected with it. Thus we lately saw Miss Phelps's "Gates Ajar" followed by a work which imitated her trade-mark in order to draw to itself the attention which had formerly been refused it on its own merits under another title, and in default of which it had miserably and not undeservedly failed. It is seldom—and that is the nuisance of it—that anything but trash resorts to this fraud, or that the unwary public is prompt to detect it. Librarians do their best to exclude these new titles from their shelves, but they cannot escape the annoyance of constant enquiries for them, and of repeated explanations; and the wrath they bring down upon themselves from the publishers whose sales they thus injure, it is easy to conceive of. It would be curious to ascertain how much our American habit of stereotyping almost everything has to do with this vamping of dead literature; and perhaps a still more curious question lies back of that, viz., Why do we stereotype so extensively and well-nigh indiscriminately? It is often said that it is a great mistake to do so, and that our publishers load themselves with tons of useless metal, valuable only as metal—that the Harpers, for example, estimate their immense stock at an average of not more than ten cents per pound. Nevertheless, we may be tolerably certain that the practice would not be continued unless it paid for itself, or answered some condition of the national culture. Our own observation favors the latter view. Our country is so vast, our population so scattered, that more time is required to discover the natural audience of an author than in a densely-settled and compact country like England, while the cost of labor and of materials is greater. The invention of a faultless type-setting machine has not yet equalized our capacity for cheap book-making with that of the Old World, as it may at any day. Meantime, statistics showing the number of works which survive a first edition in this country would shed light on the profitableness of making plates. Recent calculations in England tend to show that nearly one-third of the books published there go through two or more editions, and that "such works consist chiefly of popular histories, travels, the better kind of novels, and standard poetry, as well as ably written scientific, professional, and religious books."

— Why the Overland Monthly for April is not the most readable of all the April magazines, we do not know. It is perhaps less thoughtful than almost any of its Eastern contemporaries; but the thought of our Eastern magazine writers is not usually of such importance to thinking readers that it may not willingly be dispensed with, and that in place of it there may not be accepted cheerfully the freshness of topic and treatment which the Overland always offers. Then, too, over and above its freshness, the Overland always contains a certain quantity of the writing of its editor, a worker in literature who has great talent, and who is noticeably independent and honest, whether or not he is infallible in criticism and never self-indulgent when he talks about books and authors, and whether or not he is, as we see him in his stories, perfectly wise in his way of looking at life. No one who has gone through the volumes which have been written about the recent indictment of Lord Byron will say that this, for example, however imperfect in expression, is not uncommonly good criticism: "The case being closed, there is a feature of the pleadings which deserves comment, as evincing somewhat painfully the animus of the prosecution. Throughout the book, Mrs. Leigh is spoken of as Lord Byron's sister, and the fact that she was a half-sister, and a stranger to him until within a year or two of the alleged intimacy, is not stated. While this fact would not alter the legal significance of the crime, it might have something to do with its moral bearing. Yet, although it could have been cited by Mrs. Stowe as collateral evidence in favor of the crime—making it less unnatural and improbable—it seems to have been suppressed for that very reason, and we have, instead, Mrs. Stowe's theory that the act was the result of the deliberate intention of Lord Byron to crown the apex of his vices with a crime gratuitously monstrous." That Byron deliberately planned the erection of a fabric of utterly monstrous wickedness, and therefore set about committing the crime now charged upon him, Mrs. Stowe does not anywhere say, so far as we remember; but, no doubt, it is a part of the case as it stands, and it is very well to point it out, that there is in the pleadings suppression of the fact that Mrs. Leigh was not Byron's sister but only his half-sister, and, moreover, we may add, was his half-sister by a mother of such a character that it is within the possibilities that Byron may have been well convinced that she was not even so much as his father's daughter. Other criticisms in this month's Overland are, of Lowell's "Cathedral;" of Mr. G. A. Townsend's book of poems; of Mr. J. H. Noyes's "History of Oneida Socialisms;" of Mr. Bryant's "Letters from the East;" of Lord Lytton's translation of the "Odes and Epodes of Horace;" and of a "Comic History of the United States," by Mr. John D. Sherwood. Perhaps there is none of these notices that does not give the reader more of the reviewer than of the book reviewed; but still most of them are worth reading, not only by him who would understand the writer of the notices, but also by most of those who are interested in the authors under examination. For long articles, the magazine has several that are good and one that is remarkable. "The Battle of the Mine" gives a very graphic description of the explosion of the famous mine in front of Petersburg in July, 1864, and of the attack in which the colored troops under General W. F. Bartlett fought so well and had such bad luck. It is singularly vivid and is exciting. Good too is the article about "Russian Gold and Silver Mining," and that called "The Presidio of San Francisco," which relates some curious passages in the history of our Pacific coast. "Historical Fruits and Flowers" talks of the Napoleonic violet, the Plantagenet broom, the Irish shamrock, the French fleur de lis, Gabrielle d'Estrées' peach, and other such things, and is worth looking at as a very good paper of the sort that is written by lovers of literature who are stranded far away in new lands. "Compasses," by Mr. Bret Harte, seems to show that this author is undertaking to do too much work, for it only suggests his excellences while it brings into strong relief most of his faults. There is the strange far West flavor in the incidents, and the mixture of pathos and humor to which Mr. Harte has accustomed us; and there is also some of the accustomed clearness of delineation, both of the inner and outer man of the personages of the story; and there is some little wit. But the humor is forced; the tragedy seems not to inhere in the situation so much as to be wilfully put there by the author; the chief characters seem simply impossible in their speech and thoughts; and, altogether, "Compasses" looks like task-work done reluctantly and feebly, and perhaps not worth doing—at all events, it was not worth doing as it is here done. We like Mr. Harte so well that we feel freer to complain of him.

—Death has been busy, since the year opened, among the leaders of the various religious denominations, some of whom had a name also in literature. Such, and as such entitled to mention here, was the late Dr. Nathaniel L. Frothingham, of Boston, father of the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, of this city, and brother-in-law of the late Edward Everett and of Charles Francis Adams. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1811, and four years afterwards entered the ministry as pastor of the First Church in Boston. In 1850 the state of his health compelled him to abandon the pulpit. He died on the 4th of this month, having nearly completed his seventy-seventh year. Dr. Frothingham was a frequent contributor to the press of his native city, but will be remembered for his poetical pieces—many of which are still sung in the churches—more than for his prose. Of late years he had devoted himself to rendering German hymnology into English, preserving the original metres, and as nearly as possible matching line for line. The specimens that appeared in the Monthly Religious Magazine showed a remarkable command of language, and combine, in an unusual degree, literal fidelity, strength of diction, and poetic feeling. The freedom from stiffness which characterize these versions was a mark of the high scholarship of their author. Dr. Frothingham was universally beloved in his private and pastoral relations.

—Although it is not yet quite an accomplished fact, a great change has virtually just been made in the relations of Harvard College to its pupils. At present the graduating rank of a Harvard man is a compound representative in part of his scholarship and ability and in part of the degree of regularity with which he has attended recitations and morning prayers, and the steadfastness with which he has resisted temptations to smoke in the vicinity of the college buildings, to whisper in the class-rooms, to "group" in the college yard, and, briefly, to indulge in a thousand or more other offences, small and great. In short, a Harvard man's graduating rank has hitherto depended so much on his "good behavior"—naturally good and arbitrarily good—that it may be said to have been not at all valuable as an index of his mental power and the quantity and quality of his acquirement. From this method of assigning rank came several bad effects, and among others this, which has not been much noticed, and which we therefore mention as being worth the consideration of college authorities everywhere in this country: to hold college rank in contempt was the fashion among many of the cleverest of the students—to say nothing of young gentlemen not so clever, but with at least an equally noble innate hatred of that well-known disposition of faculties to tyrannize, and, what was more to the purpose, quite an equal capacity for making trouble. Any dull fellow—these used to believe and maintain—any stupid, goody sort of man, with a talent for jog-trot regularity, could "stand high;" even the first four or five scholars, who of necessity had to be men of ability, would, nevertheless, had they cut recitations like So-and-so and So-and-so, be like them, far down in "the last half;" there was Smith, a laughing-stock for his stupidity and toadyism, who was in "the first twenty" instead of the last, by dint of mere indefatigableness in going to prayers and recitations; there was the other Smith, whose good morals, as manifested by careful attendance at chapel and at recitations, "got his degree" for the most immoral of young men. Such used to be the talk, much of it being more or less foolish, but much of it containing some truth, no doubt. It cannot be denied, we imagine, that, under the "morality and ability" system of conferring college honors, some of the best ability in the college was not honored, and even felt itself encouraged in idleness or perverse industry; that some of the morality which was honored was of a rather questionable kind; and that the college, on its part, when its favorites were looked at, lost more in reputation as a seat of learning than it could hope to gain in reputation as an ethical instructor. It may be doubted if more than a very few persons inside or outside of the college have latterly been attaching much weight to the fact that this or that man was high up in his class when he was graduated; and certainly we should say that the after-history of the young men who have been graduated during the last half-century has not on the whole shamed the world in general out of a certain disregard for the college's imprimatur, or rather for its absolute guarantee. Under the system which is soon to go into operation, it will be as difficult as ever for a troublesome hindering student to stay in the college, injuring his fellow-students and interfering with the general work of study and instruction; perhaps it will be more difficult, at least for the present; but marks of demerit are not in future to be deducted from marks for excellence in the pursuits proper to residence at an institution which primarily and essentially is an institution of learning. It is not intended, if we understand the matter, that under the new system the college will relax in the least its hold on the student, to whom by reason of his age it still believes itself to stand partly in loco parentis. It will continue to count up against each man his failures to attend to the business which he is at college to do, and his offences against the general welfare; and it will still, by means of communication with parents, secure parental influence in behalf of its own government. But at the end of the course, in pronouncing on the ability and acquirements of the young men who for four years have been studying what the college exists to teach, it will endeavor to tell the world more accurately than before what mental stuff and mental furniture there is in the brain of each man whom it sends out. Perhaps, to be compendious, we may say that it will still be possible on seeing a Harvard man with a diploma to feel sure that he has not smoked and snowballed to any great excess within the limits of the college-yard, but that smoking and snowballing in the yard no longer have the place that they had in the college curriculum.

—Whoever undertakes to declare the religious views of the Germans in this country must evidently speak with precision and not in general terms. The majority may possibly be rationalists, but the minority is divided, apparently, into as many sects as is the English-speaking population. The Maryland Staatszeitung, in a recent article on German spiritualists in the United States, says that, although they lack congregations of their own, they are, nevertheless, more numerous than is commonly supposed. They are to be found in all the larger cities along with American believers in the same faith, and include some eminent men, like Dr. Blöde, editor of the New York Demokrat, whose wife also, lately deceased, and known as a poetess under the signature "Marie Westland," was a spiritualist. Mr. Herman Schlarbaum, of this city, was instrumental in getting the works of Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis translated into German. Their voluminousness naturally daunted the publishers who were asked to take the risk of this enterprise, and it would have fallen through but for the pecuniary support of a Russian court counsellor at St. Petersburg. Another spiritualist, Dr. Schücking, conducts a weekly paper, Columbia, at Washington, in which he, from time to time, prints discussions of the subject by German-American authors of repute. The names, also, of Dr. Dignowity, of Texas, Dr. Cyriax, of Cleveland, and, among recent converts, Dr. Tiedemann, of Philadelphia, Dr. von Püchelstein, of Egg Harbor, Dr. Gerau, of Brooklyn, A. Steinbach, of Evansville, and Friedrich Münch, of Missouri, are cited by the Staatszeitung, and indicate both the spread of spiritualism among the Germans, and the sort of persons that have accepted it. They consist, says the authority we have been quoting, in large proportion of thoughtful minds, who differ from the rationalists chiefly in the belief in a future existence. They reject miracles and the whole body of dogmatic theology. They possess a good deal of fascination for those who approach them, and are ardently attached to their philosophy as the religion of the future, resting on a scientific basis, demonstrating the indestructibility of the human spirit, and ridding the world of death.

—After the battle of Austerlitz, the most experienced publicist of Germany, Von Gentz, drew up a document to be submitted to the Austrian Government, in which he sought to provide for the safety of Austria after so terrible a catastrophe. At that time, his proposition seemed extraordinary. "From this moment," he declared, "the Austrian monarchy should cease to be considered a German power. The provinces remaining to the Emperor no longer have anything in common with Germany, and are now isolated. If the Emperor desires to continue his existence as a political power, there is but one course to take. Let him transfer his residence to Hungary, give it a constitution, create new connections with Bohemia, Galicia, and the remaining provinces—in a word, form a new monarchy." The programme thus presented by Gentz, in 1806, is precisely that which has since been forced upon the house of Hapsburg by the events of 1866. M. René Taillandier, in his "Tcheques et Magyars—Bohème et Hongrie—XVe Siècle–XIXe Siècle," presents the same theory originated by Gentz. The author is a professor at the "Faculté des Lettres" of Paris, and has for many years occupied himself with the literature and history of Bohemia and Hungary, as readers of the Revue des Deux Mondes may remember. In the work named, he disperses much of the mist that has obscured the history of Bohemia for four centuries past, and gives a clear idea of the rising literature of both Hungary and Bohemia. The bloody events of the period of Ziska, the rise of George Podiebrad to the throne of Bohemia, the struggle between him and Mathias Corvinus, King of Hungary, are recounted with the advantage of the latest historical discoveries. The resurrection of Bohemian national history through the erudition of Palacky, and the rise of a national literature in Hungary, illustrated by such names as Kölcsey, Vörösmarty, Garay, Petöfi, Arany, and others, are presented with great fulness of research and citation.

—There is scarcely a political or social faction of the French Revolution but is to-day represented in France by lineal descendants and well provided with writers and authors. Almost every phase of that period has been made the subject of thorough research. When the material at Paris began to show signs of exhaustion, recourse was had to the provinces and provincial cities, and always with valuable results. Local historical societies in every department have also worked the vein, and patient, painstaking scholars have brought to light forgotten and hidden documents whose publication has been found more fatal to the reputation of the patriots of '93 than the most eloquent royalist attacks. But these patriots are still by no means without friends and defenders. We have always thought that the proper title of Lamartine's work on the Girondins should have been, "The Apotheosis of Robespierre." Lamartine is not without imitators to this day. The latest is M. Jules Claretie, who devotes a volume of 403 pages to "Les Derniers Montagnards." This remnant of the Mountain was composed entirely of the accomplices or tools of Robespierre; all of them were stained with the blood of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, and two of them, Bouchotte and Albitte, were the apologists of the massacres of September. M. Claretie mainly defends these men by attacking their victors and successors, the Thermidorians. They will none the less remain what they always were, detestable and detested, though few tragic situations of the period which closed with their downfall will compare with theirs in picturesqueness or pathos.

—A fortnight since, Mr. John Bigelow read a paper on "Beaumarchais, the Merchant," before the New York Historical Society, and on Tuesday last was followed by Mr. Parton on "Beaumarchais, the Dramatist of the French Revolution." The former essay will appear in Hours at Home for June; the latter, we presume, will be given to the public in due time. Mr. Bigelow made known some hitherto inedited documents relating to Beaumarchais' negotiation with the American Confederation for the supply of arms, and showing what poor encouragement he received from the Congress, owing to the representations of its agents in London. The society was moved by these revelations to consider what measures it should take to secure for Beaumarchais the reputation and remembrance due to him in this country as one of its benefactors in the time of greatest need. We do not know whether it has concluded upon a series of papers upon Beaumarchais, delivered like the preceding, and finally collected and published, but that would very well answer the Society's purpose. The many-sided Frenchman would fill, if properly studied, an indefinite number of canvases; and to do justice to him in every rôle is perhaps not to be expected of American students. We are still far from possessing all the material for a thorough knowledge of his checkered career, and some doubt has lately been cast even upon the truthfulness of his Memoirs, in what relates to his experiences in Germany as secret envoy of the King of France. M. de Loménie, who has come nearest to an exhaustive study of Beaumarchais, wrote seven years ago, and much has come to light since then. Perhaps some of our woman's rights advocates, making use of Loménie's interesting disclosures, would furnish the Historical Society a paper on Julie Caron, the dramatist's sister, and her services as critic in the war of pamphlets with Goëzman.

—Beaumarchais was not only great in himself, but the cause of great works in others; we owe to him the "Clavigo" of Goethe, and, in another field of art, the two greatest comic operas ever written—the "Figaro" of Mozart and Rossini respectively—and the only ones which seem destined to be immortal. Mozart's life has been often written, and we are now promised one of Rossini, by Alessandro Biaggi, a highly esteemed musical critic at Florence. The proposed work will make 500 pages, and will contain, besides the Life, a dissertation on melodrama and on the history of the progress and relapse of music during the present century. It will be published by Barbèra.

LOWELL'S ESSAYS.*

CONTAINING the deliberate words of perhaps the best of living English critics—his final judgments on many of the great names of literature; judgments which are the result of long and wide study and reading, of marvellous acuteness of sight and delicacy of sympathy; containing a poet's opinion of other poets, a wit's opinion of other wits; in short, the careful opinions of a man of cultivated genius concerning other men of genius who are near and dear to all of us, but to all of us partly unintelligible without an interpreter—this book of Mr. Lowell's is one of the best gifts that for many years has come to the world of English literature; and to say this, still is to say one of the best gifts that has for many years come to the world of literature. Nor need we say to the world of literature merely, unless within that term we include instruction wise in human nature and profitable for the conduct of life; for concerning these things, also, much is said or let fall which is every way good. This, however, need not be said, when it is recollected that our author's themes are only the great in literature or in life; that he deals with Shakespeare, with Lessing and Goethe and Rousseau and Milton, with Æschylus and Sophocles, with Winthrop and the founders of the New England form of civilization and government—men and things of the sort which do not belong to literature pure and simple, as commonly understood, but take a hold stronger or less strong upon the life of men—of man as a creature of this and the other world. All the more it need not be said when it is recollected that the author of the essays is Mr. Lowell, a poet and critic never likely to forget more than momentarily that literature is not song-making and story-telling, but is an attempt at expressing truths of the universe, and an expression of the character of the man behind the pen—is not books made about this or that, but is "the thought of thinking souls;" is "a criticism on life."

There will not be two opinions among readers of the volume before us whether the finest piece of criticism in it is not the essay entitled "Shakespeare Once More;" and we doubt if the sincerest hater of the superlative would not be willing to admit that, on the whole, in virtue of its combined penetration and comprehensiveness, this is the best single essay that has yet been written on the poet and his works. For our own part, we felt an inclination to go further, and to acknowledge to ourself a preference of this to any equal quantity of Shakespearean criticism that is to be found anywhere else—an inclination which is perhaps better as an expression of pleasure newly felt than as a measure of either the absolute or the relative value, as criticism, of the writing newly read. It is an observed fact in literary history that the best poets who have studied Shakespeare and talked of him show themselves in an attitude of reverence—almost of unhesitating acceptance of everything that he says and does and is; and Mr. Lowell is anything but an exception to the rule. He will hardly be severe on Shakespearean commentators; apparently he is of opinion that there has been no man, born before or since 1616, who did not, by the mere act of birth, put himself into the ranks of commentators on Shakespeare—all life in all time seeming to him reflected in that all-comprehending brain, "whose creations are so real that, mixing with them, we feel as if we ourselves were but magic-lantern shadows;" so that, whether we will or no, if once we are human and accept the lot of humanity, if we live and love and suffer and enjoy and die, we are of necessity a sort of Malones and Stevenses and Theobalds.

We hardly have space to quote from this essay, which, indeed is, from its nature, to be read as a whole and not by parts; for it has for its main business to seek Shakespeare in his various plays, and does not look to find all of him in each; and, of course, its comments on particular plays are not only in no case equal to its merit as a study of Shakespeare's nature, but are, for various obvious reasons, not fitted for quotation restricted by limitations of space. This, however, treating of a single point, is quotable, and will serve to give a taste of the flavor of the whole:

"Another striking quality in Hamlet's nature is his perpetual inclination to irony. I think this has been generally passed over too lightly, as if it were something external and accidental, rather assumed as a mask than part of the real nature of the man. It seems to me to go deeper, to be something innate, and not merely factitious. It is nothing like the grave irony of Socrates, which was the weapon of a man thoroughly in earnest—the boomerang of argument, which one throws in the opposite direction of what he means to hit, and which seems to be flying away from the adversary, who will presently find himself knocked down by it. It is not like the irony of Timon, which is but the wilful refraction of a clear mind twisting awry whatever enters it; or of Iago, which is the slime that a nature essentially evil loves to trail over all beauty and goodness to taint them with distrust; it is the half-jest, half-earnest of an inactive temperament that has not quite made up its mind whether life is a reality or no, whether men were not made in jest, and which amuses itself equally with finding a deep meaning in trivial things and a trifling one in the profoundest mysteries of being, because the want of earnestness in its own essence infects everything else with its own indifference. If there be now and then an unmannerly rudeness and bitterness in it, as in the scenes with Polonius and Osrick, we must remember that Hamlet was just in the condition which spurs men to sallies of this kind—dissatisfied, at one neither with the world nor with himself, and accordingly casting about for something out of himself to vent his spleen upon. But even in these passages there is no hint of earnestness, of any purpose beyond the moment; they are mere cat's-paws of vexation, and not the deep-raking ground-swell of passion, as we see it in the sarcasm of Lear."

A little further on, in the same essay, Mr. Lowell says: "Whether I have fancied anything not Hamlet which the author never dreamed of putting there, I do not greatly concern myself to enquire;" and he goes on to give an ingenious reason for his want of concern. But it seems a reason ingenious rather than conclusive in favor of a practice to which it is not unfair to say that Mr. Lowell certainly is addicted. Beyond a doubt, "poets are always entitled to a royalty on whatever we find in their works"—we owe for suggestion as well as for what is given us out-and-out; but shall we, for that reason, make our benefactor responsible, not only for what material we get from him, but for what we build with it? It is enough that he lets us into his treasure-house, and makes us free to feast our eyes, and even to help ourselves; but the right of melting down his gold of Ophir for jewels of our own make hardly gives us a right to set the Solomonian signet on these specimens of our skill. More than one or two or ten instances we might cite where Mr. Lowell seems to put into his authors more than they meant should be found in them, or puts into their mouths something somewhat different from what they said.

* "Among my Books. By James Russell Lowell." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1870.

Of kin to this fault of overingeniousness is another, which still more interferes with the reader's enjoyment, and that is the disturbing sparkles of wit in which our author indulges himself, and with which, too, he gives his readers pleasure—a momentary pleasure, for which by-and-by they make him pay. Perhaps it is that such incessant wit, read by us ladies and gentlemen who all our lives have been talking prose, not without knowing it, we are apt to resent. Or perhaps it may be that we care more for what our author thinks and feels than for his play with his thoughts and feelings. However this may be, no doubt Mr. Lowell's point does, as a matter of fact, count to his disadvantage with many of his readers, whether these are of the envious and malicious type, or among the willing admirers of genius. Not many good readers would not say that this following passage—especially for the last, newer part of it—is not, as a part of a critical essay, worth any dozen of the brilliant jests that every now and then distract the attention of Mr. Lowell's readers:

"A criticism, shallow in human nature, however deep in Campbell's Rhetoric, has blamed him for making persons, under great excitement of sorrow, or whatever other emotion, parenthesize some trifling play upon words in the very height of their passion. Those who make such criticisms have either never felt a passion or seen one in action, or else they forget the exaltation of sensibility during such crises, so that the attention, whether of the senses or the mind, is arrested for the moment by what would be overlooked in ordinary moods. The more forceful the current, the more sharp the ripple from any alien substance interposed. A passion that looks forward, like revenge or lust or greed, goes right to its end, and is straightforward in its expression; but a tragic passion, which is in its nature unavailing, like disappointment, regret of the inevitable, or remorse, is reflective, and liable to be continually diverted by the suggestions of fancy. The one is a concentration of the will, which intensifies the character and the phrase that expresses it; in the other, the will is helpless, and, as in insanity, while the flow of the mind sets imperatively in one direction, it is liable to almost ludicrous interruptions and diversions upon the most trivial kind of involuntary association."

The opening paper of "Among my Books" is upon Dryden, and seems to us exhaustive. It is a model essay of the sort of which the men of Dryden's time have now for some time been the subjects—essays which do more to keep alive certain of our English poets than they themselves are still able to do. But this essay comes a great deal nearer to making it possible to dispense with the reading of its subject's own works than any similar essay with which we are acquainted. Usually the person criticised is so far from being under obligations to the critic who professes to paint him in his habit as he lived, that he is rather in the position of a corpse dragged out of his grave, to be pounded into pigments which shall set forth the redoubtableness of the gentleman who "resurrects" him. But we imagine that it is not saying too much to say that, fifty years from now, ten persons who know anything more and better of Dryden than will be learned out of books of "Familiar Quotations" and the "Reading Books" which contain "Alexander's Feast," will be indebted to Mr. Lowell's essay, where one is indebted for such acquaintance to any other source.

"New England Two Centuries Ago," "Rousseau and the Sentimentalists," "Lessing," we have left ourselves no space to speak of. Each is, in its own way, so good that it would be easy to speak of it at great length; but this, we hope, is in no way necessary to call the attention of all our readers to the best body of criticism, best expressed, that American literature has to show.

A PRINCE'S TOUR IN EGYPT.*

Mr. Russell's "Diary" is an extremely intelligent and entertaining account of his excursion in the East, at first in the party of the Duke of Sutherland, which accompanied that of the Prince and Princess of Wales as far as the first cataract of the Nile; afterwards as himself a member of the Royal party during their visit to Constantinople and Sebastopol. While the movements of these distinguished personages are avowedly the leading subject of interest, and are, however trivial, dwelt upon with reverential care, the lesser details of archæology, Egyptian politics, and the amusing incidents of Oriental travel come in for a fair share of attention, and are handled in a spirited fashion, which all readers will enjoy, but especially those who can for themselves recall, to justify the accuracy of the descriptions, the pleasure of floating along the Nile in a dahabeah, of threading the thronged bazaars of Cairo, or studying, bewildered, in the hieroglyphics crowded upon temple walls, the carved records of centuries past.

Without pretending to any deep lore in regard to the Egyptian antiquities, Mr. Russell speaks of them with sufficient respect to avoid the displeasure of the archæologists, while he is equally careful not to bore the ignorant by too many dates and figures. References to Amenulph and the goddess Phtah are rare, and statistics are carefully accredited to Sir Gardner Wilkinson and the inevitable Murray. Dendera, first in order of the temples on the Nile, rouses Mr. Russell from the tranquil current of narrative, well enough suited to the quiet river life, and his enthusiasm here is satisfactory in spite of his unamiable reference to Cleopatra in the comparison which naturally suggested itself:

"It was the prettiest picture possible to see the Princess wandering about the ruins, to watch her tracing out the features, with the aid of a cane, of ebony Cleopatra on the wall. What a contrast between our fair mistress and the serpent of Old Nile!"

At Karnak, again, he is appreciative and almost eloquent, and devotes a good deal of space to a description of the grand ruin and his impression of it, pleasantly interwoven with the story of how they all saw it, and what they did there. To the wonderful excursion on the other side of the river to the "Tombs of the Kings," and the desolation of that scene, he does less justice. In fact, he seems to have little perception of picturesque effects and the charm of natural scenery, although he occasionally makes mechanical mention of a fine sunrise or of soft moonlight. The long, low stretches of the Nile shore, here bright green, there fading into yellow desert sand, the level line broken only by the palm-trees against the sky, and slow camels standing out unnaturally large in the brilliant sunlight, are unmentioned, probably unnoticed. But then there was always the Princess in the other boat to look at, through lorgnettes and telescopes—an absorbing study, which divides most unequally with the pyramids and palms upon the shore the attention of Mr. Russell and his friends.

As the steamers cleft their way against the turbid stream there rose in sight the Pyramids of Aboosheer Sakkara and Dashoor; but they could be seen at any time, whilst it was not so certain when we could get a glimpse of the Prince on the Nile in the abandon of "shooting-jacket, knickerbockers, and felt hat." Great lowness of mind falls upon the party in the steamer whenever the accidents of wind and current separate it from the Prince's boat; all pleasures pall till it is again in sight. Mr. Russell is surprised that the natives do not share in this absorbing interest:

"As we saw afterwards, there was a large gathering of natives not two hundred yards away—market-day at Luxor. But indolence, ignorance, or indifference, what you will, its influence was so great, not one ever stirred to enquire into the cause of the firings and general tomasha."

The fellah of Egypt is an apathetic creature, no doubt, but it is possible to suppose that in the continuous stream of dahabeahs and steamers, bringing an inundation of travellers every year as regular as that of the Nile, the passage of the Prince's party, similar in costume and conduct to so many others, may not have presented itself to him as an exceptional event.

At Assouan Mr. Russell takes leave of the royal cortége for a time, and while they, in smaller boats and more contracted quarters, press on to the second cataract, he gives us a pleasant account of a brief trip to Jerusalem and back. Unshadowed by the princely presence, it would seem that his pen flows more freely; Jaffa and the orange groves appear distinctly, the flowery road to Ramleh and the weary ascent to the Holy City. But he has to hurry back to meet the Prince and suite; and here he fills out the narrative of their excursion, which between the cataracts might be briefly given in the word "crocodile—crocodile." True, there were carvings at Abou-Simbel, three colossi (the fourth is destroyed)—Rameses—but—crocodile, crocodile! They got one, that was well; the Prince shot it himself, and "the Princess came off to the sand-bank to examine the creature."

Everybody in the party seems to have been favorably impressed with Egypt, for which, indeed, the cordial attentions of the Khedive were a warrant. His reception of the princely party was itself most princely, exhibiting to its utmost the hospitality which is proverbially Oriental. In Cairo, palaces and pashas were placed at their disposition, balls prepared for their amusement; and upon the river every luxury and convenience for sight-seeing was theirs. At every town where they stopped, for curiosity or for coal, a crowd of governors and moudirs, donkeys and dromeda-

* "A Diary in the East, during the Tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By William Howard Russell." New York: Geo. Routledge & Sons. 1870.
"Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, etc., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Mrs. William Grey." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1870.

ries, were awaiting them. That is such a pleasant way to travel! This impression is given alike by Mr. Russell's book and by the journal of Mrs. Grey, who goes over the same ground in a book of much smaller dimensions and pretensions. She disarms criticism in the outset by the modesty of her "Dedication," in which she expresses her own surprise, evidently sincere, at finding herself in print. Her journal is thoroughly English, thoroughly feminine, thoroughly simple in style. She lays no claim to any knowledge of the monuments of Egypt, and writes in a delightful state of ignorance as to "what it is all about." One can but wonder at her total want of curiosity or wish to enquire further into a subject presented to her at every step; one can but feel that it must have grown to be intensely wearisome to visit temple after temple day by day without the slightest interest in their history, or information about their probable origin. The excellent lady, however, makes no such complaint; occasionally there is a sigh over the discomfort of her "native saddle," or over the clouds of dust (which it would be more poetic to call the "sands of the desert," though they are for all that none the less trying); but no perception of ignorance weighs upon her spirits, and whenever she and the Princess get a day to themselves on the dahabeah, they cheerfully settle down to drawing and needlework, without troubling themselves to consult the instructive Murray, which cannot fail to be close at hand, about what they have just seen, or the great Sir Gardner Wilkinson, of whose facts Mr. Russell is sure to avail himself.

In a foot-note Mrs. Grey says:

"I must say, once for all, that I do not profess to be accurate either in names or dates. I am not writing a history or description of the country. I simply put down what I was told, and as I understood it at the time."

So the proud temple of Dendera, built long ago in honor of a princess almost as celebrated as this one, is thus briefly described:

"This temple is very fine, and about 1,800 years old, much less ancient, therefore, than other temples in this country. Notwithstanding its grandeur, I cannot say it made the impression upon me which I expected, though, perhaps, I ought not to acknowledge this. The roof is formed of enormous slabs of stones, on which you see the patterns of stars, etc., engraved, the walls being also covered with hieroglyphics. Got back to the steamer at two o'clock very hot, but having enjoyed the morning very much."

It would be unfair not to say that our writer is more enthusiastic at Thebes, where, like Mr. Russell, she is genuinely impressed. Like him too, however, she is a good deal bored at the "Tombs of the Kings," where in the deep caves, more than the life-size figures of gods and men still preserved in all their original brilliancy of coloring and finely severe outline, she seems to have noticed the "swarms of bats" which fluttered round their heads. "The Prince," she says, "caught one of them."

The statue of Memnon and its companion, wonderful old creatures, who, with colossal hands upon colossal knees, have been solemnly looking out over the plain for centuries, unmindful, shall we say? of the yearly recurring inundation at their feet, are thus disposed of in half a dozen lines:

"From this we rode down to the plain to see the two colossal statues, which, seated here in the middle of the green field, have a most striking appearance. They are immense, fifty-three feet high; said to have been raised by Amenophis, 1600 B.C. They form certainly one of the most curious sights we have seen here."

And this is her comment upon another old and tried friend of Egyptian tourists:

"The Princess got on a donkey and rode round the Pyramid. I soon mounted one also, and we went to look at the Sphinx; a curious, but, certainly to my mind, not a pretty sight."

It will be seen from this that Mrs. Grey's book is not to be read as a guide to the Nile, but as a nice, pleasant account of what happened to her and the Princess, and, moreover, as giving an impression of herself as a cheery, enterprising woman, who accepts the goods the gods provide, does not grumble (much) at her native saddle, mounts a dromedary, for the novelty, and enjoys riding him, plods through heavy sands, and endures oppressive heat cheerfully. By the way, she is wonderful on thermometers. A Reaumur, a Centigrade, and a Fahrenheit must all three have been her constant companions; for she can give you the temperature by each of them at any moment.

After leaving Egypt, the party, now again joined by Mr. Russell, went to Constantinople; where the Sultan received them with a hospitality only less munificent than that of the Viceroy. Whether from familiarity with Eastern scenes, acquired by their stay in Egypt, or some other reason, the tone of both books shows some indifference to the scenes they saw there, compared with their first impressions. The bazaars of Constantinople appear to amuse them less than those of Cairo, the colors are less brilliant, the native crowds less entertaining.

Then follows an account of the visit made by the party to the Crimea; where the Prince and his suite carefully went over the ground of battle, and received Russian hospitalities cordially in spite of old animosities, not at such a time to be revived even upon the very scene of contest.

Both books close with the royal visit to Greece, and a description of the hospitalities incident to it, and the return home, made by the way of Brindisi and the pass of Mont Cenis.

FATHER HYACINTHE'S LECTURES.*

THE book before us is an edition of two series of conferences, the one relating to the family and the other to the church. The orator believes that the properly organized family is a cure for all the evils of political and religious society: a political cure, because it is a true domestic "commonwealth," from whose training in order, obedience, and self-respect the trusty citizen must at last emerge; a spiritual restoration, since in the Christian household the father is in a manner the secular arm of the church, "moulding by precept, and, when necessary, by punishment, the young barbarian, the little savage, bequeathed to him by original sin, into a civilized being and a Christian." In his treatment of the conjugal relation, Father Hyacinthe reasons after the manner of Paul, yet with all tenderness and devotion to woman. Love, he says, is a religious sentiment; it is a virtue far more than a passion; and hence the wife is to be considered an end in herself, not simply a means consecrated to parentage. She rules with delegated power, as prime minister of her husband the king, from whom she receives not merely her temporal law but also her spiritual guidance. "To hear him (St. Paul), one might suppose that the husband is a necessary mediator between woman and Christ, as Christ is himself the mediator between the church and God." But the preacher does not assign this inferior station to the wife without stating his reason. The highest kind of station is, doubtless, that heaven-born authority to which Kent referred, when he said to King Lear: "You have that in your countenance which I would fain call master." Father Hyacinthe, however, does not base the supremacy of the husband over the wife upon this sort of rank, since, whether individually her superior or not, he is still her ruler and domestic priest. Again, there is the station which we purchase, as when we bargain with a servant, expressly, indeed, for his labor, yet, by tacit consent, for the forms of his respect. But neither is it upon this ground that the husband claims his authority, since the wife is not his servant but co-laborer, giving him the opportunity to make money by relieving him from domestic cares, and thus assisting to earn their common livelihood. What then is the domestic sovereign's muniment of title? The preacher answers that, though "woman is indeed the complete equal of man in her soul, and all that pertains to her personal rights and dignity, she is not his equal in sex." The law of God and nature alike declare that man is the head of the woman, "and woman should think in that head and be inspired by that manly and kingly wisdom."

In the succeeding lectures on the family, Father Hyacinthe discusses the corruption of the conjugal relation, the dignity of Christian fatherhood, family education, which can alone resist modern neology, and the value of a home owned, transmitted, and occupied by many children.

The second series of conferences is chiefly remarkable for its development of the preacher's idea of the soul of the church, which is defined as "the invisible fellowship of all the righteous who have faith, at least an 'implicit faith,'† in the One God and in the Redeemer." Thus the majestic immemorial church whose conception was in the first councils of God extends beyond the bounds of the Roman communion, and even the wide ranks of heresy and schism—for outside the pale of Christianity itself she may number her sons and her daughters. Whether this imposing doctrine be true or false, we believe that in holding it Father Hyacinthe has fallen into Dr. Pusey's error of maintaining opinions whose logical inference contradicts his ecclesiastical position. It was not eighty-eight hundred presumable Christians that Torquemada sentenced to the flames, but heretics, ripe for perdition. The orator's idea is then a modern development, but the very foundations of the Catholic Church crumble under a developing superstructure. At present, Romanism offers us the whole body of truth, and the hope of securing it has closed many an earnest eye upon the historic and philosophical difficulties of the Catholic faith. But if it be true that even within this communion we may live and die in error with respect to important doctrines, we should not lose much by being Protestants at once, while as such we should find it much easier to repent of our history than as Catholics to defend it. It cannot even be claimed that only those dogmas which have been infallibly enunciated are required by the times, since the advanced minds of any age always demand what is afterwards needed by the masses.

* "The Family and the Church. Advent Conferences of Notre Dame, Paris. By the Rev. Father Hyacinthe." New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1870.

† According to the theologians of Salamanca, implicit faith is the disposition which would lead to belief if the mind were sufficiently enlightened.

Our space forbids the further specification of these discourses, in all of which the speaker has displayed an austere analysis of his subject, clothed, however, by the tender glow of his imaginative language. His imagination is indeed something worthy of the name. A powerful and vivid gift—independent of the mere flowers of fancy and the charm of mellifluous words—it rises to the keen perception of new and striking relations, and presents them glowing with the fire of passion, for they are the thought of his heart. Thus in his beautiful apostrophe to the hearthstone, he says:

"O sacred hearthstone, for a moment, perhaps, I had despised thee, I had counted thee a common thing; but no, the water of holy baptism, the benediction of holy wedlock, have rested upon thee; and each day a common faith, a common prayer, a household Christianity renew thy consecration! O hearthstone of my home, rise from the earth, stand thou as an altar stone before the Lord, and thou shalt be called Bethel, the House of God. On thee rest family and country; on thee the very church of God shall rest more firmly than on the foundations of her temples."

Lectures Introductory to the Study of the Law. (Philadelphia: T. & J. W. Johnson & Co. 1870.)—This little volume of 262 pages, together with the earlier "Essay on Professional Ethics," is a selection of the introductory lectures delivered by Judge Sharswood as professor in the law school of the University of Pennsylvania, a post held by that distinguished jurist from 1850 to 1868, when, having been elected to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, he deemed it advisable to resign. It is deserving of a much larger audience than the six hundred students who attended his courses, and, while it may be interesting to them to have exactly what he wrote and said ten or twenty years ago, it is to be regretted that the author could not take time from his judicial duties to bring his text down to the date of publication. At p. 16 we have a reference to Lord Brougham as still living, and at p. 146 another to Savigny as the latest authority on the civil law. These, however, are small blemishes, and of little importance as against the great good to be done by the careful and well-considered judgment of so sound a lawyer, so experienced a judge, so industrious a student, so diligent a commentator as the author. His work has been done mainly in and for his native State, but his reputation and his usefulness have extended far beyond such narrow limits, and it is likely that this volume will renew the desire often hitherto expressed that he would take a broader field for his next work than the elementary doctrines suitable for law students or the local juridical history of a single State. The lectures on the profession of the law or legal education, and on commercial integrity, are likely to be useful for laymen as well as lawyers, and while lawyers even outside of Pennsylvania may read with profit those on the feudal law and on codification, those on natural, civil, and common law will interest that large class of readers and students who seek, and almost in vain, in our growing law literature, some reliable enunciation of general principles, distinct from the jargon of case law and the perplexities of local legislation. The chapter on codification will instruct those who seek some means of repeating here the forms of Continental codes, in the views that are taken by a man of consummate ability and large experience in favor of the existing condition of the law in Pennsylvania, and of "the Common Law of England, which is the basis of the jurisprudence of this country and does possess a degree of certainty to which no general written code can lay claim" (p. 244). Judge Sharswood's views of the functions of the legal profession, of the relations of the bench and the bar, of the use of law schools, are those of a man belonging to a school of learning and morality that can never be too highly venerated or too diligently emulated, and it is more than ever wanted now and here. The fact that Judge Sharswood was elected by popular vote to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is no small evidence that the people at large, as well as the lawyers, fully appreciated his faith in and practice of his own sound principles, and the importance of putting him on the highest tribunal. The value of an elective judiciary is immensely enhanced when we find a good judge chosen against the popular political party, because his learning, his honesty, and his ability are recognized as qualities that are superior to all party ties. Under the old system of executive appointments, the long continuance of Republican rule in those States where the judiciary is elective would have kept the bench entirely in the hands of one party, and, while this may be a small objection in the New England States, where the minority is small almost to absurdity, it would go a great way in States like Pennsylvania, where the majority either way is small and varying, towards depreciating the vigor and independence of the bench, if it were not occasionally recruited from the strength of the party in opposition. That the engrossing duties of his high position have cost the university a professor may be the less a matter of regret since he has at least saved leisure enough to become an author.

The Origin and Development of Religious Belief.—Part I. Heathenism and Mosaism. By Sabine Baring-Gould, M.A. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.)—Every one knows of Mr. Baring-Gould as the author of two very interesting and well-written books on mediæval mythology, and of an admirable essay on the ancient belief in were-wolves. Although these books do not contain the marks of original philosophical and critical ability of any very high order, they nevertheless show painstaking research, they possess considerable literary merit, and they serve to make the general public acquainted with a subject at once interesting and important, which until recently has been treated only in the abstruse works of scholars like Grimm, Kuhn, and Bréal. In writing these books, Mr. Baring-Gould performed a real service to the public; and undoubtedly he might give us several more like them without exhausting his own fund of curious erudition or presuming too much upon the patience of his readers.

But in the work before us, Mr. Baring-Gould has chosen to try his hand at a different kind of subject, and one which it requires far higher ability to deal with satisfactorily. We suspect that, if questioned by a duly inquisitive "interviewer," Mr. Baring-Gould would confess that he regards the "Origin and Development of Religious Belief" as his magnum opus, as the work toward the accomplishment of which his other studies have been preliminary, as the block of which the "Curious Myths" and the "Were-wolves" have been but the chips shaved off during the process of planing and polishing. To us it seems, however, that this block itself is but a mass of chips, imperfectly glued together, with the marks of its heterogeneous origin and agglutinative growth only too plainly visible. The author has manifestly undertaken a work very far above his powers. Had he been willing to confine himself to a descriptive account of the outward manifestations of religious belief in myths, creeds, and ceremonies, he would very likely have produced a work of rare interest and value. But he has chosen a more ambitious and onerous task. He has attempted to trace, with the hand of a biologist, the origin of the religious instinct in the necessities of the human organism; and, without presupposing the truth of revelation, to demonstrate à priori that Christianity (as understood by the ritualist section of the Anglican Church) is alone competent to satisfy that instinct. But his book reveals none of the scientific and philosophic capacity requisite for the execution of such a task. The introduction of biological considerations is simply a great mistake. The book opens with a rather long and tolerably well-arranged description of the nervous system, which is superfluous, since a better one might be found in any first-class text-book of physiology—serving only to show that Mr. Baring-Gould knows what the most obvious and unmistakable facts of nervous structure are. When we look for the application, the inference, the corollary, to which all this anatomical lore is subsidiary, we find there is nothing of the kind. The author goes on to describe curious myths and observances and to gossip about sundry ethical questions, but the precise nature of the theoretical connection between myths, ethics, and medullary tissue nowhere appears. In default of any reasoning which might betray a philosophical master-thought or ground-idea—as the Germans say—governing the work, we get such bits of declamation as the following: "But as civilization advanced, men's ideas underwent modification. The religious idea, wrapped in the shell of naturalism, lay like a gland on the earth. The sun of prosperity shone on it; the dew of intelligence moistened it; the germ of life burst the hard casing which had imprisoned it, and became a vital religion, flowering in polytheism, fruiting into monotheism." There is, indeed, an age which most men and women pass through, at which such writing and thinking as this is legitimate if not laudable; but that age must be outlived before scientific explanations of the great facts of religion can be successfully undertaken.

Nevertheless, whatever its coherence or incoherence, Mr. Baring-Gould's book is remarkable for one thing. It is at bottom a defence of the popular theology of Christendom; yet it avoids ecclesiastical phraseology and takes on the airs and manners of a scientific treatise. The spiritualists of the old times appealed to the horned Satan and his crew of aërobatic witches, but now they appeal to the "od force" and "undiscovered natural laws." So Mr. Baring-Gould, the lineal successor of Leslie and Watson, substitutes the technical terms of physics and anatomy for those of evangelical theology. It should be chronicled, for the benefit of the future philosophic historian, that in 1870 a work on "The Evidences of Christianity" was published which opened its argument thus: "Force is that which produces or resists motion."

Maver's Collection of Genuine Scottish Melodies. Harmonized by C. H. Morine. Edited by George Alexander, Esq. (New York: John Wiley & Son.)—In this country there is a very large number of people, mostly fathers and mothers of grown-up children, with a fondness for music, but with little or no education in it. Classical music is Greek to them; operatic music, mere "vocal gymnastics;" and most of the so-called "brilliant" private piano-playing, ear-splitting performances. What they want is pure melody, with as little intrusion even of accompaniment as possible. But, simple as this taste is, it is often excellent as far as it goes, and is, in fact, the intuitive taste that decides which one out of every thousand songs published shall live to be loved. This class of persons will undoubtedly give a warm welcome to this collection of nearly five hundred Scottish melodies which is now before the public in so handsome a dress. Just such a one, with accompaniments for the piano (our common instrument), has been long desired. Many otherwise good collections of songs, English, Scotch, or other, are rendered quite useless to these very persons of whom we have been speaking from the fact of their containing only the bald tunes, difficult for fair amateurs even to accent with the expression on which their beauty depends, and impossible for the slightly experienced to harmonize. The airs are arranged, in the present collection, either for singing or playing, and with great simplicity. Although intended for "either piano or harmonium," the accompaniments strike us as having been wrought out by a lover of the latter instrument, and are less spirited and more monotonous in consequence—a wild Highland air harnessed to an ambling psalm tune. The poetical and historical portions of the work bear evidence of having been edited with conscientious thoroughness. The introduction is an essay on Scottish music. There is a glossary and several full indexes. The volume has the further recommendation of being of good proportions for the music-rack, and of exceptionally fine typography, large and clear.

Jerome Hopkins's Second Collection of Church Music, specially adapted to Sunday-school and Boy Choirs. (New York: Pott & Amery.)—One opens this book at the compiler's characteristic preface, in which the truth is expressed with rather more force than good taste, especially if we are to consider it a preparation for the sacred hymns that follow. Still, it is the truth, and it is piquant. Says Mr. Hopkins: "I have enjoyed the ministrations of some [clergymen] who were, in truth, excellent amateur musicians; of others whose estimation of church music was only in so far as it served to rest their own voices; of others, again, who persisted in regarding the organist and choir as irritating competitors with the clergyman in the race for popular admiration, and who systematically snubbed and mortified them by bobtailing their performance in consequence. Then, again, I have served under the same consecrated roof with clergymen who were so apathetic and indifferent that they would give out the same hymn three Lord's days in succession and never know it; others, again, who could not tell the difference between a psalm-tune and an isosceles triangle if they were to die for it." "The compositions in this book, with but few exceptions, have been tried like as silver is tried," he declares further; which being quite true, it only remains to say that Mr. Hopkins has selected with judgment from the old collections, and arranged the hymns in a fresh and pleasant manner.

The Professor's Wife; or, It Might Have Been. By Annie L. Macgregor, Author of "John Ward's Governess." (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870.)—Even the mildest reviewer must make a stand somewhere, and the very least we can ask of a writer is that he or she shall be capable of expressing what is to be said in tolerably correct language. This work of Miss Macgregor's is not only futile and pointless, considered as a story, as delineation of character, and as an exposition of its author's views of life in New London and elsewhere; but it is written in the most slipshod manner of a very careless school-girl, whose "composition teacher" has been unusually remiss in her duties. Apart altogether from the question whether or not one has something to say worth the saying, it is necessary to defer saying anything in public until one has studied at least the alphabet of expression:

"Did you never see this in life? A person old in years, so that when you think of their age you feel as though you should reverence and respect them, but utterly without the dignity and experience that should come with advancing years. Carrying with them all the foolishness they have had since a child, without the child's innocence and guilelessness to make it attractive. It is very wearing having to do with such natures, as Kate Ashton knew. Oh! if the Mrs. Nicklebys of this world had only all died when Dickens wrote his great book! But they did not, as many of us know to our sorrow. How often we see in life the best parents having the worst children, and it has been so often observed in ministers' families that it has become quite proverbial."

This sounds not unlike Mrs. Nickleby herself. But even such thought deserves a better vehicle; and as Miss Macgregor is now in her second or third novel, and also is often in the magazines, it is to be hoped she will mend her hand. We cannot all be admirable writers, if we do our best; but to some of us it is discreditable that, writing so badly, we write at all.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Allen (J. H.), Latin Primer for Boys and Girls	(Ginn Brothers & Co.)
American Chess-player's Hand-book	(Porter & Coates)
Chesterfield (Lord), Letters, Sentences, and Maxims	(Scribner, Welford & Co.) $1 25
Fisher (Prof. G. P.), The Council of Constance and the Council of the Vatican. swd.	(New Haven)
Godwin (P.), Out of the Past	(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 00
Harkness (Prof. A.), Cæsar's Commentaries	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Haydn, and Other Poems	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), The Banished Son	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Kendo (T. A.), Treatise on Silk and Tea Culture	(A. Roman & Co.) 1 25
McCabe (J. D., Jr.), Paris by Sunlight and Gaslight	(Nat. Pub. Co.)
Mulford (E.), The Nation: the Foundations of Civil Order and Political Life in the United States	(Hurd & Houghton)
Powell (T. W.), Analysis of American Law	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Randall (Anna T.), Reading and Elocution	(Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co.)
Read (D.), Nathan Read, Inventor	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Ruggles (H. I.), The Method of Shakespeare as an Artist	" 1 75
Smart (H.), A Race for a Wife: A Tale, swd.	(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Spencer (H.), Spontaneous Generation, and the Hypothesis of Physiological Units, swd.	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Textual Corrections of the Common English Version in the New Testament.	(John Wiley & Son)
Trollope (A.), The Macdermots of Ballycloran	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Youmans (Miss E. A.), The First Book of Botany	(D. Appleton & Co.)

TRAVELLERS TO EUROPE.

A Graduate of Yale College and Yale Theological Seminary, who has been several times in Europe, will go again in a few weeks with his family, with the intention of travelling leisurely for a year or more, and will take charge of two or three Young Ladies, whose parents wish to have them visit Europe.

Address "Yale," Gramercy Park House, New York City.

L. W. SCHMIDT,
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

Railroad Gazette.

A JOURNAL OF TRANSPORTATION.

RAILROAD QUESTIONS DISCUSSED BY PRACTICAL RAILROAD MEN.
ILLUSTRATED DESCRIPTION OF RAILROAD INVENTIONS.
RAILROAD ENGINEERING AND MECHANICS.
RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF RAILROADS.
RAILROAD REPORTS AND STATISTICS.
GENERAL RAILROAD NEWS.
RAILROAD ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.

Twenty-four large quarto pages, published every Saturday on and after April 2, 1870.

Every Railroad Man, and every man interested in Railroads, should have it. Terms, $3 a year, in advance. Address,

A. N. KELLOGG, Publisher,
101 WASHINGTON ST., CHICAGO.

J. W. BOUTON
Has Removed From 416 BROOME STREET
TO 706 BROADWAY,
A FEW DOORS ABOVE FOURTH ST.

A SUPERB COLLECTION OF Standard & Fine Illustrated Works,
In Fine Bindings, for Sale at Prices in accordance with the present Price of Gold.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1870.

The Week.

But one bill of public interest has passed either branch of Congress during the week, and that was the bill in aid of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which was carried in the Senate by a vote of four to one, in spite of a good deal of not unnatural opposition, considering how large a slice of the national domain is conceded to the road. Its way in the House, it is said, will not be so smooth; but nobody seriously doubts that the road will be built, or that it will get all the Government aid it is entitled to. The House has had two exciting incidents—one, the fining of non-attendant members, being rather amusing than exciting. On Wednesday week, Mr. J. H. Sypher, one of the claimants to the contested seat of representative for the First Congressional District of Louisiana, was admitted by a close vote, but, before he could take the oath, was rejected, and the election in that district was declared invalid for either candidate. The result, though reached in a highly disorderly manner, was creditable to the fairness of the House, that is to say, of the Republican members, who at first voted simply on the recommendation of the Committee on Elections, which as usual made a partisan report. St. Martin, the Democratic candidate, had received 16,059 votes to Sypher's 3,150, and it was not pretended that this disproportion was due solely or nearly to the frauds and terrorism practised by St. Martin's supporters. On the contrary, these irregularities constituted the only hope of Mr. Sypher in being returned from his district, and almost served his purpose as it was. It was a small majority of the House that actually ousted him, but it grew with every vote.

The discussion of the Tariff Bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, has been so prolonged in the House, and so many serious modifications have been made in the bill, mainly in the direction of lower duties, that it has ceased to be acceptable to anybody, and the general belief at this writing is that it will be dropped before many days, and the tariff either left as it is or a short bill introduced putting a few articles such as salt and coal on the free list, and lowering the duties on a few others about which there is no dispute. The only support the Committee bill ever had came from the extreme protectionists, and the lowering of the tax on pig-iron, as well as other indications of the free-trade leaning of the majority, and the bickerings which have sprung up among the different "interests" about the proper division of the public bounty, have so disgusted them with it that they have abandoned it to its fate. On the whole, the probabilities are that we shall have no change in the tariff this year.

The event of the week has, however, been the dropping of the legal-tender cases before the Supreme Court—a very curious and instructive incident. The constitutionality of the Legal-Tender Act as regarded contracts made prior to 1862 was passed upon in the case of Hepburn agt. Griswold, some weeks ago, and decided in the negative by four to three judges. According to the Chief-Justice, and those judges who agree with him, an understanding was then arrived at that the decision of the Court in this case should govern the legal-tender point in all other cases that might come up; but when the question was raised, on the application of the Attorney-General for a re-hearing, whether such an understanding existed or not, no record of it was to be found, and Judge Miller and the Chief-Justice differed so widely as to its existence, and showed so much temper over it, that the world came very near being treated to the extraordinary spectacle of an altercation on the bench. However, in the absence of record, the Chief-Justice's version was overruled, and a re-hearing ordered, with the aid of the two new judges, Bradley and Strong, who had in the meantime been appointed, and not without reference—we believe we are strictly accurate in saying this—to their opinions on this very question of the constitutionality of the law. This was scandal enough, but it was aggravated by the fact that the two new judges were interested in two great corporations which would have been large gainers by a reversal of the decision in the case of Hepburn agt. Griswold, and the public was informed, apparently in perfect simplicity, that the judges had assigned their stock in order to "qualify" them to sit in the new cases.

Everything was ready "to put the thing through," when, on Wednesday week, the appellants in the two new cases came into court, and withdrew their appeal, leaving the Attorney-General and Judges Bradley and Strong gazing in blank amazement into the void. Whether the appellants sheered off from the feeling that they were struggling against a foregone conclusion, or were bought off by persons interested in having the decision stand, does not appear; but it makes no difference. An attempt was then made to reopen Hepburn agt. Griswold, but none of the four judges who composed the majority which decided it consenting, the motion was, in accordance with the rule of the court, denied; and so the matter now rests, settled and yet not settled; for, of course, as long as it is known that the present majority of the Court believes in the constitutionality of the law, the question is sure to be raised again. In the meantime, we trust those railroads which agreed, before 1862, to pay their debts now due in gold, and have been holding off in the hope that the Court would enable them to shirk their engagements, will promptly fulfil them. Granting that the Court can legalize a swindle, it can hardly be proper to commit the swindle till the Court has spoken. Besides which, whatever the Court may do for the law of the matter, over the morality of it it has happily no power. Wrong cannot be made right by filling "vacancies."

A meeting of revenue reformers, in which the wicked Wells, General Hawley of Connecticut, Mr. White of the Chicago Tribune, Mr. Amasa Walker, Mr. Grosvenor of the St. Louis Democrat, Mr. Nordhoff of the Evening Post, and Mr. McCulloch, the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, bore a prominent part, was held in Washington, last week, for the purpose of talking over the financial situation. The conclusions they arrived at were, that something was producing extraordinary depression in business all over the country, and that that something was the present absurd tariff, combined with the irredeemable currency. For the tariff evil the remedy they agreed upon was the adoption, with some slight modifications, of the fourth rule of taxation laid down by Adam Smith, namely, that "taxes should be so contrived as both to take out and keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what they bring into the public treasury of the state." As regarded the currency, the general opinion was that there should be contraction, as a means of resuming specie payments; and, as regarded the whole condition of the revenue, that there should be a reform in the Civil Service; and, moreover, it was generally resolved that these things should be pushed at all hazards, in the Republican party if possible, but out of it if necessary. After the usual distribution of "British gold" by the butler from the Legation, the meeting separated, with the intention of having a more formal gathering somewhere in the West early in the fall.

On Wednesday week the Massachusetts House defeated, by 133 nays to 68 yeas, a proposed amendment of the State constitution extending the suffrage to women. The committee to whom the subject had been referred, and who had listened to the arguments of its principal advocates in Boston, had reported in favor of the amendment—for the first time, we believe, in the history of the movement in Massachusetts. The debate, so far as we can judge from meagre reports of it, was not remarkable for weight or originality on either side, and if the customary appeal to Scripture was taken on the one side, on the other it was asserted that Mrs. Howe's Battle Hymn of the Republic entitled her, at least, and women like her, to the right of suffrage. The country vote—back country, we might term it, if the phrase were known in Massachusetts—was particularly full in opposition, the four western counties furnishing but two adherents of the measure to twenty-seven opponents, i.e., one thirty-fourth of the vote pro and one-fifth of the vote contra. What happened on the following day is also noteworthy. Another resolve to amend the constitution, this time by striking out the clause making reading and writing a prerequisite to voting, came up, and was agreed to by yeas 143, nays 55, the Democrats, of course, voting for it in a body, led, as we remarked last week, by Mr. Woodbury. On comparing the votes on these two amendments, we find that five-sixths of those who desired woman suffrage also favored throwing off all restrictions upon the suffrage. We take leave to consider this a bad symptom both for the woman's cause and for the purity of politics in Massachusetts. Inefficient as the alphabetical qualification, as it has been called, may be, it is the best yet devised, and should have been abandoned only for a better.

Woman suffrage, it is clear, is making greater progress at the West than at the East. That interesting body, the Illinois Constitutional Convention, has laid down the limits of its own inclination towards the proposed reform, and at the same time has consented to leave the decision of the question to the people. It did, indeed, go so far as to adopt a clause allowing women who are property-holders to vote on the levying of any tax submitted to a popular vote; but, on reconsideration, this privilege was revoked by a vote of 36 to 26. Then, by 36 to 25, the Legislature was refused authority to permit the same thing. By 46 to 12, on the other hand, the right of voting under the constitution was not limited to males; and by 40 to 21, it was decided that the question of woman suffrage should be submitted to a separate vote of the usual constituency, and, according as a majority should be found for or against it, the word "male" should be stricken from or retained in the suffrage section of the constitution. Greater liberality than this could hardly be demanded at this stage of the experiment, though we presume it will not satisfy all the agitators. To have left the decision, however, to the women alone, would have been to surrender the point at issue, even with the chance of an adverse vote. If the fact that women want the ballot is a reason for giving it to them, it is as good for two or three as for a greater number; and a few who desire outweigh many who do not desire the franchise. And even if we suppose the majority to vote in favor of accepting the suffrage, their getting it might be, and probably would be, a concession to a minority—since, in every closely contested election, the majority consists of two minorities. Either, therefore, we must at once endow women with the suffrage, or confess that the control of the question belongs to the men, and to them only. It would, as the Chicago Tribune remarks, have gratified curiosity if provision had been made by the Convention for taking the vote of the women along with that of the men on the separate clause, of course without legalizing it. But, whatever might have been the result, would it have altered in any way the question as it now stands, as to the right of woman to go to the polls, and the corresponding right of man to keep her away?

Mr. Charles S. Spencer, the lawyer engaged in the McFarland case, who was permitted in his opening address to make the brutal and indecent attack on Mrs. Calhoun, in advance of all evidence touching her connection with the case, on which we commented a week ago, has written a defence of himself to the Independent, in which he acknowledges he used the epithets ascribed to him, which were exceedingly foul, and for which the testimony since produced has furnished not the slightest warrant; but says he did it in the honest discharge of his "duty" as an advocate, and did it, moreover, while "not entertaining the shadow of a doubt of the personal purity of character" of the lady to whom he applied them. The Independent, comically enough, professes to discover in this new and startling evidence of Mr. Spencer's badness, and declares him to have thereby "forfeited his right to an honorable name." If Mr. Spencer be not "honorable," however, he is cute; for in the letter he actually pleads his "soundness on the main question" in extenuation, reminding the editor "that, in the fight for the freedom of the slave, he had ever been by his side." This is perfectly true; but, considering the number of rascals who are now cruising under the anti-slavery flag, it is no longer permitted to us to ask—What of it?

The "Fenian scare" is proceeding in the usual way. There are, of course, two factions in the Brotherhood, as usual; Party No. 1 collects the money and prepares the "invasions" and provides "the military talent;" while Party No. 2 calls for delay and deliberation, and ridicules the military preparations, and accuses the other of stealing the money. Of course, also, there are "informers" among the members of both bodies, who forward plans and specifications touching all the bloody designs of Party No. 1 to Mr. Fish and the British Minister as regularly as the secret sessions of the innermost councils are held. What is said to be most entertaining about the affair is the look of "deliberation, public care, and princely counsel" worn by the members after they come out. The movement against Canada and the British Empire, by way of Winnipeg, is said to be now set down positively for the 1st of May, and General O'Neill is to command the expedition. Ambuscades on the American side of the frontier will doubtless play a very prominent part in his operations. Mr. Fish, however, announces that the United States is determined to have a hand in the fray, and although the Fenian "army" is thus far invisible to mortal eye, and undiscoverable by any process taught at West Point, measures have been taken to prevent its crossing the frontier—at least within rifle range of the earth. For what passes in the upper air the American Government cannot, of course, under the law of nations, be held responsible.

The "Executive Council F. B.," who represent Party No. 2, have issued a manifesto from the "Central Office" in Philadelphia, denouncing O'Neill and his operations bitterly, accusing him of "violating his official obligations," and of misapplying the funds, and with attempting a movement which the ablest military men had pronounced "unseasonable and improper," and of being "an expensive ornament," and with having "absorbed $8,000 of the funds during the past two years without in any way adding to the efficiency of the organization." They further say that all the troubles of the organization "have been created by men who were its salaried officers," and that the time of its unpaid representatives has been thus far "consumed in efforts to prevent these officials at headquarters from squandering the funds." They also refer bitterly to that earliest stage of the swindle known as the "Moffatt Mansion frauds," in which about $200,000 of the hard-earned money of the poorest class in the community was "absorbed" by a parcel of lazy adventurers, who, in horror of honest industry, took to playing at "government" and pretending to carry on "war" against England, and announce that the Chicago Congress has deposed O'Neill, abolished "the Headquarters Staff," and concentrated the management of the whole concern in "an executive council of nine," whose duty it will be at the proper time to make British blood run cold.

Of course, laughable as all this is, there is a very melancholy side to it. It is melancholy to think that so large a proportion of the American population as the Irish now are should be, in spite of the enlightening and sobering influences which surround them, in such a condition of gullibility as to make these Fenian "generals" and "senates" and "war departments" and "headquarters staff" possible; and that, in a land of universal industry, a band of worthless blatherskites should find it possible to live, year after year, on the earnings of the very poor, under the ridiculous pretence that they are going to dismember one of the strongest empires on the globe. What is most melancholy, however, is the rapidity with which the Fenian chiefs, who are necessarily men of influence amongst the Irish, have learnt the tricks of the lowest class of American politicians, and notably the old augur's trick of talking the most outrageous nonsense to each other, and pretending to each other with a grave face to believe the most ridiculous falsehoods. We ought to add, too, that they have had the help of a great many American politicians of the better class in cheating their poor countrymen. A considerable portion of the Republican party encouraged the raid of 1866, and denounced President Johnson for suppressing it, the New York Tribune all the while affecting to look on it as a serious and even praiseworthy enterprise, and helping the collection of the money by pretending to believe that a rising in Tipperary would prove successful, owing to the roughness of the ground and the facilities it afforded for "ambuscades," besides other nonsense of the same kind.

The Fenian operations seem also to be undergoing revival in England and Ireland. In Ireland they take the usual form of agrarian outrages, while in England the story goes that the Brothers threaten the offices of the Times and Pall Mall Gazette with some sort of attack, which has led the proprietors to apply to the police for extra protection. All this of course gives increased interest to Mr. Gladstone's Land Bill, which drags its slow length along, the opposition showing more strength as the debate continues. Mr. Disraeli has come out boldly against it, nominally on the ground that it has been modified in several important particulars since its first introduction; but really, owing to the Tory hostility to all interference with the "rights of property" as English landlords have always understood them, and as the Irish landlords have practised them. His main objection is that in awarding compensation for eviction, pure and simple, without reference to unexhausted improvements, Mr. Gladstone recognizes in occupation a share in the property, and, judging by the proportion borne by the compensation to the rental, that share is about a third of the value of the fee simple. As the bill stood at first, too, the landlord could escape its operation by forcing on the tenant a lease for thirty-one years; now the tenant need not accept it unless he pleases. The result has been that the overwhelming majority of the first stages dwindled down to 76; but this is sufficient. The answer of the Ministry to all this is simple enough: whatever the theoretic exceptions to the bill may be, nothing less will have any chance of curing Irish discontent, and Irish discontent has to be cured somehow.

The "Force Bill," in the meantime, has gone into operation. It enables the Lord Lieutenant to put districts in which agrarian crimes have been committed under its operation by proclamation; the police to search for arms, within these districts, on general warrants, and to close grogshops at sunset; the magistrates to examine witnesses as to crimes committed, whether anybody is charged with them or not; and to punish summarily the possession of arms. It enables, also, the Grand Jury, with the consent of the Judge, to levy compensation on districts in which murders have been committed, for the benefit of the families of the victims, and authorizes the government to suppress newspapers which a jury has pronounced incendiary, and provides for a change of venue or trial in another county in criminal cases. When it is remembered that in the state of things with which the bill deals men are shot in their own fields while taking a morning walk, and that in one case a man was carried out of his house, seated in a chair, and his nose cut off in the presence of his wife and children, and that, in short, a system of terrorism has been established over two-thirds of the island, under which the same class which hanged the negroes and burnt the orphan asylum in this city enjoys complete impunity, it has to be admitted that the question how to deal with it is a knotty one. It is true, coercion will not cure Irish woes, but until they are cured peaceable people have a right to protection for their lives and property, and the ordinary law at present gives them no more protection than "military government" gives Union men at the South. The feature in the Force Bill which has excited most animadversion is that which relates to the press, but it seems rather hard to shut up the poor peasant who has cut his landlord's nose off, while letting the raving newspaper-man, who has led him to believe that was the proper thing to do in order to get tenant right, to go free. In fact, whatever way one looks at the subject, it is very tough; and most people have little to say about it, except to thank Heaven that they have not to deal with it.

The Court of Enquiry which investigated the Oneida disaster at Yokohama consisted of the British Consul, a captain and lieutenant in the English Navy, and the master of a commercial steamer. They held that the Bombay was right in her steering, and therefore (by implication) that the Oneida was wrong; but that Captain Eyre had not waited long enough, or taken sufficient pains otherwise to ascertain the extent of the damage he had done, and have accordingly suspended his certificate for six months—a grossly inadequate punishment, if he merits any punishment at all. There are some cases in which carelessness or recklessness cannot be slight, and this is one of them. He has gone home to England, and is protesting against his punishment, the telegraph informs us, on the ground that the evidence against him was "contradictory and inconclusive;" and we learn in the same way that "much sympathy is felt for him" in England. Since the Southampton banquet to Governor Eyre of Jamaica, most people would hesitate about saying beforehand that anybody could behave so badly in a responsible position as not to find sympathizers in abundance in England. But it would be well if Captain Eyre's friends would tell the public whether, supposing his own story to be in every particular correct, they think five minutes enough for a man to wait to see if he had done any damage, after he had carried off a vessel's quarter in the night; and whether, if the example of Captain Eyre's punishment should cause all masters of vessels similarly situated to wait ten minutes, and make a strict enquiry, the suspension of his certificate for six months would not be a very cheap price to pay for so desirable a consummation?

The preparations for the plebiscitum are going on actively in France, the Emperor having issued a proclamation explaining his position to the people, which is, of course, familiar enough to everybody. There is only one novel argument in it in favor of an affirmative vote, namely, that the proposed reform will facilitate the transmission of the Empire to his son. The ministers have issued a circular to the préfets, requesting them to display a "devouring activity" in persuading the country people to vote one way or other. This led to a sharp attack on them in the Chamber from the Radicals, on the ground that, inasmuch as the meddling, intimidating préfets of the old régime are still almost all in office, they will be sure to commit abuses if called on to interfere at all. The usual privilege of holding public meetings for a week or two before election day for the discussion of the plébiscite has been granted, but the Moderates, like Prévost-Paradol, remembering the light thrown on public affairs by the debates of Rochefort's followers, in Paris, last fall, question whether the work had not better be left wholly to the press, and whether anybody will be the wiser of the great outburst of oratory which is sure to follow the removal of the existing restrictions.

A year ago the Greeks were trying to persuade the world that they ought to be put in possession of Turkey in Europe, in order to show their superiority to the Turks in the art of government, and were expending all the money they could lay hold of in helping the Cretans, instead of making roads through their own territory, paving their own streets, organizing a police, and meeting the demands of their creditors. We took the liberty at the time of pointing out that, bad as the Turks were, there was hardly a test of good government which Turkey would not stand better than Greece, and that Athens was about the last place in Europe from which stones should be thrown at Constantinople. A striking illustration of the truth of all this comes in the news of the capture and brutal murder of three Englishmen and an Italian, connected with the foreign legations at Athens, by a band of brigands, a few miles outside the city. For some unexplained reason, the negotiations for the ransom of the unfortunate men seem to have failed, and then the troops had to be called into requisition to hunt down the band, who fought to the last, and have been all killed or taken, but not till they had poniarded their unhappy prisoners. There is, of course, great excitement, owing to the rank of the victims, and there are loud calls for indemnity and vengeance and what not from the English press. But the proper thing to call on the Greeks for is more roads, industry, and police, and less newspapers and blatherskite. The little state is dying of ranting newspapers and ranting orators. It is they that breed the brigands and perpetuate barbarism. When the royal army can't keep the throats of strangers from being cut under the muzzles of their guns, on the plains of Marathon, by robbers, in broad daylight, one would think the Hellenic politicians would at last begin to blush and buy spades and pickaxes.

"A REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT."

THE Prison Association of this State—an admirable body, whose labors are amongst the greatest of the State glories—drew up a memorial to the Legislature, in January last, in favor of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the government of the prisons by a board appointed by the Governor and Senate, to hold office for ten years, in place of the present system of inspectors elected by the people for short terms, which has been productive of perhaps as revolting abuses as were ever witnessed in a Christian community. The memorial, after giving a sketch of the history of prison discipline in this State, tells how the Association was founded in 1844, taking for its principle "the supremacy of the moral part of man over the animal," and after three years' hard work obtained from the Legislature of 1847 an act abolishing corporal punishment, and providing for the erection of solitary cells for the confinement of the incorrigibly disobedient. Then follows this remarkable passage, which we earnestly commend to the attention of all reformers:

> "But a speedy disappointment of the more sanguine of these hopes was near at hand. The new constitution went into effect in 1847, and thenceforth the office of inspector became more than ever a political one, elective by the people and with a large and extending party patronage; the solitary cells provided for in the act were never built; those erected for the male prison at Sing Sing were removed to make way for a railroad; and though the whip was no longer used, other and even more cruel modes of inflicting bodily pain were resorted to, and the domination of force was again triumphant."

Of the state of things which now exists in the prisons, we do not intend to speak here, nor indeed to discuss the prison question at all. We quote the above passage simply for the purpose of enforcing what we are about to say on a very different subject. The constitution which went into operation in 1847 was framed in strict accordance with the theories of democracy which were then rampant all over the country, and had taken possession of some of the wisest heads, although they were utterly opposed not only to the lessons of history, but to every man's individual experience of human nature. It was not intended to corrupt the judiciary and debauch the prisons, but to improve them, and it was framed on the notion that that mysterious body known to politicians as "the people" was not only all-powerful but all-wise, and would, if called upon, be sure to select for every office the sages of the community, and after selecting them to see that they did their duty. This same superstition—for superstition it is—survived the adoption of the New York Constitution for several years, and came near triumphing in the Massachusetts Convention of 1853, where Mr. Boutwell was one of its leading preachers, and establishing an elective judiciary in that State, too, to take the place of a bench which, like that of this State, not only enjoyed complete public confidence, but had made splendid and immortal contributions to the literature of jurisprudence. Massachusetts narrowly escaped from the theorists; New York fell a victim to them, and is now heaping curses not loud but deep on their heads, and has acquired through twenty years of degradation a dread of à priori politics which, it is to be hoped, she will never lose.

Now this furnishes an illustration, and a very striking one, of the way in which things may sometimes be, and very often are, all right in the convention and the closet, and all wrong in the street and the court-room, and it is an illustration which comes up to our minds every time we read Mr. Drake's orations on the Georgia question, and which, now that the Fifteenth Amendment is passed, the Republican leaders would do well to take to heart in such further dealings with the South as are still open to it. About the Georgia question we do not propose to say anything further. We are happily saved the necessity of doing so by the course of events. Greater confusion than that in which it is now plunged the firmest opponents of the course Congress has pursued towards the State could not possibly desire to see. Everything has gone wrong; the State is in the hands of political sharpers, and the Senate is plunged in a muddle from which it confesses that it is impossible to extricate itself logically, or indeed in any way except by allowing by-gones to be by-gones. All that now remains for the sane portion of the Republican press to do is to utter, in the light of this example, a word of warning against the fantastical notions of the duty of Congress in the matter of guaranteeing each State "a republican form of government" which have taken possession of a good many minds in both Houses and are now threatening to keep the work of reconstruction for ever undone. By dint of brooding over this phrase of the Constitution, and raving and hearing raving about it, several members have almost worked themselves up into the belief that the term "a republican form of government," as used by the framers of the Constitution, is synonymous with a perfect state of society, and that consequently, if any State is the scene of many disorders which have their root in the sentiment of inequality, "a republican form of government" does not exist in it, and Congress is bound to go down there, sword in hand, and set one up. If, for instance, negroes find difficulty in exercising the elective franchise, or getting justice from the courts, or protection from the police, or are denied admission to hotels or railroad cars on the same terms as whites, or if crimes of violence are very numerous and go unwhipped of justice, forthwith a deputation of the local radicals hurries to Washington and presents Senator Drake or Mr. Butler with a list of "outrages," and up jump these gentlemen and demand an enquiry with the view of overturning the State government and either establishing martial law or putting the local minority in possession of the political power. By a republican form of government they evidently mean a democratic government carried on by a community entirely divested of prejudices and especially of prejudices on the subject of color—that is, one of the strongest and most deep-seated of all prejudices—of very industrious habits and very peaceable disposition, and entertaining a profound sense of its own wickedness in carrying on a war which they waged with a vigor which men never show except as the result of extraordinary fervor both of passion and conviction. In short, the state of society which Messrs. Sumner and Drake seem to ask for at the South as a condition of letting the South alone hereafter and leaving it to work out its own salvation, is one which, considering what the South was in 1860 and what has happened in it since then, could not possibly be produced—we say it in all seriousness—except as the result of a special and miraculous interposition on the part of the Almighty. No rational man, possessing any acquaintance with human nature, and with the experience of the human race, could, if he found Southerners in the state of mind Mr. Drake asks for, resist the conclusion that agencies had been at work amongst them totally different from those by which the moral government of the world is usually carried on. No community has ever changed within five years as the South is by some expected to change, and no community could, under similar conditions, possibly do so, we are warranted in believing, without the application of remedies unknown to the human understanding and invisible to the mortal eye. The "repentance," for instance, for which Mr. Drake looks—that is, not only a sense of the folly of the war but a sense of its guilt and shame—of course God Almighty could have produced in the hearts of the Southern community since 1865, but, if he had done so, it would have had all the characteristics of a miracle.

If all this is true, the folly of trying to produce the results we all so much desire to see at the South by the process known as "remanding States to military rule" is easy to be seen; and from it the folly of continuing to threaten States already reconstructed with martial law is a plain corollary. If our "military rule" produced peace and order, it is safe to say it would also be at least a great marvel, for there is nothing military about it except the name. It makes no change whatever in the means of protecting life or property, or of punishing crime. When a "Ku-Klux," who has been out in the night murdering negroes or Union men, gets home in the morning, and learns that the Congress has remanded the State to military rule, and that the State legislature is now "provisional," he hears the news with perfect indifference. It subjects him to no surveillance or pursuit to which he was not exposed before; renders the commission of no crime more difficult or its chastisement more certain. It is, in short, simply a form of words written on paper, and yet the Drakes and Butlers have, it is charitable to suppose, succeeded in persuading themselves, and try to persuade others, that they can by the utterance of it deliver Southern society suddenly from throes and convulsions which all we know of the law of human progress warrants us in believing are as natural a consequence of slavery, the war, and emancipation, as light is of sunrise, or the sprouting of the corn of the fall of the seed.

The attempts to treat peace and good order and the universal diffusion of the sentiment of equality as essential marks of a "republican form of government," and to do for the Southern people, at one stroke, by act of Congress, what nobody but God Almighty has ever done for any other people, and he only by the slow process of individual regeneration, has thus far resulted simply in placing the government of nearly every Southern State in the hands of despicable adventurers, black and white, the continuance of whose rule, were it possible, would, we do not hesitate to say, strike a serious blow at civilization itself. The persistence of the Republican party in threatening to apply this theory to all of them for an indefinite period—or, in other words, to keep an ideal State constantly on hand as a standard, and by it test the claims of the reconstructed States to be let alone—will, of course, result in retarding the material as well as moral development of these States, in still further lowering the political tone of the whole country, and in associating the party in the public mind rather with the abuses which followed the war than with the glories of the war itself.

We do not say that Congress has not, on the whole, acted with the best intentions, and, in most cases, in the manner the circumstances seemed to call for; but then there is no firm ground in politics but experience. Let us learn as we go. Certain evil results of the reconstruction policy which it was perhaps excusable not to foresee, are now plainly visible, and they have shown themselves, luckily, while there is yet time to profit by the spectacle. The South ought now to be dropped by Congress. All that paper and words can do for it has been done. "The republican form of government" Mr. Drake dreams of has thus far never been set up anywhere, and there is every reason to believe that it never will be set up until the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. Some men in Congress—notably Messrs. Trumbull and Schurz in the Senate—have urged all these considerations with a force and clearness which show that the statesmanship of earlier days is not extinct, and that, come what will, the torrent of folly will never find us without strong and manly thinkers to breast it.

THE FUNDING BILL.

For several days past almost every one of the regular Washington despatches to the daily papers has contained the announcement that the Ways and Means Committee was about to begin, had got ready to begin, or had actually begun the consideration of the Funding Bill. On Saturday, according to the New York Herald, the Committee ended their "general talk" upon the subject, and on Monday, according to the New York Times, took up the bill regularly, with the determination to continue its consideration from day to day until disposed of. We have heretofore refrained from any elaborate consideration of this measure, for the reason that the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means has repeatedly declared that he would allow no other business to come before the House until the Tariff Bill had been disposed of. Since this, at the rate of recent progress with the tariff, would have brought up the Funding Bill some time in 1871, we feared our remarks might grow stale. But now that even Mr. Schenck has grown sick over the tariff, and the Tribune, in view of the defeat of the iron interest, thinks the whole bill ought to be recommitted and abandoned; now that "the general talk" on the bill has been ended, that the bill itself is actually taken up for consideration, and that the spasmodic energy of the Committee may at any moment bring the bill before the House for action, it behooves us to express our opinion on the whole subject.

The object of the Funding Bill would be much better understood if the bill were called a bill to secure the borrowing of money by the United States at a lower rate of interest than that which it is now paying. Of the present debt, we may say, in round numbers, 2,000 millions pay coin interest, 1,800 millions at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and 200 millions at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. Of the 1,800 millions, the Treasury may at its own option pay off about 1,200 millions at any time that may suit its convenience. It is these 1,200 millions, on which we are now paying 6 per cent. interest per annum, which the Funding Bill proposes to pay off at once, obtaining the money for the purpose by borrowing a similar amount at 4 or 4½ per cent. per annum; or, what is practically the same thing, the Funding Bill proposes to induce the present holders of our bonds paying 6 per cent. interest to exchange them for a fresh issue of bonds paying 4½ per cent. interest. So palpable is the advantage to be derived by the United States from such an exchange, that it seems almost absurd to question its desirability. Indeed, when the bill was first proposed, it was almost unanimously accepted as eminently desirable, and the principal opposition to it was based upon the belief that the proposed exchange was impracticable, and the proposed method of making it objectionable. It is true that a powerful opposition to the bill was created by the national bank interest, which thought, or pretended to think, itself very unjustly dealt with in one of the sections of the bill. But, as their objection in no way applied to the main principle of the measure, it does not affect our assertion that the measure itself was, and indeed to this moment is, very generally regarded as highly desirable.

The objection to the Funding Bill on the score of its impracticability is this: If we pay off the existing 1,200 millions of 6 per cent. bonds, we must of course pay them in full, one hundred cents on the dollar, as the holders are not obliged to take one cent less. In order to be able to do this we must be well assured that we can sell the new bonds at the same price, at par, or for one hundred cents on the dollar. Unless we are assured of this, we should suffer a loss on the principal of the bond which might more than counterbalance the gain in the interest. Those who maintain the impracticability of the measure point to the fact that the existing 5 per cent. bonds of the United States are now selling in the European markets at a price which, adding the exchange and deducting the accumulated interest, is equal to but little over 92 cents on the dollar; and they say, if our five per cent. bonds will not bring more than 92 cents on the dollar now, why should our four or four and a half per cent. bonds, after the passage of the Funding Bill, suddenly be worth 100 cents on the dollar? This argument we consider totally unanswerable, as far as it goes, but it does not cover the entire ground.

Those who oppose the measure on the score of impracticability say further: so long as the 5 per cent. bonds of European governments like that of Prussia, whose credit is absolutely first-class, like Austria, Russia, sell below par, some of them considerably below par; so long as bank and railroad securities of a character for safety, solvency, and permanence almost exceeding that of any government, and paying higher rates of interest than 5 per cent., sell considerably below par, how can we expect to sell our 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds for a higher price? This question is generally met by triumphantly pointing to the example of England and France, whose securities, at much lower rates of interest, command much higher prices, the English three per cent. bonds being actually in cash worth more to-day than those of the United States bearing 5 per cent. interest. To the average American citizen that answer is conclusive. He can see no reason why an American bond bearing 4 per cent. interest should not be worth at least as much as an English bond paying only 3 per cent. He very readily concludes that all that is wanted to induce foreigners to take our 4 per cent. bonds at par is to refuse to pay more; and hence he is easily led to believe that the Funding Bill is the essence of wisdom, and Mr. Boutwell a paragon of financial statesmanship. Now, the truth is, that there can be no exact comparison made whatever between the debt of the United States and the debts of countries like England and France. For the bulk of the debts of those two countries is held, it is true, at home, but it is held in an overwhelming proportion by a comparatively limited number of capitalists, consisting almost entirely of a certain class of society, who hold consols or rentes as an investment for political purposes, certainly from political instincts, and largely from habits arising from both. If, in this country, men like Mr. Astor, Mr. Vanderbilt, and Mr. Stewart believed that their social and political position, importance, and influence depended upon the continuance of a certain form of government, and that the continued existence of that form of government depended largely upon the existence of a national debt, and that the holding of that national debt by them would largely contribute toward its permanent existence—is it likely that they would invest in that debt any less on account of the low rate of interest?

No words can more strikingly impress upon the reader the character of the English debt in this particular than the following figures:

Population of Great Britain	33,000,000
Amount of national debt	£776,000,000
Number of persons owning the whole debt	260,931
Number of persons owning 44¼ per cent. of the whole debt	195
Amount of British debt held by 195 persons	£349,000,000

When it is added that the number of persons holding any portion of this debt decreases almost regularly every year, while the proportion held by the smaller number increases yearly in almost the same ratio, it must become evident that there are influences at work that tend to maintain the price of English consols which can never, especially abroad, produce a similar result for American securities. The bulk of the English and French debts are held by an aristocracy of rank and an aristocracy of capital from mixed motives, almost regardless of the rate of interest; and in this manner, and by means of sundry legislative enactments (such as the investment of trust funds in consols exclusively), the price of the securities of those two countries is held up in spite of the low rates of annual interest.

The argument that our 4 per cent. bonds would sell at par in Europe, because our credit ought to be as good as that of England and France, once set aside, we revert once more to the fact that our present 5 per cent. bonds are selling considerably below par. Yes, say the friends of the Funding Bill, the reason why foreigners are not willing to take our present 5 per cent. bonds at par is that the United States Government has the right of paying off the present bonds at almost any time. Give them bonds that you agree not to pay off within forty years, and they will take any amount of 5 per cent. bonds at par and a premium. Indeed, it is said that offers from foreign banking-houses in good standing are on file in the Treasury to take 500 millions of the new bonds above par if at 5 per cent., and at par if at 4½ per cent., or at par in equal proportions of a 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bond, provided always that the bonds have forty years to run.

In all the discussions on the Funding Bill, both in Congress and in the press, this proviso has been always unaccountably overlooked or studiously concealed. But it is the gist of the whole measure. Mr. Boutwell in his Funding Bill asks the people of the United States, for the sake of a doubtful saving of 12 millions of dollars a year, to give up the privilege of paying off the debt whenever we choose. For the sake of a doubtful saving of 12 millions a year, we are to forego the privilege of either paying the debt or reducing the rate of interest for forty years. The very eagerness of the buyers ought to make us pause. If it is so great an advantage to them to have the rate of interest fixed for forty years, is it not likely to prove a corresponding disadvantage to us? Suppose the rate of interest in Europe after the next panic, which does not seem far distant, should again for a number of years continue at an extremely low figure, is it not likely that we might borrow then at still better advantage? Why for the sake of a slight saving assume a responsibility extending over such an extraordinary length of time?

There are minor objections to the bill which should not be lost sight of. The propositions to issue bonds payable in the various European currencies, and to establish Government agencies for the payment of the interest abroad, are disliked on the score of dignity by many people. The proposition to pay a commission of one per cent. even, to any one, for carrying out the provisions of the bill is also objectionable, and is another opening for endless jobs. If there are services to be performed in the negotiations of the new loans, let us have open competition, and let the remuneration for those services be included in the terms of the negotiation.

The section relating to the national banks is interesting in a variety of ways. The national banks have on deposit in the United States Treasury, as security for the redemption of their circulation, about 350 millions of bonds. As we have repeatedly pointed out in the Nation, the national banks get their full interest on these bonds from the Government, and then get a second full rate of interest from the people on the currency which they issue against the bonds. If there is any one interest in the country which could be justly, legally, and equitably called on to contribute a larger share of its gains than heretofore to the support of the Government, it is the banking interest. If the Funding Bill, or any other bill, had provided that the national banks should hereafter be taxed a sum equal to one per cent. of the interest on all their bonds deposited in the Treasury, and that the said tax should be deducted from the interest at the time of its payment, not a word could have been said against it. But, in order to ensure a seeming success to Mr. Boutwell's scheme, the banks were to be compelled to give up their old bonds, and buy new ones, thus ensuring to the Treasury the expense of printing and issuing the new bonds, and to some one else the commission of one per cent. on the exchange. In this manner, the only good suggestion of the Funding Bill was rendered obnoxious by the suspicious method of carrying it out. This whole section has, however, it is reported, been stricken out in committee, and it is openly declared that it is stricken out at the bidding of "the national bank men," who would not otherwise allow the bill to pass. It should be interesting to the people of the United States—and for this reason solely do we refer to this section of the bill—to notice what sort of a force they have called into existence by the National Bank Act, and what they have to expect from this force in future. It seems to be already accepted in Washington as a political axiom that no measure can pass against the opposition of the national bank interest. If on this occasion they have so far opposed a bad measure, they will be all the more likely on the next occasion to defeat a good one.

THE NEW YORK CHARTER, AND WHAT MAY COME OF IT.

The Democratic party, coming unexpectedly into the full possession of the government of this State this year, found itself burdened with a heavy load of unqualified promises to do away with the "odious commissions" in New York City. The result of its action to this end has been awaited with interest by the whole State, and largely by the country, because it was well known that the system which preceded commissions was at once purely Democratic and miserably inefficient, not to say rotten. There was, also, an uneasy feeling in the minds of Republicans that the commission system contained nothing in itself to prevent its yielding to the decay apparently a necessary consequence of Democratic management; while not a few regarded with suspicion and alarm the abuses to which some of the commissions, in nominally Republican hands, were rapidly yielding.

The session of the Legislature is nearly at an end, and the work of fixing the methods—there would be a spice of irony in speaking of principles in this connection—on which the officials of New York shall proceed is completed. There now remains only the voting of the tax levies—which, by a curious anomaly, are determined at Albany—and the charity bill, which may be regarded, the one solely and the other in part, as merely pay-rolls for the Democratic army in possession. It is possible at this time, then, to answer the question: What has this Legislature done toward solving the important problem of the government of the largest and most composite of American cities, the problem, it may be added, of which the party has besought the people to give it the solution, and the opportunity to solve which was last fall seized by daring and widespread fraud? The answer, which is to be found in the New York charter, is not encouraging. That charter perpetuates whatever was most to be feared in the system of commissions, and totally obliterates all trace of the corrective, of which there was some possibility under the old system. It gives the administration of city affairs into the hands of a number of independent bureaus, with heads consisting of officials from one to five in number, nominated by the present mayor in the first instance, and retiring from power at the rate of one annually in the case of the boards with several members, and only after a long term in the case of Messrs. Tweed and Bradley. The present mayor has exercised the enormous power placed in his hands in a way plainly the result of an agreement with the legislative authors of the charter, giving the most powerful place in the government—the head of the Department of Public Works—to Senator Tweed; the most lucrative, that of chamberlain, to Mr. Tweed's silent partner and Mr. Sweeney's relative, Senator Bradley, and placing six assemblymen in the various boards. Here, then, are the elements of the commission system which gave most uneasiness actually realized, namely, the establishment by the Legislature of commissions to create and perpetuate power in the hands of legislators, and the arrangement of terms of office in a manner placing the commissioners beyond the reach of everybody interested in their good behavior, except by the difficult and unreliable agency of the courts, which, in this case, can be called upon only by the mayor, and by him only for the extreme offence of malfeasance. Everybody familiar with the relations of New York courts to New York office-holders knows that, as a preventive or corrective of laziness, inefficiency, perversion of powers to personal and political ends, and all that horde of abuses included in the term "jobbery," this remote interference of the courts is worth nothing. It is obvious that the charter only gives a firmer hold to that class of politicians which has gradually taken possession of New York City government, and which hitherto has been actuated mainly by the resolute determination to enrich itself at the public expense. But it is noteworthy that the victory which ended a long struggle for the spoils between two sections of this class was finally purchased by co-operation with the Republican members of the Legislature. The price of this co-operation was ostensibly the passage of a stringent election law, and really the retention in office of the present Board of Police, and the nomination to place of a certain number of Republican aspirants. This fact, of the existence of which there can be no doubt, is ominous to the immediate future of New York. A politician's bargain, in which the consideration on one side compromises the administration of the police—in whose firmness, independence, and esprit de corps lies, now that the courts are so largely invaded by corruption, almost the sole hope of safety for person and in great part of property—cannot be regarded as other than a calamity to the city. Whatever efficiency may be gained in the departments of the city government concerned with the care of the streets, the public works, the wharves and buildings, consequent on the more intimate and permanent association of really capable, even if corrupt, men with their administration, the Police Department has received what may well be nearly a fatal blow. When we remember that the present Police Board, which under the new charter is continued in office, appointed the election officers and officers of registry guilty of the acknowledged frauds of last autumn, and that, since the Democratic triumph then and there secured, the Board has allowed the excise law, previously enforced to a considerable degree, to become a dead letter, and has further admitted a steadily increasing laxness of discipline in the police force, this last combination with the Ring justifies the gravest apprehension.

There are to be observed, however, in this matter two tendencies of public opinion, one in that of the country, and the other in that of the city, affording some prospect of remedying not only the evils the city has long suffered under, but those threatened by the new arrangement of the politicians' cards. The tendency in the opinion of the country is to leave New York to herself; the tendency in the city is toward a centralization of power in an executive elected for a moderate term, whom, in case the city is left to itself, the voters can call to some intelligible account. The feeling referred to in the country was made very evident by the proposition made by Mr. Littlejohn, of Oswego, and supported by Mr. Alvord, of Syracuse, the two most prominent rural Republicans of the Legislature, that the taxes of New York should no longer be voted in the Legislature, and the same feeling has prevailed in numerous debates this winter. The country members are in despair of ever coping successfully with New York politics or New York politicians, and regard the attempt made by commissions in 1857 as at best only temporarily successful and ripe now for abandonment. They are, moreover, hopeless of contending effectually with the vast means of influence and corruption the introduction of New York City government gives to the New York leaders, and they desire in pure self-defence to reduce these latter to somewhere near a level with legislators owning responsibility to constituencies, and liable to interference therefrom. In the city, the tendency corresponding to the one observed in the country is evinced in the tone of the discussion of the charter by the New York press—notably by the Post, and in part by the World and the Sun, which have recently treated their readers to some very refreshing and cogent reasoning on the methods of securing actual responsibility in officials. And though the gentlemen of the Union League Club and those of the Citizens' Association have made a rather confusing official statement of their views of city government, there is a strong sentiment in the community, that with anything like a fair chance it could put down and keep down its own dangerous classes. If the State government should return to the Republicans next year, as is generally expected by Republican managers, we need not be surprised to see an attempt made, in spite of its inconsistency with this year's Republican action, to frame a charter that will give effect to this sentiment. Such an attempt within a few years is almost certain.

GOING TO EUROPE.

The prodigious rate at which the passenger traffic between this country and Europe is increasing, and which seems to afford employment to as many steamers as capitalists choose to run, is doubtless mainly due to the growth of wealth and population. It, however, also indicates, beyond question, increasing restlessness on the part of all that portion of the American population which is not tied to one spot all the year round by stern necessity. In the early part of the century, when the visitors to Europe were few and far between, the trip was generally credited with a mysterious influence on the mind and character, and gave those who made it a social and intellectual pre-eminence which lasted the greater part of their lives. The belief in this has, of course, died out before the now multitudinous examples of persons who have gone to Europe without being in the slightest degree improved by it; but the passion for Europe is in no wise abated. In fact, it seems to grow with the growth of the country. There is now no capital in Europe, and indeed no resort of pleasure-seekers, in which the Americans do not either outnumber all other travellers, or are not rapidly gaining on them; a curious illustration of which is to be found in the gradual appearance in European light literature of a variety of American types. When the American first showed himself in European books of travel, "wayside sketches," "wanderings," and "rambles," and in novels with Continental scenery, he was all but invariably Sam Slick himself, with as much retouching as to clothes as might make his appearance among the author's acquaintances not wildly improbable. He was shrewd and good-natured, and not unfrequently played a subordinate but still important part in helping the hero out of bad scrapes, and furnished "humor" to the work in slangy comments on what he saw around him, the flavor of which was mainly drawn from his all but savage ignorance of the usages of civilized life. He furnished the materials for a great many amusing anecdotes, too, by his mistakes in churches and pictures galleries, and by his ignorance of foreign languages, French being the tongue in which he did most of his blundering, and the interest of the reader in him was kept up by the suspicion, which the writer generally suggested in a vague way, that he might at any moment commit a murder, if crossed or excited.

Now, however, we find growing evidence of the increased familiarity of Europe with him in the disappearance of Slick and the substitution of three or four varieties, who may be classed as the Cultivated American—who is almost always set down as an Englishman, and only found out by accident or his own confession; the Militia "General," a good sort of man, with his wife and two daughters, whom he is apt to be accused of calling "his gals," and whose behavior in picture galleries and cathedrals is of the most ludicrous description; and the Boastful Yankee, who is usually painted as an impudent and inquisitive monster, and almost invariably follows dry-goods as his calling. Another curious and somewhat comic illustration of the growing strength, if not predominance, of the Americans in Continental resorts is that, in our literature of travel, such as books and letters to the newspapers, we begin to use against the English the old stories the English used to tell about us. In our accounts of our wanderings nowadays, the man who makes people laugh by his bad French, and never heard of Michael Angelo, and whose ridiculous daughters are the talk of the hotel, is almost invariably an Englishman, while the man who rescues him out of his difficulties, settles the dispute between him and the landlord, or prevents the gens d'armes from taking him into custody, who overhears his silly speeches in St. Peter's, and whose charming daughters fascinate the Roman prince, is apt to be an American.

In nine cases out of ten, when people go Europe, it is "for the sake of the girls," and, as might naturally be expected, "the girls" play a very prominent part in whatever impression America is now making on the European mind. American men, whom circumstances do not allow to go immediately after leaving college and before settling down into business, rarely go till hard work and advancing years have weakened their capacity for enjoyment, and swept away the delightful haze through which youth sees all things, which to the young man makes every foreign country, the first time he enters it, a garden of delight. The consequence is, that the American father of a family is rarely found in Europe except on business, or when seeking to escape paralysis or softening of the brain by a complete break with his ordinary avocations, or when going in charge of his wife and daughters. It is the ladies of the party, therefore, who do most to make its reputation, and leave its imprint on the foreign mind. The daughters are just at the age to enjoy the trip thoroughly, and they and their mother have in common a passion which in the female breast age does little or nothing to assuage, and which the conditions of American life do something to repress, but which nothing can extinguish, and on which Europe acts like pitch on a smouldering fire—the passion for dress. The consequence is that, partly through inability to restrain themselves, and partly through ignorance of European manners, and partly through perfectly legitimate differences of manners, they have succeeded in diffusing through Europe some very unpleasant and, let us add, very false impressions of American society. If there be one canon of domestic discipline which Europeans hold more sacred than another, it is that which relegates young girls if not to seclusion from society at least to abstinence from any active or conspicuous share in carrying it on, and, above all, from anything either in dress or behavior calculated to attract attention to them. The work of society is done by married women; for them are reserved the choicest of finery, such as diamonds and Cashmere shawls; the business of the girls is to be simple, unpretending, and unobtrusive, both in clothes and demeanor. Consequently, the appearance of American girls, not only as well but often better and more showily dressed than their mothers, produces most injurious speculations either as to their own character or as to the character of the family in which they have been bred, and indeed with regard to their whole moral and social surroundings. The freedom of their intercourse with young men, too, quite natural and quite harmless here, where the men understand it, leads to some most extraordinary views as to the condition of American morals, and has given rise to some appalling mistakes. When we add to this that a great many American women walk in the street, both at home and abroad, in clothes which European women never think of wearing except when riding in carriages, it is easy to understand the amount of sensation, as well as observation, which American travellers in Europe are exciting. And the effect of the activity and eagerness and enterprise of the women is heightened by contrast with the languor of the paterfamilias, whose nerves have been broken by years of hard work, and whose thoughts are far away in the books of the Killmequick Central, or hovering over certain unimproved lots in the rising city of Alkaliville, Sonora Territory.

But then, it has to be confessed that, whenever an occasion presents itself when fine dressing is "in order," as they say at public meetings, the American women outdo everybody. There are no better eyes for color than theirs, and they have taste as to the fashion of garments which puts the most pampered Continental dressmaker on his mettle, and, along with the features and complexion, makes them easily triumphant in all ball-rooms. They have, consequently, one title to distinction which everywhere inspires respect. No woman in society ever in her secret heart thought meanly of another woman who was really well dressed, and the result is that the American women have, on the Continent, crushed the Englishwomen in such circles as they both get into, which, it ought to be added, are not always the best. The latter are now, as to their clothes, objects of pity and forbearance, and will probably never regain their old position in Continental drawing-rooms without the aid either of a bounty or a drawback from their government.

The influence of American travellers, too, is increased by the fact that they are looked on as the coming man and the coming woman. The idea is taking deep root all over the Continent that the whole civilized world is to be rapidly "Americanized," and we are sorry to say that to the best European minds the prospect is not altogether pleasing. Few Frenchmen or Germans would like to see their daughters as American girls are, but they confess sorrowfully that such they suppose their daughters will one day be—loud, fast, overdressed, a little slangy, and bold, and independent, and self-indulgent. Such "the girl of the period" is indeed getting to be already in many parts of Europe. Curiously enough, too, the radical journalists in Paris justify their blackguard abuse of each other and of their enemies by pointing to the American newspapers, which they say are examples of what democratic papers ought to be; and M. Mazade, in a recent number of the Revue de Deux Mondes, rebukes the whole fraternity for carrying revolvers in their pockets on the pretext that this is the American custom.

The American travellers of whom most is seen and heard are of small advantage to Europe, and Europe is of small advantage to them. The interchange of benefits takes place through books and the intercourse of quiet students, of whom there is, luckily, yearly a greater and greater number; but it is questionable whether, just at this stage, the attractions which European travel offers to all who can afford it are not, on the whole, injurious to American society. They unquestionably increase the restlessness, the absence of the sense of fixity and repose, which is the bane of American life, and they draw off every year, and for long periods, along with a good deal of trash, a great many people who have just reached the position in which they would be invaluable as instruments for the promotion of culture, and taste, and refinement. The civilization of a country which the men of fortune and leisure are tempted to leave frequently for long periods must always suffer more or less, and the extent to which we suffer from it is an additional reason for hurrying on the creation of counter-attractions at home; and, happily, whatever promotes the cultivation of art and literature is likely to furnish them.

Correspondence.

THE CINCINNATI LESSON.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It appears that, after all, the newly-elected Board of Education in Cincinnati is pledged to suppress the reading of the Bible and all other religious exercises in the public schools. This result might have been foreseen from the decision of the Superior Court of Cincinnati in February last, granting a perpetual injunction to restrain the Board of Education from prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the schools; the effect of this injunction being to enforce religious teaching by the authority of the State. The following has been the standing rule of the School Board: "The opening exercises in every department shall commence by reading a portion of the Bible by, or under the direction of, the teacher, and appropriate singing by the pupils. The pupils of the common schools may read such version of the sacred Scriptures as their parents or guardians may prefer; provided that such preference of any version, except the one now in use, be communicated by the parents or guardians to the principal teachers, and that no notes or marginal readings be allowed in the schools, or comments made by the teachers on the text of any version that is, or may be, introduced." To this rule was appended, in 1842, the proviso "that no pupil of the common schools be required to read the Testament or Bible, if his parent or guardian desire that he may be excused from that exercise." It is alleged, however, that this clause has been practically null, and that the children in the schools, without exception, have been required to attend upon the opening religious exercises.

In November, 1869, the Board of Education voted to repeal the regulation quoted above concerning the opening exercises of the schools. At the same time they passed the following resolution declaratory of their purpose in repealing the rule:

Resolved, That religious instruction, and the reading of religious books, including the Holy Bible, are prohibited in the common schools of Cincinnati, it being the true object and intent of this rule to allow the children of parents of all sects and opinions, in matters of faith and worship, to enjoy alike the benefit of the common-school fund."

Several citizens united in a petition to the Superior Court for an injunction restraining the Board of Education from putting this resolution in operation, and the Court granted the injunction, and thus raised the issue which was carried into the charter election. The triumph of the plaintiffs, who put themselves forward as "friends of the Bible," was doomed to be short-lived; it has resulted in dragging the sacred book of Christianity into the arena of political strife, and there subjecting it to the indignity and contempt of a popular rejection. Its friends should have remembered the saying of Christ about casting pearls before swine. It is easy to predict that a like result would follow the injudicious expedient of submitting the Bible to a popular vote, in almost every large city in the land; and in this view the lesson in Cincinnati is full of significance.

Two mistakes were made by the Bible advocates in that case, which all who desire to preserve for Christianity its conceded influence over public opinion and legislation should avoid in future. The first is that of confounding Christian influence in, and upon, the state with legislation by the state avowedly in the interest of Christianity, by its authority as a religion, and for the support of that authority in the community. The power of Christianity to affect the state for good depends upon its adhering to the line of its Founder, as "a kingdom not of this world." As a subtle, unorganized influence, by its ethical and spiritual principles, Christianity may pervade every department of society—the family, the school, the state—and so make a nation Christian in spirit, tone, customs, laws, without once attempting to formulate itself into the civil code. It may thus enter almost unchallenged into the whole constitution of society. But whenever the attempt is made to embody its precepts in specific laws, or to compel a regard for Christianity by legislation, then the secular arm is invoked to do what belongs only to spiritual agencies, and a religion whose beauty and strength lie in its appeals to the intelligence and the affections is placed in the false attitude of coercion by physical means. No Christian's faith can oblige him to secure its ascendency by false methods of enforcement.

The other mistake at Cincinnati was that of subjecting religion to the test of majorities. The advocates of Bible-reading in the schools have fallen into this dangerous fallacy: they argue for the religion of the majority, the consciences of the majority, the text-book of the majority. Leaving out of view the fact that religious faith and conviction can never be a question of majorities, but must rest with the conscience of the individual, it is dangerous to put the argument for a religion where the fluctuations of a popular vote may subvert it at the next election. If we would preserve our common schools from Roman Catholic control, and all sectarian perversion, we must be careful not to use the temporary advantage of a local majority to enforce upon Jews, Romanists, and Rationalists the reading of King James's Version as a religious ceremony for opening the school. Besides, this bringing the Bible question to the polls is a dangerous precedent of religious strife as an element in political contests. Nothing would so embitter politics as the animosities of religion; and to transfer these to the field of political action is to prepare for the next generation a war of creeds more fierce and deadly than the war of States.

J. P. T.

April 23, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

In announcing recently Dr. Hall's forthcoming work on "Sleep, or the Hygiene of the Night" (New York: Hurd & Houghton), we inadvertently allowed the word "Soap" to pass for "Sleep." We can only account for this oversight by supposing that we must have been thinking of the hygiene of the day.——Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Bros. publish shortly "A Marriage in High Life," by Mrs. Grey; and "The Christmas Guest, and Other Stories," partly by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, and partly by her sister, Mrs. F. H. Baden.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt are preparing to remove from their present location to No. 25 Bond Street, and will, by re-enforcing the publishers now grouped in that neighborhood, add greatly to the convenience of the book-buying public, as well as of the trade. Their departure from Broome Street leaves the Messrs. Appleton the only publishers on the west of Broadway.——Messrs. Leavitt, Strebeigh & Co. will offer for sale, during the week beginning Monday, May 16, a very large collection of books and pamphlets, relating chiefly to America. A cursory examination of the catalogue, which lacks clearness of arrangement, leads us to think that this collection is calculated to supply deficiencies in our public rather than in private libraries, and in some departments to be among the best of its kind for this purpose. We have particularly in mind the pamphlets relating to slavery and the anti-slavery agitation in this country, which we are not aware that any library has seriously set itself to procure, and which are here entered in considerable numbers, though very far from being complete. The other most valuable "line" seems to us the town histories, which are unusually well represented, and are accompanied by tolerably full sets of election, thanksgiving, and fast-day sermons, and Fourth of July orations, and by the publications of historical and antiquarian societies. The Indians have also received a fair share of the collector's attention, and there are also Lincolniana, rebellion pamphlets, etc., etc. The catalogue sells for one dollar, and will repay the purchaser.

—The New York Genealogical and Biographical Society has, since our mention of it in January, being growing in numbers and prosperity, and for the Bulletin which it then issued has substituted a quarterly Record, beginning with the year, at the subscription price of one dollar. This publication, at present small, will be enlarged as the means of the Society permit, and already promises great usefulness in its chosen field. Not only is it not the aim of the society to confine its biographical and genealogical researches to the State of New York, but such a restriction would be impossible; and accordingly any one who is interested in this sort of knowledge, whether a resident of this State or not, will be more than likely to profit from the reading of the Record. The number which bears date of January, though just issued, contains notices of recent genealogies which have been published in Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, and Illinois; and announces similar works and local histories in preparation relating to ten different States directly and of course to many more indirectly. Besides these, it gives the genealogy of Major-General Philip Schuyler; a list (to be continued) of New York marriage licenses in 1702, 1703, etc.; and the "Tangier" Smith records, also to be continued, and now first printed from the manuscript, which covers the period 1675—1763. This is a sufficiently varied and catholic table of contents, and should attract the desired support to the society. Persons wishing to subscribe to the Record should address the Publication Committee, at Mott Memorial Hall, 64 Madison Avenue.

—Not long ago we gave some account of Walker's "History of Athens County, Ohio," in the Ohio Valley Historical Series. That work treated of the earliest settlement of the State, by New England men, who carried with them New England's ideas and virtues. Since then there has appeared, in continuation of the same series, a history of Butler County, by the late James McBride, in the form of "Pioneer Biography" (Vol. I., Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati). These sketches, seven in all, describe a different breed of men—all but one, the author included, being of Scotch-Irish origin or descent, and transplanted from the southern frontier of Pennsylvania to Ohio. Several of them served in the Continental armies during the Revolution, and almost all were engaged for a longer or shorter period in Indian warfare. They were also men who were selected for the posts of trust and honor in the growing State, and the length of their terms of office is in gratifying or else melancholy contrast with the short and precarious tenure of our day. John Reily "watched over the financial affairs of the county with such wisdom and success that at no time were county orders at a discount, nor did it become necessary to contract an onerous debt, or subject the people to unreasonable taxes;" and John Woods, as State auditor, "by his courage, industry, and perseverance" saved Ohio "from repudiation, bankruptcy, and ruin." This is not the stock out of which they make State treasurers nowadays in Pennsylvania. If Athens County had the first Western university, Butler was not far behind with its Miami University, whose prosperity far exceeds that of its predecessor. Several of these pioneers were trustees of the institution. Athens County must even surrender the claim, asserted for it by Mr. Walker, of having formed the first public library in the North-west; for the "Coon-skin Library" was not thought of till 1803, and already, in the year previous, Mr. Reily was one of the shareholders who founded the "Cincinnati Library." These biographies, it ought to be stated, are by no means confined in their relations to Butler County, but add much to our knowledge of Revolutionary engagements, of the colonization of the Ohio valley both north and south of the river, of the war of 1812, and even (following the descendants of the pioneers) of the late rebellion. They may be read, therefore, with a great deal of pleasure and solid profit by the present generation, and will long be prized for their genealogies.

—Till now the shade of old Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, might have reposed in tolerable peace, in spite of the freedmen's schools dotting here and there the once schoolless commonwealth. But at last there comes an end to thanking God that there are no free schools in Virginia, and one may read the "Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction," dated Richmond, March 28, 1870. Mr. Ruffner had, under the Constitution, but thirty days in which to prepare this report, which is little else than a rapid justification of the free-school system, followed by an outline plan of public instruction, and a provisional plan for introducing the system into the State. There is no reference to color in any of these provisions, and we should hope that the good sense of the whites, aided by the rapid diminution in the colored population, from causes to which we have already alluded, would determine the establishment of mixed rather than of separate schools. At the same time, education is the great desideratum, and the mode of getting it should be regarded as secondary, provided the burdens are equally distributed. Mr. Hoar's bill for gently coercing the States that have made no provision for common schools will not be called up till the December session of Congress; and, in the meantime, the more States that, like Virginia, take themselves voluntarily out of its application, the better it will be for all parties. The late war, it has often been said, was a common-school conquest for the North; and as a sign and, as it were, an official certificate of this beneficent subjugation, a first report like this from Virginia may in time become a curiosity for which librarians and collectors will contend.

—A telegraph company in Philadelphia has been recently organized on the industrial partnership plan, by what seems a very natural application of the principle. It is one of the signs of the progress which co-operation, in one form or another, is making in this country, where, however, there cannot be said to be any enthusiasm in regard to it, nor any natural leader or leaders. Statistics are almost wholly wanting as to the actual extent of co-operation, and the practical success of it, and as to the points of difference between our associations and those of the Old World. A few persons, not workingmen, are interested in furthering the movement by legislation, but, as they do not approach our law-makers with a clamorous constituency at their backs, they either meet with no encouragement or are silenced by the demands of the lobby, whose business is to oppose all legislation that does not pay for itself. Lately, Mr. Josiah Quincy, of Boston, who is constantly addressing the public on behalf of cheap homes for workingmen and kindred objects, appeared with others before the Massachusetts Legislature to procure a law incorporating "people's banks," after the familiar German pattern. The petitioners brought with them some translations from Schulze-Delitzsch, by Mr. S. M. Quincy, which the latter has since published in pamphlet form, through Little, Brown & Co. While his motive is in every way praiseworthy, and he has perhaps given, if not what a legislative committee needed, all that it would probably pay attention to, we cannot consider his work well suited as an introduction to his subject for general circulation. The practical knowledge is much better conveyed in the only good chapter of Samuelson's little book on the German workingman. Mr. Quincy announces that he is preparing an abridged translation of Schulze's larger work, "Advance and Credit Societies as People's Banks—Practical Instructions for their Foundation and Management." We suggest that he should add to it some general discussion, with a view to the altered circumstances and needs of this country, and should exercise a little more care in the translation. In the pamphlet before us the word "Delitzsch" is uniformly spelt "Delisch"—a liberty which usage has not sanctioned in the case of this patrial.

—It is, perhaps, not fair to ask everything of the Ollivier ministry—at least all at once. There may be good reasons why the French troops should not be withdrawn from Rome immediately; there are probably bad reasons why the freedom of the press is still as much restricted and under penalty as it is. Politicians, too, without grievances, would in a measure find their occupation gone; and their case seems to us less hard, all things considered, than that of the littérateurs and students who continue to be shut out from the national archives. Their discontent has recently found a fresh expression in the Moniteur Universel of March 7, in an article headed "The Rights of History." What is especially humiliating is that the diplomatic archives are closed only to Frenchmen, and are thrown open to well-accredited students from other countries, through their representatives at the French court. A more galling discrimination could hardly be invented, or a more senseless. It makes no difference what the period under investigation may be—and an interdiction of a half or even a whole century could be defended on grounds of public as well as dynastic policy—the explorer, if a Frenchman, must always encounter the veto of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Sometimes, to be sure, he will find in the Imperial Library duplicates or even the original of important documents; or at the War-Office he will have a liberty of research which might be as properly withheld, and on the same grounds, as at the Office of the Rolls. But this inconsistency only serves to aggravate the odious regulation. The result has been, for the Government itself, a cessation of the great work undertaken by the July Government—"Documents inédits sur l'Histoire de France"—for which has been substituted the Correspondence of Napoleon I., which, of course, is not to be underrated in value, in spite of mutilations and omissions, but might have been carried on with the other enterprise. After twenty years, complains the Moniteur, the Correspondence of Richelieu is but just completed, Mazarin's is but just commenced, while the "History of the Third Estate" is well-nigh abandoned, as likewise the "Diplomatic Negotiations" relating to the Spanish succession.

— We referred the other day to Garnier's "Historic Nomenclature of the Department of the Côte d'Or," and may now mention two works of a kindred nature. One is "Recherches sur l'Origine des Gaulois," by the late G. Lévêque, which, however, touches our subject, and that not too learnedly, only in its second chapter, which gives a glossary of the Gallic words cited by Greek and Roman writers. The author, had his philological training equalled his industry, might have accomplished something better worth preserving. Nevertheless, his glossary may furnish a basis for the speculations of others. A work of first-rate merit, in chapters, however, without strict connection, is Robert Mowat's studies in comparative onomatology, "Noms propres anciens et modernes." One of the essays treats of the African element in Latin names; another, of phonetic decay (déformation) in proper names. In due time we are to have a much more elaborate work, for which this is but the introduction.

— The Société Bibliographique has resolved upon an undertaking of the utmost importance to the students of history. This is the publication of a "Repertory of Historical Sources of the Middle Ages," in the form of a dictionary, to contain: the names of authors and of anonymous works on the history of the Middle Ages; critical lists of the productions of the former; exact indications of all their known manuscripts, editions, and translations, of special works of reference, etc. Moreover, under the name of each country or important town will be set down the principal works relating to its history; and such general names as Council, Saint, Pope, Patriarch, and the like, will be illustrated by chronological tables much to be desired, and calculated to shed a deal of light on out-of-the-way investigations. The work will make a solid octavo, in two columns, to appear in four parts, and will cost twenty francs.

—There is one of the many services of Montalembert to his age which especially deserves to be recalled when his name is mentioned by posterity. It is, too, one not needing to be reconciled with his devotion to a church and an institution which civilization has outgrown. We refer to the grand results wrought by his work entitled "Le Catholicisme et le Vandalisme dans l'Art." This powerful defence of mediæval art against the neglect and defilement to which it was subjected, in the days when Notre Dame was fast going to ruin from dirt, decay, and shocking architectural anachronisms, opened a new era in the study of art and in church-building in France. Its first visible effect, after arresting the spirit of destructiveness, was in the scientific restoration of the great cathedral in perfect accord with the original design. "Viollet-le-Duc," says M. Léon Gautier, "was possible only after Montalembert." To be just, however, we must admit Victor Hugo to a share in this honor, for the influence exercised by his "Notre Dame de Paris." "All the archæologic movement of our time," says the writer just quoted, "has proceeded from these two books," and their authors, although preceded by Chateaubriand, "none the less may be called the sole founders of Christian art in this century." On no other plane have Montalembert and Hugo met since then. They met on this from such opposite motives, with such opposite feelings towards the Church and the Papacy, that their accidental conjunction is one of the most singular in history.

—We have referred elsewhere to Von Mohl's discussion of the Civil Service, but we may here call attention to another work of some value: "Des Offices considérés au point de vue des Transactions Privées et des Intérêts de l'État," by Eugène Durand. This is a prize essay, published in Paris in 1863. Its main business is to examine the title of such "offices" as are still bought and sold in France. These are the places of advocates of the court of cassation, of attorneys, of clerks and tipstaffs, of brokers and of appraisers. Of course, the technical parts of the book have no application here, where there is at least, so far as the Government is concerned, absolute free trade in all private employments. But the clever and very learned essay on the history of the sale of offices in Rome and in France has a special interest for the reformers here. Much of the mischief commented on by classical authors—and Durand cites most apt illustrations from Cicero, Lucan, Seneca, Quinctilian, Suetonius, Ammianus Marcellinus, and from the Corpus Juris—can be likened to nothing so much as the daily evils of our own political corruption. It is well to find that there are well-known examples of the lasting injury done by making offices the reward of political partisanship, covered by the shadow of years, and yet far more tolerable than the abuses which have grown up to be a recognized part of our own public life. The universal condemnation of our own faulty system passes too often unheeded, because both those who scold and those who are to blame do not think of the consequences. Yet the fall of the Roman Empire and the outbreak of the French Revolution are, in no small degree, attributable to the deep wounds inflicted by just such abuses of the right and power of political appointments as we are daily witnessing.

—There has lately appeared the second part of the "Diario Privato-politico-militare dell' Ammiraglio C. di Persano nella Campagna Navale delli anni 1860 e 1861," which continues to be a very important contribution to the history of Italian unity as won in our day. The first part was fuller, perhaps, of novel information, as being nearer to the inception of the plan by which the Italian government was to encourage and provoke revolution, without compromising itself and the national cause by too open intervention. The second part, however, is of use in confirming what has heretofore transpired. It covers the period from the 4th of August to the 11th of September, inclusive, in which time Garibaldi, having overrun Sicily, crossed over to the peninsula and began his march on Naples. Admiral Persano adheres to his original method of simple and brief narration, day by day, intercalated with official letters, proclamations, manifestoes, etc., many of which appear for the first time in print. Count Cavour's attitude at this crisis, his forethought and far-reaching designs, are brought into strong relief in his communications to the admiral. The latter's motive, it is conjectured, in publishing this diary is to overcome the odium attached to him by his defeat in 1866, at Lissa, by recalling his faithful and able services in the birth-struggle of the kingdom.

LIFE OF GIBSON, THE SCULPTOR.*

WHOEVER wishes to see the record of a perfectly happy life may find it in this volume. Gibson was perfectly happy at least, if a man could be happy or unhappy who could scarcely be said to share the lot or to experience the ordinary pains and pleasures of humanity. He was a born artist, and lived absolutely in his calling. To take refuge in art and its truth from all the troubles and doubts of the age, the precept of Goethe, would have been completely fulfilled by Gibson, if Gibson had ever been outside the sanctuary of art, or experienced any of the doubts or troubles. But for him, from his cradle to his grave, his study was the world, and the only real questions were questions of art.

He was the son of poor parents, who lived at Conway, in North Wales, and spoke Welsh; though, as Gibson is not a Welsh name, its bearer was probably a descendant of the colony planted here, as well as in the other fortress towns founded in Wales by Edward I. The sculptor was very near being an American, for, when he was nine years old, his parents determined to emigrate to America, and went to Liverpool with the intention of embarking, but, on seeing the ships, his mother's heart failed her, and the family settled down in Liverpool. The instinct of art was, from the first, strong in the child. He drew natural objects, but, as he says, he drew not from the object itself, but from memory, after having thoroughly impressed the object on his mind—a symptom, perhaps, of that tendency to the pure ideal of form which determines an artist's nature to sculpture rather than to the other arts. At school he drew in lesson hours, and received tokens of his master's want of æsthetic sympathy which seem to have left a profound impression on his mind. Apprenticed, through the poverty of his parents, to a cabinetmaker, he persuaded his master so far to mitigate his lot as to employ him on the ornamentation of furniture, and soon, the heaven of art having been opened to him by an introduction to some marble-works, his soul decisively rose against the bondage of cabinetmaking, and, to use his own words, he "fell upon a plan of emancipating himself." The plan was simply that of refusing to work for the cabinetmaker, and, when his master scolded him, declaring that he had no defence, and that he was ready to serve out the remaining years of his apprenticeship in prison. With a martyr so meek and so inflexible there was nothing to be done, whether by a Roman magistrate or by a cabinetmaker. He ceased to ornament furniture, and, being received into the marble-works, became a sculptor. Without pretending to assign to the author of the "Hunter" and the "Venus" his exact rank in his art, it may be safely said that the voice in his breast which bade him make no more cabinets was that of nature, and that this young Welshman, as well as the sculptor of the Parthenon, saw ideal beauty, and felt in himself the power of giving it shape. His gift was not only real, but in a singular degree special. He seems to have been utterly devoid of a taste for painting. He actually stood before a completely finished picture of Turner, and complimented the painter on having made a "very fine beginning." The force of ignorance could no further go. Lady Eastlake also tells us that he had no feeling for natural scenery, and that he was too honest to feign it.

In his twenty-seventh year he was enabled, by the help of his friends, to go to Rome. Chantry disapproved of the step, as did other advisers; but Gibson had dreamt a dream of an eagle, soaring with him on its wings, and setting him down in the Eternal City. He was most generously welcomed by Canova, and admitted to that master's studio. Many years afterwards, he writes of their first long interview:

"I need not say that this interview delighted me, while his gentle manners, his deep, sonorous voice, and his very finely formed features, made an impression on me which time has never lessened. Dear, generous master! I see you before me now; I hear your soft Venetian dialect, and your kindly words inspiring my efforts and gently correcting my defects. Yes, my heart still swells with grateful recollection of you."

At Rome the remaining forty-eight years of his life were passed, so that his fame, whatever it may be, really belongs more to Rome than to his own country. His existence was that of a monk of the studio. He seems to have almost lost all power of dealing with the outer world, and he incurred the imputation of avarice, while he was, in fact, exceedingly generous, simply by his ignorance of the purchasing power of money. He was wholly unfit to take care of himself. Just able to travel with a vetturino, on railroads he was utterly lost. His friends might start him with the right ticket, but he was always getting out at the wrong place. Bound for Chichester, he gets out at Portsmouth, and insists on being taken to the cathedral. On another occasion, he gets out at a little wayside station, merely because he sees other people getting out; and the train at once going off with his baggage, he pours out his grief and bewilderment to a policeman, who asks him whether he is a foreigner. He replies that he is a sculptor, whereupon the policeman, whose father had worked under Flaxman, becomes "no longer so sharp and laconic." In his later years he enjoyed the supreme good fortune of having, as his pupil and protector, Miss Hosmer, to whom he was in art what Canova had been to him; while the "shrewd, racy, transatlantic young lady" helped out of scrapes the teacher whose serene simplicity and guilelessness she at once profoundly respected and keenly relished. They were on a tour together in Switzerland, and Gibson had three pieces of baggage, which Miss Hosmer looked after. She observed that, to the end of the journey, one of the three was never opened; and, on asking why he had taken it with him, and given her the trouble of looking after it, "The Greeks had a great respect for the number three—yes, the Greeks—for the number three"—was all the explanation she ever obtained. The mightiest of all instincts, as Macaulay calls it, seems barely to have been awakened from its repose in the sculptor's heart. Something there was about a bit of temptation at Liverpool which "glided round him," but he was never seriously in love. A woman might as well have married a merman.

Once the world without made such a noise, and so close to the sculptor's studio, that he could not help turning from his work to look at it. It was the Roman Revolution going by.

"The 15th of March was a day new, extraordinary, and memorable for the Romans. The long-expected Constitution of Pio Nono appeared upon the walls. In the afternoon the people and the National Guard went by thousands and thousands to the Quirinal, to thank the Pope, the first proclaimer of Italian liberty. The National Guard are beautifully, yet simply dressed. The costume was designed by Canevari. But why dress infantry with helmet and red horsehair, and with the short, straight, antique sword. The answer is, that they may be as much as possible like the antique Romans. When all were assembled, the Pope came to the balcony. There stood the splendidly-robed Pontiff—the truly pious and just—the champion of liberty. The rays of that sun which has witnessed the thousand vicissitudes of the Eternal City fell upon his Holiness with glowing brightness. The shout of 'Viva Pio Nono!' from the emancipated Romans was sublime. He then gave a prayer, to which all responded, and the voice of the multitude fell on my ears like the voice of the disturbed ocean restored to tranquillity. He made no speech, but gave the benediction, when the people rose again, and the 'vivas' were deafening. The compact battalions of the National Guard were splendid, and their arms glittered like a forest of sparkling glass and gold, for every man raised his brass helmet up on his bayonet, and the numerous standards, with golden eagles, waved to and fro. Above them were the majestic statues of Castor and Pollux, while the parting rays of the setting sun fell softly upon the affecting scene."

It is impossible to imagine a more grotesque union, or one more sure to result in a speedy divorce, than this between the mediæval Papacy, personified by Pio Nono, and classical republicanism symbolized by the Roman swords and helmets and the eagles. Other scenes soon followed:

"One day, when I was working in my studio, two English friends entered, and said, 'Have you heard the news?' I said, 'My man tells me that Count Rossi has been assassinated, but I can't believe it.' Then they said, 'Put on your coat and come with us.' I did so, and went with them to the Corso, where we found every house on each side with flags and tapestry, purple and gold, displayed in token of rejoicing at the horrid event which had just taken place. In the evening of that day insulting songs were sung under the window of the widow, who was that night conveyed, in a private carriage of the Pope's, to Civita Vecchia."

* "Life of John Gibson, R.A., Sculptor. Edited by Lady Eastlake." London: Longmans.

Then Garibaldi enters Rome, and the artist is struck with his figure. "He is quite young, and I have seldom seen a more beautiful head; his profile is like a statue." All eyes are turned on him, particularly those of the ladies. "As he is beautiful, lawless, and brave, he is sure to please them." The ladies must say whether it is so.

When we ask what Gibson's idea of his art, its proper aspirations, and its future, was, the answer is easy and short. He regarded it simply as a following of the Greeks. Out of the path which the Greeks have traced there is no salvation. "I say this to the people, whatever the Greeks did was right; that ought to be our law in sculpture." "To surpass the best works of the Greeks is a hopeless task; to approach them is a triumph." "In the art of sculpture the Greeks were gods; we, with all our efforts, find it hard toil to creep up after them; the eminence on which they stood is beyond our reach." In conformity with this doctrine, Gibson chose for his works of imagination almost exclusively classical subjects, and in his portrait-sculpture insisted on classical treatment. Even the unstatuesque figure of England's virtuous Queen—even Sir Robert Peel, with his bald head, his prominent stomach, and his spindle legs—even the eminently modern and commercial Huskisson—were not to be exempted from the inexorable law. But surely these avowals raise a serious question. Will the best mind of the world ever be attracted to an art which thus declares itself the bondmaid of a very distant past, and despairs of ever achieving again what was achieved two thousand years ago? Lady Eastlake avers, probably with truth, that, among five hundred educated men and women, there are not five who can really appreciate the Elgin marbles, though, in her own country, the education of the men is classical, and, therefore, peculiarly suited to qualify them for understanding classical art. But the fault may lie in the art, which fails to appeal to existing humanity, as well as in the humanity which fails to appreciate the art: if Paris and London are busy, so was Athens in the time of Pericles; action is not a disqualification for feeling; for some of the best art-critics, including Pericles himself, have been very busy men. The Catholic Middle Ages produced a style of monumental sculpture real and beautiful in its way, into which the people thoroughly entered. Michael Angelo was a solitary miracle; while we bow before his individual might, we feel that he could not be the parent of a universal school. Since Michael Angelo sculpture has failed to gain a strong hold on the feelings of mankind, look for the indications of these feelings where you will. Rome, according to Gibson, was the only home of the sculptor. It may be so; but a universal art, when it appears, will have a home in every civilized land.

Lady Eastlake modestly describes her function as only that of an editor. The core of the book is a memoir written by, or rather extracted from, Gibson himself. But Lady Eastlake has done a good deal both in the way of introduction and in the way of supplement and interpretation; and she has done it pleasantly and well.

HOW CROPS FEED.*

To the crowd at a menagerie the most attractive part of the exhibition is seeing the animals fed, and to agriculturists no part of the science of agriculture is more interesting than that which pertains to the feeding of plants. Scientific and practical men have given many years of careful thought and experiment to the endeavor to wrest from the soil the secret of what food plants like best, and how best and most cheaply to supply the right kind of food. The earliest enquirers were familiar with the phenomena of culture, had seen fertile soils grow poor under long cropping with no return of manure, and poor soils give good crops with manure or after long rest; and, after all our pains, we know little more now than they did. This book comes to us misnamed, for it tells the common reader no more about how crops feed than a bill of fare tells how men feed. To the average or even well-read farmer it can give but little instruction and no advice; to the scientific enquirer, of experience and reading, it will be invaluable; as a text-book in colleges and scientific schools, it must stand high; and, considered as a work on agricultural chemistry or agricultural mineralogy, it has no equal. But the reader must not look to it for theory, advice, or generalizing; it gives nothing of the sort, but is full of details of experiments, chemical facts, and discoveries which have been buried out of the sight of even good students who are debarred access to the transactions of the learned societies of Europe. Prof. Johnson has simplified the usual chemical technology and phraseology a good deal, and when he has not given new matter has presented old in a more than commonly clear manner, and permits the reader to compare for himself experiments which seem to contradict each other, and to draw his own conclusions.

Boussingault and Liebig have hitherto been representatives of two different schools of theoretic agriculture, the first believing in the potency of nitrogenous matters, the latter claiming greater importance for the saline manures which represent the elements contained in the ash of plants. The many experiments quoted by Prof. Johnson seem to give the nitrogenous side the predominance, for they show most conclusively that even a soil liberally supplied with saline and nitrogenous elements will respond to proper doses of nitrates as to a spur. On page 271 he recites an experiment where seeds were grown in pots prepared for them and furnished with a suitable quantity of saline food. The seeds in one pot were given in addition a little nitrate of potash, and the result, as is shown by an illustration, was enormously in favor of the nitrate. Single experiments, however, are of trifling value, as there may always be something on the large scale of actual earth culture to disturb the perfect working of the theories thus developed. Prof. Johnson accordingly offers many pages of proof that the use of nitrogenous manures gives man a power over vegetation not otherwise attainable. He brings out with great distinctness the relations of oxygen in the form of ozone to vegetation, and shows the great value of humus, clay, and all porous and finely divided materials in the soil for their absorbent qualities. He clearly demonstrates that for its actual value as food for plants the humus, which is dark-colored to the eye and seems the richest possible plant food, is of small consequence other than as a powerfully absorbing and condensing sponge, which sucks up into its pores the gases and vaporous saline forms of matter which plants are sure to want, and which it slowly yields to them when wanted.

Some of the facts brought out are quite remarkable, as they overturn some of the most firmly fixed beliefs of agriculturists. For instance, farmers and thinkers have been at a loss to decide what is the peculiar value of gypsum, plaster of Paris, or sulphate of lime, which, spread in small quantities over many soils, is followed by a growth of crop out of proportion to the mineral food the plaster seems to furnish. Making due allowance for the relative and reactionary power of the sulphuric acid and the lime, there still seemed an influence not accounted for, and it has come to be believed that plaster has a great affinity for water, and that its capacity of absorbing water, which it can in turn yield to the roots, must be the source of its power. A series of experiments were tried with a long list of substances to test their absorbent qualities. It included plaster, sulphate of magnesia, many mineral matters, peat, rich garden soil, and clay, and gypsum proved to be the least absorptive of any excepting sulphate of magnesia. If the power of gypsum were expressed by 1, peat would be 200, and clay 300, and, of course, directly in proportion to the absorbent power is the capacity of returning moisture to the air in dry periods.

Another singular fact, if it is a fact, is the great disproportion which exists between the exhaling capacity of plants and the natural supplies of water. We should say, if vegetation exhaled more water through its leaves than the annual rain-fall, that in a short time any land would become a desert like Sahara. If the experiments given by Johnson are at all reliable, we must believe that there is some source of supply of moisture quite inexhaustible without regard to rain, for on page 202 there are two experiments, one by Schleiden, and one by Schübler; the first found that a square foot of grass land exhaled "more than 1½ lbs. of water in 24 hours," the latter states that "in the same time one square foot of pasture grass exhaled nearly 5½ lbs. of water." Where 45 inches falls annually to the square foot there would be 6,480 cubic inches of water for every foot, or about 223 gallons=230 lbs. of water; and if evaporation were to go on at the rate of 1½ lbs. to the square foot every 24 hours, in 150 days all the rain-fall would have evaporated; and were 5½ lbs. exhaled, it would take but about 30 days to use up the rain-fall. These experiments seem to prove too much, but that is no fault of Prof. Johnson's. We might occupy much of our space with instructive extracts and descriptions of experiments, but instead will refer all interested to the book itself. Our only complaint against the author is a badly selected title, but we think the publishers ought to try to give so good a book a better dress to wear; the paper is of a very poor quality, the margins of the pages narrow, the covers scrimped, and the book, therefore, as a book, has a needlessly unattractive appearance.

* "How Crops Feed. By S. W. Johnson." New York: Orange Judd & Co.

RECENT TEXT-BOOKS.

It is so seldom that the teacher of geology can find anything to praise in the numerous first books, alphabets, and introductions to that science which infest the path of the beginner, that he is in danger of lauding too highly the excellent compendium of elementary information by Prof. Ansted, entitled "The Earth's History; or, First Lessons in Geology" (Lippincott & Co.). It is, without doubt, the best work of the kind in our language. The advanced student will fail to find here any great mass of geological details such as are contained in the manuals of Jukes and Lyell; but the beginner will obtain an admirable outline of the general truths concerning the history of our earth. Most books of this kind are antiquated before they leave the press, the compilers get their materials at second or third-hand, and the march of the physical sciences is so rapid that when they come to the reader's hands a large portion of their statements have been rendered incorrect or incomplete. Professor Ansted has, however, in this little book given the student an opportunity of learning, in a few and simple words, the essential matter of all the latest discoveries in geology of great importance. He is particularly happy in his brief recital of the most important of the evidences concerning the antiquity of man and the proof of his association with the cave bear and the mammoth. He is also fortunate in setting before the student with impartiality the different views which may be held by scientific men concerning important questions, with possibly a single exception, when he states that Eozoon Canadense is a rhizopod—a point which must be regarded as still doubtful while so able an observer as Professor King disputes it.

The only drawback the book has for the American student is that it has been especially prepared for the inhabitants of Great Britain, and applies especially to the phenomena found there. Local names and local fossils are frequently cited as illustrations of points which are thereby left obscure to a dweller on this continent. This local coloring, which is entirely pardonable in this place, is seen at one or two other points where it is not so well warranted. It would be hard to justify, to any one but an Englishman, the assertion that "geology has always been essentially an English branch of science." English geologists have been so long in the habit of regarding their own little island as the epitome of all geological action, and as the only field in which a student can learn that science, that they manifest an unconscious contempt for the labors of those who have worked in other fields. To speak of a science as "essentially English," which has for its greatest names Von Buch, the ablest investigator, and D'Orbigny, the greatest systematizer—both men who were born and trained in other fields—partakes largely of the absurd.

The details of the book are quite well managed, the derivations of the scientific names given in the text, and not in that secure retreat from observation—a glossary at the end of the book. The names of the fossils cited are remarkably correct, which is well accounted for by the fact that Mr. Etheridge, of the Jermyn Street School of Mines, revised this part of the work. The type and paper are both fair, but the plates are carelessly done, and often convey a too imperfect idea of the character of the objects they represent to be of any use to the student.

The praise which has been given to this book should not be construed into approval of the use of this or any other printed introduction into the science of which it treats. A day in the field with any competent observer will be worth more to the beginner in geology than half-a-year's study of the best text-books ever written. The highest claim of the natural sciences to a place in a liberal education is in that they give the student close investigative contact with nature. It would be difficult to devise a method of teaching a science better calculated to prevent this result than that which is afforded by text-book teaching.

Professor Harrington's edition of Plautus (Harpers) is on the whole scholarly and satisfactory. The low standard of demand in our colleges is probably the reason that he has given less instruction in early Latin than we could have wished in an edition of this author. For the study of the literature of Plautus it is excellent; for philological study it leaves much to be desired. The notes are in the main well fitted for the use of students, but are sometimes rather meagre; for instance, we hardly think an ordinary class would understand the drift of verse 11 of the Captives without some explanation. We are surprised, too, at certain inaccurate or, at any rate, inconsiderate expressions. Thus, the note to verse 15 of the Captives contrasts the capite censi with the opibus vestris censi, as if the possessive (which stands in the text) were part of a technical expression; for the matter of that, the correct technical expression for those not capite censi was assidui. Again, the note to the Trinummus, verse 152, speaks of the mention of Nummi Philippei as an anachronism, because they were first coined by Philip of Macedon, "of course long after the incidents of the play were supposed to have happened." But Philemon, from whom this play is translated, lived after Philip of Macedon, and the scene is naturally laid in his own time. In the introduction to this play, again, we find one of those bits of illogical moralizing which even sensible men seem sometimes to feel themselves called upon to perpetrate: "The similarity of heathen moral maxims to the morality of the Scriptures is the unconscious testimony of human experience that the writers of the Bible were inspired by One who perfectly knew men."

An American edition of Madvig's Latin Grammar (Ginn Bros.) may justly be pronounced the most important aid to Latin scholarship which our community has for a long time received. We have had no Latin grammar of American authorship worthy to be compared with the Greek grammars of Sophocles, Crosby, and Hadley; and the lack was but poorly supplied by the edition of Zumpt, which is got up in so unattractive a style that it has never come into general use, as its merits would have entitled it to do. But this edition of Madvig is elegant and attractive in the highest degree; type and paper are both of a quality to exact the least amount of labor from the eyes. Even, however, if the two books were equally agreeable to the eye, we should decidedly prefer Madvig to Zumpt for college use. The accuracy and comprehensiveness of Zumpt's grammar are too well known to need insisting upon; in these qualities it is not likely to be surpassed. But Madwig adds to this comprehensiveness and accuracy a far superior power of generalization; or at any rate, taking up the analysis of the usages of the language where Zumpt left it, he has carried it still further. At the same time, this more philosophical treatment is not à priori or over-theoretical; the generalizations are purely the result of the observation of facts, not of preconceived theories, so that the grammar is in the main just what a grammar should be—a well-digested analysis of actual facts and usages. An illustration of this quality is found in the rule for verbs governing the dative, where Zumpt merely enumerates "to command, serve, trust," etc., while Madvig gives "various intransitive verbs, which denote an action, state of mind, or condition, with reference to a person or thing, but without carrying (to a Latin) the idea of an immediate acting upon it;" after which follows a classified list of such verbs. A rule like this is not so easy for school-boys to learn and recite, but is far better for students who aim to understand the principles of the language.

Mr. Raub's "Plain Educational Talks with Teachers and Parents" (Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger) is a book calculated to do much good. Its ideas are eminently sensible and judicious, and are presented in a clear and attractive manner. Not that there is anything new in them—they are such as have long been familiar to thinkers upon educational subjects—but every repetition of these fundamental principles, every restatement of them which brings them before persons to whom they are new, or which confirms and strengthens them in those to whom they are not new, is a clear gain. The titles of some of the chapters—"Machine Education," "Educational Cramming," "The Influence of Home Example," "Too Early at School"—indicate the kind of views made most prominent by this writer. A good illustration of his style in thought and expression is the following (p. 67)—he has been speaking of the habit of the child at home to study nature by observation: "He is a close student of nature, and follows out nature's plan of learning. But this doesn't exactly suit us; so we catch the little fellow and lead him to the school-house, and there, with a number of others of the same age, or size, or advancement, we say he goes to school. He seems to think that is more like going to prison, the plan of getting knowledge there is so different from the plan he pursued at home. He no longer studies nature's objects, but sits at a little desk, and has a book or a card put before his eyes," etc.

Mr. Sands's "Philosophy of Teaching" (Harpers) is in the same general direction of reform, and is worth reading for some excellent points very well developed. But, while much more carefully written than Mr. Raub's book, it is heavier and less readable; and we are sorry that Mr. Sands thinks that progress consists in wholly rejecting the old foundations of education. Part of his treatise, which might very well have been spared, consists of an attack on classical education; and he even makes a savage onslaught on our old friends "'Little Red Riding-Hood,' or some other equally foolish or more injurious tale such as 'Bluebeard' or 'Cinderella.'" For such he would substitute "anecdotes of great men, suitably arranged; events in history and biography, carrying with them valuable and important morals."

Miss Elizabeth Peabody has published a new edition of her "Kindergarten Guide" (Schermerhorn), which she has revised and materially altered after a visit to Germany and observations of the German Kindergarten. The reader will make allowance for a generous enthusiasm which hardly thinks children know how to play at all until Fröbel has taught them, and will find the book full of thought and genuine sentiment, and abounding in excellent practical suggestions. Thus, it is a very real truth, if somewhat quaintly expressed (p. 39), that the child knowing that the sorrows of life are outside of it, "of course, it is bodily life that it seeks at first, trying to incorporate the without with the within by eating everything." Again (p. 55): "There is such a thing as making children, I will not say too conscientious, but too conscious." Again (p. 61): "Let the child hammer out some substance with a mallet, and he will never forget the meaning of malleable." Mrs. Mann's "Letters on the Moral Culture of Infancy" form a valuable portion of the work.

The little French stories published by Mr. Urbino, such as the "Contes," of Mesdames de Ségur and Carraud, are precisely fitted for those who believe, as we do, that a child can hardly be too young to learn French; and that the empirical knowledge of this language, acquired very early, is the best foundation for future linguistic studies. Mr. Urbino's books, too, are models of execution, in their white paper and clear type.

The marked tendency toward the use of small text-books has given us new Latin and Greek grammars, intended for the use of beginners, but, we should say, hardly meeting the want. We confess that we do not see the necessity of compiling mere paradigms of declensions and conjugations—for Prof. Silber's Latin Grammar (Barnes) is hardly more—moreover, in that old worn-out routine which ought to be discarded from our schools at last. A pupil who studies Latin must complete at least a preparatory course, if he would derive any profit from the study; but even for this the book before us does not contain enough, and it will be impossible to teach Latin syntax from such catechism-like paragraphs, without the life of illustration by examples. Moreover, we think the only scientific way of teaching Latin declensions and conjugations is the crude form system, at least in a certain degree; in Greek, where it is even more essential, it seems already to have got a foothold. Professor Waddell's Greek Grammar (Harpers) is much better, and more nearly adapted for a short complete course. Still even this is too meagre—preparatory rather than compendious, and excellent as it is in most of the detail, is wholly old-fashioned—gives no intimation of the crude-form principle, and—will it be believed?—goes back to the old discarded τυπτω as a paradigm. The syntax of the moods is very inadequate; and under the head of Negatives it is satisfied with the old rule that "two negatives in Greek generally strengthen the negation." It would have required only one more line to give the correct rule, that this is the case when a negative is followed by a compound negative of the same kind.

Believing, with Archbishop Whately, that "nothing can be more preposterous than laboring to acquire the art of pretending to be what one is not, and to feel what he does not, in order that he may be enabled, on a real emergency, to pretend to be and to feel just what the occasion itself requires and suggests; in short, to personate himself," we have no liking for systems of elocution and oratory like this of Mr. Griffith (Chicago: Adams, Blackmer & Lyon). The hideous pictures of the mouth, variously distorted to utter various sentiments; the curious little black figures, shaped like pears, crook-neck squashes, dolphins, and pollywogs, which the voice is to follow in giving sundry indescribable pitches, stresses, and waves; and the gesticulating figures illustrating "how frightful the scene!" and "how beautiful are the clouds!"—all these alike are an abomination to us. For its avowed object, however—that is, to cultivate an artificial style of public speaking—this book seems very well adapted.

There are so many good arithmetics in the market, each having its special points of excellence, that it is hard to say that any one is decidedly better than another, and hard to say what especial demand is met by "Walton's Illustrated Practical Arithmetic" (Brewer & Tileston). It is certainly a good book, and has many very good points. On the other hand, there appear to us to be some defects, as, for instance, in teaching short division before long, and in the very inadequate sections on numeration. Nor do the illustrations seem to add anything to its value. The authors do well in omitting much of the lumber of compound numbers, and aiming to give only what is practically useful. They do well, too, in introducing the metric system and other features demanded by the present relations of trade; but why not give such dimensions as the quarter and the stone, which are used so generally in England?

Prof. Day's "Speller" (Scribner) has many merits of arrangement and detail which recommend it for use. Especially it aims—and this is its most striking feature—to serve as a basis for a more scientific study of the language. The last pages are very valuable in this point of view; but we are sorry that Mr. Day has thought it necessary to introduce the book by primer exercises of monosyllables, with such sentences as "It is my ox." These do not legitimately belong to a spelling-book.

Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church. With an Introduction on the Study of Ecclesiastical History. By Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D.D., Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church. From the second London edition, revised. (New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1870.)—This book, considered as a contribution to the literature of popular information, or as a preliminary guide to a field very little cultivated by English scholars, may be said to possess high merits. Most of its readers will find in it much that is entirely new to them, and that conveyed in a very pleasing manner; all will find additional information on topics of history and church life both curious and important; new light shed on many an interesting point, and plenty of suggestive remarks. Besides, the whole of it is pervaded by a spirit of judicial calmness and critical candor, such as we rarely meet with in theologians of either the conservative or the reformatory camp. To say much more, however; to represent the book as an exhaustive work on its subject, as a product of vast research or of profound original criticism, would be praising it beyond merit, and elevating it above what it pretends to be. Dr. Stanley has undoubtedly spent a great deal of conscientious labor, and has used excellent materials in the study of this vast field—though we are struck with the scantiness of the quotations from German sources—but in presenting the results of his studies in the lectures before us, he acquaints us only with its surface, and passes over parts of it with the utmost rapidity—witness the little he says about the Nestorian, Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, Georgian, and Danubian branches of the Eastern Church. All that is more or less hidden to the eye of the fugitive observer, and in part forms the foundations of the ecclesiastical structures brought into view, he but lightly touches upon. Broadly tolerant, he shuns questions of dogma to an excess, and in all matters of essential religious importance, from fear of performing a dissection, almost entirely avoids analysis and critical incision. We are shown the varying outer forms of the Church establishments, and told a great deal about the men that mould them—and among others, many a petty, almost trivial detail; but with this and little more we must be satisfied. We believe the author goes much too far in the application of his maxim that "the proper material for ecclesiastical history is, after all, not institutions and opinions, but events and persons."

Of the twelve lectures forming the main part of the book, one is devoted to the general divisions, historical epochs, characteristics, and advantages derived from the study of the Eastern Church; four treat of the Council of Nicæa; one sketches the Emperor Constantine; one, Athanasius; one, Mahometanism in its relations to the Eastern Church; and the four last present the principal phases of Russian Church history. These latter are the most readable of the lectures, but those devoted to the first Œcumenical Council are by far the most elaborate. The two prominent personages of the Russian portion, the Patriarch Nicon and Peter the Great, the reformers of their Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, form interesting counter-figures to those of Athanasius and Constantine. The Russian portion was evidently intended to be the most original contribution of the author in this field, and in order to gain more accurate information he even took the trouble of visiting Moscow, the focus of Russian nationality and faith; yet we cannot say he has done full justice to his subject. Patriarch Nicon's reform and the schism, the main points, are long enough dwelt upon, it is true; but what we hear about them chiefly concerns a few events and men, and the characterization of schismatic life and opposition in the Russian empire—a highly interesting topic, for which Haxthausen and others offer ample materials—is almost entirely wanting. Some inaccuracies—such as, for instance, the placing of "the reign of Stephen Dushan," who ascended the throne of Servia in 1336, "in the twelfth century" (p. 103); the statement that those who "still hold to the Greek calendar" are "eleven days behind the rest of the civilized world" (p. 116); and several slight errors in the chronological tables annexed to the last lectures—cause us also to suspect that the author, in spite of his fondness for the Eastern ecclesiastical world in all its extent, has neglected to acquire a knowledge of the Slavic division of his field proportionate to his knowledge of the Byzantine. His endeavor to use a correct spelling of Russian names is not carried through with consistency. Whether the mention of "the Iconoclasm of the seventh century in Constantinople," in "connection with the nearly contemporaneous rise of Mahometanism" (p. 377), is a slip of the pen or an intentional semi-anachronism, we are unable to say.

Staatsrecht, Völkerrecht und Politik. Von Robert von Mohl. (Tübingen. 3 vols. 1862, 1865, 1869.)—Robert von Mohl, the author of many learned works on political science, has recently published the third volume of his last treatise on the present state of the leading branches of this great subject. His "Politik" appeared last year at Tübingen, and is a stout octavo of over 700 pages. It discusses education, civil service, social science, and a number of subordinate matters—e.g., emancipation of the Jews, abolition of the death penalty, the necessity of an international criminal law, etc. The part devoted to civil service (347–470) has a particular interest here just now, in view of our own efforts at reform in that direction. Mohl refers at p. 395 to Jenckes's bill, and to the discussions on it in Congress, but in a tone that shows how little hope he entertains of its adoption. Of course, in a general treatise there is little to be found of the kind of practical instruction which we are constantly looking for, but a careful study of the views here set forth on the various kinds of civil service, of the necessity of a sound training and a careful advancement, may well be commended to all students of political science. It is to be regretted that the thoughtful study dedicated by Mohl to the political literature and science—or unscience—of the United States has received so little return at our hands, in the way of translation or even commendation, and to others than the few who have read his works in the original German his labors are almost unknown. The late Mr. Edmund Dana, of Boston, began a translation of Mohl's "Political Literature," and that part of it which relates to the United States might well be the groundwork for a complete bibliography of the subject. Judge Jameson's work on "Constitutional Conventions" serves to show how a single branch of the great whole can be exhaustively treated, although as yet the field in other directions is almost untouched.

Mohl's "Politik," like his other works, suffers from what De Morgan (in his note to the Crabb Robinson book) calls the seven capital sins of the German language—although it might be summarized in one, that there is too much of it. Human nature, at least any part of it that we know in this country or any other, except German professors and statesmen like Mohl himself, can hardly be expected to read books, even those on subjects of the most pressing interest, which go on in ever-increasing volumes, supplying, encyclopædia-like, all the learning of the subject, but never exhausting either it or themselves. If a strong, energetic, and useful abstract of the contents of this last work, or of any of the series to which it belongs —five or six now—could be made, it would be sure to find readers and students, who could transfuse something of the spirit of scientific zeal and enlightened liberalism of Mohl and his German school into our own better class of political students and studious politicians. It is at least pleasant to hope that, in some not impossible future, we may see in practical working here institutions such as Mohl urgently presses on the authorities in Germany, for the training of civil servants and for the encouragement of the service itself; but we must do great things before we come to that.

Mohl treats of "civil service" in synthetical rather than in analytical, in historical rather than legal method, and takes up the leading topics in the following order: Beginning with a clear, characteristic statement of the comfortable faith with which each country believes its own civil service the best, he shows how each form of government—the monarchical, aristocratic, democratic—has its own system of appointment. Then come the different tenures of office, according as they depend on right or property in the office, on election or on voluntary undertaking of its duties. A thorough account of the mischief done by too great an extension of the parliamentary system of government aids in explaining some of the abuses that have taken root in our own civil service. The direct interposition of the members of Congress, and the effort of members of the Government to strengthen their position by giving appointments to friends in Congress, are sources of mischief that cannot find words strong enough to represent the evils that are but too patent among us. Mohl's decided preference is for the English civil service, with its gradually increasing standard of examination, and for the large proportion of offices filled by country magnates without pay, as conditions of their great interest in the sound administration of local affairs. The absolute dependence of French civil servants on the central government is well contrasted with the firm grasp with which the Prussian civil service holds its own on the varying shades of government, influencing and controlling alike the liberals, the conservatives, and the military annexationists now in power.

Of the necessity for better education for the civil service, no man can speak with more authority than Mohl. A citizen of Würtemberg, a professor and author of political science, one of his earliest works was a treatise on our own constitutional law, published in 1824. The reaction drove him from Tübingen to the more liberal ground of Heidelberg; during the short-lived German Empire, he was Minister of the Interior, and active in presenting plans for laws which were hardly drafted before the Empire fell. Returned to his chair, he took an active part in the reorganization of Baden; and, on a change of administration in Würtemberg, was appointed minister to Bavaria, where he dates this his last work. The account that he gives of the existing sources and helps for educating civil servants in Europe shows how much yet remains to be done there to bring the practical superiority of their systems to anything like a theoretical excellence. The total absence in France of any official education or examination is hardly more mischievous than the absolute level of preparation to which all professions and all classes of civil servants are brought in Germany. England is further forward in the development of civil service, for, having established a thorough system of examination, it raises the standard by supplying the means of education to all who look forward to this career. That the success has been satisfactory to the public as well as to the official world is best proved by the recent suggestion of a leading London banker to apply the same system to the clerks in commercial houses. It is to be hoped that in our new technical schools there will yet be provided instruction for those who desire to be "civil servants."

Politische Geschichte der Gegenwart. Von Wilhelm Müller, Professor. I. Bund, 1867; II. Bund, 1868. (Berlin: Julius Springer. 1868–69.)—These two political annuals, each of which contains about two hundred octavo pages, do not pretend to give a complete history of political events, but rather a review—as far as possible in connected form—of the most important developments, changes, and debates which took place in the years they record. This is executed with special regard to the affairs of Germany, and with the unconcealed object of promoting the extension of the Confederation headed by Prussia beyond the line of the Main, which separates it from the section of the German Fatherland to which the author belongs. The whole consists of a kind of pleasant and often piquant talk on the interesting topics of the latest past, which in some parts assumes the regularity of a chronicle, and almost in every part evinces a considerable familiarity with the latest phases of the political situations. A detailed list of contents agreeing with the line of the narrative, and a chronological table of events, are added for the sake of easy reference. The style is plain and popular, and the tone liberal—to a well-marked degree. For the author's liberalism goes exactly as far as his unconditional subserviency to the aims of Count Bismarck allows it to go. That statesman is his hero, his sage, his guide—the master, so to say, of his conscience. The cause he represents in his eyes—the union of Germany—is his summum bonum. Whoever or whatever militates against it is the constant target of his invectives or raillery, and these are not always measured and tasteful. He detests Napoleon and French chauvinism, hates the Danes, has no sympathy for Poland, makes war on Beust, combats the South-German particularists, coquets with Russia and Italy, is rather satisfied with England and the United States, and rejoices at the fall of Isabella, chiefly on account of her relations with the French court. To Belgium, Holland, Sweden, and Switzerland he hardly pays any attention, and when speaking of countries more remote from his main theatre of events even his wonted accuracy occasionally forsakes him. Nevertheless, he is rarely drawn into error or misstatement of facts, and though his annuals might easily be more complete and less partial, even as they are they are more apt to enlighten than to mislead.

Leaves from a Trooper's Diary. (Philadelphia: Published by the Author. 1869.)—This work ought to have been confined to the small circle of friends to whom it is dedicated: "The Anderson Cavalry." As a record of the war the book is absurdly inadequate to the subject. The author was in but one engagement, and he once had a horse shot by a bushwhacker—adventures meritorious in themselves, but their recital is not exciting to the public mind accustomed to heroism on a larger scale. The appendix contains an interesting statement by an officer of the Anderson Cavalry of the causes that led to the mutiny of that regiment while serving under General Rosecrans. It seems to us that if any mutiny was ever justifiable this was, the regiment having been disgracefully trifled with and neglected, until some of the men who were, like their companions, of quite superior character, thought their grievances past endurance. That portion of the regiment which did not engage in the mutiny was singularly unfortunate, suffering heavily by an ambuscade into which it fell, two majors, Rosengarten and Ward, very gallant and excellent officers, losing their lives.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

Authors.—Titles. BOOKS OF THE WEEK. Publishers.—Prices.

Andersen (H. C.), In Spain, and a Visit to Portugal .....(Hurd & Houghton) $1 75
Bowen (Prof. F.), American Political Economy.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 28, swd.....(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Demarest (G. L.), Simple Numbers: a Text-book.....(Ginn Bros. & Co.)
Hawes (S.), Synchronology of the Principal Events in Sacred and Profane History (J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.)
Ludlow (F. H.), The Heart of the Continent.....(Hurd & Houghton) 3 75
Newman (Rev. J. H.), Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Proceedings and Communications of the Essex Institute, Vol. VI., Part I., 1868, swd..... .....(Salem)
Report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, Aug. 1869, Mar. 1870, swd....(Boston)
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XXVI., swd..... (Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
Thomas (Dr. J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, Part 6, swd.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 0 50
The Workshop, No. 4, swd.....(E. Steiger) 0 50
Viardot (L.), Wonders of Italian Art..... .....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50

Fine Arts.

FORTY-FIFTH EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

EVERYBODY has noticed how many studies and sketches there are included in this year's collection. Indeed, the "corridor" is half-filled with them, while a respectable minority of the paintings in the four galleries are of the slighter and more unfinished sort, even if the word "study" could but inaccurately be applied to them. So that, with the highly-finished French pictures of the Beaumont sale only just passed out of sight, and the rarely-opened Belmont gallery open even as we write, with its selected specimens of Meissonier, Bouguereau, and Alfred Stevens, the frequenter of picture-shows goes from delicacy, completeness, carefully subdued tones of color and balanced harmony of parts, to what is a rough-looking exhibition indeed. In one place are perhaps thirty square feet of Mr. Homer's sketchiest memoranda, and in another place as much more of the same artist's scarcely more finished work. And the catalogue has pages of such titles as "Sketch from Nature" and "Study from Nature," sketch of this place and study of that, by Mr. Hart, Mr. Eaton, Mr. Van Elten, and others.

It happens that, as this exhibition opens, all the observers of art are going to Goupil's to see autotype copies of studies by the old masters. The entire collection, of which we spoke several weeks ago as to be found only in Philadelphia at the agency there, is now in New York, for a time at least. We have a chance to see how some painters have built up the fabrics of their knowledge and power, such as they may be, whether of solidity, proof against time, or of evanescent splendor, or crumbling with their own paltry weight.

There is one thing noticeable, and which others than we have noticed, namely, that scarcely a study on these Academy walls is a study of drawing. They do not pretend to be; they are all, or nearly all, alike, memoranda of effects of light and shade and hue. Of course, the studies of drawing may be at the studios and in the portfolios; they are in pencil and pen and ink and crayon; it is merely an accident, or because of a supposed preference of the public for oil-paint on canvas, that these also are not exhibited. But it is a fact that none are here; and true, also, we think, that none of these studies show much care for drawing or thought about drawing. Is this partly because the photograph is relied upon to do a painter's drawing for him, and to preserve the forms of the trees he means to put into his picture, and to catch and fix the difficult foreshortened pose of the figure? Photography is useful to artists in many ways, but it may be very mischievous as well. It was a trenchant criticism made long ago upon a most famous American picture, that it was, after all, evidently a colored photograph. There is no good drawing without much drawing. The thing desired refuses to be drawn correctly if it has not been drawn often before. The lines will not come right in the picture if they are merely copies from the photograph to the canvas; they will not even be truthful, so difficult is it to draw aright only the outline of a tree trunk against the sky; suitable to and powerfully aiding the picture they can never be. And as for expression of face, vigorous action of body, sufficient representation of men and women and children, beasts and birds, the photograph will give you nothing in that way beyond reproducing the work of other painters who did not know it, or did not trust its aid too far.

There are a few painters, and strong ones too, able members of a great school of landscape-painting, who abandon accurate representation of form, and seek nothing in landscape except, in each picture, a single, undivided, momentary artistic impression. Momentary—for though it may often be renewed, and although it may take time to make itself evident to the less instructed spectator, yet one who understands the painter, and can feel completely the impression he aims to produce, will feel it all at once, and as a single revelation of a fresh thought. Let Daubigny and Corot be examples of our meaning. Now, we have no intention of analyzing at present the nature of their works, and certainly none of passing judgment upon the peculiar and exceptional style or styles which they have made celebrated. But we may be safe in saying that no painter can hope to make a Corot unless he can draw. It is certainly safe to say that to neglect learning to draw, with the idea of becoming a Corot by force of ignorance, is very poor training indeed for a painter. To know all, and to decide firmly each time what and how much you will give, is the way to excellence in any style. Nothing but inanity and vague failure comes of a willingness to leave all unlearned except the one petty knack of imitating this or that great painter's manner. This of landscape; but when it is the human figure that we propose to represent, in no matter how modern and popular a genre, good drawing is the one thing needful. A landscape-painter may reduce his foliage to a green membrane hanging upon and clinging to the branches, or to a mist just condensing around them, and yet produce works of art of a certain value and interest—and yet be an Otto Weber or a Corot. But to be a poor or indifferent draughtsman, and yet excel as a painter of subjects of human interest, is, we suppose, simply impossible.

In any branch of art, the ruinous course is the one which so many young painters nowadays seem disposed to follow, namely, the starting with a profound admiration for the works of one master or school to the exclusion of others, and the pursuit of whatever course of study may seem likely to lead to the results they admire. The mischief of all this lies in the erroneous ideas prevalent as to art education generally. The student feels sure that he can become a painter just like his model, if only he can study nature in just the way in which that master paints it. He does not know of the years of labor which the artist he admires has given to his art, of the studies of nature under many aspects, of the open mind and heart and eye which have taken in and made his own so many phases of nature, of the reasons for the final choice of one style or manner of representing nature. It may well be that the student cannot even read the thoughts which are expressed by the pictures he worships, and that he is therefore incapable of appreciating the fitness and almost necessity of the artistic language in which these thoughts are expressed. And it is almost certain that he will be unable to see how completely inferior to the great masters of painting is the man who has a well-defined manner at all. Because his favorite example expresses one series of thoughts in a series of similar pictures, beautiful to him and eagerly bought up by the public, the student thinks that success for him would be the production and the purchase of just such pictures. He does not know that his own business is to try to express his own thoughts in a fitting manner; that he cannot be a copy of his master; that, even if he could, the public does not stand ready to buy his pictures as it had bought his master's pictures. He cannot see—and here is the rock on which young painters make shipwreck—that nothing in nature or in the practice of his art is foreign to his purpose, and that his business is to learn all that his life allows him, to learn in his youth all that his powers and his opportunities allow, and to leave selection till after-life.

It need not be said that the Academy exhibition affords numerous examples of the truth of these statements.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1870.

The Week.

THE Congressional record for the past week is exceedingly meagre, and, except for an Oregon railroad bill, giving away about a million acres of the public lands, which was passed in the House on Friday, there has been nothing done of national interest. On Wednesday week, Mr. Edmunds reported to the Senate, from the Judiciary Committee, a bill permitting any suit, civil or criminal, while pending in any State Court, to be removed to the U. S. Circuit Court, if the defendant intends "to make any defence based upon the authority of a law of the United States, or of any Department of the Government." Such a law, if enacted, would have removed one of the subtlest points in the Richmond mayoralty arguments before Judge Underwood—that, namely, which concerned the competency of the Court. Perhaps this was what suggested the bill to the Committee. On Saturday, Mr. Judd made a praiseworthy but unsuccessful attempt in the House to throw overboard the now hopelessly encumbered Tariff Bill, and to substitute for it a simple measure, embracing but a few articles, and proposing a reduction of duty or of tax on all of them. By a vote of 96 to 32, the House preferred to keep on tinkering—or, rather, the Democrats thought Mr. Judd's method too likely to advance the public business, and so resorted to their professional policy of obstruction. On Tuesday, the last of the paragraphs relating to iron was disposed of, the result of the conflict over the whole field having been decidedly in favor of a reduction of duties. When the paragraphs on steel were reached, the committee sustained still further defeats, though sometimes the result was a higher duty than that actually in force. The struggle was greatest over the paragraph relating to Bessemer steel, and the decision reached that day, in favor of a large increase of the present duty, seemed likely to be recalled on further debate before a fuller House. On Tuesday, also, Mr. Jenckes presented anew his Civil Service Bill, and found no difficulty in meeting the half-hearted and frivolous objections brought against it. The charge that the proposed Board of Examiners was undemocratic of course reappeared, though this time not from Mr. Logan, whom, we trust, time may have convinced on this score and on others, and led to give his support to the bill.

The Funding Bill seems to have made but little progress in the House, the Committee still having it in hand, and showing as yet no sign of reporting—Mr. Boutwell, who declares the debt reduced over eleven millions last month, and one hundred and fifteen millions of gold in the Treasury, being clamorous for funding machinery, and yet unable to get it. It is hard to say what is the greatest obstacle to the passage of the bill, but probably the national banks. If Mr. Boutwell can make his peace with them, he will soon have an opportunity of letting us see what "the prominent Frankfort banker" has to say. We may be allowed to repeat, apropos of this bill, that, no matter what the merits or demerits of the banks may be, it is a bad beginning for a new loan to force them take a third of it at a low rate of interest or go out of existence. Credit was never yet improved by compulsion.

The Republicans and Democrats of this State have held conventions and made their nominations for the new Court of Appeals. We are thankful to be able to say that both tickets are excellent, and perhaps equally excellent, and the court will be composed in part of both, two judges, at least, coming from the minority. The Democrats refrained from all allusions in their resolutions to party politics, although one prominent member—we need hardly say from this city—Mr. Richard O'Gorman, made the sweet suggestion that the times demanded political judges. This valuable contribution to the discussion, however, met with no response, and, with this exception, the proceedings were from first to last very decorous. Of the Republican Convention even more might be said, if it had not lugged into its resolution a vote of confidence in the administration of General Grant, which has no more to do with the election of judges to the New York Court of Appeals than the Coast Survey. The mention of it, therefore, served no purpose but to keep up the delusion which has been the curse of the State judiciary, that the election of judges is a party proceeding. Why was there no declaration of the determination of the convention to see the pensions of the soldiers and sailors punctually paid? We have seen no mention of this matter of late in the party platforms. Can it be that the politicians have "sold out" to the secret agents who have been so long trying to get the pensions stopped? The New York judiciary is not yet reformed; but, with a good Court of Appeals, Satan will find himself considerably hampered in his movements, even though he has the eight Supreme Court districts to rove about in. Having to go to Albany every term to appear before a hostile bench will greatly depress him, and injure his practice at the bar.

It being finally admitted that the municipal dispute in Richmond did not fall under the jurisdiction of any United States court, in spite of Judge Underwood's decision to the contrary, two habeas corpus cases were made up by agreement, and carried before the State Court of Appeals. Here the whole issue was reargued by the counsel of the contending mayors, but with a much stricter reference to what was the real question—whether the clause of the Enabling Act under which Ellyson was appointed was an infraction of the Virginia constitution. It was shown very clearly that the provision in the constitution which authorized officers whose terms had expired to continue in their functions until their successors had qualified, was prospective and not retrospective in its intent, and contemplated, not the interim between military and restored civil government, but the period when the constitution should have gone into complete operation. On this ground the court unanimously decided in favor of Mayor Ellyson, and was on the point of pronouncing its decision, on Wednesday week, when, by the giving way of the floor which separated the densely crowded court-room from the hall of the House of Delegates, there occurred a catastrophe almost unparalleled in horrors. Among its victims were representatives of nearly every section of the country, and of both sides in the late war; and while it is wonderful that all did not share a common fate, the escape from death of the mayors and their counsel is, perhaps, especially remarkable. The latter, however, were not unscathed. Ex-Governor Wells and Mr. Neeson were severely injured, and Judge Meredith not slightly. The Legislature, the bar, and the press suffered heavy losses. A colored senator, Mr. Bland, was among those whom all classes united in lamenting, and nothing could exceed the respect exhibited for him by his colleagues, in the resolutions which they passed in praise of his good offices between blacks and whites, the badge of mourning which they assumed, and in their attendance at his funeral—one of the committee which formed the escort being "Major Grimsley, the senator from Culpepper, a young officer of distinction in the Confederate service." There is something consoling in such a spectacle, and indeed in the fusion, which we trust will be more than momentary, of all interests and parties in the glow of a purely human sympathy.

The celebration of the Fifteenth Amendment by the colored people of Philadelphia, and the speech which Mr. Frederick Douglass made to them on that occasion, have fixed the attention of politicians more strongly than ever upon the colored vote, and set both parties to devising the means of winning and controlling it. It appears, or some of their more or less judicious friends strive to make it appear for them, that the newly enfranchised have "claims" to a Congressman, to at least four places in the Legislature, and to some profitable county office, not to mention a right to be elected to the League, to be stockholders in the Academy of Music, and generally to get at once social as well as political recognition. Their number is variously estimated at from five to ten thousand, and there is no doubt that the Republicans will have the support of the great majority of them, whether they are especially courted or not. They are said to have a very perfect organization, but this probably does not embrace the numerous and degraded negroes of the Fourth Ward, who seem to be very apt material for Democratic handling. The "Moyamensing Hose," at any rate, is making a bid for them. The Democrats, however, are a good deal divided as to the proper way of dealing with negro suffrage, although the party stands formally committed against it, and a small but respectable and educated portion declare with disgust that they will never vote at polls to which colored people are admitted—in short, will never vote again. The Republicans, on their part, whatever they may think of sharing places with the negroes, feel the burden of making the best possible nominations, in order that they may be in no wise behind their opponents, and leave no room for bolting or scratching, or for third candidates.

Our readers may remember the disturbances caused last November by the issuing of tickets to women to attend the clinical lectures at the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia. The opposition of the male students from the medical schools culminated in one disgraceful display of blackguardism and indecency, and has since remained smothered, but not extinguished. On Monday, the managers of the Hospital, who favored the continuance of the privilege, submitted the whole case to the "contributors" at their annual meeting—that is, to those who had ever given thirty dollars to the institution. This constituency amounted to between five and six thousand, and is said to have been increased by those who wished to take part in the polling, and could only thus acquire the right to. The public discussions which preceded the final decision were very animated, the press generally advocating the women's side, and the physicians as generally opposing. Some very scurrilous pamphlets were circulated, abusing the women and the Quakers about equally; but their authorship was disowned by the profession. The result was, that two-thirds out of some four hundred voters (many of them women) accepted a resolution of the managers which, without attempting to enforce mixed clinics, provides for the thorough clinical instruction of women at the Hospital. We presume the pamphleteers were not far wrong in singling out the Quakers as the chief reliance of the women in carrying their reform, and if we are not mistaken their votes were potential also last week, among those of the other stockholders, in opening the Mercantile Library on Sundays. The city, we apprehend, will never have cause to regret the action in either case.

Probably nothing, not even the calamity at Richmond, has occupied nearly so much of the attention of the country, during the week, as the MacFarland trial, which seems at this writing to be at last approaching its end. We have, of course, nothing to say at present about the merits of the case, but the conduct of MacFarland's counsel has again been abominable. That eminent anti-slavery martyr, Mr. Charles S. Spencer, having withdrawn, or been driven from the case, in consequence of his canting letter to the Independent, the conduct of it has passed into the hands of Mr. John Graham, who has evidently nearly as great faith as Mr. Spencer in epithets and strong language, and a much fierier temper. His practice of commenting on the evidence and the character of the witnesses as he went along led, on Friday afternoon, to an indignant remonstrance from Mr. Davis, "the private counsel" engaged for the prosecution, which so infuriated Mr. Graham that, after the adjournment of the court, he was only prevented from assaulting Mr. Davis in the court-room by the interference of the bystanders, and his language suited the occasion. But the encounters between the newspapers arising out of the affair have been marked by still greater ferocity. The Tribune, which, from the day of the murder and pendente lite, has most needlessly and injudiciously, as we pointed out at the time of the murder, made itself the champion of Richardson, and, consequently, the pursuer of MacFarland, has drawn on itself a certain amount of whatever odium Richardson's conduct excited, and has gradually worked itself, in the popular eyes, into the position of the real defendant in the suit, and, in this character, has had a series of encounters with the Times of the most sanguinary character, in which no quarter was given on either side. The Times used rockets and grape simply, but its practice was bad; while the Tribune threw shells, pepper-balls, and stink-pots, and finally erected a stockade of "parallel columns," from behind which it was heard at the close of the fight melodiously reading a sermon against bad language, with some remarks on the duties of friendship.

Mr. Wilson's Army Bill has been reported in the Senate as a substitute for Mr. Logan's in the House, and it lacks the more odious features of the latter measure. The army is to be reduced to 25,000 within the coming year; and officers are to be allowed to disappear from the service on their own motion, or after thirty years' service; discharges are to be made after enquiry, and for incompetency, and no new majors or brigadier-generals are to be appointed till the number is reduced to three and six of these grades respectively. The Logan prohibition, directed against military officers holding civil offices, is, however, retained, and a good provision too. When one remembers how knavish, lazy, and inefficient army officers are, and what diligent, sober, faithful, and trustworthy persons the civilians who want Government offices usually prove, one cannot commend too highly the care Congress is taking to keep the civil service closed to the soldiers.

The report comes from the Plains that another Indian war is impending—and this time a great one—from 8,000 to 12,000 warriors being reported in the saddle, or whatever it is they sit upon, and bent on mischief, and, of course, capable of desolating hundreds of miles of frontier. The United States cavalry, all told, is not nearly numerous enough to guard the two lines of railroad, and it is being diminished every day by the expiration of terms of enlistment, so that, if things come to the worst, there will be lively times along the frontier, and perhaps on the railroad, in view of which it might not be a bad plan for California passengers to see to their scalps, wigs, and chignons. The cause of the war is the old story—non-payment of allowances and supplies, encroachments on territory, and the threatened advance of a large exploring party of miners into hunting-grounds.

Somebody, who seems to know all about the matter, writes to the Evening Post to explain why it is the Fenian "invasion" of Canada has not come off, as promised, on the 1st of May. It seems that it is due to the fact that the Senate has quarrelled with General O'Neill, the commander-in-chief, because, finding $2,000 a year insufficient for the support of his family, he drew three dollars a day more out of the treasury without a vote of the legislative branch of the government. The result is, that the republic is split into two warring fragments, one of which consists of General O'Neill and a lawyer in Warren Street, whose name for obvious reasons is not revealed. This division had to quit its territory, consisting of No. 10 West Fourth Street, on the 1st of May, in accordance with the absurd New York custom, which makes that the moving-day for governments and armies, it appears, as well as for families, and has crossed over into Brooklyn, unopposed, with its furniture. General O'Neill has also arms stored, but declines to say where his army is; and, indeed, the organization of the force is such, that it is just as likely to be in Montreal or Toronto at this moment, as in New York, which shows the folly of the Canadians in mustering on the border. That Canada should be saved by the trifling circumstance that the chief of the enemy's forces took twenty-one dollars a week more than his due from the military chest, is a striking illustration of the way in which great effects are sometimes worked by small causes.

The question whether the State of Massachusetts ought to give further aid to the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad has become involved in such a mass of detail that it is difficult for an outsider to form an intelligent opinion on the merits. The issue on which the controversy turns is, whether the enterprise is likely to prove a profitable investment of the public money. To determine this a vast amount of testimony has been heard by the committee now considering the subject, and exhaustive arguments have been made on the one side by the Attorney-General, on the other by Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr. The swindling direction of the road were also represented at the hearing by a person named Graves, and also in a most amusing manner by the President, Eldridge, who came up smiling, and "hurled the foul libel back" in the teeth of those who had uttered it. But the direction have no chance of a favorable report, for it is admitted on all hands that, whatever the State does, they must retire. If anybody is to be aided, it is the bondholders, not Eldridge, Farwell, and Graves. What the committee will report it is of course impossible to say. It is understood that they are evenly divided, and are likely to defer reporting until the end of the session, when the friends of the road hope to hurry some enactment through by the same means which were used with such success last year. Meanwhile the public is making up its mind by reading the newspapers. The independent press, we are sorry to say, and indeed almost all the Boston papers, oppose all further loans, and they rest their opinions on the testimony of such men as John M. Forbes, J. W. Brooks, and C. F. Adams, Jr. These witnesses are disinterested, and well qualified by long experience and study to form conclusions of the greatest value to the State, and nine voters out of ten are more influenced by what they say than by the report of any legislative committee.

The United States Naval Court of Enquiry, organized at Yokohama, consisting of a Captain, Lieut.-Commander, and Paymaster, to investigate the Oneida disaster, have sent in their report to the Navy Department. They find that the Oneida was properly steered, that a good and sufficient lookout was kept, and that perfect discipline prevailed on board, and that the collision was occasioned by the Bombay's having, "when three points forward of the Oneida's starboard beam, put her helm hard a-port, and gone directly at the Oneida, when the latter vessel at once flung her own helm hard a-starboard," and it was when thus paying rapidly off to port that the Bombay struck her. They further find that the channel was three miles wide, with deep water on the side on which the Bombay was sailing and shoal water on the other; "that the Oneida was skilfully handled, and that the international rules of the road were carefully and intelligently obeyed;" that the Bombay was loudly hailed, immediately after the collision, but took no notice of it, nor yet of three or four signals of distress, fired from the big guns with full service charges of powder; and throw the whole responsibility of the disaster on Captain Eyre. It would have greatly increased the value of the report to the non-professional reader if it had stated what "the international rules of the road are." The particular rule applicable to this case has never, so far as we know, been brought out on either side. The question seems to be one of this kind: Two wagons are driving in opposite directions on a very wide road, each on the left-hand side; should they, on approaching each other, cross over, and each pass to the right, or keep on as they are, without noticing each other? If one wagon attempts to cross at the last moment, and the other continues its course, and a collision ensues, who is to blame? Would some naval man inform the world, distinctly and simply, within what distance of each other steamships have to be for the "rule of the road" to begin to govern their movements?

The French plébiscite is to be taken to-day (May 5), and the last mail brings a formal statement of the Radical reasons either for voting No or abstaining from voting, signed by Arago, Bancel, Crémieux, Garnier-Pagès, and others. It declares in substance that personal government, after having been set up by violence, has been tried for eighteen years and found unbearable; that to vote Yes now would be simply to confirm its authority and strengthen its foundations; and that the parliamentary régime which is offered to the country is but a mockery as long as the right of direct appeal to the people is reserved to the Emperor, a right which it characterizes as "the permanent menace of a coup d'état." The telegraph also brings confused stories of the discovery of a grand conspiracy against the Emperor—according to one account, for the blowing up of the Tuileries—and "bombs" are being discovered by the police in every direction. As nearly every man mixed up in politics in any way in France now appears to go armed, of course everybody whom the police arrests is found to have "a dagger and a pistol," and the police are making a great many arrests. In one factory, four hundred "bombs" had been ordered, but, strange to say, 'owing to the strike," only twenty had been delivered. The discovery of the conspiracy, with its "extensive ramifications," has certainly been made very opportunely; and we greatly fear we find the explanation of it in the announcement, which the telegraph also makes, "that the Central Committee in favor of the plébiscite have sent 100,000 copies of this morning's Figaro, which contains all the details of the conspiracy against the life of the Emperor, into the various provinces, as a document furnishing arguments in favor of the affirmative vote."

The excitement in France about the plébiscite is a good deal increased by the unrest of the working-classes. The organization of the various trades has been so far improved, and the relations of the different trades with each other have been so far perfected, that the leaders are at last beginning to think of putting into execution their long-cherished dream of a general strike—that is, a strike of all men who work with their hands against the rest of society—for the purpose not so much of raising wages or shortening hours in particular trades, as of bringing about a change in the whole social organization and procuring for the working-classes a larger share of the good things of this life. More has been done in France than in any other country in producing this "solidarity" of the trades, and a general strike, which the leaders think now within their reach, would probably greatly facilitate the movement in other countries, or hasten what is its grand aim—a working-class organization over the whole of Europe, and towards which the recent labor congresses have been steps. The late great strikes at Creuzot and in Paris have apparently been entered on rather by way of drill than on account of anything peculiar in the trades engaged in them. M. Simonin, speaking in the chamber recently of the state of the country, warned those who had given the working-classes the ballot and the right of coalition that the power had passed into their hands, and the rest of the community must make up its mind, before long, to be governed by them. Edmond About has been writing the same thing, and takes a very gloomy view of the future, as he says the people have got universal suffrage before they were ready for it. At a meeting held in London the other day, to denounce property in land, one of the speakers uttered what is one of the prevailing working-class sentiments, that the workingmen had now got "a political economy of their own," and mean to have it carried out, and we fear it is based on the grand fundamental principle of everybody "going shares" with everybody in everything.

The Khedive is trying to get another loan on the London market, to the great scandal of his creditors, and without any interference from the Sultan, who not long ago formally forbade him to contract loans on his own account. His credit is, however, pretty good, in spite of the shocking disorder of his finances, and the impossibility of telling how he stands in a business sense, and for the simple reason that he is the only sovereign in the world who really owns his whole territory and nearly everything in it, and could turn them into money if he pleased. Of the amount of his revenue few people know anything, and he hardly knows himself, but it may be called whatever Egypt can produce, minus a wretched subsistence for the inhabitants. An international commission has been sitting during the past year, for the purpose of drawing up a code, and providing mixed courts for its administration, for the government of foreigners residing in Egypt, and thus to put an end to the Capitulations under which Christians are subjected to consular jurisdiction. When the report was taken to Constantinople, the Sultan, for some unexplained reason, refused to approve of it—probably through jealousy of the Khedive's relations with European powers; but he will probably give way. In the meantime, the vassal is accumulating arms, and has taken several American officers into his service, which looks as if the New York Tribune was again forcing the unfortunate man into war, in spite of its professions of humanity and of love of peace. However, he has the consolation of knowing that the Canal is a great success—a greater than anybody ventured to hope—and only needs more dredging and some walling to be perfect.

THE ERIE RING AND AMERICAN CREDIT.

A few months ago a well-known English gentleman came to this city to look after certain millions of property, belonging to countrymen of his, which had been invested in an American railway. It is wholly unnecessary to enter into the details of his experience among us. Suffice it to say that he was a stranger and we took him in, and that he went home towards the close of the last year with considerably enlarged views on the subject of injunctions, receiverships, proceedings in equity (so called), in general, and the practice in New York courts of law in particular. One of his last acts in this country was to record his conviction that the treatment those whom he represented had undergone would deter a hundred million sterling of foreign capital from seeking an investment in America. Scarcely had the person referred to got back to the shelter of the Royal Exchange when Mr. Charles Burt, an English solicitor, was sent forth from London to do battle in the courts and Legislature of this State for certain other millions of English money which had sought an investment in the stock of the Erie Railway. The result of this gentleman's mission has yet to appear.

Meanwhile, there never has been a time when the demand for foreign capital in this country has been so great as it is now. It is alarmingly great, and the utmost inducements are held out to tempt European money-lenders. As evidence of this fact, we copy the following from two recent money articles now before us: "From Frankfort the advices are that the subscription for $5,000,000 mortgage bonds of the Oregon-California Railway at 72½ has been successful, and that $2,000,000 of the Port Royal are advertised at 73½ per cent. . . . It is reported that agents have arrived in Europe to procure the sale of $100,000,000 of bonds of the projected Northern Pacific Railway. . . . Messrs. Huggins & Beswell, of Threadneedle Street, have issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions to the first mortgage bonds for $5,000,000 of the Indianapolis, Bloomington, and Western Railway of Indiana and Illinois. The bonds are offered at the price of £168 per $1,000. . . . Messrs Joshua Hutchinson & Son, of Throgmorton Street, are authorized by the president and directors of the East Tennessee, Virginia, and Georgia Railroad Company, and in virtue of an act of the Legislature of Tennessee, to negotiate the sale of $3,900,000 in bonds bearing interest in gold at six per cent., and issued at £82 10s. per £100. . . . Messrs. J. H. Schroeder & Co. have invited subscriptions for $450,000 eight per cent. gold bonds of the State of Alabama at 94½ (or 93¾, reckoning allowances). . . . The present issue represents the subscription of the State to the Alabama and Chattanooga Railway. . . . The subscription lists opened in London by J. S. Morgan & Co. for the first mortgage bonds of the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company ($4,000,000, bearing seven per cent. interest in gold) have been closed, the amount asked for having been successfully negotiated."

This list might be indefinitely continued, but is already sufficient as an illustration. One thing about it is significant—the last loan mentioned (that of the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company) is almost the only one of the whole which has been really negotiated. The cause of the success of this loan does not appear; it is, however, understood to be owing to the fact that the corporation in question was organized under a charter granted by Congress and beyond the reach of State Legislatures. This brings us back to the point from which we started—the influence exerted on the minds of foreign money-lenders by recent scandalous occurrences in our courts, legislatures, and corporation offices. It is distinctly affirmed by those most conversant with European money markets that no more loans on private corporate securities coming from this country can be negotiated abroad, except at a ruinous discount, until the law vindicates the rights of those who now stand before our courts as defrauded and baffled plaintiffs. This proposition sounds very reasonable. Capital is generally declared to be timid. After what has happened it would, indeed, be bold as a lion if it sought investment under the ægis of Mr. Justice Barnard and within reach of Col. James Fisk, Junior.

What are the prospects as to the successful vindication of the rights of those whom Mr. Burt has come over here to represent? Not, we fear, very good at present. Few persons, after all that has been said and written on the subject, have any conception of the strength of the combination which now holds the Erie Railway as its individual property. This matter is deserving of much more than a moment's consideration. It is only two years since those who compose the Erie dynasty were fugitives from the process of that court which now protects them, and, as such, were then barricaded in a hotel in Jersey City. They have since proved themselves to be men who learn by experience; during their exile they realized the benefit of enjoying a personal influence with the powers that be, and one, at least, of the ruling triumvirate is no vulgar knave, but an adventurer possessing rare faculties for combination. From the day these men returned from Jersey City, and their gross outrages on the dignity of our courts were condoned on the payment of a $10 fine—from that day they have worked like spiders in a web to bind in intricate meshes their grand victim—the Erie Railway. Their method of procedure has been curious, instructive, and alarming. The moment that the present leaders stepped into the control of the road in July, 1868, the public was favored with an intimation of the course to be pursued. Two prominent members of the Tammany Ring took their places with them in the board of direction. This foreshadowed a powerful alliance; it did more, it signified, what events have since proved, that the executive government and judiciary of New York City were in future to be the very faithful servants of the de facto proprietors of the Erie Railway. Jersey City had not proved an agreeable place of refuge, and security was taken against any necessity of a return to that locality. The combination, however, was not yet complete. The Legislature and executive of the State, as well as of the city, must be brought into it. This, too, was in due time effected; the law known as the Erie Directors Bill—a law which was the crowning scandal of a venal legislature—was duly passed and sent to a governor who for ever sealed his own condemnation when he recorded his reasons, not for rejecting, but for signing it. Success elated the ruling spirit of the triumvirate; there seemed no one whom he could not circumvent, no part of the government which could not be made subservient to his frauds. One year had brought the whole public machinery of the State within his subtle influence; another should see the National Government his very humble coadjutor. There was something sublime in the audacity of the idea; there was something alarming in its near approach to success. The net was cunningly flung out; the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in New York, and a brother-in-law of the President, were securely entangled in it, and even the President himself, though untouched in his integrity, was deluded by cunning sophistry, while open bribes were tendered to confidential officers of his staff and to the members of his family. Then came the day of disaster; the scheme was very ingenious, but its success was more than mere mortals had a right to expect. The 24th day of September saw the engineer hoist with his own petard. This, though the final and utter destruction of the carefully prepared national combination, did but reveal the perfect strength of that which held the State government in its meshes. The triumvirate bore safely out the storm, strong in the protection of the court and civil power; there were no more flights to Jersey City, no more threats of Ludlow Street jail.

Meanwhile time passed; the Legislature met; Mr. Burt landed in this country and confronted his opponents, with a majority of the stock of the Erie Railway Co. in his hands and without a voice in its direction. The position did not seem very alarming, but the scheming brain in the Grand Opera House was busy again with its combinations. In the Legislature, the usurping triumvirate was supreme; the word of one of its associate directors was law there; the city government and the civil power were its own, and the courts might almost be considered its other self; it owned a national bank. It seemed difficult to invent any additional strength for such a combination. One doubt did suggest itself. The defences were weak on the side of the United States authorities. Neither the National Government nor the national courts were controlled by the Ring, and to the latter Mr. Burt would naturally and inevitably have recourse. Here was a threatening danger. The courts and civil authority of the city could be relied on, certainly and in any event, perhaps also the executive of the State; a conflict of authority might thus be among the contingencies of the future. At any rate, and stimulated by whatever motives, one of the triumvirate, whose ambition had hitherto seemed to lie in the direction of naval titles and a maritime fame, was now seized with a military ardor. Suddenly his election to the command of a regiment of the State militia was announced, and certain observing men thought they saw in this the handiwork of a shrewder head than rested upon the shoulders of the new colonel, who notoriously was only less ignorant than he was reckless. The combination had absorbed into itself a new element of power, the military arm.

Meanwhile the Legislature was not idle, and statutory entrenchments were thrown up on every side to perfect the security of the triumvirate. A bill was introduced which practically empowered those in possession of the offices of the Erie Railway to sell out the whole company, and to reorganize in such a form as to be free from the molestation of foreign stockholders. This measure was for some reason not reported by the committee. A bill was proposed which looked to depriving Mr. Burt by law of the services of eminent counsel whom he had retained, and on whom he mainly depended. Failing by itself, this legal outrage was smuggled through in two different forms. Another bill, however, openly became a law, certain provisions of which lend a startling significance to Col. Fisk's recently conceived military aspirations; it practically secured the usurpers against all danger through any of the State courts by confining the power of bringing suit against them to the attorney-general of the State, the whole political machinery of which they almost absolutely controlled. The act in question, however, went further—much further; it seemed ingeniously framed and contrived to precipitate, and render inevitable, conflicts of jurisdiction between the State and Federal courts, to recall to existence, if need be, the spirit of State rights in defence of organized robbery by an appeal to armed force.

Here the combination rests to-day, and such is the power entrenched in the Erie corporation rooms which Mr. Burt is courageously preparing to assail. What materials for a counter-combination may exist within his reach we do not now propose to discuss. There are such, and they are very potent; but whether they can be brought into immediate active union remains to be seen. Meanwhile, on the issue of the contest depends, in very great degree, the most important financial interests of America. It is here to be decided whether our State laws and State courts will afford any protection worthy of the name to foreign investors. If in the result it shall appear that they do not, then the prediction of the London financier, with which this article opened, will fall far short of the truth. We are a very patient people; but yet it cannot be that the public understand this matter fully or they would not submit to be thus outraged. Messrs. Jay Gould and James Fisk, Jr., are to-day probably the two most expensive luxuries that this country enjoys. They cost us millions in hard money, paid as interest every year, and they cost us yet more and other millions which, but for them, would flow to us from abroad and fructify on our soil. Nevertheless, our whole machinery of government is stretched out to protect them and to continue them in power. Our bankers and money-changers know this well enough, and yet they submit; the time may come when the whole community will realize it, and then, perhaps, a national nuisance may be suddenly abated. Mr. Burt and his clients must not lose heart; they have with them now the sympathies of all intelligent and honest Americans; they may yet, when they least expect it, enjoy also their active co-operation.

THE REVENUE REFORMERS AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The New York Times seems to have discovered in what we said last week of the meeting of revenue reformers, recently held in Washington, evidence of greater indifference on the part of the persons present to the claims of the Republican party to popular confidence and support than we certainly meant to express. The meeting was not wholly composed of Republicans; there were Democrats present; and the object of the discussion was not an enquiry into the value of either party, but the discovery of points of agreement on the great questions of the day—the tariff, the currency, and the condition of the Civil Service; or, in other words, of the instruments by which the taxes are collected and expended. It was held by all that right legislation on these subjects was of prime importance, and that if party allegiance seemed to stand in the way of securing it, it was to be sacrificed, at all events in the case of the Republicans, wherever it seemed possible to do so without endangering the results of the war, or helping to put into public life a notorious and incorrigible copperhead. Of formally setting up "a third party" there was no thought or mention. Every person present was aware that new parties are not made to order; that they grow up naturally around new ideas and new wants; and that the first concern of reformers is to spread new ideas and make new wants widely felt. This done, the required party organization is sure to come of itself without anybody's taking any special pains about it. If the Republican party can be made the instrument of the needed legislation, well and good; if not, why it must go to pieces. The Republican party, like all other parties, is a means, not an end. To keep it up because of its past services, when its inability to meet the new requirements of the country had been demonstrated, would be not politics, but fetish-worship—indeed, hardly more sensible than reverently keeping old rails on the track out of affectionate remembrance of the enormous quantities of freight they had in their day safely transported.

That some change was necessary, the meeting had abundant proof in the debates on the tariff going on in the Capitol while it was sitting. The most ardent protectionists confess now that the performances of the House over the tariff during the last two months have been most injurious to the national reputation and the national industry. If the Tariff Bill should be totally dropped before the end of the session, as for some weeks past has seemed not unlikely, it would be a fitting termination to a very sorry farce. What has occurred, however, has gone far to convince the country that whatever be the rights or wrongs of the high-tariff theory, we have no machinery in this country, and are never likely to have any, fitted to carry it out. The encouragement of particular branches of industry, either by means of protective duties or in any other way which involves either the bestowal of bounties or an artificial raising of prices, is exceedingly delicate work. It would almost need an archangel to administer it fairly, honestly, efficiently, and persistently. It consists under a popular government, when stripped of the custom-house drapery, simply in the opening of the public purse to such trades and callings as have the strongest lungs and longest arms; and what we have been witnessing at Washington lately has been not so much attempts at protective legislation as a general scramble for a certain portion of the public money. The cause of all this lies not in Congress, but in human nature; and in popular government there is no getting rid of human nature. If Colbert took it into his head to protect pig-iron, he would clap on his ten or twelve-dollar-duty by decree, without asking the cotton-spinners or railroad men what they thought of it; and he would keep the duty there as long as he pleased. If anybody cried out against it, he would find himself on his way to the galleys next morning. If a batch of "revenue reformers" met to discuss and protest, they would probably have to adjourn to the Bastile, and stay there till their heads grew gray. But when Mr. Schenck undertakes this duty in our time, he finds that fifty other industries want as much done for them as for the iron industry, that he cannot silence or get rid of them, and that they are as strong as he is, or stronger, and will have a fair division of whatever "protection" he has at command; and that, in short, the example of Colbert is of about as much value to him as the example of Tamerlane or Genghis Khan. Of the corrupting influence of the system we have no time here to speak, nor yet of its effect in diverting our vast wealth of ingenuity from the ennobling work of mechanical invention and contrivance to the barren and debasing work of lobbying. Something is surely wrong in a modern state when manufacturers who stand in the very foremost rank, such as our edge-tool makers, for instance, on finding foreign rivals underselling them, instead of sitting down to study their processes and overhaul their books, have to leave their factories to take care of themselves, and go to Washington to have long palavers with men who hardly know a hawk from a hand-saw.

To put an end to this state of things, and put the industry of the country on a natural basis—that is, on a basis which will stand, not if all men are wise and enlightened and familiar with the works of Henry C. Carey, but if men remain just as they are, some wise and some foolish, some protectionists like Horace Greeley, and some free-traders like Amassa Walker—is now the work before any party which, being in a majority, has charge of the government of the country. The object of the revenue reformers is, first of all, to satisfy the Republican party that this is its main duty, and to persuade it to do it. If it should appear that it cannot be got to take this view of its duty, why they must still keep preaching, let the consequences be what they may. But we cannot help thinking that, as Mr. Nordhoff hinted in his recent letter to the Evening Post, the next election will probably bring so many Congressmen over to a better way of thinking, whether it be the free-trade way or not, that the party will yet be found equal to the task before it.

THE FRENCH PLÉBISCITE.

The refusal of the Emperor to give up the right of ordering a plébiscite, or direct appeal to the people, at his pleasure, without the intervention of the legislature—and, indeed, it might be against the legislature—has plunged French politics once more into confusion, and broken up the Ollivier Cabinet. Count Daru, who represented the Orleanists, and is indeed the first Orleanist of note who gave in his adhesion to the Imperial dynasty, and whose willingness to take a place in the Cabinet was looked on as one of the best proofs that parliamentary government was again going to be set up in France, has resigned, from the feeling that the reservation by the Emperor of the right to call for plébiscites was in reality the reservation of the right to make coups d'état at pleasure, and that in the presence of any such right on the part of the executive, parliamentary government must be a mockery. M. Buffet, who was a Radical, and has always been a fierce opponent of the Napoleonic régime, has resigned, too, from somewhat similar reasons, thus taking out of the Cabinet all that it possessed of a real and acknowledged liberalism, except M. Ollivier himself, who is now openly treated by the Left as a traitor, but who seems to hold on to the Emperor, in what often seems a romantic faith that all will come out right in the end. We need hardly say that this state of things is looked on by the believers in the possibility of a liberal Empire with dismay, and the European press generally treats the Emperor's resistance as a veritable reaction, or falling back once more on the army and the government of force.

The objections to the right of the executive to take a popular vote whenever it pleases are obvious enough. The executive has the command of the army and the appointment of the civil functionaries, or, in other words, the practical possession of the government. With the army at its disposal, it can always afford to disregard temporarily the enactments of the legislature, and with the civil functionaries at its disposal, it can always, in a country in which only one in ten of the inhabitants can read and write, and the rural neck is thoroughly used to the yoke of the central authority, extract almost any result it pleases from a popular vote, or, in other words, secure the popular approval for any measures it may see fit to take against the legislature; consequently, the new constitution, if it contained this article, would really leave the country with no security whatever for its liberties; it would legalize such acts as the coup d'état of 1851, the illegality of which even Bonapartists do not attempt to deny, and would make the Chambers a mere board for the transaction of such business as the Emperor liked to leave it. Moreover, the Liberals say that it is not possible that the Emperor would venture to take his plébiscite now, unless the result had been provided for beforehand by the use of the old tactics, and reforms brought about in this way can be of no possible value; born of corruption to-day, they may be stifled in corruption to-morrow. The power of appeal to the country, they say, in order to make the constitutional reforms a reality, must be lodged in the legislature, as some sort of counterbalance to the brute force lodged in the hands of the executive; or, if lodged in the hands of the executive, it must, as in England, be exercised indirectly, through the legislature as a medium, by means of a dissolution. In other words, the people must be asked, not, do they approve of what the Emperor has done; but do they desire the majority of the Lower House to retain their seats?

Another bad sign of the crisis is the entrance into the Cabinet of M. Magne and M. de la Guerronière, both of whom are old and hardened adherents of the dynasty. M. Magne has been one of the most subservient ministers of finance a despot could desire, and M. de la Guerronière belongs to the same school of politicians as the Cassagnacs—father and son—that is, he is one of the "Mamelukes," as they are called, or body-guards of the Emperor, and ready to do any job at his bidding, and whose idea of the proper composition of the government was well expressed by Paul de Cassagnac, when he said, addressing himself to the Radicals, that it consisted of the police, the clergy, and army—"the police to catch you, the priest to shrive you, and the army to shoot you down." The reappearance of men of this class on the scene certainly does indicate strongly that the days of personal government are not yet over, and that people have been flattering themselves that France had made much more progress during the last six months than she really had.

The Emperor defends himself in his obstinacy by arguing that were he to lay down the power of direct appeal to the people, he would confess himself a vanquished man, which his self-respect and the respect due to his office will not permit him to do, and that, moreover, were he to consent to the reforms now proposed without obtaining for them the popular sanction, he would confess that the process by which he converted the republic into an empire and himself into a hereditary monarch had no legal force or effect, and might be set aside on his own mere motion—which regard for the safety of his dynasty will not permit him to do; that, in short, the great peculiarity of his dynasty is that it rests on the popular will directly expressed, and that to place anybody whatever between it and the popular will would be to change its basis. On the other hand, some of its friends, and not the least shrewd, say that a monarchy which makes a practice of taking a direct popular vote on all its more important acts can hardly hope to be long considered hereditary; that hereditary monarchy rests on the idea that the national will once expressed becomes irrevocable, and that one generation is competent to settle the main facts of government in such manner as to bind all coming generations; that if you break in on this idea, it is useless to hope that people will look on calmly at the completion of so important a transaction as the passage of the crown to the Emperor's son—a new man of whom they know nothing—without a fresh application for their consent, and that if you ask their consent at the accession of each new ruler the monarchy becomes elective. That there is great force in this nobody can deny. The taking of the new plébiscite indicates a very defective appreciation by the Emperor of the part played by habit in political affairs, or of the extent to which every dynasty rests on mere popular familiarity with the idea of its immobility. A fresh appeal to the people spreads abroad once more the feeling that nothing in France is as yet fixed; that all things are open to question; and it spreads it, too, when the Emperor is sixty years old, his son a boy, and the most intelligent and active portion of the French people fiercely hostile to him.

The vote will be taken on the 5th of May on the simple question whether the people approve of "the liberal reforms which have been effected in the constitution since 1860 by the Emperor, with the concurrence of the great legislative bodies of the state, and ratify the senatus-consultum of April 20, 1870." It is to be taken in a single day, and meetings for discussion preparatory to the vote have been permitted since April 23, and might be held down to Monday last, and the prefects had been enjoined to permit the freest discussion. Thus far the meetings do not seem to have been very improving, and have been marked by a good deal of turbulence and folly, though their effect in familiarizing people with free discussion will doubtless be very valuable. With regard to the vote, it may be set down as certain that the legitimists will abstain, en masse, from voting, and though they form a very insignificant body in point of numbers, they are very influential through their wealth, large landed estates, and social position. The moderates (Centre and Left Centre) seem likely to vote Yes; the extreme Radicals will doubtless entirely abstain or vote No; while the peasantry will probably vote Yes en masse. The causes of anxiety to the Government are, the probability that the majority voting

Yes may be either a very small one, and thus have no moral effect, or that so many may abstain that the majority will not be a majority of the voting population. The chances, however, on the whole seem to be in favor of a heavy affirmative vote.

IN MAY.

Now that the green hillside has quite Forgot that it was ever white
With quivering grasses clothed upon,
And dandelions invite the sun,
And columbines have found a way
To overcome the hard and grey
Old rocks which also feel the Spring,
And birds make love and swing and sing
On boughs which were so bare of late,
And bees become importunate,
And butterflies are quite at ease
Upon the well-contented breeze,
Which only is enough to make
A shadowy laughter on the lake,
And all the clouds that here and there
Are floating, melting in the air,
Are such as beautify the blue,—
Now, what is worthier, May, than you
Of all my praise, of all my love,
Except whom you remind me of?

ROBERT WEEKS.

THE "LIBERTINE PRESS."

THERE are loud wails from all parts of the world in which the press is free, over the growth of sensational, eavesdropping, scandalmongering, malignant, blackmailing journalism. The rapidity with which intelligence is now transmitted has so stimulated public curiosity that the purveying of news—of all kinds, good, bad, and indifferent—has become one of the most remunerative of trades; and those who have successfully engaged in it having discovered that there is no news on the whole so profitable, that is, so eagerly sought after, as personal gossip, have pushed their operations into the domain of private life to a degree never before known, and, in doing so, have become possessed of a means of intimidation which is to some natures, and those amongst the best, very terrible. The result is that the blackguard editor—this is a strong term, but it is the correct one—occupies the position in our day towards the rest of the community which the duelling bully occupied in the last century. He takes the wall of decent people and forces them to step into the mud; criticises their personal appearance, stares their wives and daughters out of countenance; looks into their window when they are at dinner, and laughs over the fare, and, when they complain, impudently offers them "satisfaction." But then there was one check on the duelling bully: bullets and steel went through his carcase without difficulty, and he could not tell the moment when he might insult a man who handled the sword or pistol as well as he did, and would sacrifice him to the infernal gods. Consequently, he had to exercise some caution. His successor of course labors under no such restraint. He is under no obligation to expose himself to any risk. He sits snugly in his editorial chair, and blazes away at his victim as long as it affords him any amusement, and, what is better still, gets paid handsomely by an admiring public for every shot he gives. In other words, the more of a bully and blackguard he is, the richer he grows. His victims cannot retort, because they have no weapons. To fight him on equal terms, they would need to control a newspaper, and newspapers are such expensive weapons that nobody but professional editors can use them for personal warfare.

When we come to talk of a remedy, we find that nearly everybody has one of his own, and each differs from all the others. Harper's Weekly took the subject up last week, and produced a cure which is, it seems to us, very inadequate. It says:

"The remedy lies primarily in the editorial profession, and not in the public; and if shrewd and honorable editors make an interesting paper, without pandering to the blackguard taste of the public, they detach from the support of the blackguard papers those who buy them, because they find them more entertaining than the others; and thus the line will be drawn. But honorable men who become journalists will prefer to make money honorably, and will decline the other kind of service. In this way the real dignity and worth of the press may be advanced, while just in the degree that the libertinism increases, the character and civilizing power of the press will decline. The touch of the libertine press soils every cause as it dishonors every person. Its advocacy is felt to be either venal or sensational. Its object is that of the pirate and of the adventurer—to make money at any price, and to give its baseness the finest name. Among truly sagacious and self-supporting journals the libertine newspaper is what a sharper and pander is among gentlemen. He affects to resemble them. But he listens at keyholes. He cheats at cards. He lies and swears. He swaggers and cringes. He is a bully and a coward. Gentlemen avoid him, and do not name him.

"It is in this way that the encroachments of the libertine press in this country are to be opposed. The active work must be done by the editors. If they denounce and then embrace, they must not be surprised that the public embraces without denouncing. They must show that libertinism is not essential to the liveliest and the most attractive of newspapers, and then the blackguard journals will go to their own place and patrons."

Now, we cannot help thinking that the editors can do very little about the matter; that nearly all that can be done by way of cure has to be done by the public. It is the public which supports "the libertine press," and makes it attractive as a calling. No blackguard would edit a blackguard paper if he did not find that it not only paid, but, on the whole, paid well; and the reason why it pays well is because the public like it. To call on "honorable journalists" to put him down by making their papers "interesting," is like calling on painters and sculptors to make their pictures so attractive as to ruin the trade in obscene photographs. Make your paper ever so interesting, and it will want the particular kind of spice which gives the libertine paper its sale. Make your picture ever so noble, so beautiful and entertaining, and it will still want the foul suggestiveness which renders the indecent photograph or engraving one of the most vendible of all works of art. There are several bad instincts and bad tendencies in human nature against which it is folly to call on preachers or editors or teachers to contend single-handed. The public must do most of the work. If each man gave way to every other low taste every time he felt its promptings as readily as he buys a blackguard paper for the purpose of seeing his neighbor "exposed" or ridiculed or reviled, the churches and art-galleries and lecture-rooms and libraries might as well be shut up; the brothels and taverns would be the only really prosperous and attractive institutions in the country. That they are not we owe to the fact that the great body of the community stands firm against their temptations discountenances and denounces and brings children up to dread them, and thus forms and maintains a taste which loathes them and a conscience which disapproves of them. When we see something of this kind roused against the libertine press it will decline, but not a minute sooner.

At present, we are apparently a good way from any so desirable consummation. Very few persons, indeed, have any moral sense, either transcendental or utilitarian, about newspapers. Periodical literature is of such recent growth, and its direct influence so difficult to see or appreciate, that hardly any feeling of duty about it has grown up in the public mind. Moreover, the preachings of a newspaper are so mixed up with its news proper that it is difficult to make any distinction, and the appetite for early intelligence is so great that people like a paper for its news without caring what use is made of the power which the supplying of the news gives—a fact with which the libertine press has become thoroughly familiar and profits by it.

But, then, the sins of the public with regard to the libertine press are by no means sins of carelessness simply. They absolutely connive at some of its worst abuses. For instance, the blackmailing of insurance companies has long been a regular business in this city, and the process consists simply in starting a periodical nominally devoted to insurance and subjects connected with it, and then asking the insurance companies to advertise in it on pain of being denounced as insolvent or declining, in case they refuse. The circulation of the paper, which is perhaps mostly gratuitous, is at best small; but then the reputation of insurance companies is very sensitive; a mere unfavorable report about a company is sufficient to do serious injury; so they succumb, give the rascals the advertising, and pay the bills without question. The rascals, however, go further than this, for, as may be imagined, they are enterprising as well as ingenious. If a company resists, they prepare their attack on it, get it struck off on slips, and supply these to its rivals for distribution through their agents at so much a thousand, and officers of some companies buy these libels and distribute them accordingly; or, in other words, join the gang in plundering their neighbors. Nevertheless, officers of insurance companies are amongst the most respectable members of the community, and a little concert and courage on their part would suffice to break up this species of swindling.

In these transactions, however, the blackmailing appears in its naked simplicity. But so profitable, and at the same time so odious, a business is seldom carried on in its naked simplicity. Papers of a general character, devoted to news, literature, religion, and what not, begin to have a regular blackmail department, in which contributions are levied on persons seeking access to the public for commercial purposes just as regularly and systematically as the barons on the Rhine used to levy tolls on travellers going down to the sea. They are called on to advertise in the paper on pain of being either hinted or insinuated against, or openly denounced, all of which would, in a widely-circulated or influential paper, probably do great injury. If they comply, they receive some words of special puff or commendation, which is the equivalent of the barons' passport, and sometimes payment is asked for this puff too, over and above the advertising bill, and with the same penalty in case of non-compliance. Now, the most respectable business men in the community submit to this sort of extortion without a murmur. They know that here again a little courage and public spirit would break up the trade; but they have them not, and so the trade flourishes. It flourishes, in many cases, under the flag of religion or humanity, or reform of some sort, just as the baron was as likely as not to have a cross on his banner, and keep a domestic chaplain in his stronghold. But then it is not wonderful, seeing the community so cowardly, that some of the men who go into the trade should think the pretence of religion and reform cumbersome and unnecessary, and take the devil into the firm openly as a general partner, and go roystering round the streets with him, and taking purses publicly from the passers-by.

Perhaps, however, there is nothing which, on the whole, gives the libertine press so much encouragement as the charitableness and forgivingness of the public. That the cultivation of such virtues should absolutely work evil sounds strange; and yet nothing is more certain than that they do, and their doing so is one of the mysteries of the moral world, over which men have puzzled from the beginning, and will puzzle to the end. If the publishing of a libertine paper meant certain and perpetual social damnation to the editor, probably very few men would be so indifferent to the opinion of their fellows as to attempt it, let the prospect of wealth from it be ever so tempting and so sure. But there is hardly a blackguard editor at work at this moment who does not flatter himself that, if he can only make his fortune, he can then retire from the business, or change the character of his paper, and that society will then speedily forget all about his sins, and, if he be personally agreeable, receive him into favor and consideration. Moreover, there are good grounds for this expectation in the practice of society every day towards all sorts of offenders. It is becoming more and more the fashion not to treat any stain as indelible, and, not only this, but to receive the penitent thief as in all respects the equal of the man who has never stolen.

The effect of this on social morality is tolerably bad already, and we doubt if we have seen the worst of its results, either on the press or any other calling. It has deprived, and is depriving, character—that is, steady persistence to the end in well-doing—of much of its social value. Persistence in well-doing involves in nearly every man's life more or less discomfort, privation, resistance to temptation, postponement of dearly-loved pleasures of all kinds. These the average man will not undergo when he knows that he may have the rewards of righteousness, in so far as they come from public opinion, any time he pleases, while a temporary indulgence in rascality may make him immensely rich. The rule, for instance, on which the Government acted in the case of Sickles, and on which, in the opinion of many good men, it did well to act, is one which is calculated to destroy the only restraint which keeps millions from vice. That the lesson was without its effect on the press is hardly to be supposed. The public can, in short, have the press just as good as it pleases, and the press will never be a whit better than the public calls for; and as long as the merchants, bankers, and brokers tamely allow the newspaper caterans to prey upon them, without remonstrance, we may be sure the newspaper caterans will be a large and prosperous body.

ENGLAND.—PROSPECTS OF THE IRISH LAND BILL—THE FINANCES—THE BOAT RACE.

LONDON, April 15, 1870.

WE have reached Easter, and members of Parliament are taking a short rest from their labors. I know not how many of them look back with pleasure upon the work they have hitherto accomplished; but I fear that the general feeling is so far one of disappointment. Mr. Gladstone is what is called, in the language of the prize ring, a glutton for work; he cut out for himself a task at which some of his less enthusiastic colleagues were frightened, and despised the warning thrown out by Mr. Bright about driving six omnibuses through Temple Bar. The great majority at his disposal seemed, however, to justify the sanguine policy; and, but for certain circumstances, his expectations might have been, as perhaps they may still be, approximately fulfilled. I have on previous occasions noted one or two of these, and especially the unfortunate necessity of introducing once more a coercion bill. Another, which is gradually becoming more evident, is the extreme complexity of the Land Bill—a complexity which is only too characteristic of Mr. Gladstone's habitual methods of reasoning. The consequence is that the bill is rapidly getting to be amongst those things which "no fellow can understand." A correspondent ought, I suppose, to partake the omniscience of newspapers in general. Nothing should be too hard for a summary explanation. At the same time, I must honestly confess, and I beg your pardon for my stupidity, that I do not understand the Land Bill. Nay, I will add that I know nobody at the present moment who is bold enough to say that he understands it. I met a friend, the other day, who was on his way to legislate for his country. He pulled from his pocket what appeared to be a moderate-sized volume, and informed me that it was the abridgment of the amendments proposed on Clause 3. I forget the precise number of clauses; but, if I am not wrong, they get some way into the hundreds; and, though Clause 3 is one of the most vital parts of the bill, there are many others which will give ample opportunity for discussion. The committee has so far succeeded in approximately settling one and a half. I leave you to calculate, if you please, how long they are likely to be in despatching the remainder. In fact, the case is simple enough. Government introduced an elaborate measure; they have since modified it considerably; 658 gentlemen have exercised their ingenuity in tugging it hither and thither, cutting out and inserting and altering; and the consequence is that it has become a labyrinth through which scarcely anybody can find his way; the latter clauses cease to refer to the earlier, and every change involves so many other changes that it is impossible to say distinctly what would be the result of any given alteration. I find, for example, in the Pall Mall Gazette of this morning, a careful and apparently satisfactory argument, professing to come from a friend to the bill, who proves, or seems to prove, the following assertion: "We shall take a clause which the committee have already passed, the first and simplest in the bill, and one which only seeks to legalize an existing system, and we shall have no difficulty in showing that its effect will be absolutely illusory in so far as it is intended to give any protection to the tenant." The clause in question refers to the Ulster tenant right, and the argument is substantially that, as Mr. Gladstone has scrupulously left to the landlord the power of raising his rent, the landlord will be able to repay himself for any advantages given to the tenant by this simple process. It is necessary, however, to hunt through so many clauses to discover the precise effect of any regulation, that it is possible that the writer's arguments may be unsound. Certainly, I shall not undertake to pronounce upon it.

I will not discuss the merits of the bill, so far as they have hitherto been revealed, further than to say that it is rather a bad omen for its ultimate success that so many unforeseen difficulties should have already turned up. The bill, or rather some bill founded upon the present proposal, will be certainly passed, for the credit not only of Government, but of Parliament, is pledged to passing one. But it may be doubted whether so complicated a measure will really give satisfaction to anybody. Landlords and tenants will not understand their mutual relations, and they will not impossibly plunge into a mass of litigation in order to elucidate the difficulty. Meanwhile, one conclusion of more general interest may be noticed. There is a strong feeling that our present mode of legislation is unduly clumsy. Parliament seems to be able only to pass one big measure in a session, and that one measure becomes such a piece of patchwork that it requires a whole series of supplementary measures to put it tolerably straight. On the present occasion, moreover, it is an Irish measure which stops the way, and which prevents English legislation from getting forward, whilst it naturally fails to represent the Irish view of the matter. This gives a certain plausibility to a feeling which is apparently growing, that Irish business ought to be turned over to the Irish, and that we, who have so much to do on our own account, should not choke our legislature by trying to do business for other people as well. In short, the national sentiment is growing daily more pronounced in Ireland even amongst the upper classes; and it is not improbable that a prophecy made by Mr. Gladstone in 1834, when he was yet an ardent conservative, may come to be fulfilled, and that the abolition of the Irish Church Establishment may only be the prelude to a formidable agitation for a repeal of the Union. Fenianism has never been very dangerous in Ireland; but the sentiments of which it was an expression seem to be extending rather than growing feebler. A fiasco on the part of Government in the legislation of the present session, which does not seem to be out of the question, would undoubtedly go far to strengthen this feeling, and we may not improbably be on the eve of a still more serious contest than any which has lately taken place.

It is enough for the present to point out this possibility, which is as yet rather a subject for private speculation than for open discussion. I will turn to the more satisfactory topic of our finances. Mr. Lowe had the pleasant task of propounding his budget on Monday, and had little to say that was not of the most rose-colored hue. Our expenditure has been less than was calculated; our revenues have been greater; and but for our costly investment in military glory in Abyssinia, we should be in a position of unprecedented financial prosperity. As it is, we have a very agreeable prospect. The floating debt is at a lower point than it has been within the memory of man; and Mr. Lowe had only to consider what branch of our taxation was to be reduced. The surplus for the coming year is now estimated at between four and five millions sterling. The main proposals which were noticed by Mr. Lowe were to apply it in reduction of the national debt or to accept a policy indicated in the popular cry for a "free breakfast-table"—translated into more prosaic terms, this means the abolition of the taxes upon tea and sugar. The conclusion at which Mr. Lowe arrived was very simple, and I think has been pretty generally approved. He devotes a very small sum towards the reduction of the national debt. By turning certain funds into terminable annuities, about seven millions of the debt will be extinguished in 1885. The main advantages to be derived from the surplus will be unequally divided. The income tax will be reduced from fivepence to fourpence in the pound, and a larger sum will be saved by reducing the tax on sugar to one-half. This may be considered as bringing our financial system to about its ultimate form in these directions. In other words, we divide the taxation between direct and indirect sources, so as to equalize the pressure as much as possible. The adoption of a free-trade policy has reduced the number of taxes so considerably that we cannot expect that any further diminution will take place. The only changes in future will be to raise or, it is to be hoped, to lower the rates imposed, but not to change materially the sources from which the revenue is derived. We have, in fact, got at a system of the greatest practicable simplicity, and we are as content as is compatible with the payment of taxes at all. Some indirect taxes are desirable, as otherwise the system would practically be that the poor should impose taxes on the rich; but they will not be multiplied—on the other hand, it is not to be hoped that they will be materially diminished. On the whole, Mr. Lowe's budget is the last step in the policy gradually carried out by Sir R. Peel and Mr. Gladstone under the pressure of the movement for free-trade, and it is some comfort to be able to believe that in one great branch of legislation we seem to have arrived pretty nearly at a definitive conclusion.

I should not be doing justice to the topics of the day if I omitted to notice the University boat-race. Cambridge, as you will see, has at last won. It won not so much by turning out a crew very superior in style to its predecessors, though there was a distinct improvement in this respect, but chiefly because it had on this occasion, for the first time for many years, a decided superiority in physical strength. The crew was a magnificent one, averaging 12 stone, or, as you would say, 168 pounds, in weight, and fairly rowed Oxford down by superior lasting power. You will not perhaps care for these details. I may remark, however, that the interest in the case has risen to such a pitch that it is beginning to be denounced as a nuisance. The numbers present increase at every contest, and London becomes fairly emptied of a large proportion of its population on the critical day. On the Saturday previous to the race, there were more spectators of the practice than would have been present at the race itself ten years ago; and the victory of Cambridge was hailed by four miles and a half of human beings packed as closely as they could stand. The University crews attract even more interest than the horses running for the Derby. The amazing prominence given to athletic sports at our universities has long been attacked as a growing evil, and it seems to be arriving at its culminating point. Moreover, some dangerous elements are beginning to show themselves. The race is scrupulously fair, and nobody has even ventured to hint that the crews have ever been influenced by anything but a thirst for aquatic glory. But it is beginning to be a subject for bets, and the touts of low sporting newspapers haunt the banks of the river to comment upon the practice of the crews. The tendency indicated is unsatisfactory, and, considering that it should scarcely be the main object of a university education to turn out accomplished athletes, it is not wonderful that amongst the ordinary praises of the pluck and physical perfection of our lads there is beginning to be heard a strong undercurrent of distinct disapproval. The English undergraduate is in many respects, as I have good reason to know, a very fine and manly young fellow, but his ideal is rather too little directed towards mental cultivation and too much towards the physical and social accomplishments characteristic of a country-gentleman. To be a good rider and a good shot; to be able to quote Latin in the House of Commons and occasionally to make Latin verses himself; to be a man of honor and a straightforward, stupid "good fellow" (an expression which is lamentably prevalent), are all very fair objects of ambition; but they are not all that one requires from a university, and the popularity of the boat-race tends rather to encourage the development of this type of character at the expense of equally valuable qualities.

Correspondence.

MODERN RUSSIA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: May I be permitted to say a word in reply to the letter of Dr. H. von Holst, in No. 246 of the Nation, which has just reached me, in regard to the book of Dr. Eckardt. What I said about Dr. Eckardt's being blind to the dark shades of feudalism in the Baltic provinces had reference solely to the book under criticism, and not to his previous career. I never read the Riga'sche Zeitung (which I freely translated Gazette, as is often done) when under Dr. Eckardt's management, but his other books bear out my statement. I called Mr. Katkoff sincere, because I believe him to be so. I know him well, and, though I do not agree with all his ideas, I believe that he acts from conviction and from a sense of duty. The Rizhskii Vyestnik, a Russian journal published at Riga, was founded with his approval, if not co-operation. As 30,000 of the 120,000 inhabitants of Riga are Russians, I do not exactly understand the words "false flag," nor do I see anything wrong or insincere in Mr. Katkoff holding communication with the editors of the Vyestnik. As to Mr. Katkoff's moderation, that is a relative word, and there is a large party in Russia who consider him too conservative.

I have been much with the Russian peasant, and have observed this point particularly, and only repeat that it is a fact that the Russian peasant, not of course an Esthonian one, understands the church Slavonic, so far as it is used in the church services. I have even seen peasants reading aloud the Gospel in Slavonic. It is, however, a point of no particular importance.

I agree with Dr. von Holst that it is impossible to make the progress of two thousand years by two years' legislation. But if any abridgment of time can be made by legal measures, we can hardly ask the Russians to wait two thousand years, and do it as we did. Russia has, however, begun rightly at the bottom, and, by granting personal freedom and municipal self-government, has prepared the way for a greater civil liberty in the future.

In reviewing Dr. Eckardt's book, I endeavored to be perfectly fair and impartial, and did not mention many objectionable and questionable passages. I can only say that my opinion on the Baltic question, whatever it may be—and I agree with neither side—has been formed only after carefully reading both sides of a voluminous controversy, and after acquaintance and conversation with leading Russian radicals, and with representative men of the Baltic provinces, where I have some warm friends. Very respectfully yours,

The Critic of "Modern Russia."

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Sheldon & Co. announce a collection of editorial articles from the Independent, by the editor, Mr. Theodore Tilton, with the title: "Sanctum Sanctorum; or, Leaves from an Editor's Table;" a republication of Mr. Grant White's articles in the Galaxy on "Words and their Uses;" and a new work by Mr. Spurgeon called "Feathers for Arrows." It is also their intention to publish an octavo illustrated edition, bound and in paper, of Charles Reade's "Put Yourself in his Place," and a household edition uniform with that of Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have in rapid preparation the "Mythology of the Aryan Nations," by the Rev. George W. Cox, M.A., which has just been published in England. ——Messrs. De Witt C. Lent & Co., a new publishing firm, occupy the premises left vacant by ssrs. Leypoldt & Holt, at 451 Broome Street. They have in preparation, to be sold only by subscription, a memorial volume called "Presbyterian Re-union, 1837–1871," which will consist of eight chapters by prominent clergymen of both the Old and New School, giving the history of each since 1837, and of the re-union, along with biographical sketches of the leaders of the two schools, portraits on steel, etc.

—Of works recently or soon to be published in England, we notice the following books of travel. In Mr. Murray's list: Robert Shaw's "Travels in the Track of Marco Polo," or a visit to High Tartary, Yarkand, and Kashgar, and return journey over the Karakorum Pass, with map and illustrations—Mr. Shaw, it is said, being the first European since Marco Polo who has returned alive from Yarkand; "A Ride through the Disturbed Districts of New Zealand, and Notes of a Cruise among the South Sea Islands," from the journals of the late Lieut. Herbert Meade, R.N.; and "A Voyage Round the World, touching at Australia, Java, Canton, etc.," by the Comte de Beauvoir, translated under the author's superintendence. Messrs. Longmans & Co. publish "England to Delhi," a narrative of Indian travel, by John Matheson, with a map and eighty-two illustrations on wood. Messrs. Low, Son & Co. issue new editions of Mr. Henry Blackburn's "Pictures of the Pyrenees," and "Artists and Arabs." Among greater enterprises are the following, from Mr. Murray: A sequel to Dr William Smith's Dictionary of the Bible—"A Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," comprising the history, institutions, archæology, geography, and biography of the Christian Church, from the times of the Apostles to the age of Charlemagne; "The Talmud," by Mr. Emanuel Deutsch; "A Mediæval Latin-English Dictionary," founded on Du Cange, but illustrated and enlarged from a great number of archæological sources, ancient and modern, by E. A. Dayman. We are also to have from the same house a further contribution to the Junius controversy, in "The Handwriting of Junius professionally Investigated," by Mr. Charles Chabot, expert, Hon. Edward Twisleton furnishing a preface and collateral evidence. This work will contain fac-similes of all the letters of Junius to Mr. Grenville and Mr. Woodfall, and one hundred pages of letters of Sir Philip Francis, out of all of which some light ought to come. Finally, we may notice two cheap reprints, by Alexander Murray & Son, that deserve to be circulated widely in this country: Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," with a brief biography of the author, and notice of his writings; and, in one volume, McCulloch's "Principles of Political Economy" and Locke's "Essay on Interest and Value of Money." Those who prefer the clearest and handsomest edition yet made of the "Wealth of Nations" will purchase that just issued by Macmillan & Co., edited with valuable notes by Professor Thorold Rogers.

—It was reserved for Lord Shaftesbury to object to the proposed revision of the English Bible, which we seem likely to get before long, that it would depreciate the stock of the Bible societies, and leave them with hundreds of thousands of undisposable copies on hand. We suppose this would result not altogether from the inability of these societies to work off their imperfect Scriptures, but from conscientious scruples on their part about circulating any but the correctest version. In that case they might, and probably would, go a step further and consider their pecuniary loss an even willing sacrifice to the truth which it is their mission to spread among all the nations of the earth. As the work of revision, however, is not the pastime of a day, it ought to be easy to reduce both the stock on hand and the manufacture, so as to keep pace with the progress of the Commission, and come out even in the end. Already, says the Publishers' Circular, the great producers have taken the alarm and stopped further production, of course not without hardship to their employees. On the other hand, too, the Commission is being anticipated in various ways, Mr. Murray having issued the prospectus of a new edition of the Bible, intended to give the general reader, "as far as possible, the same advantages as the scholar, and supply him with satisfactory answers to objections resting upon misrepresentations" of the sacred text. This, by the way, will be that of the Authorized Version of 1611, with its marginal references and renderings; but there will be appended a commentary with amended translations, and concise statements of the results of learned investigations in Scriptural matters during the present century. Bishop Thirlwall heads the list of editors or contributors, the general editor being Rev. Canon Cooke, Preacher at Lincoln's Inn. The Circular expresses a very just regret that no one of the many Jewish scholars of eminence has been associated with the English scholars, at least in the poetical and non-prophetical Hebrew books. The proper paragraphing of the Bible ought to form part of Mr. Murray's plan, and the neglect of it by the Commission which Lord Shaftesbury discountenances would be inexcusable indeed.

—The Historical Manuscript Commission in England has begun its work, and has met with a great deal of favor from the possessors of collections. The number of those offering to communicate valuable documents is so great that five inspectors have been employed merely to examine these and report upon them. It is already possible to see that the disclosures are to have an important bearing on histories both written and unwritten. The Gunpowder Plot will be illustrated by papers found in the Phelips' collection at Montacute House, in Somersetshire, and which have lain undisturbed since 1612; also by a narrative, by John Fortescue and Helen his wife, in the library of Ushaw College, near Durham. This library also has seventy-two original letters of Mary, Queen of Scots, all in cipher except two, which are entirely in her own handwriting. Important letters of Charles I., one of them interceding with the House of Lords for the life of Stafford, form part of "a grand collection of papers, comparatively unknown, in the House of Lords." The Earl of St. Germans, at Port Eliot, has several letters from the historian Gibbon which throw light upon his parliamentary career and have a peculiar interest. The Scotch collections are described as full and important.

—What with missionaries, and railroads, and telegraphs, and steamships, and the settled purpose of the British Government, the breaking up of caste in India is merely a question of time. All these levers working to the same end, the question of precedence need not be raised. We presume, however, that it is fair to reckon the Suez Canal among them, as offering a temptation to the more intelligent Hindus to cross the "black sea" which caste expressly forbids its members to traverse—in other words, to visit foreign countries. Not long since we saw here two Bombay merchants who, having visited England once in defiance of caste and returned without harm, essayed the same excursion a second time, and even extended it to America. The end of caste being visible even to the eye of caste, it doubtless finds itself, in the case of these fugitives, very much as the stricter Quakers find themselves when their demoralized brethren buy pianos and let their children learn to play on them, or even marry out of the Society. It becomes prudent to wink at these transgressions. That is what must be done, we suspect, even in the case of Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen, of some notoriety as the leader at Calcutta of the Brahmo Somaj, a society of Hindu theists, who aim to overthrow idolatry and caste in India. This gentleman is now in England, where he has preached in the chapel of the Rev. James Martineau, and received a public welcome as a religious reformer. It appears that his own church is but one of about fifty, in different parts of the peninsula, where similar doctrines are regularly inculcated, and which exert a growing influence in favor of education, of raising the condition of women, and against early marriages and polygamy, which so much delay the progress of the country. Dean Stanley, in behalf of all the Protestant churches, moved the resolution of welcome to Keshub Chunder Sen, and supported it in a speech of marked, but with him customary, liberality. Lord Lawrence gave some details of the personal history of their guest, who belonged, he said, to the physician caste, and, as an orphan, was educated in an English school and afterwards in a Calcutta college. Of the two classes of reformers, rationalistic and theistic, he chose to join the former, and is now the representative of the advanced section of it. They do not, however, as Keshub Chunder Sen himself explained in the course of the meeting, hold to any sectarian views. Confounded by the diversity of missionary teachings, and "passing through a bewildering series of endless dogmas, the Hindu still cherishes in his heart respect and reverence for the central figure of Christ," without attaching himself to any particular form of Christianity. Four lectures on the Brahmo Somaj, by its leader, have been reprinted in London, from the Calcutta edition, with a preface by Sophia Dobson Collet.

—The profession of medicine is decidedly that in which women nowadays choose to demonstrate their ability to accomplish whatever the male intellect can by study and application. It was but lately, in Paris, that Miss Putnam, daughter of our well-known publisher, bore off honors flattering to her countrywomen as well as to herself and her sex. Still more recently, the professors of the University of Vienna have of their own accord met to consider the propriety of awarding medical diplomas to women, although as yet no woman has applied to be examined for them and have decided that those who have received diplomas in other cities shall hereafter be admitted to attend the lectures and to visit freely the hospitals of Vienna. Already an English and a Swiss woman have profited by this concession. At Edinburgh, a medical student, Miss Edith Pechey, entitled by her marks to a junior scholarship, of the Hope foundation, and as a consequence to six months' free admittance to the laboratory, has been refused this reward of her diligence and offered a bronze medal instead. The case, as stated by Nature, appears to be wholly in Miss Pechey's favor. Dr. Hope, many years ago, opened a chemistry class for ladies amid great opposition—so great that he had to take his pupils in through a window, because the regular entrance was closed against them. The fees of this class amounted at his death to £1,000, which he converted into the scholarships which bear his name—two senior and two junior—under the following condition: "The class honors are determined by means of written examinations held during the session. The four students who have received the highest marks are entitled to have the Hope Scholarships to the laboratory of the University." There seems to be no doubt that the founder designed to include both sexes in this provision. Miss Pechey stands third out of 234 men and 6 women, and first of this year's students; she is matriculated and registered, and her claim is to be legally tested. Miss Sophia Jex-Blake is on the list of first-class honors in chemistry. "So the lady doctors," says Nature, "may fairly be congratulated on the results of their first session in Edinburgh."

—The low condition of the English stage is not helped by a necessity under which playwrights labor of stealing all they can from foreign and notably from the French dramatists, without violating the Copyright Convention with France. They contrive to do this by varying the original as much as they think necessary for their protection under the law and to entitle the product to be called a fair adaptation or imitation, and not a "piratical translation" pure and simple. Our readers will perhaps remember what slight alterations Mr. Robertson made in the play he borrowed from the German, and afterwards brought out as his own, with the name of "School," as we showed at the time of its performance in this city. Lately, in London, an unauthorized version of "Frou-Frou" was attempted to be represented at the St. James's Theatre, and an injunction laid upon it was removed, on a hearing before the Vice-Chancellor, whose decision, however, is to be reconsidered. As a London paper remarks, the Convention is a quite one-sided one, the English having nothing which the French care to pilfer or purchase a copyright of; and the latitude which it technically allows makes the protection it affords the French author altogether precarious. As a symptom of regard on the part of theatre-managers for some other public than that which can be calculated on to pay, an invitation sent to the London press by the lessee of the Theatre Royal has been remarked upon and is worth quoting. It seems intended to get the benefit of judicious criticism prior to the first public performance, but it does not hint in what way the criticism is to be conveyed:

"THEATRE ROYAL, ———, April 11, 1870.

"DEAR SIR: We have a night rehearsal of the new piece entitled ———, on ——— night, when, if you are passing this way, I should be glad if you would look in and see what we are doing. The stage entrance will be open.—I am, etc., ———."

—A highly valuable book on the scenery, people, and customs of Japan, prepared with great minuteness, and in the most sumptuous manner, is that lately issued by Hachette & Co., "Le Japon Illustré," by Aimé Humbert, formerly a Swiss envoy and minister. It contains nearly five hundred engravings, relating to subjects of every variety and all degrees of importance, and mostly taken from photographs. The Pall Mall Gazette draws from it some rather striking comparisons between Japan and the British Islands, in its population, relation to the continent, and even history, though the feudal state of society exists there still in all its rigor. A landscape in Southern Niphon, which forms one of the illustrations, is said to be "quite an English woodland scene." The author, for his part, "says that the Japanese scenery frequently recalls the Swiss, and adds that the Japanese who travel tell him that no country reminds them so forcibly of their own as Switzerland." Reading and writing qualifications would not disturb the suffrage in Japan, as every man carries writing materials with him as naturally as he does his pipe, namely, a brush, a stick of India ink, and a roll of mulberry paper. The women, however, have this badge of inferiority, that they use a different handwriting from the men, and cannot read the men's, who, nevertheless, can read theirs. When the woman's rights agitation reaches those now tranquil shores, it is well to know what abuse must first be attacked. The map accompanying this volume is pronounced by the Gazette to be a great acquisition, as accurate as the Admiralty charts, and much fuller.

—A little more than eight years ago Renan delivered his first lecture as professor of the Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldaic languages in the Collége de France—a chair which had been founded expressly for him. The "Life of Jesus" was not yet published, but Renan was already obnoxious as a dissenter, and the Cross of the Legion of Honor, which he had earned by his acceptance of a Government mission to Syria, in 1860, had rendered him an object of distrust and something more in the eyes of the Liberals. Hence, two elements of opposition manifested themselves in the lecture-room on the 23d February, 1862, and a reference to Jesus as "an incomparable man," whose work was of such an exceptional character as to win for him the name of God, was seized upon by the clerical party as the ground of effecting Renan's dismissal by the Government. His course was, indeed, at once suspended by the Minister of Public Instruction, who charged the professor with having "uttered doctrines which offended all Christian creeds, and might give rise to unfortunate disturbances." Subsequently Renan was displaced in favor of M. Munk, and now, after a vacancy of three years, caused by the death of the latter, the original incumbent is restored by the almost unanimous nomination of the College and the Academy of Inscriptions, the Government confirming it according to custom. This reappointment, of which no one doubts the fitness, is one of the consequences of the new political freedom of France, notwithstanding which Renan has not shunned the appearance of being a partisan of personal government. And, as he refused to conciliate the clerical party in 1862, so now he is careless of offending the Radicals of 1870. He has just published by itself the article which he contributed, last November, to the Revue des Deux Mondes, on the "Philosophy of Contemporaneous History—Constitutional Monarchy in France." (Paris: Michel Lévy. 1870.) It is designed to show that the French Revolution proceeded philosophically instead of historically, imagining that a free state is founded by popular sovereignty in the name of a central authority, instead of by successive petty and local conquests; that this idea naturally begot the First Empire, to which Napoleon was not necessary, for he merely carried out the possible parts of the revolutionary programme. Speaking afterwards of the "grand law" that the life of mankind must consist of several degrees, he applies it to French monarchy as an institution necessary to the continuance of good government after 1793—the keeping, in fact, of an historical compact between the nation and some family devoted to its interests and personifying its genius. Without such a dynastic alliance, the national conscience in no country can be fixed and stable; with it, as France had it most perfectly in the Capets, the nation has not only royalty but a priesthood—a priest-king, a Saint Louis. These sentiments are hardly to be styled fresh or adapted to present political tendencies in either hemisphere. At most, they exhibit Renan's independence, and show that radicalism in religion is not invariably conjoined with radicalism in politics, though as for the former Renan warns the "powerful religious party" which has been pursuing him that some day the Church is likely to "invoke him as an apologist to repel injurious and destructive attacks," and that then they may regret the obstacles they have put in the way of "a respectful dissenter, who has never suffered himself to be driven beyond the point where he meant to stop, even by the most unjust usage."

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

IT is a long time since we have known the magazines of the month to average so well as they do this month; the rise in value being due to special improvements which each has made, by creating new departments or enlarging old ones; but also partly due to better and more interesting writing in the body of the magazine. For example, Putnam's offers seven or eight pages of "Editorial Notes," which possess variety of topic certainly and contain many sensible remarks, albeit written with the "vigor" which the profane have termed "slinging ink," and which may, perhaps, better be designated as the sort of slashing and peremptory writing which may be learned in many newspaper offices. Then the critical notices in Putnam's are this month more pleasing than hitherto, being unmarked by a certain peevishness of tone which has often pervaded them and being all the better for being better natured. But the greatest improvement which this magazine has to show is in its long articles, four or five of which are worth attention, and one of which is excellent. This last is by Mr. Hamerton, the well-known critic of pictures and painters. It is not about art, however, but is called "Polyglots," and is intended to show that "to speak a foreign language really well, is a matter of superhuman difficulty," and that no one is really perfect and a master in any language save his own. Mr. Hamerton, who is very familiar with France, once thought he had at last found a person perfect in French and English, and was sufficiently surprised to resolve on examining his black swan more closely. He therefore engaged him in conversation in the presence of a born Parisienne, who, for the first half-hour, she said, detected nothing in his speech that was not right, but then discovered a fault: he did not vibrate the letter r properly. But what person does any of us know who, speaking his own tongue, has not some fault peculiar to himself? Testing the best speakers with such severity as that exercised by Mr. Hamerton in the case of Mr. Wyld—not accepting as enough an unfailing correctness in idiom and grammar and the choice of words—we would almost venture to say that of all the tribes of articulate speaking men there is not one person, man or woman, who could not be condemned. Mr. Hamerton goes on, talking pleasantly and instructively, and, if we are not mistaken, affording in his own person an example of the general truth of his main proposition. Or, perhaps it is considering too curiously to note in him what seems a not perfect amalgamation of his French and English habits of speaking and feeling and thinking, as expressed in his style, which appears to us to express a something of French ease and accurate perception of nuances, and something of British stiffness—woodenness and downrightness, to speak irreverently, and to use language which we fear Mr. Hamerton would do right to call British or American in the worst sense. All his lightness of touch seems laborious as we read. Another Englishman—let us say, in hope to make ourselves better understood—who has overlaid his Briticisms with a certain amount of Gallicism, and has fallen further short than Mr. Hamerton of chemically combining the two, is Mr. Matthew Arnold, as we think any one may see who will read the preface of the "Essays in Criticism." If there ever was more palpably ungenuine suavity and more palpably genuine bloodthirstiness, we do not know where one may find it.

Another good paper in Putnam's is the first of a series on "Our Political Degeneracy and its Remedy"—a not very taking title certainly, but the designation of a piece of sound writing which is calculated to do good. To be vivified, however, and made readable by the average reader, we should say that a little less of the "Federalist" and a little more of the Federal senators and representatives might be desirable. There is some heaviness in the philosophizing and some creaking of the machine of thought. The first of a series, too, is Professor L. C. Seelye's essay on "Our Celtic Inheritance," which asserts that we are far more Celtic than most Anglo-Saxons (so-called) have been believing. "Pernickity People," that is to say, people who are fidgety about dirt and disorder, are the subject of a pleasant little sketch by Mrs. F. Barrow; "The Great Gold Flurry" is described by Mr. J. A. Peters; and the picture-galleries of Mr. August Belmont and Mr. W. T. Blodgett of this city are treated of by Mr. Eugene Benson, whose article is one of his best, and capable of giving pleasure and profit to most readers. One is perhaps justified in doubting whether a man with such a delight in color in languages has a right to more than one mode of giving expression to that side of his nature, and whether he is likely to paint as well as write. Still, there is M. Fromentin, of whom Mr. Benson speaks, who now is high in rank among French painters, and who ten years ago did not know whether he was "a painter who writes or a writer who paints." The affair is not ours of course, except so far as that it belongs to us to say that Mr. Benson undoubtedly writes best when he depends least on the adjective, and holds himself most rigorously to simplicity, and thus sets a needed example to several other Americans whom it would be easy to name.

The May Lippincott's brings to its end Trollope's "Vicar of Bullhampton," in which at last Miss Mary Lowther marries Captain Marrable and sends Squire Fenwick about his business, which for the present is to consist in roaming the world in some anger and more grief. How miserable a girl may be who marries a man she does not love is Mr. Trollope's moral in this novel, he says. Something of the same sort no doubt is to be the moral of the same author's new story, "Sir Harry Hotspur of Humblethwaite," which begins as the "Vicar of Bullhampton" leaves off, and it does seem as if it had already been heard times enough. "The Echo of Appomattox," which tells how the collapse of the late Confederacy affected England, France, Prussia, and Spain, is such as to please all Americans, and ought to assist us in bearing with equanimity the delay in settling the Alabama claims—if, indeed, more equanimity is necessary. Mr. McCarthy sets forth in his well-known manner—which is perfection in its way and a magic sword for a man who besieges all the magazines—the blind confidence in the ruin of the Union which was felt by the governing classes in England, and their bewilderment when suddenly they found Lee paroled at Appomattox instead of dictating peace at Washington amid general rejoicings. "Eccentricity as a Pursuit" is a gossiping sketch of the Comte de Châteauvillard, recently deceased; "The Cross in Legend and Art" is a pleasant paper; and there is besides in Lippincott's a running acount of American socialistic or communist movements. It is apropos of Mr. J. H. Noyes's book, to which it does not do justice, being perhaps severe enough on the Oneida Community but not full enough. It is by Mr. Lyman Abbott. The weak spot in this magazine is something entitled "The Widow Bedott in Philadelphia." It was always of the essence of vulgarity—this style of writing, and it is now so entirely obsolete that the reader can only wonder that any editor should have any thing to do with it.

"The English Governess at the Siamese Court" in the Atlantic continues to be very entertaining, giving a portrait of the first king, Chowfa Mongkut, whose English in particular is sufficiently amusing. It is like that of the famous Anglo-Portuguese phrase-book prepared by a pair of Brazilian linguists for the use of such of their countrymen as should travel, but, of course, is not equal to that triumph of philology, which is easily superior to all other efforts of the absurd. Here, however, is a part of Chowfa Mongkut's obituary notice of his brother, Chowfa Chudha Mani, whom, by the way, he secretly hated as being a better scholar than himself, but whom in the literary production mentioned he professes to admire excessively: "He pleased very much in and was playful of almost everything, some important and some unimportant, as riding on Elephants, and Horses, and Ponies, racing of them and racing of rowing boats; firing on birds and beasts of prey, dancing and singing in various ways pleasantly, and various curiosity of almost everything, and music of every description, and in taming of dogs, monkeys, etc., etc., that is to say briefly, that he has tested almost everything eatable except entirely testing of Opium and play."

Another readable article in the May Atlantic is the fifth of Mrs. Celia Thaxter's delightful sketches of life in the Isles of Shoals. This one, with its excellent painting of nature, is charmingly in keeping with the season, which, if it has not been very early, has, nevertheless, by its warm days and by the suddenness with which everything has sprung up and put forth buds, produced in the beholder a peculiarly strong impression of the presence of spring. It happens then that Mrs. Thaxter, with the keenness of her pleasure in the sights and sounds of the season, makes an attack which it is the harder just now to resist; but what she has written is absolutely good, and is independent of considerations like these, so that we can promise pleasure to almost any person who reads it. We hope that before the series is done a paper or two more may be devoted to the superstitions and other folk-lore of the isles, and to a portraiture of the Shoaler. "My Secretaryship" is a little story by a new writer, so far as we know, who seems to be "a true woman"—a term which we suppose to mean something more feminine than ordinary woman—and a vivacious lady, as well as an out-and-out sentimentalist of the most unmistakable sort. "Signs and Show-Cases in New York," by Mr. C. D. Shanly, is a piece of pleasantly humorous talk on a subject which, however, is still open to other humorists, we should say, and which ought, one would think, to tempt such persons very much indeed. "The Channel Islands" is something about Guernsey, Alderney, Jersey, and Sark, as the school geographies used to say, and is by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton, who also leaves behind her much grain for other reapers, and who is not particularly entertaining. Better, we judge, than entertaining is what appears to be a very intelligent letter from Madrid, which gives the circumstances of the recent duel between the two princely cousins of Bourbon and Orleans, and describes the character of the principals. The business seems to have been one that may be sincerely regretted by all outsiders, with whatever mixture of feelings Spanish partisans may regard it.

The poetry of the Atlantic is by George Eliot, Mr. Bayard Taylor, Mr. T. B. Aldrich, and Dr. Parsons, Mr. Aldrich's being the best—a pretty neatly turned little poem—but Dr. Parsons's blank verse having a fine movement, though on the whole there is not much in "Aspromonte." But prettier than any other verses in the number are some quoted by Mrs. Thaxter:

"Ships, ships, I will descrie you
Amidst the main,
I will come and try you,
What you are protecting
And projecting,
What's your end and aim?
Some go abroad for merchandise and trading,
Another stays to keep his country from invading,
A third is coming home with wealth and costly lading,
Halloo! my fancie, whither wilt thou goe?"

They owe some of their beauty to their setting in Mrs. Thaxter's description of the vessels sailing past her light-house, but will be liked by themselves. As for Mr. Taylor's "May-time Pastoral," it is English hexameters, but we do not see that it is not as good as George Eliot's "Legend of Jubal." We confess to having read neither of them through.

The reviews and literary notices are by Mr. Cranch, Mr. Henry James, Mr. T. W. Higginson, and Mr. Howells, and are, without exception, good, though why a little less kindness to Leigh Hunt and a little more civility to Mr. Arthur Helps would not have been in place we but darkly guess.

"Diet en Masse" is perhaps as good as anything else in Hours at Home, though Professor E. P. Evans's "William Blake" is enriched by two or three of Blake's most beautiful poems. The latter article, however, is on the whole slight. A short story perfectly full of love, "which is pretty to observe," as Pepys used to say, being that warm and gushing as to be a fountain of youth to the reader, is "Pink and Blue," by Miss Sarah Chester. Jack, a handsome young man, but not a kingly soul, pleadingly requests Gertie to wear a pink ribbon on the next day; Tom, not so handsome, but hard headed and royal in spirit, briefly requests Gertie to wear blue. Gertie goes up to her little room, hesitates, deliberates long, and on the next morning, such is the nature of young women, she appears dressed for the picnic and wearing the pink ribbon, which causes handsome Jack to look handsomer than ever, and Tom to look grimmer than his former self. Figure then in the imagination the degree to which Mr. Jack is taken aback by finding Miss Gertie behaving to him in a very austere manner all the morning, as if he were merely an acquaintance. The obtuse Tom, however, superior in virtue of his nature to the wiles of women, persists in his delusion and in wearing a look of pain. Gertie execrates all shades of pink and snubs everybody. Her soul is not at peace. Going away with little Kittie to wade in the water, she is overtaken by a storm, and when she tries to get back to the hotel by the beach she sinks in a quicksand. The natural cry of "Tom" comes to her lips, which is immediately answered by Tom himself, who rescues her, arriving with his burden just in time to see the somewhat shallow but handsome Jack coming down stairs to enquire "what is the matter?" Still Tom persists in keeping his eyes shut. Jack is to have her; he will be brave. Nothing, by the way, is more noticeable in all these tales than the inexorableness of even the youngest and naturally kindest of the writers of them. They are so relentless to the wretched lovers that we may be sure Malthus's doctrine is not yet going to come in fashion. There is no fear that there will not still be pairing. At last Gertie emancipates herself from Jack, who, she says, need never have left her had he but had the soul, as he had the mien, of a prince, and proceeds to do something very like making an offer of marriage to Tom, who is a little stupid to the last. So, then, "Pink and Blue" is very far from being the worst story in the world, and it is written in a sprightly, straightforward, pleasant way, the opening, in particular, showing skill.

Hours at Home begins with an article by Mr. S. S. Randall, which we opened with some expectation of pleasure, as thinking to see in a periodical which has influence in the American religious world a logical appreciation of the exact state of the controversy between the Roman Catholics and the friends of American free schools. This was the more to be expected as the article is entitled "Popular Education versus Sectarianism," and is by the Superintendent of the Public Schools in this city. But the sum and substance of it is this: that the Roman Catholics ought not to have any special grants of money for the support of their schools, nor should the school fund be divided. So far every non-Romanist goes; but it is not a sagacious non-Romanist, we are compelled to believe, who stops there and goes no further. Hours at Home might profitably take a lesson in this matter from the Christian Union, which is not only the ablest and best, but, also, as we suppose, the most popular of American religious periodicals. At all events, it is safe to predict that it will soon have, if it has not already, greater influence than any other religious paper in the country—an influence which will be none the less, we are persuaded, because it has taken in the discussion of this question the only position that is tenable and cannot be forced.

For the rest, Hours at Home has an agreeable desultory chat about "The Art to Blot," which talks of poets and their painstaking; something readable concerning an Arab wedding; an article containing curious information about the symbolism of numbers, and half-a-dozen of other pieces.

Old and New, too, as well as Hours at Home, discusses the question of "Religion in Schools," the writer describing himself as "a practical teacher." He comes, after more or less irrelevant pleading, to a conclusion which also has much irrelevancy: he would have a joint commission, made of delegates from all the principal denominations, prepare a Scriptural manual, which should satisfy all consciences. This the Catholics have, over and over again, said in the most emphatic manner it is impossible to do. But "a practical teacher" has not learned the art of putting himself in another person's place and understanding the grounds of a Roman Catholic's objections to Bible readings without note or comment, and it is not too much to say that all his ammunition is so much powder and shot fired into the air. Of the rest of this number of Old and New, perhaps the most generally interesting portion is that written by Mr. Robert Dale Owen, but it cannot be called very fresh. There is more of "Ten times One is Ten," by "Colonel Fred Ingham," and of Elise Polko's novel. There is a Sandwich Island legend, by Mr. W. T. Brigham; a careful and encouraging article on the "Mormon Problem," by Charles T. Brigham; and several religious articles which will be of interest to Unitarians, but which the world of magazine readers will not care for. The "Record of Progress" gives us some information concerning the Rochdale Co-operative plan, as tried in this country, at Fall River and near Providence, Rhode Island; some account of the People's Banks in Germany, as set forth in the recent report made by Mr. S. M. Quincy; a report of the doings of the well-known Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Libraries for the Unitarian denomination; a résumé of what has been done for the black man under the new order of things in South Carolina; a New York letter, and a letter from Mr. Sidney Andrews, in Washington. It cannot yet be said of Old and New that it is not heavy rather than light, religious rather than literary, and too scrappy; but it is not half a year old, and as it bids fair to live its friends may look to see it good.

The chapters of "Put Yourself in His Place," in the May Galaxy, are a little less exciting than some of the instalments of that story which have preceded this one; but are perhaps more interesting. They give another proof of that quality of Mr. Reade's which makes some women dislike him—or try to dislike him, for we do not know that any actually succeed—and makes some men like him: namely, his inability to conceive of women except in what may be called their adjective position, their subordination to sexual influences. This last adjective is not used in any coarse sense. The passion of love, and love of a kind out of which the physical element is not at all left, has been the spring of his best novels. In the later ones this simple motive has been somewhat overslaughed by a deal of "business" not naturally growing out of it—as in the case of this novel by trade-unionism; but here in these chapters, what with the complication arising out of Grace Carden's marriage and Jael Dence's love for Henry Little, the story is for the moment reduced to its essence, and Mr. Reade again reminds us of the Mr. Reade of "Peg Woffington" and "Christie Johnstone"—stories which, it seems to us, much as we admire all his works, he has never since their time equalled.

Mr. Mark Twain's "Memoranda," though some of them are sad—as the demise of "The Good Boy who did not Prosper"—will please all the friends and enemies of this writer. Mr. Greeley, however, will feel some natural jealousy of the agricultural remarks. Mr. Thurlow Weed contributes some queer passages from his forthcoming autobiography. He is garrulous, and that about people for whom the general public of this generation cares nothing; but the picture of the "stage" of fifty years ago is interesting, and Central New York ought to furnish a good many readers for this part of Mr. Weed's book. "Chanet" is a not over and above good story by Mr. De Forest; "Nature and Dress" is talk not very new, but all sound we suppose, by Dr. J. C. Draper; "A Marshal of France," by G. B. M., sketches very clearly the career of Bugeaud, whom General McClellan knew personally; "George Sand" is by Mr. Justin McCarthy, and appears to be fair as far as it goes; there is, moreover, the close of a shocking story by Anthony Trollope; there is the story of "The Lady of Gruach," or Lady Macbeth, by Mr. Grant White; there is a piece of Walt Whitman's which is about as valuable and beautiful as almost any equal length of that gentleman's fabrication, and these with a dozen other articles make up the May number of this clever and readable magazine.

In Harper's, the "Easy Chair" defends the American lecture system, of which some philosophers have thought and spoken slightingly, and says that "the platform" is a good institution, because it presents to the people, through the mouths of eminent men, or well-known men, the two sides of the questions which agitate the popular mind; and we presume he would add that the people might never, as a whole, hear both sides, but each half of the public would hear only the one in whose favor that half might chance to be prejudiced. There is a good deal in this, we suppose. Two dangers, however, threaten the argument—one that this people, which listens contentedly to both sides of a question, would probably not remain in ignorance of one side, even though this should not have a lecturer; the other is that lecturers are not apt to be so exhaustive and unimpassioned as to make one very well pleased at the thought of even half the people taking law from them. We confess, however, that there are lecturers, and lecturers, and that, though we have heard few good ones of any kind, and a mighty array of very bad ones, our objection was rather to the itinerant teacher than the itinerant orator attempting to set "causes" in motion.

"Secular and Sectarian Schools," by Mr. Lyman Abbott, is the best presentation of this vexed question that we have found in the magazines of the month, but it wears a very non-committal air. Nothing else in the May Harper's calls for special mention.

To define "the American state" is the object of the leader of the Catholic World; but inasmuch as the modern course of opinion in regard to religion and the functions of government, of which the existing American state is one of the results, passes with our author under the name of "the revolution," it is difficult to see how he can speak of the state, as he does, with praise, or how he can predict ruin to "the revolution" and glory to the American polity. The article is, perhaps, not worth reading, as being of the vagaries of a man who has always done more of the labor of thinking than the world has ever been able to think justified by the usefulness of the product of his thought.

"Dion and the Sibyls" goes on in an agreeable fashion, though nothing would be easier than to parody with ludicrous effect the mixture of story and antiquarian learning—the way in which the latter is brought in having of itself, indeed, almost the effect of a parody.

There is, besides, in this magazine a civil review of Emerson's prose works, an amusing paper about Sir John Maundeville, a beautiful "May Carol" by Aubrey De Vere, and some other matter, of which none is of importance.

THE HOHENSTEINS.*

We are pretty well persuaded that the days must be longer in Germany than in any other part of the inhabited world—say twenty-four hours daylight, besides the night time, in each seventh part of a week. We think the encyclopædic form of novel could not otherwise have originated there—a summer's reading between two covers. The book whose title is affixed to this notice affords a forcible contrast to the rapid, hit-or-miss, slangy style of some of the modern English novels, such as "Red as a Rose," "Cometh up as a Flower," "Within an Ace," where the eighth sin, more deadly than the seven others, is evidently to be "slow." That horror of being bored which is the simple explanation of many complex social conventions in England, has not yet dawned on the Fatherland—rather a patience, a longanimity exist, which may make it a blessed habitation for the professional story-teller. We are curious to see how representative government may affect this disposition; yet the Grand Cyrus was written under a "despotism tempered by epigrams," and we are still in doubt. It is high praise to say of "The Hohensteins" that in spite of its length it is not tedious, but that the interest is remarkably maintained through the diversified and complicated adventures of a whole family. Both author and translation have considerably improved since "Problematic Characters" appeared. There was an element of fertility in that story which, though perhaps intentional, was too undramatic to be tolerable, whereas this plot is ably constructed and, though complicated, is coherent.

The story opens in the spring of 1848, and deals with three generations of the Hohenstein family then living, and variously affecting and affected by the political and revolutionary activity of that year and the following one. In spite of the name—or perhaps because of the impossibility of moulding a hero out of a grand-uncle, three nephews with their wives, and five grand-nephews and nieces—Munzer, an ardent patriot, and a revolutionary politician, is the real hero of the book, and is powerfully drawn. An occasional realistic touch in his character, life-like inconsistencies, and a strong pervading vitality suggest that this personage is drawn from life, and Cajus, though of inferior type, has the same stamp. Major Degenfeld, also, is a valuable addition to the usual stock characters, and is so delicately discriminated from his companions and co-workers that we shall be surprised if he is not recognized by those more familiar than ourselves with the actors in that drama of high hopes and bitter failures—the German uprising of 1848. We, who have played and won in the great game of civil war in the years just passed, must read with an appreciative if painful sympathy of the gallant efforts, the stifled purpose, and the loyal self-devotion of our less fortunate brethren.

In the Hohenstein family, we have the usual rich and despotic head of the family, the usual interested and scheming heirs, and the female villain, who is rather a special possession of German and Prussian novelists, but who in this instance is unusually genuine and coherent, though decidedly improper; we have the good young man who is poor and wearisome, with the profligate favorites of fortune, his cousins—in short, the usual dramatis personæ; but the life of the book is the incubation, the bursting forth and the collapse of a political movement, and here Spielhagen has been a true artist, and has focussed the light on Munzer's figure. This man, variously gifted, influential, beloved, and sincere, whom we see first as the centre of a great and hopeful activity, we follow through the tragic mistakes and failures of his life to its close (which, by the way, is the best managed thing in the book), and forgive him his long speeches for the sake of the earnestness in him. Antonia (the female villain) taxes him with being not one of the people:

"You mock me!" replied Munzer, with a melancholy smile. "I cannot blame you for it, you have cause enough. You wish to know where my kingdom is. Here, behind this brow, within the narrow walls of this head! And who are my royal parents? Poor peasant people, who wasted their sad lives under the burden of heavy baskets, in which they carried earth up to the narrow terraces of the slate mountain, where every two or three years they reaped a pitiful harvest of grapes. The toys they put into my aristocratic hands were a spade and a hoe; my playmates were half-wild goats browsing on the coarse grass of rocky heights. My royal parents died of grief, misery and sorrow; and I, their only princely son, would have perished likewise of misery and hunger if the priest in the nearest village—the only true friend I have ever known—had not taken pity on the poor ragged orphan, and shared with him his pittance of daily bread and precious knowlege."

There is an occasional touch of humor, which is refreshing among so many of the very highest sentiments, as where Camilla says: "A few thousand dollars more or less do not matter much." "The mother sighed. She thought of several old bills, of which her husband had no suspicion, and how enormous the difference between a few thousand dollars more or less is for a maternal heart, beating affectionately for her daughter's wardrobe!"

"I believe Munzer is going to lose his senses," said Dr. Hohn. "How can a man be so clever in general, and such a fool in particulars?" Aunt Bella, too, with her shabby-genteel expedients, is cheering.

The translation is not without its defects, of which these are a few:

"Your lady (meaning 'your mare') is knocking her fore shoes to pieces on the pavement. Apropos of lady! are you really going to exchange her for Brinckman's sorrel?" "Two thousand years ago it was called folly to fill new wine in old bottles." "Hampered by the bans under which I have been put by my family." "It was a deed, and he had always felt that Wolfgang suspected him of not being energetic enough to do a deed."

It is an awkwardness to speak of Rheinfeld, and in the same sentence to translate the name of a place into "Churchtown." We would also suggest to the proof-reader that the final e in "noblesse oblige" and "misère" is never accented." There are some very dramatic scenes in the book, as that where Antonia and Munzer are hidden by fog from the advancing troops, and the last sight which we have of Degenfeld and Balthazar; and finally, we can assure intending purchasers that patient readers will be no losers.

The Great Empress. A Portrait. By M. Schele De Vere, of the University of Virginia. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870.)—Like another Southern author whose book we had recently under consideration, Professor De Vere seems bitten with the desire to "ensnare youthful devotees of light literature" into the acquisition of historical knowledge by keeping carefully out of sight such dry and prosaic matters as dates and precise references, and setting before them instead a highly colored picture of the times and people whom he is describing. His "Great Empress" is scarcely to be called a valuable contribution to historical science, but is rather a much expanded magazine article in the style with which his readers in Putnam must be already familiar. One lingers over passages like one we are about to quote, describing a scene in the life of Tiberius, and wonders whether it is only the general public for whom this profitable kind of amusement is provided, or whether the avenues to knowledge are in like manner smoothed and made pleasant to students of the Virginia University.

"There he lay, exhausted and weary in the early morning, with a sinister and ferocious expression in every lineament, and savage rage lurking in every wrinkle; his whole countenance filled, as it were, with the concentrated infamy of many ages. Suddenly a light step was heard on the crisp sand, and, with sylph-like quickness, there bounded forth a Bacchante of marvellous beauty. Grapes of golden hue, relieved by ruddy vine-leaves, encircled her temples in a rich garland, and waved in airy dance as she came gliding in softly, touching her cymbals with timid finger and looking wistfully in the dread emperor's face. He smiled, and off she bounded again in the wild, intoxicating Bacchic dance, her lustrous and defiant eyes throwing out vivid flashes of light, her bosom heaving in the roseate warmth of her youth, and all her limbs swaying to and fro—now in a tumult of wild passion and now in the soft waves of infinite grace. As he gazed at her with a passing thrill of admiration, she stood still for an instant in all the perfect symmetry of sculpture; as he wearily closed his lids, she became at once again all motion and fire, till her deep black hair fluttered in ringlets around her, her light robes flew back from the jewelled brooch on her knee, and her tiny sandals clinked on the bright mosaic in unison with the capricious clank of the cymbals. The emperor looked again as she passed, now near, now at a distance before his eye, but ever radiant with sublime beauty; his eye blazed up in unwonted fire, and he beckoned her to fill the golden goblet by his side with Falernian wine. He raised it eagerly to his lips, as if to drain its ruby vintage to the bottom; but he fell back exhausted, overcome by the power of his passion, and soon he was writhing in one of those paroxysms of rage which made men whisper in stealthy conclave that their master was a madman."

* "The Hohensteins. A Novel. By Friedrich Spielhagen. Translated by Prof. Schele De Vere." New York: Leypoldt & Holt.

The full value of passages like this, however, and of numberless others which rival it, is only to be understood by readers of the entire work, who know that it has no bearing on what follows or what precedes it, and that it shows only how easy it is to superadd the lighter charms of fiction to the graver details of history.

* Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Alger (H., jr.), Ben the Luggage Boy: a Boys' Story	(Loring) $1 25
Appleton's Railway Guide for May, 1870, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Aguilar (Grace), The Mother's Recompense	(D. Appleton & Co.)
The Vale of Cedars	" " 1 00
Allibone (S. A.), A Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors Living and Deceased, Vol. II., K–S	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Barker (Prof. G. F.), The Correlation of Vital and Physical Forces, swd	(Chas. C. Chatfield)
Caldcleugh (W. G.), Homer's Iliad translated into English Verse	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Caxton (Laura), Marion Berkley: a Story for Girls	(Loring) 1 05
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 29, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 05
Gleason (Mrs. Dr. R. B.), Talks to my Patients	(Wood & Holbrook)
Howard Paul's Jokes, swd	(Loring) 0 25
Manton (Kate), Man's Wrongs; or, Woman's Foibles	(Crosby & Damrell)
Merrick (J. M., jr.), The Strawberry, and its Culture	(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Rand (E. S., jr.), Seventy-five Popular Flowers, and How to Cultivate Them	(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Savage (M.), The Woman of Business: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 75
The Private Life of Galileo	(Nichols & Noyes) 1 50
Schem (Prof. A. J.), Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon, 1. Band, A bis Austräge	(F. Gerhard)
Sargent (H. W.), Skeleton Tours through England and the Continent	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Swan (J. G.), The Indians of Cape Flattery, swd	(Smithsonian Institution)
The American Tune Book	(O. Ditson & Co.) 1 50
Winans (R.), One Religion: Many Creeds	(J. P. Des Forges)
Wrage (Prof. H. D.), Practical Grammar of the German Language	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Yonge (Miss C. M.), The Caged Lion: a Tale	(Macmillan & Co.)

Valuable New Works

JUST IMPORTED BY

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY.

Bernard (M.), A Historical Account of the Neutrality of Great Britain during the American Civil War. 1 vol. royal 8vo, cloth, $8.

Cox (G. W.), The Mythology of the Aryan Nations. 2 large vols. 8vo, cloth, $14.

The Cavroche Party: Being Literary Estimates of Political France. By Blanchard Jerrold. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $3.

The Epigrammatists: A Selection from the Epigrammatic Literature of Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern Times. With Notes, Observations, Illustrations, and an Introduction, by Rev. H. P. Dodd. 1 thick vol. 8vo, cloth, $5 25.

Erasmus in Praise of Folly. Illustrated with many curious Cuts, designed, drawn, and etched by Hans Holbein. With Portrait, Life of Erasmus, and his Epistle addressed to Sir Thomas More. 1 vol. 12mo, half-morocco, gilt top, $3.

NOW READY.

Price reduced from $4 to $2 50. A New and Cheaper Edition of

SINAI AND PALESTINE,

In connection with their History. By ARCHBISHOP STANLEY, Author of History of the "Eastern" and "Jewish Churches," etc., and uniform with those volumes. 8vo, 591 pp., well printed in clear type, on fine paper, price $2 50, containing all the maps and plates of the fine edition.

A NEW AND HANDSOME EDITION OF

Wit and Wisdom of Sidney Smith;

Selected from his Writings, and Passages of his Letters and Table-talk. Edited, with Memoir and Notes, by E. A. DUYCKINCK.

 A choice impression of this valuable book, on tinted paper, with Steel Portrait and fac-simile Letter. Small 8vo, cloth extra, $2 25.

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,
27 Howard Street, New York.

For sale at principal Book-Stores.

Recent Publications

OF

J. E. TILTON & CO.,

BOSTON.

I.

Seventy-five Popular Flowers,

AND HOW TO CULTIVATE THEM.

By Edward Sprague Rand, Jr., Author of "Flowers for the Parlor and Garden," "Bulbs, etc.," "Garden Flowers." Price $1 50. With 31 Illustrations.

"This volume is an attempt to answer the question, 'What can I plant which will take care of itself?' It is better to grow a few plants in perfection than many badly."—Extract from the Author's preface.

II.

The Practical Poultry-keeper.

(With 47 Illustrations.) A Complete and Standard Guide to the Management of Poultry, whether for Domestic Use, the Market, or Exhibition. By L. Wright. Price $2.

III.

The Strawberry & its Culture.

(Illustrated.) With a Descriptive Catalogue of all known varieties. By J. M. Merrick, Jr. Price $1.

We copy the following from a letter from a distinguished Horticulturist and well-known author: "It has the merit, not too common, of being written by one who knows what he is writing about. I find it as interesting as it must be valuable to those who are able to give attention to Strawberry-growing.

IV.

The Book of Roses.

By Francis Parkman. A Cheap Edition. Price $1 50.

The N. Y. Nation says: "So simply and attractively does he write, that even one not interested in acquiring practical knowledge would find the book good reading; and we are sure that until horticulture makes a much greater advance than it has yet made, Mr. Parkman's book will be such an exhaustive authority as to render new books on roses a drug."

V.

Tennyson's Poems.

(Globe Edition. Illustrated.) This is the only complete edition in which the Idylls of the King are properly arranged. A neat 12mo volume, price $1 25.

 Any of the above sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by

J. E. TILTON & CO., Publishers,
BOSTON.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.

HAVE NOW READY,

GREEK LEXICON

Of the Roman and Byzantine Periods

(From B.C. 146 to A.D. 1100.)

By E. A. SOPHOCLES. Royal 8vo, cloth, $10.

This Lexicon may be regarded as a supplement to the Classical Greek Lexicon. It contains such words, meanings, idioms, and constructions as occur for the first time in authors of the Roman and Byzantine Periods, from B.C. 146, when Greece was reduced to a Roman province to the close of the eleventh century, when the ancient language ceased to be spoken by the people.

Also, the following valuable Works:

CENTENARY EDITION

OF THE

WAVERLEY NOVELS.

New and Complete Edition. In Twenty-five Monthly Volumes. Illustrated with Vignettes and Frontispieces. Crown 8vo, cloth, price $1 75 each. Vols. I. to V. now ready.

Grote's History of Greece.

New Edition, with Portrait, Map, and Plans. Post 8vo, cloth, price $2 per volume. To be completed in Twelve Monthly Volumes. Vols. I. to VI. now ready.

Hallam's Complete Works.

10 vols., post 8vo, cloth, price $20. Comprising:

Constitutional History of England, 3 vols.
Introduction to the Literature of Europe, 4 vols.
Views of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, 3 vols.

Milman's Complete Works.

15 vols., post 8vo, cloth, price $30. Comprising:

History of Christianity, 3 vols.
History of Latin Christianity, 9 vols.
History of the Jews, 3 vols.

Little, Brown & Co.,

PUBLISHERS,

110 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON

JUST PUBLISHED.

A Life of the Great Lord Fairfax. By Clements R. Markham. With Portrait, Maps, and Plans. 8vo, $5.

The Private Life of Galileo. Compiled principally from his Correspondence and that of his Eldest Daughter, Sister Maria Celeste. With Portrait and Vignette. Cloth, $1 50.

The Morning Land. By Edward Dicey, late Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in the East. 2 vols. post 8vo, cloth, $5.

A NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HEIR OF REDCLYFFE."

The Caged Lion. By Charlotte M. Yonge, author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." $1 75.

Globe Edition of Dryden's Poetical Works. With a Memoir, carefully revised Text, and Notes. Edited by W. D. Christie, M.A. $1 75. Just ready.

RECENT VOLUMES OF MACMILLAN'S SERIES OF GLOBE EDITIONS.

Pope. Edited, with Notes and Introductory Memoir, by Adolphus William Ward, M.A.

Spenser. Edited from the Original Editions and Manuscripts, by R. Morris; with a Memoir by J. W. Hales, M.A.

NEW EDITION OF BISHOP TEMPLE'S SERMONS

Sermons Preached in Rugby School Chapel, in 1858, 1859, 1860. By the Right Rev. Frederick Temple, D.D. Fcap 8vo, cloth, $1 50.

MACMILLAN & CO.,
63 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

In order to meet the demand, the publishers have now ready a new and cheaper edition of Dr. Schaff's volume, elegantly printed on superfine paper, neatly bound in cloth, at $2 25. It contains 735 pages, and at the price now fixed upon it is remarkable for its cheapness.

CHRIST IN SONG: Hymns of Immanuel. Selected from all ages, with Notes by PHILIP SCHAFF. Crown 4to.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & CO.,
770 BROADWAY, cor. NINTH ST., N. Y.
Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

Rare London Books,

IN ALL LANGUAGES AND EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE, SUITABLE FOR PRIVATE LIBRARIES AND PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

The attention of the literary public is respectfully requested to our extensive assortment of books, now offered for sale AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. The net prices are plainly marked in each volume, thus obviating the annoyance of pricing any work.

About due at this Port, and will open in a few days, a large and fine Invoice, carefully selected in the best foreign markets.

Importations by every steamer. Catalogues issued regularly and forwarded to any address, gratis, on application.

A. L. LUYSTER,
London, and 138 Fulton Street (Up Stairs), NEW YORK,
ESTABLISHED 1840.

THE
Congregationalist & Recorder

Is gotten up each week with the most liberal expenditure of money, and with the constant endeavor to make it the most interesting and attractive Religious Journal published in the land. It gives in the course of the year about three times the amount of matter contained in most of the monthlies. Every Minister, it is believed, will find in it an important assistant and ally in his work among his parishioners.

The Congregationalist and Recorder furnishes:

TIMELY EDITORIALS,
HENRY WARD BEECHER'S LECTURE ROOM TALKS,
A FULL LITERARY REVIEW,
LITERARY AND ART ITEMS,
A CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT,
POETRY.
SPECTATOR'S WASHINGTON LETTER.
A SABBATH-SCHOOL COLUMN,
MISSIONARY ITEMS,
NEWS FROM ABROAD,
SKETCHY ARTICLES,
DOCTRINAL ARTICLES,
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES,
AN AGRICULTURAL COLUMN,
LETTERS OF TRAVEL,
IN BRIEFS,
EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS,
OUR EXCHANGES,
BUSINESS AND THE MARKETS,
A FINANCIAL COLUMN,
SUMMARY OF SECULAR NEWS.

If you keep a scrap-book, every paper will be sure to contain something that you will wish to cut out and preserve.

Among the multitude of contributors to the Congregationalist, and those from whom we expect articles during the year, we mention the following, but have room for only a few:

Senator Wilson,
Hon. Henry L. Dawes,
Senator Patterson,
Rev. H. Clay Trumbull,
Prof. Austin Phelps, D.D.,
Miss E. Stuart Phelps,
Prof. W. S. Tyler, D.D.,
Grace Greenwood,
Sophie May,
Mr. C. C. Coffin,
Rev. Leonard Bacon, D.D.,
Rev. John Todd, D.D.,
Lynde Palmer,
Rev. Albert Barnes,
Judge Woodbury Davis,
Rev. W. H. H. Murray,
Rev. George B. Willcox,
Rev. J. E. Rankin, D.D.,
Rev. Lyman Abbott,
Rev. J. M. Sturtevant, D.D.,
Prof. E. A. Park, D.D.,
Rev. A. L. Stone, D.D.,
Rev. A. H. Clapp, D.D.,
Frances Lee,
Rev. Asa Bullard,
Rev. I. N. Tarbox, D.D.,
Rev. William Barrows, D.D.,
Judge Mellen Chamberlain,
Prof. J. C. Bodwell, D.D.,
Rev. Alex. Raleigh, D.D., of London,
Mrs. J. P. Ballard,
Rev. J. P. Thompson, D.D.,
Rev. Ray Palmer, D.D.,
Prof. Thomas C. Upham,
Rev. C. H. Wheeler, of Turkey,
Hon. Amasa Walker,
Rev. A. H. Plumb,
Rev. W. L. Gage.

In Editorial Matter, Communications, News of the Churches, Domestic and Foreign Correspondence, the Farmers' Column, Children's Department, Poetry, Summary of Secular News, Foreign Religious Intelligence, Business Articles, Literary Review, Washington Correspondence, Missionary Items, Temperance Items, Sabbath-school Items, Catholic Items, Editorial Paragraphs, and, in short, in all its departments, the Congregationalist and Recorder claims to be a first-class paper; not perfect, but striving to improve week by week, and constantly laying plans whereby, with a liberal expenditure of money and constant, earnest, and enthusiastic labor, a growing excellence and interest shall be found by the public in its columns from week to week.

PRICE $3 PER YEAR.

W. L. GREENE & CO.,
15 CORNHILL, BOSTON.

VAN NOSTRAND'S
Eclectic Engineering Magazine.

VOL. 2, NO. 5, FOR MAY,

NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

The Spectrum of the Bessemer Flame (illustrated; The Resistance of Vessels (concluded); The King's College Girders; A New Water Meter (illustrated); Who Invented the Steamboat? The Corrosion of Ship Plates; The Coal Fields of the North Pacific; Difficulties in the Received Views of Fluid Friction (with cuts), The Louisville Bridge; The Wetli System of Locomotion for Steep Inclines (illustrated); Arabian Design and Art; A New Gunpowder; The Boutet Bridge; Hoisting Stone in Quarries; Effect of Sudden Loads on Cast Iron; Narrow-gauge Branch Railways in Sweden; Performances of Engines; Lead Mines of Missouri: Iron Bridges; The Whitworth Gun; Elasticity in the Track and Rolling Stock; Masonry—Thickness of Mortar Joints; Waste of Labor in Building; The Harvey Torpedo; Equilibrium of Floating Bodies; The Manufacture of Coke; Hydraulic Riveting Machine (illustrated); How Rails are made in France; Explosive Agents; Screw Piles; Estimating Earthworks; Railroad Building; Cutting and Filling (with cut); Exhaust Steam for Heating Purposes; The Fairlie Engine Trials; Materials for Construction in Europe; The Festiniog Railway.

PARAGRAPHS.—Iron and Steel Notes; Railway Notes; Ordnance and Naval Notes; Engineering Structures; New Books; Miscellaneous.

TERMS: Issued monthly at $5 per annum; single numbers, 50 cents.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
23 Murray and 27 Warren Streets.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,
BIBLIOPOLE,
133 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

SEND FOR

SABIN & SONS'
"AMERICAN BIBLIOPOLIST:"

A MONTHLY JOURNAL,

Devoted to current and interesting literary topics, including a reprint of the English "Notes and Queries," so much as they respect America.

The February Number contains a reprint of André's "Cow Chace" as it originally appeared in the Royal Gazette.

The subscription is only one dollar per year, postage prepaid.

It has received flattering commendations from the press, and subscribers have expressed high gratification.

An unusual and unique advantage is offered to publishers, for we will at present agree to take in exchange for advertisements books at NET PRICES, selected from advertisers' stock.

Advertising, cash rates, $13 per page; $7 half-page; $4 quarter page. In books $16 per page; $9 half page; $5 quarter page.

The American Bibliopolist is useful to Booksellers and Librarians, as containing a list of new books, English and American, a catalogue of books for sale, and remarks upon auctions, with quotations.

Special attention paid to the importation of English, French, and German Books.

J. SABIN & SONS,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1870.

The Week.

THE Senate has shown that it can waste time over the question of adjournment as well as upon matters of legislation, and consequently it is yet uncertain whether the date fixed by the House—the 4th of July—will be the one finally agreed upon by both chambers. The Senate has also indulged its fondness for procrastination by postponing once and again the Franking Bill, which may or may not have the luck to be passed this session. On Monday, Senator Morrill, of Vermont, spoke for two hours in favor of a protective tariff. A debate the same day on the Bureau of Education elicited a great diversity of opinion in regard to the usefulness of such a department of the Government. In the House, Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service Bill, after having been debated on Wednesday and Thursday, was on the latter day recommitted at Mr. Jenckes's request, and whether it too emerges again before adjournment we presume is not certain. Mr. Jenckes was not to be taken by surprise by his opponents, and the short discussion has had several excellent results. In the first place, it has kept the measure alive, and recalled the attention of Congress and the public to it; it has, besides, exhibited the weakness of those who denounce it, Mr. Peters, of Maine, being without doubt exactly the antagonist that Mr. Jenckes would have prayed for; and finally, if it has failed to convert Mr. Bingham, it has developed the adhesion of Mr. Kelley and Mr. Schenck to the principle of the bill, and cannot but encourage the friends of the reform to renew their efforts incessantly.

It was opposed by Messrs. Maynard, Peters, Bingham, and others, in speeches which, without any reference to the merits of the bill, were, it is no exaggeration to say, a disgrace to human nature. It would be difficult to crowd into the space they occupy in the Globe more falsehood, absurdity, misrepresentation, greater contempt for facts, more clap-trap and humbug, and more unblushing confessions of ignorance. One assumption ran through every one of them, and that was that there were no faults in the civil service now which were not inherent in human nature, and that (and this was the really impudent part of it) appointments and dismissals were now made solely "in the interest of the public service." In fact, if any one wants to find a parallel for the performance, both as regards style, temper, logic, and candor, one has to seek it in the arguments by which the slave-trade was defended by royal dukes in the House of Lords. The pro-slavery orators here usually showed more respect for the understanding of their hearers. One of Mr. Bingham's arguments was "that this bill creates an aristocracy in the face of that wise provision in our Constitution that neither the United States nor any State of the Union shall create titles of nobility;" but then the sage omitted to account for the existence of that worst form of "aristocracy," the military "aristocracy" in the army and navy, under which the country has been groaning for half a century. He then added "that it was an absurdity, as his friend from Illinois (Mr. Cullom) remarked." The basis for this lucid observation was also supplied by his friend from Illinois, viz.: that "the author of 'The Mechanism of the Heavens' did not prove himself a very skilful man in civil affairs when called to a civil trust by the first Napoleon." Mr. Bingham is wasted in the House; it is not "educated up" to him.

However, we think he was, on the whole, outdone by Mr. Maynard. This gentleman's forte seems to be foreign politics. One of his reasons why illustrations drawn from the civil service of European countries are of no use to us here is, that in Europe "the object of government is to get as far away from the people as possible," while "the object in this country is to keep the government near to the people." There are some persons with whom it is treason to the human understanding to argue, and we do not say that Mr. Maynard is one of them, but one is puzzled to know how to deal with him. The civil service system which he is defending in this country, is the old aristocratic system which prevailed in every country in Europe down to the French Revolution, and in some still later. Its basis is favoritism, nepotism, personal gratitude or affection—in short, jobbery and disregard of the public interests. In proportion as "government has got near the people," to use the Maynard jargon, that system has disappeared, and the system of competitive examinations and promotion for merit been substituted for it. No civil service is a popular one which is not open to all, without other qualification than knowledge and character. What the people want is a fair field and no favor. Mr. Maynard ought to know that there is no civil service in the world, and never has been one, which was in the hands of a smaller and more disreputable class than ours, or which was managed with more brutal disregard of the interests of taxpayers, or to which the honest poor man has less chance of access.

The bill was sent back to the Committee to save it from total defeat, a result which was of course not wholly unexpected. As we have often said, Congress is the fountain-head of this stream of corruption, which now overflows the country, and which rises higher every year; which is debauching and degrading every branch of the Government, and converting the legislature in particular into a mere board of office-brokers. The members of Congress get and keep their seats largely through the efforts of the unclean herd with whom they fill the Government offices. To reform the civil service is to deprive them of the means either of rewarding their friends or punishing their enemies, and compel them to appeal to their constituencies on their own merits—a prospect for a large number of them full of horrors. Therefore, it is safe to say that until the public sentiment forces this particular reform into the party platforms, and terrifies those who live by the abuses into submission, we shall never see it carried. One might as well expect to see in Turkey a movement against polygamy originating among the Sultan's eunuchs.

The "Reform Party" in South Carolina, of the establishment of which we spoke some weeks since, seems to be well under way and to be increasing in size and spirit with gratifying rapidity, though we fear there is but little chance of its carrying the elections; the State seems to lie almost completely at the mercy of the white and black corruptionists who have been plundering it for some years past; and that the negro voters are not yet educated to their responsibilities is clear enough to everybody; and if not, it soon will be, for Mr. B. F. Whittemore is to be sent back to Congress, we see. Apparently, nothing could be worse than the conduct of the high officials of the State. It is, for instance, constantly asserted, and is nowhere denied, that a senator, Leslie by name, who held the office of Land Commissioner, and spent altogether some $600,000 of the State's money, and then resigned without satisfactorily accounting for much of it, openly declared that if the Advisory Board tried to make him account for it, he would have the chairman of that body "in his own penitentiary in less than two weeks." The Advisory Board consists of the Governor, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of State, the State Treasurer, and the Comptroller-General. More than this, when Leslie "resigned," and there was talk in the Senate of compelling him to explain his conduct in office, he coolly enquired which senator would like to begin, and dared his colleagues to press him for the reasons of his resignation; and none of them pressed him, he having a tongue in his head and knowing certain secrets. Plenty more things of this sort might be related, and have been, and nothing is surer than that the rescue of South Carolina from her present rulers is a thing for which decent men everywhere—Democrats and Republicans, especially Republicans—should pray with fervor. As we say, however, there seems to be as yet but little ground for hope, though probably a thorough organization of the new party and some hard work may secure a legislature for next year which shall be less of a disgrace to civilization than the last was. We must not forget to mention that the T. J. Mackey who figured in a shooting affray in the Common Council some months since, and who escaped punishment by pleading "morphine," has just been made a trial justice by Governor Scott.

More encouraging is the non-political South Carolina news, which, indeed, is a great deal better than most persons in this section of the country have been hoping for, and is absolutely good. It is surprising, for example, to learn that one small association working in Newberry District, a fine country with a beautiful climate and lying in the middle region—between the sand and the hills—alone has introduced almost 500 European immigrants, Swedes we take them to be, for the gentleman who gave the account of them went on to say, that "if you give a Swedish laborer a peck of meal and three pounds of bacon (a week) you may expect him to tabernacle with you only for a night;" and he added something to the effect that the Swede is a free man, who comes to this country to better his condition and not to be a serf, and who must be treated accordingly. These remarks were made in a convention which sat for several days in Charleston, and included delegates from Georgia as well as from all parts of South Carolina. Looking over the report of the proceedings, we noted an entire absence of the spirit but recently pervading the South Carolinian mind—the spirit which demands, not immigrants who desire to better themselves, but a servile peasantry. It appears as if there were now a genuine wish to foster the sort of immigration from abroad and from the North and East which has built up the States of the West and made them the wonder of the world; and an elaborate plan to accomplish the desired result was submitted to the convention and, after intelligent debate, adopted. The South was always ready enough to hold conventions, agricultural and other, and it is hard, when we read the Charleston resolutions, not to think of the gentlemen who used regularly to meet and resolve that Norfolk, Virginia, was designed by God to be the greatest seaport on this continent; but still the resolutions before us have a very business-like and hopeful look. In brief, this is the general scheme: Landholders and other capitalists are to subscribe land, or money with which to buy land, and this is to be divided into farms, of which every other one is to be given to any respectable and healthy man who will occupy it and improve it, holding it at the end of ten years in fee simple, and, until the ten years' term expires, under the sole condition that he shall not abandon it, but shall cultivate it. Alternate sections the association is to hold. Four freight and emigrant steamers are to be built, and every means is to be tried to induce emigrants from Europe, whether bound for South Carolina or for Oregon, to make the journey via Charleston—a route alleged to be cheaper than any other now in existence. Chinese laborers—of whom, as "cotton-hands," glowing accounts were given—are to be called into the rice districts. The erection of cotton-mills is to be encouraged, and figures were read, which seem reasonable, tending to show that a manufacturer who should barely pay expenses in running twenty frames in New England, could make $15,000 a year by running them in Georgia. An instance was given of a manufacturer who actually had done both these things so lately as last year. Our space forbids our giving further details of the projected plan, but, as is said above, it looks hopeful.

It is said that a man is either a fool or a physician at forty; and if the alternative has hitherto seemed a hard one, the action of the American Medical Association last week should serve to reconcile a good many of us. This body met at Washington to hold its twenty-first annual session, and the presentation of credentials by colored delegates and by some white delegates who did not scruple to consult with colored physicians, gave rise to a noisy and heated debate which ended in the triumph of prejudice. It appears, therefore, that political ethics and professional ethics are not co-extensive, and the more we contrast the stress laid by the medical fraternity upon their "ethics" with the rowdy behavior of too many of them toward negroes and women, the more transparent becomes their abuse of the term. The regulations included under it, though frequently calculated to protect the public from imposition, closely resemble in other respects the worst features of trades-unionism, and serve like purposes of persecution and repression. Few close corporations are so odious as a medical society may easily be and often is, and the exclusiveness which forms the basis of doctors' morals is singularly inappropriate to a science which is as empirical as agriculture, and whose therapeutic literature, at least, resembles nothing so much as a farmer's almanac or a cook-book. The majority at Washington, we are well aware, was due to the presence of Southern members, and this the Association could not help; but we should have been glad to see, on the part of the minority, an avowed intention to disregard so much of the ruling as made it unprofessional to consult with physicians of color.

Speaking of the Hartford and Erie business before the Massachusetts Legislature, last week, we made a most absurd though transparent blunder, by the accidental omission of one clause of a sentence. What we said was that "The independent press, we are sorry to say, and, indeed, almost all the Boston papers, oppose all further loans," etc. What we should have said was, "The independent press—from which, we are sorry to say, we must exclude the Boston Advertiser and, indeed, almost all the Boston papers—oppose," etc. We owe an apology for this to the Boston papers, for most of them are warm friends of the road. The Committee has reported in favor of giving further State aid to it—to the extent of $3,500,000. The assailants of the State treasury have been ably represented, while the Attorney-General has had to fight single-handed; and common rumor says that if you examined the coat-tails of the men you met in State Street, you would find a bond in nearly every one of them. It is calculated that if the Commonwealth now takes hold of the road, and pushes it through, it will cost about $20,000,000 to equip and put it in working order, making the total cost of this great "artery" about $50,000,000. Altogether, the performance may be considered the greatest raid ever yet made by a railroad Ring on a State Government, and throws Fisk's and Gould's operations at Albany far into the shade. One not improbable, and we were going to say not undesirable, result of the swindle will be the transfer of the State government to other hands. We should not, indeed, be surprised to see the impeccable Butler raising the standard of reform, and rallying the majority under it.

The World has contributed a valuable and very amusing chapter to the history of journalism, by collecting and reproducing the various "amenities" which several of our contemporaries have been interchanging during the last week or two, apropos of the McFarland case and various other matters and things. It has done great injustice, however, to our esteemed contemporary the Tribune, in reprinting some of the billingsgate in which that paper occasionally indulges without quoting any of the reasons it has given at sundry times why no paper should ever be guilty of personalities, or ever wander from the discussion of subjects and the public conduct of individuals. It seems to us the collection is hardly complete without some specimens of cant as well as of ruffianism. In other respects, we cannot speak of it too highly. It will raise the profession of journalism, indeed, has raised it already, in the opinion of all thinking men; and the profound interest the public takes in this newspaper vituperation, not to speak of its high literary excellence, will, doubtless, cause increasing demand for it, for public as well as for private libraries, as the years roll on. We confess, too, we have ourselves taken deep satisfaction while listening to the thwacking and mud-throwing which has been going on around us, in the reflection that it was all due to the intense zeal of some gentlemen for the purity of the family. Everybody engaged in the row, unseemly as his behavior may have seemed to careless lookers-on, was really either pushing home or repelling a charge of "free love," which, as it seems to us, ought to dispel the apprehensions felt by many about the prevalence of opinions hostile to marriage.

So far as Mrs. Lincoln's claim to a pension rests upon mere sentiment, and her desire for one is in order that she may, to use her own words, "live in a style becoming the widow of the Chief Magistrate of a great nation," we agree with the Senate Committee on Pensions that there is no obligation to make any further provision for her. Unfortunately, too, she is a person whose breeding does not qualify her either to enhance the sentimental view of her case or to set the "style" for Presidents' widows; and if she were allowed to do the latter she would probably give Europeans a very false notion of the dignity and state of our "chief magistrates." Something of the Committee's concern for what we may call republican appearances is therefore justified by our experience of the petitioner; but we fail to sympathize with their attaching so much importance to the precedent they were called upon to create, and with their seeming belief that it would be a damaging blow to republican purity. They say, truly enough, that pensions have hitherto been granted only in the military and naval service; and as they proceed to state that "it has not been deemed advisable in a free country to provide permanent emoluments in favor of the families of high officers of the state, as in European countries," we conclude that they think pensions in the civil service a mark of the degraded condition to which monarchy reduces its subjects. They also evidently look upon them as establishing "caste," since, as matters now stand, "when eminent officers end their official term they become equal, but not superior members of society." The Committee might further have felicitated the country that there could not be found here a bloated aristocracy of superannuated schoolmasters, such as, for perfectly intelligible motives, the grinding tyrannies of Europe have instituted. But really the Committee's arguments induce very serious reflection as to the favor which the civil service reform is to meet with in the Senate; especially as Mr. Edmunds was the chairman, and presumably the author of the adverse report on Mrs. Lincoln's claims.

The private advices received from England, in a still greater degree than the public ones, indicate that the difficulties of the Gladstone ministry are increasing seriously. It seems as if it would require a special interposition of Providence to make a cabinet containing Bright and Lowe work well, and Mr. Gladstone's mind, if acute, is also impressible and fluctuating. Moreover, there are signs that the House of Commons, having abolished the Irish Church, feels that it has redeemed its pledges, and finds the work of reform begin to pall on it. Hence some of the increasing difficulty shown in "understanding" the Irish Land Bill, of which our correspondent spoke last week. Meantime, its flagging energies will probably be quickened by the increasing signs of political union between the Irish Catholics and Protestants. Should the Irish Protestants throw their weight into the "Nationalist" scales, which they have not done since 1782, they would probably force on England, without further delay, a solution of the Irish problem almost as serious as that to which she was driven in that year, when she, for the first time, acknowledged the independence of the Irish Parliament. The Protestants can at any time give point and force to the aimless blather of the Fenians.

The French police are busy with the investigation of the great conspiracy, the proportions of which are of course alarming, and arrests continue to be made on a great scale. On one of the alleged conspirators was found a letter from the well-known publicist, Gustave Flourens, who has been drifting about ever since he "rose in insurrection" last month, and is now in London. He directed his correspondent to send his letters through Mr. George W. Smalley, the redoubtable London correspondent of the New York Tribune. At first it seemed as if Messrs. Smalley and Flourens had joined forces, and we really expected to see the air darkened with the splinters of thrones and altars, but it turns out that Mr. Smalley knew nothing of the contents of M. Flourens's letters, and merely forwarded them as an act of friendship, which information has doubtless smoothed the pillow of many a brutal despot. Mr. Smalley, at the last accounts, was in Paris, asking to be "examined" touching his connection with the conspiracy. If the Imperial Government does not examine him, or examines him with less than twelve Procureurs Impériaux, or in any place but a good large hall, and on a raised platform, it will be guilty of a great wrong towards a modest, unobtrusive, and sweet-tempered journalist. Flourens, by-the-by, disappeared on the night he "rose in insurrection," revolver and all, and so effectually that the police would have had no evidence of any overt acts of his after the first rising, if he had not written a letter, which was intercepted, to a friend in Paris, describing his exploits. They now have it under his own hand that he is a sanguinary monster, and spent that night in slaughter.

The plébiscite has, as was generally expected, resulted in a large majority for the Government—about 7,000,000, it is supposed, out of a vote of 8,500,000. This is the ninth plébiscite which has taken place in France, and all with the same result—an enormous majority for the party in power. It is safe to say that, with the existing highly centralized administrative machinery, no other result is possible. All questions put by the powers that be to the people, whatever they may be in form, will be, in fact, leading questions—that is, the answer to them will be suggested beyond the possibility of mistake. The Radicals say that the Imperial arrangements in the present case put the result beyond doubt, apart from the general tendency of the country people to fall in with the ideas of the maires, the sous-préfets, the gens d'armerie, and the gardes champêtres. But then it must be admitted, also, that the performances of the "irreconcilables" in Paris have not been without their influence on the agricultural mind. The peasant's intellect cannot grasp Rochefort, and Flourens, and Paschal Grousset. The moderate liberals, however, even the most moderate of them, such as M. de Mazade, of the Revue des Deux Mondes, are seriously alarmed by what has happened, and hold, and not without a show of reason, that the plebiscitary confirmation makes the reform illusory. It throws the legislature into the background, and renders it possible for the executive at any time to reduce it to total insignificance by an appeal to the people, as the Emperor is the sole judge when this appeal should be made. The Emperor's reputation for shrewdness will probably now rise again, as he has evidently hit on a device which gives him most of the advantages of constitutional sovereignty, and none, or next to none, of its inconveniences.

The full details of the massacre of the captives by the Greek brigands have reached us by the last mail. It appears that to go to Marathon, twenty miles from Athens, the party had to give notice to the Minister of War and procure an escort of troops, but the Government was left to judge what escort was necessary, and only furnished four gendarmes, following up with an infantry patrol of ten men. On their return, a volley from the bushes unhorsed two of the gendarmes, and placed the party in the power of about thirty brigands, the infantry patrol being easily beaten off. The ransom was then fixed at $120,000 and an amnesty; the money was forthcoming, but the amnesty was forbidden by the constitution. The Government, however, on the earnest solicitation of the captives and of the British Minister, solemnly promised that the troops should not go in pursuit till the terms were arranged. In spite of this promise troops were sent in pursuit, and the brigands, finding themselves hard pressed, butchered their prisoners, two by two. The most horrible part of the story is, however, that, according to the Greek Prime Minister, the brigands were encouraged to persist in asking for the amnesty by the emissaries of the "outs," so as to force the Ministry to call the Chambers together, and thus give the Opposition the chance of turning them out of office. Indeed, most of the great strikes against foreigners made by brigands are believed to be instigated as measures of party warfare to bring discredit on the Ministry. It is safe to say that a lower pitch of degradation "politics" have never reached than they have reached in Athens, not excepting South Carolina. The intrigues of the harem are more respectable than the wiles of the Greek "statesmen." We have received a letter from a correspondent urging as an excuse for Greek iniquities, the old story of their having an expensive royalty imposed upon them after their liberation fifty years ago, but we are too familiar with this plea, and with its absurdity, to be willing to devote any space to it. That a power which cannot protect travellers five miles from the king's palace without the aid of an army, and is now allowing the Ionian Islands to go to waste, and the roads and public buildings to fall into ruin, should have been wild to get Crete a year ago into the same precious corporation, is a striking illustration of the way the Greek mind looks at its own defects.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN EUROPE.

We spoke briefly, last week, of the new phase on which the contest between labor and capital was entering in Europe, owing to the attempt to organize the labor of all countries against the capital of all countries in one grand international union, which the leaders were commencing, and the success of which they at last think they foresee. The papers received by the last mail show that in France the socialists are now directing all their energies to this end, and that a triumph over capital in Paris simply would no longer satisfy them. They are still as desirous as ever of getting the government into their hands, and are, therefore, as hostile as ever to the Empire, or, indeed, to any government which recognized the right of property as it is now recognized by the legislation of the civilized world; but they are no longer ready to fight for the triumph of their opinions. They have learnt by bitter experience that capital is sure to beat them in a physical struggle, and that, if they mean to win, it must be through the weight of numbers and organization, and through the influence on legislation which the extension of the suffrage has nearly everywhere thrown into the hands of the working classes. They have, moreover, secured the services, as directors of their operations, of a class of men very much superior in education and intelligence, and in knowledge of the condition and capacity of the laboring class in different countries, to any they have ever had before. They are opposed, too, to all local strikes. A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette reports that he had recently an interview with one of the chiefs in Paris, who assured him that the recent strikes at Creuzot and elsewhere were not, as we had supposed them, experiments on a small scale, directed by the central authority, by way of drill or practice; that they received no encouragement or assistance whatever from headquarters, the leaders being occupied solely with the problem of producing a general international strike.

This change of tactics is due to a variety of causes. The profitlessness of local strikes, so long preached by economists, has at last been found out by the workingmen themselves. If only resorted to rarely, strikes produce only a momentary effect on wages, and this never sufficient, or certainly not more than sufficient, to make up for the loss sustained during the period of idleness. If resorted to frequently, as they have been of late in England, they drive away business. Their effect on certain trades in England has been already disastrous. Locomotive building, for instance, is rapidly going to France and Belgium, and shipbuilding has left the Thames. This is what the economists always predicted would happen if capital were in any locality too hard pressed by labor; but the laborers always refused to believe it; they now see it. Moreover, the flight of capital from hostile localities has been greatly facilitated by recent improvements in the means of communication between different countries. The effect of the telegraph and the railroad in widening the field for the employment of capital has been enormous.

The workingmen have accordingly now set about the job of clipping the wings of capital, and forcing it to stay where it is invested, and make the best terms it can in the local market, by a general organization of labor, using for this purpose the very means which have made capital so volatile. They want to arrange matters so that when the English engineers strike for higher wages, nobody who wants a locomotive or boiler will be able to cross over to the Continent and get it any cheaper than they are willing to furnish it; so that, in short, wherever the capitalist turns he will find himself hemmed in, and will have to surrender at discretion. Of course even this is only a step towards other and better things. Beyond all strikes and associations and guilds, the workingman thinks he sees a reorganized society in which the government will relieve him of the trouble of striking; will see that capitalists get no interest, and that nobody lives idle on the interest of capital, or has any enjoyments which are not equally shared by all; in which all carriages shall be public; all picture galleries free; all schools and colleges common; all clothes of about the same cut and cost; and in which ice-cream will be consumed by such persons as like it, and not as now by those who can afford to purchase it. Of course, in this state of things the government would be under an obligation not only to see that everybody worked for his living, but that everybody found work to do.

As might be guessed, the moderate Radicals in France are anything but pleased with their allies' state of mind. A reorganization of the government is what the former are striving for, a reorganization of society the last thing they think of; and they are a good deal disconcerted at finding, now that political life has been restored, that the workingmen have hardly made any change in their aims since 1848, while they have chosen means far more formidable than bullets. One of the working-class representatives laid down, in 1848, that "the best government for them was that which made their lives a little more tolerable," and this the régime of individual liberty, which M. Jules Favre and his friends seek, does not seem likely to do. De Tocqueville, in the Constitutional Assembly in 1849, called loudly for such peremptory action as would relieve the country of the weight of anxiety which the talk of socialism imposed on it. M. Thiers pointed out to Louis Blanc—who was trying to persuade the Chamber that, if all had to work for all, each would make it a point of honor to do his best—that his ideal society would be lazy and slavish; that people do not and cannot be got to do their best for the community at large; that you may say to a man, "Die for your country," and he will do it; but if you tell him to weave or work iron for his country, he won't do it. Moreover, the experiment was very fully made, the previous year, in the National Workshops. When it was first announced, in 1848, that the Government would find work for the unemployed, on the 9th of March 6,000 men enrolled themselves; by the end of the month it had 30,000 in its pay, and by the end of April 100,000, and the tide still flowed in from every direction. It soon became impossible to find even the appearance of labor for so large and motley a multitude, and it was necessary to keep a large force of them on what might be called "the retired list"—that is, idle—at a franc a day. The result of this was that thousands more abandoned their places in private employ, and loafed at this rate. In short, human nature triumphed. The Government had at last to break up the workshops to prevent the total disorganization of society. The result was the terrible three days of June, in which the Archbishop of Paris, two members of the Assembly, and fifteen hundred others on the side of the Government, fell.

There is no sign that the ideas which led to this frightful tragedy are any less deeply rooted in the working-class mind than they were then, while there is no doubt they are far more widely diffused. Jules Favre delivered an address, a month ago, at the request of the Société de l'Instruction Elementaire, on the "Inequality of Social Conditions," in which he showed that human nature is the ultimate fact of politics, that you cannot change it or get rid of it, and that society can only flourish, or indeed exist, by giving it liberty. The discourse showed throughout with what alarm the best men in France look to the future; and the evils of the situation are aggravated by the fact that all men with black coats on their backs are regarded with suspicion by the working-classes, and their economical teachings treated as pleas for their own selfish ease and comfort. But then the existing order of things has still powerful support in the peasantry, whose passion for land, and possession of it, make them the fanatical friends of property.

THE NEW CRISIS IN AUSTRIA.

Of the two grand divisions of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, as reconstituted after the great shocks which threatened its break-up in 1866, the eastern, or Hungarian, has been steadily and quietly progressing in its sphere. The conservative power of its old constitution, the political aptitude of its leading race—the Magyar—the moderating influence of a nobility tried in statesmanship and legislation, and, above all, perhaps, the prudent and consistent parliamentary guidance of Francis Deák, have made its new trial of freedom and autonomy more successful than even its warmest friends dared to anticipate. The Andrássy Cabinet, though hard-fought by an active and able opposition, is still at the head of affairs. The reunion of Transylvania, Croatia, and Slavonia with the central country—Hungary proper—has been completely effected, in spite of the centrifugal tendencies of the Rouman and South-Slavic populations; the Croat deputies have occupied their seats in the Diet of Pesth; and the incorporation of the Military Frontierland, as an integral and civil part of the whole, has been begun. No considerable shock, no crisis, has taken place since the inauguration of the new era. There is no lack of difficulties in the path of the Hungarian Government, but its ability seems to be adequate to the task, and it finds support in the energy of a nation.

The course of the western, or Cisleithan, division has been considerably less steady and successful; and this is far from being surprising. Its constitutionalism is of recent date; it lacks the weight of traditional policy; it has neither a central nationality nor a leading class; the clashing interests of its component parts, of which none is strong enough to become decidedly dominant, admit of no pronounced and yet common leadership. In one word, it is an unnatural conglomeration, whose raison d'être is of an almost entirely negative character. It exists because none of its component parts is able to exist by itself, or inclined to share the fate of any of the adjoining countries. Left to itself, Galicia would suffer the terrible fate of the Polish provinces now groaning under the heel of the Cossack; the Czechic nationality of Bohemia and Moravia would be for ever crushed by the overwhelming force of all-annexing Prussia; and the German group of the Imperial provinces, so long accustomed to rule, would be degraded to a frontier territory of the hated Hohenzollerns. The dread of absorption by Russia or Prussia keeps the antagonistic elements together, and this dread of absorption has also made their equally unnatural, dualistic connection with the Hungarian half of the Empire a political necessity. But the Poles of Galicia hope and work for the restoration of a free and united Poland; the Czechs dream of the establishment of a northwestern Slavic realm, with the aid of the Czar, or of a Panslavic movement; and many an Austrian German would hail with joy a new revolution which would make both Prussia and Austria equal members of a common German fatherland. The common negative interest which binds to each other the heterogeneous parts of the Austro-Hungarian Empire is strong enough, it is true, but it could hardly be expected to form more than a loose confederation.

And yet the transformation of 1867, executed without the co-operation or the consent of the Bohemians, was intended to weld the Cisleithan provinces into a consolidated half of a dualistic empire. The Bohemians protested against the whole of the arrangements, and resolved to hamper, as far as in their power was, the action of the Vienna Parliament. Abstaining from its sittings appeared to them the most effective means, and to this day their obstinacy has withstood both the threats and the disdain of the Reichsrath. Their representatives to this assembly, elected by the Czechic majority of the provincial Diet of Bohemia, have all steadfastly refused to occupy their seats. The Czech ultimatum demands of Vienna an autonomy for Bohemia and Moravia similar to that of Hungary. The Poles were less harsh in their opposition, and appeared in the Reichsrath, though strongly urging a modification of the constitution in favor of provincial self-rule. The Sloven representatives of Carniola and some adjoining parts pursued a like course. The same did the representatives of the Tyrol, though prompted not by national but by religious motives. The opposition became from day to day more conscious of its power, and the Reichsrath soon split into two hostile camps, the federalistic and the centralistic. The action of the Cisleithan cabinet, too, became wavering, and the Dalmatian insurrection greatly added to its perplexities. The Chancellor of the Empire, Count Beust, and with him the Emperor Francis Joseph, leaned to the federalistic side.

On his return from his eastern journey, in December, 1869, a new session of the Reichsrath was opened by Francis Joseph, in a speech which betrayed the leaning of the monarch on one side, and a want of harmony in the Cisleithan cabinet on the other. A few days later, the dissensions in the ministry culminated in an open rupture, the majority and the minority—the former embracing the centralists Giskra, Herbst, Hasner, Plener, and Brestel; and the latter, Minister-President Count Taaffe, the Polish Count Potocki, and Berger—each presenting its views on the main question in a separate memorial to the Emperor, and each offering its resignation. Francis Joseph hesitated. The majority of both houses in the Reichsrath, in which the Slavic element, in the absence of Czechs, was slimly represented, thundered against the minority of the cabinet, denouncing its recommendations as treason to the constitution. Francis Joseph finally accepted the resignation of Taaffe, Potocki, and Berger. After some difficulties, Hasner succeeded in completing the cabinet. Giskra was its soul. Beust seemed to have suffered a defeat. Soon after, offended in their religious honor by members of the majority, the noted Tyrolese representative, Greuter, and his associates, withdrew from the Reichsrath. The Poles threatened to do the same if their national demands were not granted. Giskra in vain negotiated with them; more intractable still, the Czechs refused even to open negotiations. His project of a law rendering the elections to the Reichsrath direct, by districts, instead of provincial, by the Diets, was the great stumbling-block. On the 21st of March, 1870, he retired from the cabinet, but Hasner, for a short time, continued the same experiments. They proved futile. Yet he persisted in pressing the change of the electoral law. But now the Poles and the Slovens finally executed their threat, and withdrew from the Reichsrath, after a solemn protest and warning. The assembly thus dwindled down to a rump-parliament, numbering a bare quo rum. The German element alone was represented. The fall of the Hasner ministry immediately followed the retirement of the Poles and Slovens. Count Potocki was entrusted by Francis Joseph with the formation of a new cabinet, and fresh negotiations with the Czechs were at once begun. The Reichsrath was prorogued April 8, on which occasion the eloquent Kaiserfeld, of the centralist or German party, made a doleful but dignified address to the House. When the parliament reassembles, it will be seen whether the means has been found of reconciling the conflicting interests and passions of the Cisleithan nationalities by a bond of federation both loose and strong, or whether the only alternative still remains to Austria, as some one expressed it, of "unity killing liberty or liberty killing unity."

NAVAL REORGANIZATION.

In the midst of the naval controversy between the line and staff about the degrees of rank sought by the latter, the attention of both sides of the question is concentrated on a claim that the so-called "executive officer" shall have precedence of all staff-officers, without regard to his lineal rank, but simply ex officio. The staff-officers assert that there is no conclusive reason why such claim should be admitted in any degree or manner whatever. Authority in military government always centralizes. The military body, according to the number of men included in it, is divided into many bodies, the larger comprising the smaller. In an army, the corps include divisions, the divisions brigades, the brigades regiments, and the regiments companies. In a navy, fleets include divisions, divisions squadrons, and squadrons single ships. Authority and responsibility in a general way centralize in him who is duly assigned to command the whole or only a part of an army corps or fleet. This centralization of authority and responsibility in one man necessarily implies prompt obedience from all who may be duly placed under his orders, and that he should be supplied with special assistants to relieve him from the burden of details necessarily pertinent to the office of command. Assistants of this character are denominated aides-de-camp and adjutants, who are selected without reference to their lineal rank in the army. A colonel commands a regiment; the lieutenant-colonel, who is next in rank, is not the adjutant; this temporary office is usually filled by a captain or lieutenant of the line. The regimental adjutant has no other precedence than that belonging to his rank. He gives orders in virtue of authority delegated to him by the colonel for the accomplishment of specified purposes.

In the navy, "fleet-captain," "fleet-lieutenant," and "executive officer" are the titles of the assistants, whose duties are analogous to those of aides-de-camp and adjutants in the army. The line-officer whose rank is next below that of the commander of the ship has in recent times assumed the name of executive officer. Like the adjutant of a regiment, his office is to supervise the details of the command, and exercise authority delegated to him by the commander in preserving order, securing observance of the regulations, as well as the general and special orders of his immediate superior. He exercises the functions of a chief of police on one hand, and general inspector of neatness and cleanliness on the other. He presides at scrubbing of decks, at exercises of various kinds with guns and sails, and takes the place of the officer of the deck at "general quarters," and while the ship is entering or leaving port. He does very many and very different things, all of them important; but all that he does is absolutely the work of his commander, and not his own. The statutes hold the commander responsible for the safety and efficiency of the ship, as well as for the proper fulfilling of the purposes for which the vessel was built, equipped, and commissioned. On the principle that qui facit per alium facit per se—or, that the principal is accountable for the conduct of his agents—the responsibility which pertains to the official acts of the executive officer legally devolves upon the commander of the vessel. Theory requires that the captain himself shall do everything. Practice permits him to do by deputy all official acts, with few exceptions; so that the affairs of our public ships generally have come to be administered just as those of the Navy Department were said to be under Mr. Borie, by an irresponsible alius or deputy, leaving their commanders free from the incumbrance of official cares or occupations. The modern cruise of an American man-of-war is for the commander almost a yachting excursion, without much anxiety for its general cost. The master of a private yacht can scarcely be more fastidiously careful of the owner's comfort on board than is the executive officer of a ship-of-war of her commander's ease and tranquillity. He stands between him and the affairs of the ship; assumes to be the exclusive legitimate medium of communication between the commander and all his subordinates in the ship, and, in this manner, relieves him almost entirely from the trouble of listening to appeals to his authority to decide mooted questions. It is often pretended that no staff or other officer may ask leave of absence without the sanction of the executive officer—a pretension of authority, especially in cases where the staff officers are the official seniors of the "executive," for which no conclusive reason has been assigned.

In the British navy, it was the practice to promote very young men, scions of aristocratic families, to command ships, for which neither experience nor professional acquirements qualified them. To compensate for want of knowledge in such cases, it was the custom to associate with the young captain some experienced lieutenant, who, through lack of family influence, could not expect promotion. The young lordling depended upon this old lieutenant for conducting all the details of the command of the ship. He seldom or never left the vessel from the commencement to the end of the cruise. He became of necessity the actuary of the vessel, although legally the commander was alone responsible. The "Admiralty Instructions for the Government of Her Majesty's Naval Service" impose all responsibility on the captain:

> "In the absence of the captain and commander (where there is one borne), the senior lieutenant of the ship is to be responsible for everything done on board; he is to see every part of the duty as punctually performed as it could be if the captain or commander were present. He may put under arrest any officer whose conduct he shall think so reprehensible as to require it; and he may confine such men as he shall think deserving of punishment; but he shall have no power to inflict corporal punishment on any person, unless he shall have succeeded to command of the ship by the death or incapacity of the captain or officer who was appointed to the command, or unless he shall have been left in charge of the ship whilst the captain shall be absent on admiralty leave, or on leave for a lengthened time granted by a commander-in-chief abroad."

The functions of the senior lieutenant are clearly indicated in this regulation. Except only that he is excused from keeping watch in turn with others of his grade, his precedence and privileges are those pertinent to his rank. But, colloquially, he was sometimes termed "dry nurse" of the captain, over whom his influence was very great. He never assumed, however, that an officer should not communicate with the captain without first obtaining his permission. Nor was he called "executive officer;" for the reason, we have been told, that all line officers, and the captain especially, are denominated "executive officers."

The organization of the English navy has been copied in very many of its details into the navy of the United States, and this provision for enabling inexperienced lordlings to command ships has been imitated so far as to place competent American commanders in a position analogous to that of aristocratic youngsters of the British navy. Acquiescence on the one hand and assumption on the other have brought the American "executive," who corresponds to the English senior lieutenant, to be the ship's factotum, claiming to be second in command, with an official individuality and responsibility exclusively his own. He punishes men in a cruel, fantastic, and illegal manner, without the commander's knowledge, as shown in the Seely trial, to the injury of the popularity of the naval service. The cruelty, injustice, and tyranny to which men in the navy are exposed has been shown, also, in the case of ordinary-seaman King, of the Portsmouth, who was tried, convicted, and punished twice, illegally and cruelly, for one and the same offence—first by a "summary court" and then by a court-martial, with the approval of the rear-admiral in command of the squadron. That the victim was at last rescued, by the judicious interposition of the Secretary of the Navy, from the infliction of five years in the penitentiary at hard labor, for applying gross terms of reproach to the executive and commanding officers, probably on provocation enough to justify an outburst of indignation on the part of any man possessed of self-respect in any degree, does not excuse the conduct of the rear-admiral and his officers in the case. The Secretary of the Navy has acted wisely and justly in the premises. He must perceive that, while officers are permitted to act thus tyrannically and cruelly with impunity, no measures devised to attract seamen to the navy can be effectual.

Strict, prompt, and cheerful obedience to lawful orders and regulations, which constitutes discipline, can be secured in ships without resort to either cruel, fantastic, or illegal punishments. But as long as the line shall be recognized as a privileged class or caste, the tyranny which now smirches the American navy will continue. A first and essential step towards reformation in this particular will be the enactment, without amendment, of Mr. Stevens's bill to reorganize the navy, which provides a positive rank for staff-officers, and thus places them upon a legal footing, or equality with those of the line, ignoring the latter as a superior caste of American citizens. While it does not release staff-officers from their obligations of obedience to the commander of a ship or station, it does not recognize any transient, ex-officio precedence, such as claimed for the so-called executive officer, nor make him the measure or criterion of the rank of those staff-officers who are his seniors.

All the points connected with this controversy have been patiently and carefully scrutinized by the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives. Leading members of both the line and staff have been heard by the committee. Their statements and arguments have been duly considered. The results of the committee's deliberations are expressed in Mr. Stevens's bill to reorganize the navy. Extremists on both sides of the question are not entirely satisfied with its provisions, which implies that the committee has fairly compromised the differences of opinion on the issues between the two parties. If this bill shall become a law, it will, in the judgment of very many judicious gentlemen, experienced in naval life in all vocations, contribute largely towards restoring harmony among line and staff-officers, and remove the chief cause of aversion which competent professional men of all classes manifest to employment in the naval service. And, last though not least, it will tend to check that tyrannous spirit which is fostered, especially among the younger officers, by the existing naval system—a spirit which has led to such exposures as the court-martial trials of Dr. Green, Lieutenant-commander Seely, and ordinary-seaman King have spread before the public.

THE McFARLAND CASE.

THE public is so sick of the McFarland trial, and it is as a criminal proceeding so utterly devoid of interest even to lawyers, that we should owe an apology to our readers for making any further allusion to it, if it were not for the light it throws on some curious phases of manners and morals. We think we are not guilty of unwarrantable disrespect to the judge who presided over it, when we call it as sorry and disreputable a farce as has ever been permitted in a court of justice. McFarland was charged with murder, and he set up the defence of insanity. All the evidence, therefore, going to show that he was insane before and at the time he killed Richardson was pertinent and admissible, and might have been got in readily in a week. But the Recorder actually allowed another issue to be tried at the same time, in which the public had not a particle of interest, which ought never to have come before the court, and could not regularly have got before the court at all—namely, whether certain persons connected with the New York Tribune had or had not had anything to do with inducing McFarland's wife to leave him; and with this weighty question the court, the jury, and the newspapers were actually occupied about twenty days out of the twenty-seven the trial has lasted, to the great shame and scandal of all persons who believe that courts of justice have some higher function than aiding bellicose editors and reporters to pay off old scores by blackening each other's character.

Whether McFarland was insane or not when he committed the murder we do not propose to discuss. It is quite certain there was a good deal of method in his madness, if we may judge from the evidence adduced in support of it, for it is he who must have furnished his counsel with a list of the various oyster saloons, restaurants, and offices in which he told the story of his wrongs and exhibited that peculiar expression of the eye of which we have heard so much, to say nothing of the persons to whom he casually revealed his symptoms in the street. But no evidence was produced convicting him of habitual drunkenness. There was testimony showing him to have been seen drunk two or three times, but there was plenty of counter-testimony in favor of his general sobriety. It also appeared incidentally, and was indeed revealed by one of his own letters, that he was violent in his temper and had been guilty of abusive language to his wife, and that he was poor; but these things do not seem to have diminished his wife's affection for him down to a very recent period. None of his wife's friends and supporters produced any evidence of positive ill-usage, and the only proffer made of such evidence was a letter written by Mrs. McFarland to Mrs. Sinclair or Mrs. Calhoun, but as it was written after Richardson had appeared on the scene, the Recorder very properly ruled it out, on the ground that it might have been written by way of preparing a justification in the eyes of her friends of the step she afterwards took.

However, with the propriety of Mrs. McFarland's, or any other woman's, living or not living with her husband the public has nothing to do. On this matter of living together husbands and wives are the sole and sovereign judges. If the interests of children have been provided for, society has no right to force a man and woman between whom, for any reason, mutual repugnance has sprung up, to remain under the same roof as members of the same family. But when the question comes up in what manner and for what causes shall the marriage contract be dissolved, so as to enable the parties to enter into fresh contracts of the same nature, society alone is competent to answer it, and we are all interested in the answer to it, for on it domestic purity, the physical and moral welfare of children, and the very integrity of the state depend. Now, in this McFarland case, the question of the propriety of Mrs. McFarland's living with her husband after she had ceased to love him, and he had ceased to provide a comfortable maintenance for her, has been, we will not say, artfully, but we must say most disingenuously, mixed up by a good many people, who ought to know better, with the other and far graver and totally distinct question of the propriety of her receiving the addresses of another man with a view to marriage before her marriage with McFarland had been dissolved—and not only this, but before she had formally separated from him; and upon these two questions, thus most improperly mixed up together, the public has been asked by some newspapers, with the sanction, if not connivance, of some ministers, to deliver a common verdict of approval.

It appeared on the trial that Mrs. McFarland, on the 24th of February, 1867, sent for her husband at a friend's house at which she was staying, being already, and having been for some time, acquainted with Mr. Richardson, and then and there, in the presence of several witnesses, announced to her husband that she would live with him no more. This she had a perfect right to do. But, one fortnight later (March 9), Richardson wrote her from Boston an impassioned love-letter, speaking of his having been "waiting for her for years," and dwelling joyfully on the prospect of their marriage, and making various other allusions showing that he had been for some time on the footing with her of an accepted or, comical as it may sound, affianced lover. In spite of this letter, to which Mrs. McFarland's friends refuse to apply any stronger term than "imprudent" or "foolish," they ask us to believe without question that Richardson had had nothing to do with her determination definitively to abandon her husband, and that it was caused solely by the drunkenness, shiftlessness, and violence of the latter. They ask us, moreover, to treat her verbal announcement, on the 24th of February, of her decision to leave him, as a "separation" sufficient to justify her afterwards receiving any man's addresses; and, in defending Richardson's conduct, always speak of "the separation" as if it operated in morals, if not in law, as a dissolution of the marriage contract. Of course, under this theory, her resorting to Indiana for a fraudulent divorce—fraudulent in morals if not in law—and her refusal to seek or obtain one in her own State, in which the marriage was contracted, becomes at worst merely a trifling peccadillo hardly worth notice.

But there can be, and we venture to say there is, no difference of opinion in the whole matter amongst the sane and healthy-minded portion of the public who know the influence of sexual passion in clouding the judgment and enfeebling the will; and their opinion, we venture to assert, is this: that to permit either wife or husband to so far release herself or himself from the marriage contract, by a mere verbal announcement, as to make it lawful and proper to enter into amatory relations with another person, with a view to a second marriage, would result in practice not perhaps in promiscuous intercourse, but in that relation of the sexes known as "free love"—by which we mean simply that the tie between man and woman known in civilized communities as matrimony, would rest simply on inclination, and society would have even fewer guarantees for the legitimacy of children and the preservation of the family institution than it has for the paternity of calves or the rearing of young birds. Among the religious, the pure, the conscientious, the disciplined, and cold-blooded, such a usage might not be unattended with danger; but it is not for the religious and the pure that legislation is needed, but for that vast body of the human race in whom, in all that relates to the intercourse of the sexes, brute passion is only kept in check by law and custom and public opinion.

We have been asked, however, not only to approve of Mrs. McFarland's mode of dissolving her contract with McFarland, but to approve of the ceremony by which she entered into a new contract with Richardson on his death-bed at the Astor House. Everything was done that could be done to attract attention to that ceremony. The Tribune teemed for days previously with articles, letters, and telegrams, which were intended to impress the public with the idea that Richardson was clearly in the right, and, therefore, an innocent victim, and that McFarland, although he was in the hands of justice, was clearly in the wrong, and ought to be hanged. At last, when all hope of Richardson's recovery was gone, and decency and humanity required that he should, as far as the public was concerned, be left to die in peace, a veil drawn over his frailties and misfortunes, and his name and memory be left quietly and hopefully to men's charitable judgments, a grand tableau was arranged in his room in the hotel. Two clergymen were summoned to celebrate his marriage with the woman who brought him to his doom, one of them being a total stranger to him, whom there was no reason under the sun for calling in, except the hope that his prominence would give the affair greater éclat; and with the clergymen came the reporters and a cloud of witnesses. Every word of what followed was set down for our edification, and no trick of newspaper rhetoric was left untried to seduce us into the belief that there was nothing in the ghastly scene but what was pitiful.

The notion that this ceremony would vindicate Richardson's memory and Mrs. McFarland's reputation in the eyes of the world, without reference to the facts which had preceded it, was of course a delusion, and one of those delusions into which sensational journalists, owing to the inordinate value they attach to publicity, are very apt to fall. The marriage roused a spirit of scrutiny and indignation, which threw a greater share of odium on all the parties concerned than they probably really merited, and led to the disgusting newspaper quarrels which have ever since been raging over the dead man's grave. When pressed for a reason for having it celebrated, however, those who brought about and assisted in it declare that they wished to furnish Richardson's children with a protector, and Mrs. McFarland with a legal right to fill that office. From the point of view of her friends, on the day on which the wedding took place, not only was Richardson in the article of death, but McFarland was lying in jail on a capital charge, for which he would probably be hung, leaving his children fatherless. His children were, however, Mrs. McFarland's own, and she was their natural protector. In the event of their father's death on the scaffold, their claims on her devotion would be simply boundless. She would owe them everything of which she was capable in the way of care and tenderness and devotion. As she had chosen their father, she would owe them, above all things, as complete deliverance from the consequences of their father's crime as in the existing state of society she could possibly achieve. So far, however, from their fate being uppermost in her mind during these transactions, she made no mention of them whatever at "the separation;" and after the tragedy, and with the foregoing facts staring her in the face, she consented, under the advice of her "friends," to enter publicly into another marriage contract, in their father's lifetime, with his enemy, on whom he had, in a quarrel about her—their mother—inflicted a mortal wound, thus doing what in her lay to make the stain on their name deep and indelible and notorious. She did this, moreover, for the purpose of taking into her family, to rear up side by side with her own children, the children of a stranger, who had no claim on her whatever, and her relations with whom had brought all this woe on her own sons. Her family, then, would have consisted of two sets of children, the father of one having been hanged for murdering the father of the other—she herself being the cause of the crime—and each being to the other a perpetual reminder of a sorrow and shame for which the world has no balm. The heathen Furies may have, before now, created households like this, to furnish illustrations of the blindness and cruelty of Fate; but we are sure that nothing of the kind was ever before set up under the benediction of the Christian church. The subject is not a savory one, and we come back to it very unwillingly—all the more unwillingly because it is impossible to say anything without paining persons who were, doubtless, led into participation in the performance by simple want of reflection. But, then, it has since been defended, by numerous "organs," with deliberateness which leaves no alternative to those who do not believe the pleasant land of Bohemia is a good place to go for our rules of life. The world owes a good deal to "reformers," but then there are reformers and reformers, and there are some things on which we cannot afford to have the visionary, the crack-brained, the restless, the unscrupulous, and the sensual try experiments—and marriage is one of them.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW AND THE HON. ELBRIDGE G. SPAULDING.

THE Hon. E. G. Spaulding has thought proper to appeal to the public against the North American Review. He has published an eloquent letter recalling all the patriotic memories of the war in support of the financial merit of the Legal Tender Act. His general remarks seem to have only a remote connection with the argument or the evidence offered by the reviewer, but he has pressed one point so far as to require an answer. Ho claims that the reviewer has in one respect fallen into a mistake "which, when corrected, will leave the criticism without much force, and certainly far less pointed in regard to himself." The mistake in question is contained in the following passage: "The intellect of a Congress man gifted with no more than the ordinary abilities of his class, is scarcely an interesting subject of study. . . . But when an accidental representative, though he may possess neither breadth nor force, is able to carry, 'over the Administration and through Congress,' as Mr. Spaulding claims to have done, and as it is clear that Mr. Spaulding did, a measure of such far-reaching consequences as the Legal Tender Act of 1862, the character of that person's mind and the facts of his life cease to be matters of absolute insignificance." Mr. Spaulding in reply asserts: first, that he never spoke the words "over the Administration," etc.; secondly, that he never made the claim; thirdly, that he never claimed any particular merit for what he did.

The reviewer was occupied in dealing with the claim rather than with the words, and had he anticipated Mr. Spaulding's objection he would have obviated it by simply striking out the quotation marks, or by mentioning in a foot-note that the words were first used in the legal-tender debate by Mr. Pomeroy, of New York, in describing Mr. Spaulding's share in creating the law. Mr. Spaulding, however, now wishes it to be understood not only that he used no such words, but that he made no such claim. The reviewer, in attributing the claim to Mr. Spaulding, certainly did omit to comment on Mr. Spaulding's mode of expressing his claim. The point would have been a little out of place at the time, since it did not directly concern the merits of Mr. Spaulding's bill, but rather those of his book. This defect may, however, be easily remedied, since Mr. Spaulding wishes it. There can be no reason for refusing to gratify a desire natural to an author, although most persons who have examined the book will feel a little surprised that Mr. Spaulding should not have rested satisfied with the slight remarks the reviewer has already made upon him.

Mr. Spaulding's book is, in fact, a curious and amusing work, but its title of "Financial History of the War" is a misnomer. It is rather a financial history of the Hon. E. G. Spaulding. To speak mildly, it is almost unique as an example of self-complacency in American public men. In its pages Mr. Spaulding shines supreme. His speeches, his letters, his opinions (and Mr. Spaulding, whether as orator, letter-writer, or thinker, is not a model of condensation) are reproduced with much faithfulness, even in connection with subjects which relate neither to finance nor to war. The very title-page is a plea for legal tender made officially by its champion, the "Chairman of the Sub-Committee of Ways and Means at the time the Act was passed." The book itself, from beginning to end, is an incessant reassertion of Mr. Spaulding's prominence and of his authorship of the Legal Tender Act. There is no reason to be surprised at this fact. The only surprising circumstance about the book is that it actually does seem to prove Mr. Spaulding's claim.

The story as told by him shows that he drafted the bill originally of his own accord, without advice or consultation; that he introduced it on his own independent motion into the House, and had it referred to his own committee; that he obtained a private opinion on its constitutionality from the Attorney-General; that he persuaded his committee to report it to the House, although the committee was equally divided; that he insisted upon it in conference with Secretary Chase and the presidents of banks and boards of trade, to the exclusion of any and every other measure; that he entirely refused assent to the scheme agreed upon by the Secretary and the banks, which excluded legal tender; that the Secretary resisted the pressure during several weeks, and that at the last moment he still declared himself opposed to the principle, but heartily desired to "co-operate with the committee." As Mr. Spaulding expresses himself in a letter dated December 9, 1868, "Secretary Chase relied mainly on the passage of the national currency act to furnish the means, but it appeared to me that it would be wholly inadequate. I therefore introduced the legal-tender bill."

The claim is distinct, and it is precisely what was expressed by Mr. Pomeroy. Mr. Spaulding says almost in so many words that he introduced the bill in spite of the Secretary and of his own committee. But although so much is obvious, Mr. Spaulding finally asserts that he has claimed no merit for what he did. On this point, Mr. Spaulding is again in error. The very letter he writes is nothing but a claim to merit. His whole book is such a claim. Nay, he has pressed it so strongly as to drag three newspaper reporters on the stage, and done it for no conceivable purpose except to support his claim. As it is commonly the habit of members of Congress to furnish such information of their own accord to reporters, it will be doubly worth while to quote their words. Mr. Dawson, of the Albany Evening Journal, is introduced by Mr. Spaulding, in the form of a paragraph dated February 6, 1862, in order to say that "Mr. Spaulding, of Erie, has had to assume the laboring-oar in this financial expedient. He had but a bare majority of the committee with him at the outset, and when the Secretary of the Treasury hesitated, as he did for several days, the committee became equally divided. . . . The grateful thanks of all loyal men are due to Mr. Spaulding." Mr. Simonton, of the New York Times, is called on the stand avowedly to prove the authorship of the act, and testifies, by letter of February 13, 1862, that "due credit should be awarded to the author of the legal-tender scheme, the Hon. E. G. Spaulding. It was Mr. Spaulding who originated the proposition to force a fixed paper currency upon the country. . . . He has reason to be proud of the triumph he has achieved, and the country will not soon forget his services." Besides conferring this boon on his country, Mr. Spaulding selects these newspaper paragraphs, and no others, to reprint in his book, and then says he makes no claim to merit. And finally, Mr. Wilkeson, of the New York Tribune, is brought in by Mr. Spaulding in order to state that "to the patient labor of the Hon. E. G. Spaulding the country is greatly indebted . . . for what vigor has been displayed in its passage through Congress." These are Mr. Spaulding's chosen witnesses, brought up by him eight years after the event to support his statements.

Mr. Spaulding is fond of hiding behind other men, and attempts to do so on every occasion; but, if he can satisfy the public that his book is not a claim to merit, he will succeed in perverting the public morals almost as much as he did by his legal-tender bill. The true difficulty in his case is, not that he has made one claim, but that he has made two. He conscientiously tries to be on both sides at once. He asks sympathy from both camps. He calls for it from the friends of legal tender because he made the law, and he asks it from the enemies of legal tender because he thinks the law bad. And what the North American Review meant to protest against was his notion that a public man may be permitted to receive credit for the authorship of a dishonest measure, the ultimate results of which he had neither the knowledge nor the capacity to foresee, and the effects of which he joins in deploring. H. B. A.

WASHINGTON, May 9, 1870.

Correspondence.

PROFESSOR SCHELE DE VERE'S "GREAT EMPRESS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your recent review of Mr. Schele de Vere's book, "The Great Empress," you quoted passages which seemed strangely familiar. On referring to Blackwood's Magazine for October, 1847 (art. "The Vision of Cagliostro"), I find a complete coincidence between its pages 411–412 and Mr. De Vere's pages 40–42. The phrases are identical, though the arrangement has been slightly varied.

I desire, therefore, to ask these questions:

1. Did Mr. De Vere write the article in Blackwood?

2. If not, have both authors copied or translated from a common authority?

3. Has Mr. De Vere simply plagiarized from Blackwood and altered the original in a few trifling particulars?

One of these three questions apparently must receive an affirmative answer. D——N.

Notes.

LITERARY.

AMERICAN works of reference on which European scholars are dependent are few enough, and it is pleasant to read Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.'s announcement of such a one: "Greek and Latin Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods, B.C. 146—A.D. 1100," by Prof. E. A. Sophocles, of Harvard College. The attention which this laborious and learned undertaking will naturally attract to its modest editor will be among the least of his deserts.——Messrs. Roberts Bros. have several entertaining works in press, of which the titles are: "Salmonia; or, Days of Fly-Fishing," and "Consolation in Travel; or, The Last Days of a Philosopher," both by Sir Humphry Davy, but not in the line of his greatest reputation; William Morris's "Lovers of Gudrun," printed separately from the rest of the "Earthly Paradise," in a pocket edition; Dante Rossetti's "Poems;" and "Songs before Sunrise," by Mr. Swinburne.——"Madagascar and its People," by J. Sibree, jr.—being the notes of a four years' residence in the island, with an account of mission work among the Malagasy—will be republished by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. The same house have also in press "The Virginia Tourist," by Edward A. Pollard—a guide-book for the springs and mountains, the natural beauties and wonders of the State.——The Ohio Valley Historical Series has met with the good success it deserved. The first three volumes related to Ohio almost exclusively, but the fourth and fifth, which are soon to appear, describe the early settlements south of the river. They are: "Pioneer Life in Kentucky," a series of letters by the late Daniel Drake, M.D., addressed to his children, and "giving a faithful and graphic description of pioneer life." Dr. Drake was the father of Senator Drake, who edits the letters and furnishes a memoir of the writer. Also, a reprint of "An Account of the Remarkable Occurrences in the Life and Travels of Col. James Smith," who, as the long-winded title states, was in 1799 a citizen of Bourbon County, Kentucky, and had been a captive among the Indians in the years 1755–59. He describes the "customs, manners, traditions, theological sentiments, mode of warfare," etc., of the Indians, and the "soil, timber, and waters where he travelled with the Indians during his captivity;" and tells of some other wonderful things that befell him after his release, and of the different campaigns against the Indians west of "Fort Pitt" from 1755 to 1799. Volume two of McBride's "Pioneer Biography" will contain sketches of Captain John Cleves Symmes, "with a full explanation of his celebrated theory of Concentric Spheres; Robert McClellan, one of General Wayne's scouts during his campaign in Ohio; Judge Henry Weaver, Isaac Paxton, and other pioneers of note." Messrs. J. Sabin & Sons are the Eastern agents for this series. Mr. Robert Clarke has undertaken for himself an enterprise in which he will be thankful for any assistance that may be rendered him. He purposes publishing a record that was kept of the names of the purchasers and receivers of lots at the laying out of Cincinnati in 1789–90, with the numbers of the lots and the prices paid for them; and he means to supplement this "with a copy of the plat, an account of the settlement, and sketches of the early adventurers." In preparing the last especially, he requests the aid of the kinsmen of the persons upon the record, whose names he has published, with a statement of the above facts, in a small brochure, to be had, we presume, for the asking. There are 224 names in all, representing considerably less than that number of families, and those who possess a genealogical turn of mind will do well to examine them. They may find that Mr. Clarke has something to give them in return for any information of theirs. To many it may be new that Cincinnati was originally called Losantiville (L-os-antiville), i.e., the town opposite the mouth of the Licking. The unhappy schoolmaster who framed this compound died shortly afterwards at the hands of the Indians.——A timely publication, at this juncture, should be this, which is announced by Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger: "Sheridan's Troopers on the Plains," a description of a winter campaign, "with incidents of the war-path and the chase, and manners, customs, and traditions of the roaming Indians south of the Arkansas; also, comments on the administration of Indian affairs," by Dr. B. Randolph Keim. The title promises rather too much, perhaps, but it is not to be expected that all parts will be treated with the same thoroughness. The book is to be illustrated.——"The Invitation Heeded: Reasons for a Return to Catholic Unity," is the title of a work to be published immediately by the Catholic Publication Society. The author is the Rev. James Kent Stone, D.D., a grandson of the late Chancellor Kent, and recently President of Kenyon and Hobart Colleges—Episcopal establishments at Gambier, Ohio, and Geneva, New York. Prof. Stone graduated at Harvard within the past ten years with marked honors, and the number of his friends and acquaintances who will be curious to learn the reasons of his "perversion" is not few.

—When an American editor hereafter meets with a reference to the Standard, he must stop to think whether the consolidated organ of the Western Baptists, or the transformed organ of the American Anti-Slavery Society, or Mr. John Russell Young's new daily paper, is intended. The last-named is known as the New York Standard, and is a rival of the Sun in more ways than one. Its début has been attended very naturally with an exchange of compliments between Mr. Dana and Mr. Young, of the sort which are just now flying thick and fast between newspaper managers in all sections of the country, and as it were by epidemic, the like of which has not been seen in many years. Mr. Young seems to have overcome one difficulty which has hitherto beset all similar enterprises in the principal cities. He has organized an American Press Association, as a rival to the Associated Press, and, in so doing, has served not only himself but the reading public. It has been surmised that Mr. Young's Standard is Gen. Butler's also, and that in most questions of public policy and personal interest the editor and the Congressman will see eye to eye. "Advanced Radicalism," at least, is understood to be the distinctive feature of the New York Standard, and, in this, whether interpreted by Gen. Butler or not, it agrees with the late National Anti-Slavery Standard, now simply the Standard, and a monthly magazine in place of a weekly newspaper. So far as number one permits judging, there is nothing but a change of shape in the anti-slavery organ. Its topics are the same as before, minus the Fifteenth Amendment, but rather more prominently than of late it will argue in behalf of woman suffrage, having absorbed the Woman's Advocate, another monthly. The writers are substantially the same, Mr. Wendell Phillips being in the foreground. Mrs. Howe and Mr. Higginson are also declared contributors, though, from the way they are made to do duty in the May number, we should judge that they were not engaged at first-hand. The Standard, albeit it adds literature to its numerous reformatory departments, will scarcely compete with the belles-lettres magazines; and its audience will probably continue to be chiefly the members of the late Anti-Slavery Society and other friends of universal "moral censorship."

—A story is told of the Rev. Theodore Parker which relates that, being met on a Sunday morning by a lunatic who warned him of the approaching, and indeed imminent, destruction and total collapse of the universe, he replied in these words, or in words of the purport of these: "Oh! that don't affect me; I live in Boston." But the other opposite opinion appears to be the prevailing one in the city itself, where, as is known, and as one of its own poets has said, Boston is held to be not only closely connected with this frame of things, but the hub of it; and, despite the respect in which Mr. Parker is held, there are probably only a very few Bostonians who would not admit, even to a person from New York, that there is room for grave apprehension as to what will be the condition of Boston after the universe once goes. Naturally, then, all classes of Bostonians—Parkerites, Holmes-men, lunatics—are always pretty busily at work "solving the universe." Several times they have all but done it—sometimes making a very good shot at the answer in a book, but on the whole coming nearer to it in courses of lectures than in any other way. We speak only of public lectures, for what one hears about private lectures in parlors, where only a few persons, mostly ladies, are present, and where, if one could believe all that is told him, the thing has actually been done over and over again by certain gentlemen—what one hears about these private lectures, we say, has always seemed to us too much like what one hears concerning the "time" which is made by rowing crews in their practice rowing, but which is never made on the day of the race. Certain it is that no Bostonian lecturer can be pointed out who, in a lighted hall and in the presence of a mixed audience, has ever spoken "the word of fate" and settled the thing. However, they keep at it; and during this last winter there has even been extraordinary exertion made to get the universe finally disposed of. But the season passed without its being solved; though Dr. McCosh's lectures are highly spoken of by some persons who heard them; and so were those of Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Wendell Phillips. Besides, it is only fair to say that, though the season is technically over, the Radical Club continues its sessions, and that Mr. John Weiss lectures five times more before he brings to an end his latest attempt. Mr. Weiss's discourses, however, are open to the objection set forth above: though tickets may be procured at Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co.'s which admit outsiders, still it is in a private parlor that the utterance is made, and the audience must of necessity be small and, we suspect, of a character to make its testimony as to Mr. Weiss's success a little suspicious. We have taken some time to come to what we were going to say, which is this: "Free Religion" lecturers and the Radical Club having latterly done so much writing and speaking and talking—of a singularly captivating and deluding kind, would the clergymen say?—some of the clergy and laity of Boston and vicinity thought it necessary that the people should have an opportunity to hear the Christian solution of the universe also; so they engaged some dozen or so of ministers, eminent in the various denominations, to go to Boston and preach a course of sermons which should counteract the influence of the unorthodox and unbelieving writers and speakers above-mentioned. President Harris of Bowdoin, President Woolsey of Yale, Professors Herrick of Bangor, Mead of Andover, Peabody of Harvard, Fisher of New Haven, Smith of Andover, Diman of Brown, and Porter of Yale, were the gentlemen selected, and their lectures or sermons were so well received that they have now been collected and published in book form, the volume bearing the imprint of the Congregational Publication Society, of Boston.

—The editor of five volumes of "Historical Collections of Louisiana," Mr. B. F. French, has begun a new series which includes also Florida (New York: J. Sabin & Sons). The first volume contains four pieces, viz., the editor's translations of M. de Rémonville's Memoir to Count Ponchartrain, on the importance of establishing a colony in Louisiana (1697); D'Iberville's account of his voyage to take possession of Louisiana in 1698; and M. Pénicaut's Annals of Louisiana, 1698–1722. Finally, Richard Hakluyt's admirable version of Réné Laudonnière's history of the attempted Huguenot settlement in Florida, 1562–1567. The merit of the first three pieces, all derived from the archives of France and never before printed, is that they form an unbroken chronicle of events from 1697 to 1722; and it is Mr. French's object, if we understand his preface, to continue these records of "the gradual advance of French and Spanish colonization in Louisiana and Florida," and even to follow the history of the Gulf States down to the time of their perfect incorporation with the Union. This is an undertaking which deserves a cordial support, Mr. French having the requisite knowledge for it. We should have been glad to see, side by side with the translations, the original text, and, if as much care had been bestowed on the proof-reading as on the press-work, it would also have been well. Mr. French's English, too, it must be said, is at times slovenly and obscure beyond excuse, so much so that we feel like quoting a few of the worst passages:

"La Salle now resolved to go in search of the Mississippi River, and, in October, he left the fort, leaving Joutel in command. At the end of four months he returned to Fort St. Louis without finding it [the river]." (Note to page 7.)

"These trees are only found in low and swampy countries, which grow to a prodigious height, and bear a fruit resembling an olive." (Page 45.)

"At daylight, we gave the war-whoop (le cri de mort), which greatly astonished them, who, in endeavoring to find out the cause of their alarm, was fired upon by us," etc. (Page 85.)

"The temple . . . with the walls eight feet thick, and covered with a matting of canes, in which they keep up a perpetual fire"! (Page 95.)

The use of which in reference to persons also frequently occurs, and appears to be in affectation of Hakluyt's Elizabethan English. In reading the latter one is struck with the false impressions that must have been created in European minds by certain phrases in which the savage government is described as if a civilized monarchy—the word "king," for example, being put for "chief" or "head-man," and the same respect being shown in speaking of him as if authority were the same thing the world over. Here and there in this volume one finds traces of those cruel customs among the Indians, partly superstitious and partly instituted to maintain bravery and fortitude, which reached, probably, their most revolting pitch among the Mandans, as Mr. Catlin has described them for us. Mr. French's notes are always to the point, and their references are of no little value to students.

—Sir William Berkeley it was, and not Governor Dinwiddie, as our treacherous memory lately reported, who deemed the absence of free schools a blessed circumstance for Virginia, and whose spirit has too long animated the people of the South. They are now bravely exorcising it, with the aid to native resolution which the Peabody Fund affords, under the judicious management of Rev. Dr. Sears. Does any one wish to see how States are regenerated, and public spirit awakened to the necessity of general intelligence, let him read the proceedings of the trustees of the Fund at their annual meeting in February, and particularly Dr. Sears's report in detail of the help extended to every Southern State (Cambridge: May, 1870.) Not only will the reader obtain a clear perception of educational movements at the South, but he will find in them cause of deep satisfaction both with the principle on which the Fund was instituted and has been meted out, and with the spread of the free-school system among the towns before or beyond any provision of the State. Dr. Sears speaks with much interest of the rapid growth of the population of Texas, by European and domestic immigration, and is perhaps at this time in that part of the country arranging with the legislature for future action. We wish it were as plain as it ought to be to the people of every State, that for the European immigration they so much desire there is no bait like the common-school: it is the guaranty of public order and stability not less than of intelligence, and wherever Dr. Sears goes and is welcomed, the foreigner, if he ever has the chance, will follow and settle.

—It has been remarked and sometimes asserted, not always by prejudiced observers, that the negro intellect in youth is bright and apt to learn, but that beyond the age which will carry it through the grammar-school it falls off in capacity and wins no further laurels. We doubt if this can be considered a well-ascertained fact, or whether, if exceptions were shown in plenty, there would not be an attempt to exclude them on account of some "visible admixture" of white blood, and such a line be drawn as to prevent our citing examples of Haytians who have gained distinction in the schools of Paris. Be this as it may, an inference of similarly limited capacity in the female mind has been drawn from the experience of the Syndicate at Cambridge, which conducts the local examinations of that university, open, it will be remembered, to both sexes. The candidates are "junior" when less than sixteen years old, "senior" when between sixteen and eighteen. "It is a striking fact," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "that for the last five years the percentage of senior boys who have 'passed in honors' has been without exception very considerably greater than that of junior boys," while, in the case of the girls, the reverse has been decidedly true. This may be explained, the writer goes on to say, without raising the question of mental constitution, by supposing "that schoolmistresses can teach the younger girls admirably well, but are not yet able to carry more advanced intellects through graver studies." The materials for judging rightly the question of sex must be very much more abundant in this country than in England, though they can scarcely be thought complete, either here or there, so long as the stimulus of employment is not present with girl-students as with boys; and it would be strange if the former should pursue a merely "liberal" education with the same ardor and application that have distinguished many of them in scientific courses. At Cambridge, the arithmetic of the girls showed unscientific and unsuccessful training, but they outstripped the boys in punctuation and in French; even in Euclid they gave a better average, though the best of them were not equal to the best among the boys. In general, their native quickness was of great advantage to them.

—The poets are doubtless to blame for much of the exaggeration in the common notion of the superiority of country over city virtue, and of the extent to which the mere living in contact with nature purifies and elevates the people who are thus situated. The trouble is, not only that familiarity may "make a twice-told tale of God," but that, while birds, trees, mountains, brooks, and clouds are teaching what they may of morality and spirituality, other influences are at work which quite overpower them. Country life is at once scattered, isolated, and contracted, its interests are few in number, its intellectual resources scanty, its communication with the active and controlling spirit of the age irregular and precarious. It has other accidental conditions, which differ among different nations, so that the social and political relation of the country to the town and to the state is anything but the same in all cases. For instance, the Registrar-General for Scotland, in his late report, shows that the proportion of illegitimate births is lower in the towns than in the rural districts, namely, 9 per cent. to 9·9. In France, on the other hand, the proportion is reversed, being 20 per cent. for the towns (27 to 32 per cent. in Paris) to 4 per cent. in the country. In Belgium, likewise: cities, 13·6 (31·8 in Brussels), to country, 5·7 per cent. In Sweden: cities, 24·2 (41·2 in Stockholm), to country, 7·8 per cent. These statistics, however, are quite illusory, and must ever remain so until accompanied by facts concerning infanticide as well as fœticide and prevention—the last, of course, only being inferrible from medical experience. The report just mentioned states that "in numerous instances the parents of these illegitimate children were true to each other, that the woman had borne several children to the same man, and that frequently these children were legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents." As this reduced the apparent proportion of illegitimate persons in the population, Scotland is perhaps in still greater contrast with the Continental nations cited than the official figures indicate. "But possibly," continues the Registrar-General, in this way "one of the strongest motives to infanticide was removed, inasmuch as the woman may have lived in the hope that the birth of the child would eventually be the means of inducing its father to marry her, and thus legitimate her offspring." This is so true, we may remark, of the Welsh settlers in the United States, that in some places most of the marriages are made after they have become necessary to legitimacy, and before the birth of the first offspring. In rural France, where the laws of landed inheritance are a premium on small families, the small ratio of illegitimates is probably due to systematic repression. In Scotland, it further appeared —and this is the most remarkable revelation—that "the counties in which the proportion of illegitimate births was highest were also those in which the highest proportion of men and of women were able to sign their names in writing in the marriage registers." For local reasons, also, on the smaller farms illegitimacy is more frequent than on the larger. And, finally, most of these births are confined to the laboring classes, the mothers consisting chiefly of farm-hands, factory girls, domestics, needlewomen, and shopwomen. The fathers are generally of the same grade.

—At the end of four hundred years from the time of his invention, William Tell has lost all claims to be considered a real personage, but is so well bolstered up with monuments and dramas and operas and poetry that he must care very little for having been kicked out of the histories. The Swiss, who, in the last century, burnt Freudenberger's book proving that the Tell legend was Danish, are now fain to acknowledge that it is even as he represented. In the Revue des Deux Mondes for January, M. Marc Monnier has reviewed the whole question of Tell's existence, and the steps by which modern criticism has made manifest his fictitiousness. Saxo-Grammaticus had told, in his "Danish History," the story of one Tokko, a soldier of King Harold, who boasted of his skill as an archer, and was put to the test by the king ordering him to shoot an apple from the head of his son. This history was translated into German in 1430. The ingenious author of the chronicle known as the "White Book" (Chronik des Weissen Buches), forty years later, adopted the story of Tokko, changing names and transferring the scene to Switzerland, and supplying the incident of the pole with the tyrant's hat upon it. Then came the "Tellenlied" in 1474, and transformed "The Toll" (i. e., the "daft"), by which the patriot was designated in the chronicle, into "Wilhelm Tell," and after that all went swimmingly with the legend and its hero. Later chronicles supplied dates for every event, and fresh characters who, in turn, were given a complete historical outfit by the "historian" Müller. Schiller built upon this last, and Rossini upon both of them, and, as we have said, there is no hope of depriving Tell of the immortality of the stage. There is now an opportunity for somebody to make use of him in illustration of the utility of novels, and to maintain that, on the whole, the manufactured hero of the "White Book" has done about as much to cultivate patriotism and lofty sentiments of liberty in the breast of mankind as the flesh-and-blood Virginian planter, Washington, is likely to do in the same length of time.

—Among noticeable works that have lately appeared in France are the following: "Ingres, his Life, Works, and Doctrine," by Vicomte Henri Delaborde (Paris: H. Plon). This biography is based on manuscript notes and letters of the great painter, and contains the completest possible list of his works, whether painted, drawn, engraved, or lithographed, with mention of the studies in color for every considerable piece. This list will be found readable of itself. M. Daremberg, one of Ampère's executors, has brought out a second edition of the latter's "History of the Formation of the French Language," which originally appeared in 1841. Since then the knowledge of the Old French has so greatly increased that it has become necessary to complete and correct the text of Ampère by means of notes, the adding of which has been entrusted to M. Paul Meyer, who has shown his entire competence for the task (Paris: Didier). The latest of the series of inedited documents called "Archives of the Bastille," collected and published by François Ravaisson (Paris: Durand et Pedone-Lauriel) is said to be, thus far, the most interesting. It relates wholly to the epoch of poisoning in which Mme. de Brinvilliers flourished, and throws much additional light on her trial. Volume one of a "History of Hannibal," by M. Hennebert, has appeared, and indicates a purpose to make a thorough and connected study of the subject. It is occupied mainly in setting forth the causes of antagonism between Carthage and Rome, and in describing Hannibal's campaigns in Spain. The crossing of the Pyrenees and subsequent events, down to Capua, will be narrated in the second volume; the third will treat of the military operations during the long occupation of the Italian peninsula. To one who has not looked into it, the bibliography of Hannibal's passage of the Alps will be surprising. The Revue Bibliographique Universelle for April begins a list of works on this subject, dating from 1515, and catalogued by centuries, that already (1818) exceeds fifty in number, and is yet to be completed for the remainder of this century.

THE LIFE OF FAIRFAX.*

The General of the Parliament was worthy of a biography, and he has found a good biographer. Mr. Markham is not unassailable by criticism. He sometimes overrates his hero, and underrates his hero's rivals and opponents. He is a strong Parliamentarian (we see that two Markhams fought at Naseby), and not always free from partisanship in his judgments, or even in his statements. He exaggerates, for example, in saying that, under the tyranny of Charles I., "members of the learned professions were flogged about the streets of London." In trying to be graphic and animated, he sometimes commits faults of taste, and once or twice approaches the verge of fustian. But, upon the whole, he has done his work well, and given us probably as good a portrait as devouring time would permit of a character which, besides its historical importance, is one of considerable beauty.

Fairfax was of a great Yorkshire house, and the inheritor of fine estates and a Scotch peerage purchased by his grandfather, as in the days of the Stuarts peerages were purchased, of James I. The family was distinguished in war, diplomacy, and letters. Two youths of the name fell together in the Palatinate, fighting for the Queen of Bohemia and the Protestant cause; and Prince Rupert, if his heart was open to any such feelings, may have felt a pang when he drew his sword against a Fairfax. The General's great-uncle was Edward Fairfax, the translator of Tasso, called by Mr. Markham, a little ambitiously, "the founder, with Spenser, of the modern school of English poetry." It was a house of that Protestant chivalry of which the "Faërie Queene" is the poetic mirror, and which abounded in the so-called Puritan camp quite as much as anything deserving of the name of chivalry abounded in the camp of the Cavaliers. The General, the flower of the house, was brought up under the eye of his great-uncle the poet, spent five years in study at Cambridge, and remained through life an example of the union of literary accomplishments and tastes with military aspirations which lends so singular an interest to the heroes of that age.

Feudalism and Catholicism were still pretty strong in the north of England, and most of the Yorkshire aristocracy and gentry, with the princely Marquis of Newcastle, took the King's side. The Fairfaxes were drawn by the memory of the blood which their family had shed in the Protestant cause, and by their Protestant and Spenserian culture, to the side of the Parliament. With them went, on one hand, their tenantry, who followed them on feudal principles, while the tenantry of the neighboring landlords followed their chiefs to the King's standard on the same principles, and, on the other hand, the Puritan burghers of Bradford, Leeds, and other rising seats of Yorkshire manufactures—a typical instance of the mixture of aristocratic and democratic elements in the party of the Parliament. An attempt was made at first, by means of a compact between the leading men of both parties, to keep civil war out of Yorkshire altogether. And, though the attempt was hopeless, they who made it might well be pardoned. As Mr. Markham, in his description of the country which was to be the scene of conflict, passes from one beautiful dale (beautiful then, for their heathery sides were not yet covered with tall chimneys, nor had their clear streams yet become water-powers) to another, and as he gives the names of the old halls which stood along those dales, with the genealogies and alliances of their inmates, there rises before us the image of the country life of the English gentry in the early part of the seventeenth century—a life uniting some of the best characteristics of the age of chivalry with some of the best characteristics of modern times, as healthy, perhaps, on the whole, and as happy, as ever the life of mortals was. From the nature of the issue, too, the line between the parties was at first very faintly drawn, though the rising passions of the conflict soon deepened it; and to a large proportion of these gentry it was plusquam civile bellum, a war against kinsmen and friends, against the companions of the hunting-field and of the Christmas board, and against men whose principles were often fundamentally the same as their own—for there was no real difference of principle between Falkland and Essex, probably none between Falkland and Fairfax, but only a difference of opinion as to the camp in which the real upholders of the principles were to be found. Our own great conflict was divested, by the sharp division of territory, and the almost equally sharp division of principle, of some of the direst features of civil war.

* "A Life of the Great Lord Fairfax, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Parliament of England. By Clements R. Markham, F.S.A., Author of the History of the Abyssinian Expedition." New York: Macmillan & Co.

Such a civil war as that of the seventeenth century in England is the most calamitous of all human conditions; yet even this condition has its moral ideal, which was admirably set forth in the words of Sir William Waller, the Parliamentarian General, to his Royalist friend, Sir Ralph Hopton: "My affections to you are so unchangeable that hostility itself cannot violate my affection to your person; but I must be true to the cause wherein I serve. The Great God, who is the searcher of my heart, knows with what reluctance I go upon this service, and with what perfect hatred I look upon war without an enemy. The God of peace in his good time send us peace, and in the meantime fit us to receive it! We are both on the stage, and we must act the parts that are assigned us in this tragedy. Let us do it in a way of honor and without personal animosities." Fairfax acted up to the spirit of these noble words more thoroughly, perhaps, than Sir William Waller himself, while, unlike Sir William, he played the part assigned him in the tragedy, without flinching, to the end. He may be taken as the model of a good citizen and an honorable gentleman whom fate has involved in a civil war.

In our civil war, the volunteers failed, almost without exception, as generals, and the West Pointers alone succeeded. In the English civil war the reverse was the case; the veteran officers trained under Gustavus were useful in organizing and drilling, but never rose to high command; the successful chiefs, Cromwell, Ireton, Fairfax, and Blake, were volunteers. But the English gentry were all, to a certain extent, trained to arms; Fairfax himself had just smelt powder in Brabant, and he had seen military organization, though under an evil star, in the two campaigns of Charles I. against Scotland. Moreover, these gentlemen were all huntsmen, and had acquired not only a firm seat in the saddle, but, what was far more valuable, a good eye for country. The brilliant little campaigns in Yorkshire, by which Fairfax made his reputation, were in fact the campaigns of a fox-hunter, though he skilfully combined with the rapid movements of his cavalry across the country the defensive energy of his burgher allies in the manufacturing towns, especially in Bradford. It is a pleasant trait of the chivalry which still mastered the passions of civil war that, after the defeat of Fairfax at Adwalton Moor, Lady Fairfax, who accompanied her husband in the field, having fallen into the hands of the Royalists, was sent back to her husband in Newcastle's own coach, escorted by a troop of Royalist horse. It is true the Marquis did not display quite the same chivalry towards Roundhead burghers.

Marston and Naseby are well-known stories, though Mr. Markham tells them with more detail than they have been told before, and illustrates them with more complete plans. He does his hero injustice when, apparently from his anxiety to keep Cromwell in subordination to Fairfax as a general, he gives ear to the calumnious aspersions on the conduct of Cromwell at Marston which emanated from the party feeling, mingled with personal envy, of the Presbyterian Crawford and his clan. The best confutation of these stories is the anxiety shown by Fairfax himself to have Cromwell as his second in command of the New Model army. Mr. Markham, however, adopts what we conceive to be the right account of that appointment. The organization of the New Model army was entrusted not to Cromwell, but to Fairfax; and there is no reason to doubt that Cromwell would have resigned his command, in compliance with the Self-denying Ordinance, had not Fairfax, who was entirely clear of party intrigues, and took a purely military view of matters, insisted on his retaining it, at first for a special service, and then permanently. It is said that Fairfax was Cromwell's tool; but there is nothing either in the known facts or in Fairfax's character to give color to such a supposition; and, in the most important of all the questions on which the two men came into contact, Fairfax strenuously resisted Cromwell's design. Our view of the whole of this episode has been distorted by the Restoration theory of Cromwell's character. Few writers observe the distinction, though it is most important, between the two Self-denying Ordinances. The first, which was lost, incapacitated all members of either House of Parliament for command; the second, which was carried, only relieved the members of the two Houses of their command, without rendering them incapable of appointment for the future. Cromwell, therefore, or rather Fairfax, was guilty only of omitting the form of resignation and reappointment, if, indeed, that form may not be said to have been gone through when Cromwell waited on Fairfax to resign his command.

The dispersion of Goring's rabble army and of the Club men in the west was a mere gleaning after the harvest of Naseby, though Mr. Markham dignifies it with the title of a campaign, and thinks it worthy of a military map. After Naseby, Charles ought not to have prolonged the war; but it is not necessary, with Mr. Markham, to accuse him of selfish recklessness of blood—he was unable to conceive that God would really abandon the cause of an anointed king. The ex-King of Hanover intimated pretty plainly in a manifesto the other day, and no doubt in the most sober earnest, that Providence would compromise the grounds of its own existence by failing to restore him to his throne. For the intrigues and the faction-fights between the sections of the victorious party which ensued upon the victory, Fairfax was as little suited as any knight in the "Faërie Queene." Retaining the commandership-in-chief, he would fain have confined himself to strictly military duties; but that army was not only an army but a political power, identified with one and opposed to the other of the two parties which were struggling for ascendency in Parliament; its own existence being in fact the immediate subject of the struggle. In some cases Fairfax could have little or no difficulty in acting. He could have little difficulty in receiving and restoring to their place in Parliament the two Speakers and the members of the Independent party, when, being driven from the House by the Presbyterians, they sought refuge in his camp. He could have no difficulty in insisting that the army should not be disbanded, as the Presbyterians wished to disband it, without security for its arrears of pay. But in the game that was played by the army politicians he took no part, though it was played to some extent in his name. His position was equivocal, and it is evident that he felt it to be so, and wished to resign; but it is, we think, equally evident that the best opinion of the time sanctioned and demanded his continuance in command. In the purely military sphere he retained complete control over his soldiers, who combined to a singular degree strict military spirit with active participation in politics, and who idolized Fairfax as a commander; he was able to maintain the strictest discipline, and to prevent any kind of outrage, even when the army entered London as conquerors; he saved society, by his military faithfulness and decision, from the terrible mutiny of the Levellers. He did to some extent succeed in repressing the tendency of the army to lay violent hands on the Parliament; and he might have done more, if the narrow-minded and hot-headed leaders of the Presbyterian party would have listened to the voice of the only man, perhaps, in high command who at that moment had absolutely no object at heart but the good of the whole country. "I entreat you that there may be ways in love and composure thought upon. I shall do my endeavors, though I am forced to yield something out of order, to keep the army from disorder. I desire you to take some speedy resolution for the composure of things; for the effecting whereof I should be content to be a sacrifice, as the last service you can have from me."

As commander-in-chief, Fairfax was called upon to repress the Royalist rising in Kent, which took place in combination with Hamilton's invasion from Scotland; and the execution of the two Royalist chiefs, Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, by the general's order, has been supposed to leave a stain upon a name otherwise most spotless as regards humanity and chivalry towards opponents. Mr. Markham's defence of the act, however, seems to us satisfactory. That it was not a violation of the terms of surrender is certain: a distinction was expressly made in those terms between the common soldiers who were to be admitted to quarter and the officers who were to surrender "to mercy." Both Lucas and Lisle had been prisoners in the hands of the Parliament; both had been set free on parole; both had broken parole in taking up arms again; so that their lives were forfeit by the military code. In rekindling the civil war after the complete submission and pacification of the whole kingdom, they exposed themselves, and must have known that they were exposing themselves, to the extreme penalty; and we are certainly not in a position to say that their lives could safely have been spared. All we can say is, that, if they were fighting for what they believed to be a good cause, they were deeply to be pitied; and we have no reason to suppose that Fairfax thought otherwise when he signed the order for their execution. There is not a trace either in his character or in that of Cromwell of cynical exultation in a policy of violence and blood.

Fairfax had nothing to do with the seizure of the King at Holdenby; he would have brought Joyce before a court-martial, but he found that the officers would not support him: over political questions, of which this was really one, his authority did not extend. By him personally, and by all under his orders, the captive King was treated with perfect respect and humanity; his favorite chaplains were again allowed access to him, and he was permitted to see his children. This is the more creditable to Fairfax, because he could not have forgotten that when, on the eve of civil war, at the great Yorkshire gathering on Heyworth Moor, he had laid a petition for peace on the pommel of the King's saddle, the King had rudely spurred his horse forward and nearly trampled the petitioner under foot. Charles emphatically expressed his conviction that Fairfax was a man of honor, and if he had acted on that conviction and trusted Fairfax he might have been saved; or rather, perhaps, if he had been capable of trusting Fairfax, he would never have got into Fairfax's hands. A draft treaty in Fairfax's handwriting, found in Leeds Castle, proves that at first he was willing to restore the King, and not only the King, but the bishops, taking guarantees for the rights of Parliament and liberty of conscience—a project which certainly proves that he was but a poor politician. But Hamilton's invasion and the rising in Kent, brought about by the King's intrigues at the very time when he was negotiating with the Parliament for a settlement of the kingdom, revealed the abyss of Charles's perfidy; and as Fairfax allowed himself to be put on the commission for the King's trial, and attended the first meeting of the commissioners, it appears that by that time he had become convinced that there was no course left but the judicial deposition of a monarch with whom it was impossible to make any binding agreement. But he started back at once when he found that the majority of the commissioners were bent on putting the King to death; and it appears to have been a matter of notoriety that he did everything in his power to avert an act which all sober students of history, however sensible they may be of the demerits of Charles, are united in pronouncing to have been a tragical and calamitous error. But his control over the passions of the army was for the moment lost. His endeavors were ill-seconded by his wife, who, in her Presbyterian and Royalist zeal, was so ill-advised as to show herself at the trial and insult the court in her husband's name. On the afternoon of the fatal day, Fairfax, having come down as usual to do business at the headquarters of the army in Whitehall, met in the gallery the King's coffin, covered with a black pall, with Juxon and Herbert following it, and uttered some nervous and agitated words, which, it seems, were really a question as to the King's behavior on the scaffold, but which were misconstrued as implying surprise and ignorance of what had taken place. What had taken place Fairfax knew too well. He accepted a place in the Council of State; and the earnestness, sincere, as there is every reason to believe, even on Cromwell's part, with which he was pressed to accept the command against Scotland, proves that his military ascendancy and his personal position were still unimpaired. If his reason for declining that command was that the proclamation of Charles II. by the Scotch was not an act of hostility to the Commonwealth of England, it was a weak one; if it was deference to the feelings of his Presbyterian wife, it was weaker still. But, knowing at once Fairfax's character and the range of his political capacity as we do, we have no difficulty in accounting for his resignation. The tyranny of Charles, against which Fairfax had drawn the sword, was buried in Charles's grave; the nation was now in its own hands, or in the hands of statesmen who might be regarded as the elect of the people, and whose policy Fairfax neither desired nor was qualified to control. An entirely new series of events opened before him. The particular service which he had been called by the voice of public duty from his pleasant home to perform for the country had been faithfully and thoroughly performed, and he might feel at liberty, as he certainly desired, to go back to Nunappleton Hall. He knew that he left the country a general in Cromwell. The character of a man who has really no desire to live in public, but having been placed by circumstances in a post of duty, and having done his duty, welcomes his release as a laborer welcomes the end of his day's work, is not easily comprehended by more ambitious natures; but, happily for nations, such characters are sometimes, and perhaps not seldom, found.

In Milton's sonnet, Fairfax is hailed as the deliverer of the land from the "avarice and rapine" which did not fail to show themselves with other evil passions in the train of that, as they have shown themselves in the train of all other civil wars. No crusader ever was more disinterested. The Parliament voted him, in lieu of a pension awarded but never paid, two confiscated estates of the young Duke of Buckingham; but he merely held the property in trust till he could restore it to the duke. The seignory of the Isle of Man was also granted to him, and the grant enabled him to give another proof of his generosity. The proceeds of the sequestrated bishopric he devoted to increasing the incomes of poor clergymen and to the maintenance of grammar-schools; the rents of the island he regularly paid to the widowed Countess of Derby, the warlike lady who had defended Latham House against him and his lieutenant. He carried nothing with him to Nunappleton but his wounds and the disease which he had contracted in the course of his campaigns. His retirement was, as retirement from public life when once resolved on should be, complete; he meddled with state affairs no more, but occupied himself with literature, the education of his child, his stud, and his garden. He translated the Psalms into verse, and wrote poetry of a religious and rather melancholy cast, the specimens of which given by Mr. Markham have no serious value, but are agreeable as proofs of the existence of tenderness of heart and refined tastes under the cuirass of the great soldier. Only when the second Protectorate ended in anarchy Fairfax came again upon the scene. It is with a melancholy feeling that we see the General of the Commonwealth, the beloved commander of Cromwell, the theme of Milton's verse, taking an active part in the Restoration, and going to the Hague as chief representative of the Parliament to carry its invitation to the King. But, in the eyes of all men of sense, the restoration of the constitutional monarchy was the only escape from anarchy; the republicans, however they may command our admiration and sympathy, were a small and hopeless minority, passionately struggling against fate for what, in the circumstances of those times, was a noble chimera. The conduct of Fairfax, unlike that of Monk, was perfectly open and honorable; unlike Monk, he disdained reward; unlike Monk, he remained loyal to his old cause and his old associates; and while Monk basely furnished evidence against Argyle, Fairfax, on hearing of the proceedings against Vane and the other victims of the Restoration, openly said that, "if any man must be excepted from amnesty, he knew no man that deserved it more than himself, who was the general of the army at that time."

One who saw Fairfax in his old age says of him: "He sat like an old Roman, his manly countenance striking awe and reverence into all that beheld him, and yet mixed with so much modesty and meekness as no figure of a mortal man ever represented more. Most of his time he did spend in religious duties, and much of the rest in reading good books, which he was well qualified to do in all modern languages, as appears by those he hath writ and translated." On the last morning of his life he called for a Bible, and read the psalm, "As the hart panteth for the waterbrooks." Many an age must pass before the world will really feel the interest in pure virtue which it feels in grandiose ambition and 'long butcher's bills.' Nor can Fairfax ever be ranked among great men. But he rendered high services to his country without asking or desiring reward either in the shape of pelf or tinsel; and he lived and died a stainless knight in circumstances where it was difficult, indeed, to escape a stain. If we look among the characters of history for Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior," we shall hardly find the ideal better realized anywhere than in Fairfax.

AN INSIDE VIEW OF CREATION.*

This volume is a collection of essays setting forth some of the most talked of facts in cosmical physics, geology, and palæontology. Quite in the usual way the author begins by appealing to the prejudices of the uneducated reader by drawing an invidious comparison between the firm-set truths of science and the "cobwebs of logic." He then gives a passing scowl at metaphysics for despising "trees, and birds, and rocks, and fossils, and other material things," and assures the student that he has a more direct and certain way of arriving at the history of the universe. A perfect fusillade of rhetorical fireworks celebrates the outset of the author and reader in their new path. We have the "Epic of the Trilobite," the "Vistas of the Fleeting Ages," the "Ruins of Continents," and the other adjuncts of the spectacular drama of creation which it is the wont of science popularizers to parade before the public.

Accompanying our author on his rapid course through creation, we are shown what he terms the "Ordeal by Water," in which the instructive but somewhat type-worn Temple of Serapis, the changes of level of sea-shores generally, and the uplifting of volcanic islands—"ocean births," in the exalted language of our guide—are passed in rapid review. Then comes the "Ordeal by Fire." Here the Mosaic account of creation and the deluge are combated. A chaotic impossibility is figured as a volcano, and some of the text of the chapter is about as near to the truth as the picture. We next have "The Solar System in a Blaze." After perusing this peculiar chapter, we are sure the reader will sympathize with us in our abiding regret that the nebular hypothesis was ever invented, or that, being invented, it had not been kept as a bit of esoteric doctrine only to be taught to old and steady heads. As it is, the publication of this doctrine has given a place of refuge where obscure thinkers on all physical matters can become nebulously incomprehensible, and where their erratic imaginations can comet around in profound disregard for all known laws of matter. Worst of all, it affords an unbounded field for fine writing. How our author has availed himself of it may be seen from a chance selection:

"And what is the substance of that filmy comet which sweeps with such indecent haste through the ranks of the dignified sisterhood of planets? In its dazzling proximity to the sun at perihelion, it can only exist as a fiery vapor, like the substance it seems to be (sic). And if we gaze across the cold and starless interval which separates our firmament of stars from its nearest neighbors, there we may witness a universe in its formative stage. There, indeed, are firmaments so remote that the eye of the telescope is strained (sic) in the attempt to descry the component stars; but nearer to our domestic earth than these are the materials of firmaments which remain rudis indigestaque moles—the semina rerum, the primordial igneous vapor from which worlds are destined to be formed in some far distant future age—so distant, probably, that the career of terrestrial things will first have closed, and mankind will have been ushered into another state of being."

We have also a neat figure of "The Solar System rotating in Space." The details are so accurately given in this figure that we are compelled to suppose that the author has come into possession of a photograph taken by some of the ancient astronomers of these outside firmaments. After giving his Pegasus a short rest, our author sets out again to take us through the "Reign of Fire." We can promise the reader that he will find it diverting to trace in detail, as the author enables him to do, the processes which went on on the earth's surface at a time when "the morning and evening twilight almost met each other in the midnight zenith, so high and refractive was the heterogeneous atmosphere." But, the professor assures us, "there was no need of twilight; an ocean of fire sent up to the nocturnal heavens a glare that was more fearful than the poisoned ray of the feebly shining sun." However, we must leave it to those whose inclinations tempt them to study this remarkable chapter and that which follows, wherein "Old Ocean commences Work."

Having disposed of the preliminary work of creation in about sixty pages, our author begins the history of life with a pretty good account of the Eozoon Canadense, yet indulges his propensity for smartness in the most lamentable way. It leads him to call the Irish Eozoon the "first Fenian," and to speak of "Johnny Bull thrusting his elbows into the sides of Young America," when he only means that there is a certain correspondence between the form of the opposite shores of the North Atlantic, if he means anything at all. In the succeeding three hundred pages the general facts of the succession of animals are tolerably well given, wherever the author's rhetoric will allow us to see them. The titles of the chapters show very well the extravagant spirit which prevails throughout the work; we have such headings as the "Garden of the Stone Lilies," "Scouts of the Reptile Horde," "Geography of the Empire of Reptiles," etc. It is with no little satisfaction that we find amid all this two chapters—one, "Something about Oil" (meaning petroleum), and another, "Something about Rock Salt and Gypsum," in which the author talks about things which he has evidently studied attentively, and where his personal acquaintance with the facts gives his account of them a special value. These two chapters set forth the phenomena of which they treat in a better shape than they are to be found in any popular work with which we are acquainted, though there are some of the conclusions with which we cannot agree. After this the book relapses, and we have more about "World Thoughts," "The Tooth of Time," "Cycles of Matter," a succession of chapters containing a rhetorical solution of most of the problems of modern science. After having discussed and settled all these, we feel unfeignedly thankful that the considerate author does not "attempt to lift the veil which conceals the destiny of other firmaments."

In these days when pictures count for so much, we cannot pass the illustrations by. In scientific works especially, these are important, for the impressions the public get from them are more vivid and enduring than what the text supplies. Those of this work which are intended to furnish the reader with an idea of the ancient life of the earth are among the most unhappy results we have ever seen of the temerity which undertakes to reproduce scenes of which we have only the merest fragments and wreck. We are sorry to add that the book is likely to prove of little value, except where it may chance to awaken somebody to look up a better. We are still more sorry to say that it is likely to have a certain popularity among the public for which it was written.

* "Sketches of Creation: A Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life, etc. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoölogy, and Botany in the University of Michigan." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1870. 12mo, pp. 459.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR APRIL.

In his life of Rufus Choate, President Brown quotes a just remark which Mr. Choate once made about John Quincy Adams, for whom he had a great admiration, not only because of his vast knowledge and his remarkable facility in using it, but also because of his force of character. "He has peculiar powers as an assailant," Mr. Choate said, "and almost always, even when attacked, gets himself into that attitude by making war upon his accuser; and he has, withal, an instinct for the jugular and the carotid artery as unerring as that of any carnivorous animal." It would seem that the descendants of "the old man eloquent" have in a high degree of perfection his ability to see the vital point of attack and his willingness to fasten on it. Nobody would say, for instance, that the late minister to England has no fighting blood in him, nor that he is at all wanting in the instinct for his antagonist's jugular and the power of sticking fast to that artery when once he has closed upon it. And the directors of the Hartford and Erie would be as little likely, we imagine, to charge undue mildness and feeble inefficiency against the younger Charles Francis Adams as would Earl Russell against the elder, or Mr. Jefferson against the second President. In this last number of the North American Review, Mr. Henry Brooks Adams justifies his title to the family name by making a deadly attack on the framers of our legal-tender legislation; and Mr. E. G. Spaulding, recently a member of Congress from this State, must, if he has discernment, perceive himself to be, as one may say, pinned, and in urgent need of the assistance of the humane. It will be seen, from a letter on another page, that Mr. Spaulding, having imprudently shown signs of life before Mr. Adams left the field, has been despatched by having several large stones thrown on him.

We do not know whether Mr. Adams makes more or less impression on most of his readers by the deliberate contemptuousness with which he is apt to treat the more contemptible or feeble of his opponents. There can be no doubt, we should say, that his method has its effect on the tempers of the latter; nor is there any doubt, we fear, human nature being the imperfect thing it is, that a large minority of the spectators of his cruelty get from it a lively pleasure. Probably some of our readers remember with satisfaction the elaborate comparison between Mr. Boutwell and Mr. Hoar which Mr. Adams contributed to a recent number of the North American, and how it must have pleased the Secretary of the Treasury to learn the estimation in which he is held by some of his fellow-citizens they can imagine. Equally well pleased we may suppose Mr. Spaulding to have been when "his attention was called" to the following passage—such passages never, it is observed by editors, being read by the subjects of them until some friend or other happens to mail them a copy of some obscure periodical, which, in the natural course of events, they would not have seen. The passage is as follows:

"The intellect of a Congressman gifted with no more than the ordinary abilities of his class, is scarcely an interesting or instructive subject of study; nor are the discussions that arise among such men likely to be rich in stores of knowledge or experience. But when an accidental representative, though he may possess neither breadth nor force, is able to carry, 'over the Administration and through Congress,' as Mr. Spaulding claims to have done, and as it is clear that Mr. Spaulding did, a measure of such far-reaching consequences as the Legal Tender Act of 1862, the character of that person's mind and the facts of his life cease to be matters of absolute insignificance."

As we say, there is no doubt that this is certain to have some effect on Mr. Spaulding's temper; and there is no doubt of the cleverness of it; nor that for this and other reasons it will please many persons and will be admired, as most of Mr. Adams's writing should be. But there may well enough be doubt if this way of administering justice is, on the whole, so effective in mixed communities as some other ways. We confess to having felt, as we read, some slight stir of the sentiment of compassion in favor of Mr. Spaulding, and some slight indignation against his executioner; and to having had some thoughts concerning the justice of capital punishment, indeed, but also concerning the reasons against vivisection, even of criminals. But we need not insist upon this point. Or, at least, insistence is not necessary on Mr. Adams's account, for he himself says, further on, that "it is easy, only too easy, to ridicule and satirize the doctrines of men like Mr. Spaulding; and something like an apology to the public is due for the extent to which this appetite has been indulged in these pages." Not only that, we should say—not only is it always easy for a writer with such a public as ours to satirize particular men and doctrines too much, but it is also easy for him to indulge too much his aptitude for general ridicule and satire. American political writing cannot be too simple and direct if the writer would see anything effected. Still, no doubt, it is well in the end, here as elsewhere, that the best men should speak out without reserve their whole mind, contempt and all. Only, if they do so, they must have a capacity for writing. Barring objections to the tone of some few portions of it, adverse criticism will find nothing to fasten upon in this article, and we recommend its perusal to all persons who desire the masculine pleasure of reading vigorous English, embodying sense, wit, and knowledge, and also to all those who wish for information in regard to Mr. Adams's specific subject—the Legal Tender Act—and in regard to the wider subject of the way in which legislation is done in Washington.

Another article, which should be studied by everybody who is in a position to influence public opinion, and who would influence public opinion for good, is Mr. F. B. Sanborn's essay on "Poverty and Public Charity." It is full of figures, and is not too readable, unless one is interested in the subject of which Mr. Sanborn treats; but it is full of information too; and we suppose that very few people who are interested in the care of the criminal and helpless classes in any American communities would not get from it valuable instruction, as we are sure that very few general readers of an optimistic turn would not get from it much encouragement. All things considered, we doubt if the science of charity has a better friend in this country than Mr. Sanborn, who has the peculiar good fortune of being at once a well-known philanthropist and a practical helper of people who need help and who are within his reach.

"The Norman Conquest of England," an essay by Professor William Allen, of Madison University, is marked by all that writer's carefulness and soundness, and is what the best reviewing of its kind should be—an addition to what one can learn from the book reviewed. Fault may reasonably be found with most of Mr. Allen's writing, as being deficient in life; it is not to be called attractive reading. But such is his honesty and ability, and the things which interest him are of such a character, that his reader may always be sure, when once Mr. Allen has consented to treat of a subject, that what he writes will be worth attention—that to read his criticism of an author will be to listen to two men of ability talking about a matter of which it is well to hear. So far as we know, we have no better informed and more intelligent critic of works relating to English history than Mr. Allen has proved himself to be.

Dr. Hammond is the author of an interesting paper—much better worth reading than many of his later and hastier writing has been—on the "Physics and Physiology of Spiritualism," or Spiritism. His descriptions of cases of clairvoyancy and so-called "mediumship" which fell under his observation in the course of his own practice are of particular interest, and will be found worth attention by the faithful as well as by the "sceptics"—as the mediums call the disbelievers. It is not, of course, to be expected that the believers will accept either Dr. Hammond's inferences or his facts; but they may profitably read and see what it is that they have to meet. Though, for that matter, we believe they no longer seek to join, battle with the men of science, but give over such to darkness of mind. And a great darkness it is in Dr. Hammond's case, his essay being sufficiently materialistic in tone to shock Miss Emma Hardinge into fits.

Mr. Charles L. Brace's "Darwinism in Germany," Miss Agnes Irwin's review of M. Tenot's "Paris en Décembre," the Rev. George Ellis's review of Mr. Parkman's "Discovery of the Great West," an article on "The Prospects of the Political Art," and four notices of late books, are the remaining contents of this number of the North American. The book-notices, few as they are, maintain the literary character of the quarterly, for each work examined is an important one, and the notices are of a very high order. Particularly worth attention is the review of Mr. Carew Hazlitt's "Library of Old Authors." Mr. Hazlitt has more than all his father's ill temper and arrogance of mind and very much less than his father's ability, and as he has chosen to work in a field where knowledge is essential and there is absolutely no place whatever for arrogance and impudence, it may be imagined how easily he is made a prey. He falls with such a great ruin on being touched with the pen of a man who is acquainted with his subject that one is at first inclined to be sorry for him, but it is only a moment's work to bethink one's self that he deserves all the castigation that he has skin enough to bear, and that it is a good work to give it to him; for not only has he always been full of insults to men infinitely better than himself, but some publisher on the other side of the water has him now in pay and is going to let him edit a library of reprints of old English authors—for which task—as is made evident by his North American reviewer—Mr. Hazlitt is less fit than the first day-laborer one might pick up in the street. The day-laborer would probably be content to print as they stand such texts as the publisher might give him, but as for Mr. Hazlitt he will add blunders of his own to the blunders that he finds in his texts; he will abuse every student of Early English who has had the luck to be born and to die before his appearance, and he will make notes of a degree of foolishness that will go far to reconcile even Mr. Henry Bohn to the existence of the gentleman who first robbed him and afterwards called him an ignoramus. Perhaps the reader who is ignorant of Mr. Hazlitt's character and habits will be inclined to think that his critic in the Review bears on a little too hard; but even such a reader will not fail to observe that nothing is said against the offender which does not carry with it instruction for third parties, so that the article is a lesson in literature as well as in morals.

The review of Ellis's "Early English Pronunciation" is another essay which will bear the examination and the close study of every one interested in the history of our tongue. Doubtless, however, the people will be few who will give their approbation to the writer's scheme for making Chaucer intelligible to the average general reader. Chaucer, as he is, is so good and so easy, that a person who is not willing to surmount such difficulties as he presents, is a person not capable of appreciating him. "Popularizing" Chaucer, if it is ever to be done, will be done not by making over the poet, but some of the rest of us.

The Hollands. By Virginia F. Townsend. (Boston: Loring. 1869.)—This is a trivial and commonplace story, of a kind which is found most often in the columns of the so called ladies' magazines. Like most of the women who are engaged in producing domestic love-stories of an unexciting if not of a soothing description, Miss Townsend appears to have read Mrs. Harding Davis's stories with a good deal of interest, and to have laid some of their worst lessons more closely to heart than was at all worth while. We suppose it is in great part owing to Mrs. Davis's studies in that direction that so many of our story-writers give us more than is quite agreeable in the way of facial and muscular contortions on the part of their characters—that they turn their faces gray with agony, "smite and choke and half smother" their voices with pain, and in other ways manage to disfigure them bodily and mentally without mercy. Miss Townsend, at all events, in mannerisms like these, recalls a model on whom she has not improved, and whom it would have been as well to study merely for the sake of avoiding her errors. In all other respects, "The Hollands" is about on the level, or perhaps a trifle below the ordinary level, of magazine stories.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Brooks (Rev. C. T.), Schiller's Homage of the Arts, and Other Translations	(James Miller)
Dryden's Poetical Works, Globe ed	(Macmillan & Co.)	$1 75
Froude (J. A.), History of England, Vols. IX., X	(C. Scribner & Co.)	2 50
Goddard (Julia), Baffled; or, Michael Brand's Wrong: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)
Hesekiel (J. G. L.), Life of Bismarck	"
Keary (A.), The Nations Around	(Macmillan & Co.)
Le Pileur (A.), Wonders of the Human Body	(C. Scribner & Co.)	1 50
Miles (Rev. H. A.), Traces of Picture-Writing in the Bible	(Little, Brown & Co.)
The New-Fashioned Girl: a Story of To-day	(James Miller)
Von Hillern (Wilhelmine), Only a Girl: a Tale	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

LIST OF

New Publications.

Mr. A. R. Wallace's Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection. A series of Essays. By the author of "The Malay Archipelago." Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

NEW VOLUME OF THE GLOBE EDITIONS.

The Poetical Works of John Dryden. Edited, with a Memoir, revised Text, and Notes. By W. D. Christie, M.A. Cloth, $1 75.

On Comparative Longevity in Man and the Lower Animals. By E. Ray Lankester, B.A. Cloth, $1 50.

The Nations Around. By A. Keary, author of Early Egyptian History. Forming Vol. IX. of the Sunday Library of Household Reading. With illustrations. $2.

NEW EDITION OF BISHOP TEMPLE'S SERMONS.

Sermons Preached in Rugby School Chapel. By the Right Rev. Frederick Temple, D.D. New edition. $1 50.

The Morning Land. By Edward Dicey. 2 vols. $5.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

63 Bleecker Street, New York.

Valuable English Works

JUST IMPORTED BY

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY.

Alpine Flowers for English Gardens. By W. Robinson, F.L.S., Author of "The Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris." 1 vol. 12mo, with numerous Illustrations, cloth, $6.

The Lyrics of Horace, done into English Rhyme. By T. C. Baring. 1 vol. square 12mo, cloth, $3 50.

Madagascar and its People. Notes of a Four Years' Residence. With a Sketch of the History, Position, and Prospects of Mission Work amongst the Malagasy. By James Sibree. 1 thick vol. 12mo, Engravings, cloth, $3 25.

Hand-book to the Grammar of the Greek Testament. Together with a complete Vocabulary, and an Examination of the chief New Testament Synonyms. 1 thick vol. 12mo, cloth, $3 75.

Ontology; or, Things Existing. By Sir John Ramsay. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

Lectures on the Science of Religion. By Max Müller. Lecture I. Now publishing in Frazer's Magazine. (To be in four numbers.) Each $1 25.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

MARK TWAIN,

The Great Humorist,

WRITES FOR

THE GALAXY

EVERY MONTH.

June Number will be out May 20.

SHELDON & COMPANY.

THE

New-Fashioned Girl.

A STORY OF TO-DAY.

1 vol. 12mo, cloth flexible, price 40 cents; paper, 30 cents.

For sale by principal Booksellers.
Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher,
647 Broadway, New York.

SCHILLER'S

HOMAGE OF THE ARTS.

With Miscellaneous Pieces. Translated by Charles T. Brooks. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, price $1 25.

NEW EDITION.

THE EXCURSION:

A POEM.

By William Wordsworth. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, price $1 25.

For sale by principal Booksellers. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher,
647 Broadway, New York.

OPERAS of Fra Diavolo, Massaniello, Crown Diamonds, Faust, Martha, Norma. Elegant uniform editions in small quarto size, containing TEXT and brilliant and effective (but not difficult) arrangements of the Overtures, and all the PRINCIPAL MUSIC, both for VOICE with ACCOMPANIMENT and for PIANO SOLO. Music finely engraved. Illustrated with beautiful STEEL AND COLORED PLATES AND WOOD ENGRAVINGS. Price $2 50 each, or $6 for three, or $10 for the six Operas. Sold by the principal Music Dealers, and by American Opera Publishing Co.,

19 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

 Circulars sent on application.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Letters on the American Rebellion.

BY S. A. GODDARD.

Five Dollars.

"You understand the American question as well as any one in Great Britain that I know of.
"CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS."

"Nothing more exact on the great struggle than your letters was written in England during the war.
"JOHN BRIGHT."

This Day Received by

NICHOLS & NOYES,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

NEW YORK: FELT & DILLINGHAM.

LECGAT BROTHERS.

Cheapest Book Store in the World.
Immense Prices paid for Old Books.
12,672 Magnificent Books
AT OUR PRICE.
53,472 Miscellaneous Books
AT YOUR PRICE.
67,432 Books, History, Biography, etc.,
AT ANY PRICE.

Catalogues Nos. 22, 23, 25, free. Send stamp.

3 BEEKMAN STREET.

Messrs. Putnam & Sons

Take pleasure in announcing that they have added to their business a Stationery Department, and are prepared to furnish the

Best Quality of American, English, and French

STATIONERY,

Business, Wedding, and Visiting Cards, etc.

Designs Furnished and Monograms cut in the latest and most tasteful styles.

They would also call attention to their SUPERIOR INITIALED STATIONERY, which is put up in Boxes, ranging in price from 40 cents to $3.

In addition to the above, we stamp any Stationery purchased from us, without charge.

☞ Particular and careful attention given to all orders received by mail.

Single Books or Libraries neatly bound, at moderate prices.

C. P. PUTNAM & SONS,
ASSOCIATION BUILDING,
Fourth Av. and Twenty-third St., New York.

Rare London Books,

IN ALL LANGUAGES AND EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE, SUITABLE FOR PRIVATE LIBRARIES AND PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

The attention of the literary public is respectfully requested to our extensive assortment of books, now offered for sale AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. The net prices are plainly marked in each volume, thus obviating the annoyance of pricing any work.

About due at this Port, and will open in a few days, a large and fine Invoice, carefully selected in the best foreign markets.

Importations by every steamer. Catalogues issued regularly and forwarded to any address, gratis, on application.

A. L. LUYSTER,
London, and 138 Fulton Street (Up Stairs),
NEW YORK,
ESTABLISHED 1840.

TO ORGANISTS!

A LONG-FELT NEED SUPPLIED.

CLARKE'S SHORT VOLUNTARIES
FOR THE PIPE OR REED ORGAN.

Designed chiefly as Opening Voluntaries and Responses for delicate and expressive stops. EASY AND PLEASING. Selected and arranged by WILLIAM H. CLARKE, Author of the "New Method for Reed Organs." Price, in boards, $1 50. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON, New York.

HENRY K. VAN SICLEN,

BIBLIOPOLE,

MONOGRAMS, VISITING AND WEDDING CARDS ENGRAVED.

133 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1870.

The Week.

THE folly of removing the National Capital received a temporary check on Wednesday week, when the Senate appropriated $500,000 towards a new building for the State Department, and a still further amount for an extension of the Capitol grounds. The Legislative Appropriation Bill was under consideration at the time, and the provision in it for the Educational Bureau was maintained against an attempt at reduction. On Friday, Mr. Sumner introduced a comprehensive bill to make it unlawful for color prejudice to be indulged by common carriers, innkeepers, managers of theatres and other places of amusement, officers or teachers of common schools, trustees of incorporated church and cemetery organizations and benevolent institutions; and to eradicate the word "white" from State and national legislation; with appropriate penalties. The House has discussed the decline of American commerce, a general amnesty, and the Tariff Bill, which it shelved on Monday, at the instance of Mr. Dawes, whose practice, though parliamentary and patriotic (as we take it to have been), was certainly calculated to enrage Mr. Schenck. The latter, to be sure, flattered himself outrageously when he stated that, if the bill could pass the House this session, it would pass the Senate next March. That was quite too refined a probability to justify wasting the two months yet left for work. On Monday, also, Mr. Bingham carried a bill to protect the colored voter under the Fifteenth Amendment.

The fate of the Tariff Bill seems, humanly speaking—in all that relates to the tariff and to Georgia one has to put in this qualification—to be sealed. Mr. Schenck has introduced a bill for the reduction of internal revenue taxes, to the extent of about $35,000,000 in all, and this rousing the interest of the House in new schemes, Mr. Dawes was successful in obtaining a postponement of the consideration of the tariff, for the purpose of dealing with the appropriation bills—only six weeks of the fiscal year now remaining. This is looked on as putting the passage of the Tariff Bill out of the question, and the high protectionists are not sorry, while the revenue reformers are, as enough reduction had been made in it to bring it much nearer to what most sensible men begin to acknowledge any tariff that is to stand must be. This is, however, a sorry result of five months' labor, especially when it is considered that we shall see the whole ground gone over again next December, and shall have the same treatises on protection and free trade from the same men, the same uncertainty, same recrimination, and same frantic struggle of opposing "interests." Mr. Schenck's reduction in the internal taxation repeals the tax on legacies and successions, which are probably as unobjectionable taxes as exist, both as regards the objects on which they fall and the facility of collecting them, and his removal of them, considering his reluctance to touch even the most outrageous portions of the tariff, suggests some interesting reflections as to what his theory of taxation is. He proposes to increase the exemption from the income tax to $1,500, and diminish its inquisitorial features, and prohibit the publication of incomes, all of which are improvements; and he righteously sweeps away a large number of small dues, which plagued far more than they profited, and have been the disgrace of our revenue system. The measure is, however, doubtless intended to serve the purpose of a sop to the revenue reformers, and to stop their grumbling, without making serious changes in the present tariff, which in default of anything better is to be made to serve another year.

The two Woman's Suffrage Associations—Mr. Beecher's and Mr. Tilton's—have been in session during the week in this city, all attempts to unite them having failed, owing to the obduracy of Mr. Beecher's Association, which monopolized not only nearly all the talent, but all the honors of the occasion, and the roar of whose heavy artillery at Steinway Hall almost completely drowned the barking of Mr. Tilton's small mountain guns up at Apollo Hall. "Fraternal salutations" were interchanged during the session, Mr. Tilton's surpassing in tenderness, Mr. Beecher's in dignity. That anything new was contributed to the discussion by either Association we are, however, unable to assert. The arguments used and the promises held out as to the results of the extension of the suffrage were much the same. The McFarland case had evidently stimulated the enthusiasm of several of the female orators, and though they were very anxious to avoid mixing up the suffrage with the sexual relation, it was quite evident that they were no nearer than the rest of the world to separating in their thoughts woman as a citizen from woman as a possible or actual wife and mother. Allusions to the case were frequently made; one lady lauded Horace Greeley for his devotion to the "fugitive wife," and Mrs. Stanton, who is one of the leaders of the movement, delivered a lecture on it, to women only, on Tuesday morning.

By-the-by, when Miss Noble, with the acuteness and perspicacity of whose criticisms on the drift of the movement we are more and more impressed every day, alleged in the Nation of June 20 that Jany.

> "The most cursory reader of the reports of woman's rights meetings in the newspapers must be struck with the tendency to two lines of false reasoning very prominent in the debaters, viz., the arguing from altogether special and accidental cases to universal rules; and, again, the sorting out into grievances redressible by civil law life's most intimate and awful woes, the catalogue of domestic sufferings, whose baffling problem is, that the very conditions which make their terror make also for the purest and best joy given to mortals, so that how to deliver from the one without jeopardizing the other, is the riddle yet unsolved"— the Woman's Journal accused us with great violence of "professional dishonesty" in representing her articles as having been written by a woman, as no woman would venture to assert that the woman's suffrage champions meant in any manner to meddle with or regulate marriage, or divorce, or the sexual relation. Our astonishment may therefore be guessed when we found in the same periodical, a few weeks ago, in a letter signed by some of its editors, and addressed to Mr. Theodore Tilton, the fact that the New York Suffrage Association had undertaken the discussion of marriage and divorce, and deficiency of offspring, given as one of the reasons why the Cleveland Association had been founded.

We now venture to assert that the Cleveland Association will, as it extends its organization, find it impossible to keep clear of the very same topics; that they are already cropping out in its debates, and for the simple reason that its recruits are and will be largely drawn from that vast body of persons, of both sexes, to whom the yoke of the institution of marriage, as at present established, is irksome, and who believe that a freer gratification of individual desires ought to be provided for by law. We affirm, moreover, that the exclusion from the discussion of woman's condition, in a country so slenderly governed by tradition and habits as this is, and in which all discussion takes inevitably the widest possible range, of everything relating to her functions as a female, is not possible, and would not be expedient if it were possible; that, as long as she has to perpetuate the human species by child-bearing and nursing, those who propose to better her lot must make up their minds to deal openly, boldly, and persistently with her sexual relations, for to this they are sure to be driven eventually. We call attention to this matter because we believe the attempt to carry on the movement with a false bottom is full of danger, and helps to hide from the able and respectable leaders of the movement—of whom there are a great many—the real weight of the responsibility they are assuming. We must have no patched-up settlement of this matter, and no rearrangement of the relations of men and women in which sexual passion is ignored, and which is based on the theory that when a wife desires to quit a husband, or a husband a wife it is presumptively because he or she wants opportunities for a "broader development," or "a more perfect spiritual union," or "a closer communion with a kindred soul," or "a freer interchange of his or her deepest experiences."

Owing, we believe, to the culpable failure of the jury to indicate by their verdict whether they acquitted McFarland on the ground of insanity, he was discharged unconditionally, and is now at large. One of the humors of the affair is that Dr. W. A. Hammond, who gave the most interesting testimony at the trial with regard to insanity, has since lectured on him, and declares that he is liable to another or other attacks of mania; and, indeed, there is no reason why he should not have as many manias as he has enemies, until, at last, he can proudly say that he has not a foe above ground. A petition is circulating in Brooklyn, asking the Governor to shut him up, but we suppose the Governor neither will nor can do anything of the kind. His wife, the day after the verdict, published in the Tribune a long, elaborate, and highly-wrought account of her married life, showing it to have been utterly miserable, owing to McFarland's violence of temper, habitual drunkenness, improvidence, and poverty, which has had a great circulation, and, combined with the acquittal, has excited an outburst of sympathy for her. Its force as evidence is weakened by the letters from her which McFarland has been publishing in reply, and which, written during this period of unutterable woe, are full of the most extravagant expressions of affection for him, and acknowledgments of his kindness and thoughtfulness. Moreover, although it alleges McFarland to have been an habitual drunkard, and to have been in the habit of changing his boarding-house nearly once a week through long years, nobody, of the dozens of boarders and boarding-house keepers who must have been cognizant of his excesses, was produced at the trial to testify to either his drunkenness or his violence. Still, after all allowances have been made, there is enough to show that it was a wretched marriage, and ought never to have lasted so long.

But it was only a specimen of a large class; thousands of wives all over the country are passing their lives in abject misery, trying to rear in boarding-houses the children of that large army of ne'er-do-weels who spend their time roving about in the cars, with a carpet-bag and a shawl, and passing nearly every week into a new trade, and succeeding in none—editing newspapers, speculating in land, taking photographs, manufacturing hair-pins or hoop-skirts, and, above all, peddling inventions and patent rights, which is their darling occupation. In the political campaigns they take a turn on the stump, and, when hard pressed by fate, retire for a brief season to the Custom-house, where they gather fresh strength and ideas for new wanderings and failures. McFarland, in the midst of his brutalities, had no difficulty in getting warm recommendations for office from Messrs. Sinclair and Greeley. The Evening Post has made a better attempt to furnish the rationale of the popular excitement over his case than any we have seen; and it is in substance this: not only is the appetite for "sensations" intense, but there is a class of persons in the community who carry their moral judgment almost entirely in their lachrymal glands, and are always sure that anybody they can cry over must be a saint. Accordingly, when Richardson was shot down, they went and wept by his bedside; McFarland then being put on trial for his life, they went and wept with him over his "desolate home," to which Mr. Graham made such touching Latin allusions, though where the home was or ever had been there was no evidence to show; McFarland being acquitted and safe, if not sound, Mrs. McFarland appeared on the scene with her statement, and now they are weeping over her. Had he been convicted, she would probably be an object of intense execration. Of course, we do not mean to say that the same persons pass through these alternations of feeling, but simply that they all belong to the same category.

The news of the passage of the Woman's Suffrage Bill to a second reading in the House of Commons excited a good deal of rejoicing amongst the friends of the movement both here and in England. As might have been expected, however, the incident was mainly valuable as an advertisement. Wednesday, the day on which the vote took place, is the equivalent of the Saturday sessions of "the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union" in Washington, and is generally given up to bores and visionaries. Moreover, the House was, as usual on that day, very thin, and the bill was sure to be defeated by a large majority if any attempt had been made to push it to a third reading. The measure was killed a few days later, without difficulty, on the motion of its enemies. Its friends would doubtless have been very well content to sleep on their laurels. It would, however, have only applied to unmarried female taxpayers. The suffrage movement of late has been unfortunate too in this country. It has been checked in Vermont by a popular vote against the introduction of a female-suffrage clause in the constitution; and in Illinois the Constitutional Convention has on reconsideration refused to submit the question to the people, influenced, it is said, mainly by the arguments of one of its lady opponents. We believe these reverses are in great part due to the feeling which the continued discussion is developing that the questions raised by the agitation go far deeper than the distribution of the political sovereignty, and the mass of the community shrinks therefore from attempting to deal with them. But the whole matter is in the hands of women themselves.

While the freight business of the Pacific Railroad has not immediately answered expectations in regard to it, the road's importance as a national highway is daily increasing. The latest result of it is the establishment of regular steam communication with Australia. The Wonga-Wonga, which left Sydney on the 26th of March, and Auckland on the 4th of April, inaugurated the line, and at Honolulu connected with the Idaho, which reached San Francisco on the 5th of May. Almost all the passengers were on their way to England, and the trip from Sydney to Liverpool was for them a rather agreeable and highly diversified excursion of less than sixty days. There is little doubt that this route will be preferred to all others between Europe and the South Pacific, at least so far as shortness is concerned; but it may be questioned whether it will tend to knit the bonds of the British colonies and the mother country. The mail service must create among us an interest in Australian affairs which cannot be said to have existed hitherto, any more than Australia has cared much for what was going on in the United States. We may also naturally anticipate an interchange between the mines of the Pacific coast and those of the colony, and with the wares and tools which we shall send out there, will go not a few skilled workmen, and many adventurers and speculators. Our political ideas will travel thither by the same course, and that they will have some effect is already predicted. The Taranaki (New Zealand) Herald, which arrived here by the first direct mail, talks openly of "New Zealand seeking relationship with America," and declares that that colony is practically severed from Great Britain in consequence of imperial neglect, and that it is henceforth to draw its commercial advantages from the United States, with a fair chance of imbibing its republican notions.

In spite of the excitement produced in England by the Greek massacres, none of the wild schemes of revenge proposed at the outset by a portion of the press seems to have met with popular favor. Indeed, Lord Clarendon made all high-handed measures impossible by his offer to the brigands, at the execution of which the Greek Government agreed to wink, not only to pay them the ransom, but to get over the amnesty difficulty by conveying the whole band in a British man-of-war to Malta—probably, on the whole, as complete a bit of baseness as a high officer of a great state was ever guilty of, and which, there can be little question, was due to the social position of two of the captives. When Mr. Moens was captured, and held for two months by the Italian brigands, they were hunted vigorously the whole time by the Italian troops, the British Government looking calmly on, and he was left to pay his own ransom; and, what is more, the Italian Government refused to reimburse him, and the British Government refused to back his claim; but Mr. Moens was unknown "in society."

The Greek Government appears to have been actuated in breaking its engagement not to pursue the brigands partly by the desire of avoiding the repayment of the ransom, which it felt would be demanded, as it had undertaken to escort the travellers, and partly by the hope of escaping a collision with "the opposition," which, as M. Zaïmis, the Prime Minister, explained to the British Minister, was believed to be at the bottom of the whole thing. One of the captured brigands declares that the news of the projected excursion was communicated to them by an unknown person from Athens, and that two persons in masks, whom the chief treated with great respect, came out after the negotiations had been opened to urge them to insist on an amnesty. The brigands appear to be simply a portion of a gang of seven hundred cut-throats and vagabonds who went to Crete as volunteers during the insurrection and were brought back at its close, and then "went into politics" as highway robbers. The utter demoralization of the political class in Greece could hardly be better illustrated than by the fact that "the opposition" in the Parliament is usually at least believed to be in a league with the footpads, who make it impossible to take a walk on the road five miles from the king's palace. The army and the people seemed really put to shame by this last performance, and the troops pursued the brigands with great fury. If it were not for the promise not to pursue given by the Minister of War, and the long previous connivance at the exploits of the robbers, nobody could blame the Greek Government for what it did. A government cannot treat with thirty cut-throats at the gates of its own capital without loss of self-respect, and without breaking down all popular confidence in the law; and sad as was the fate of the unhappy gentlemen who were ruthlessly and uselessly butchered, their safety would, under ordinary circumstances, have been a secondary consideration. One of the most curious things about the condition of Greece is that as shrewd a people as the Greeks are do not see the enormous amounts of money they might bring into the country every year if they only made it safe and attractive to travellers. They have only to look at the revenue Switzerland draws from tourists to see what a paying operation it would be to hang their brigands, equip a good police, and open a few roads. Their soil is holy ground to the educated men of the civilized world, and would swarm with pilgrims; but the interior is now hardly more accessible to Christians than Mecca or Bokhara. It is estimated that, on a moderate calculation, the brigands have levied on the peasantry about $30,000 since February last, and they have taken about $100,000 in ransoms.

The Winnipeg rebellion has had a singular termination. The Canadian Government has conceded to the insurgents nearly everything they asked for, and, amongst other things, the autonomy of "the province" which they have created, and the control of the public lands. Riel, who was, a month or two ago, a windy, vaporing rebel, who was certainly to be hanged for his brutal murder of Scott—and, if the deliberate killing of a human being, without the slightest necessity, be murder, that was certainly a very foul one—has lived to see his agents received as respectable diplomatists, and with them the statesmen of the New Dominion have treated on a footing, if not of equality, at least of what is as good as equality. The armed force, therefore, which the Michigan authorities refused to allow to go through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, is reduced to the character of a surveying party, and the one chance of waging war that will probably ever offer itself to Canada has passed away. The New York Times taunts the Fenians in a most unseemly manner for not having taken the field before the unpleasantness was over, apparently not being aware that the Republic has just gone into a new house in Brooklyn, and is having it scrubbed and the carpets fitted. The departure of its armies for the frontier is therefore for the present impossible.

The Independent has applied to Mr. Niles G. Parker, the State Treasurer of South Carolina, for a refutation of the statement we made some weeks ago that eighty-odd members of the State Legislature could neither read nor write; and he has furnished it in the shape of an assertion "that he thinks there was not one who could not read, and only three who could not sign their names," and one of these refrained, he believes, from that ceremony, when receipting for their pay, on account of dimness of sight, and the other two "in the hurry of receiving pay." We made that statement on the authority of a gentleman—a Republican, we may mention—of the highest character, who has just been making a thorough examination of the condition of affairs in South Carolina for business purposes. We have, however, taken measures to procure more testimony, and when we obtain it we shall take the matter up again. The Independent "is curious to see how we shall meet this prompt rebuttal of our wholesale charges." When we get a "rebuttal" of our charges, we shall do what the Independent will perhaps consider a very funny thing—viz., acknowledge frankly that we were totally wrong. Our informant took testimony on the point in a great variety of quarters, and he says the statements made to him by white men "were quite confirmed by intelligent colored men, who were earnest Radicals, but who greatly regretted the class of entirely uneducated negroes who had been sent to Columbia, as tending to degrade the freedmen in the eyes of the public, and bring them into contempt." "That a larger proportion," he adds, "than you have stated of the members of the last South Carolina Legislature went to Columbia unable to read and write, I have no manner of doubt. You will remember that until within five years it was a punishable offence in that State to teach a colored person to read. The natural ambition of these men, and the strong desires of their friends, may very likely have led them to pick up a few words, and to learn to write their names after a fashion, after they took their seats." We hope in a few days, however, to have additional evidence. It must be remembered that we are now talking of the legislators of a civilized State, possessing the power to vote away their neighbors' property almost without stint, and to pledge the credit of the State for millions—and not of hod-carriers.

The long-talked-of, much-discussed, and with-great-difficulty-arranged match between the American yacht Sappho and the English yacht Cambria has ended in a complete muddle, and we shall probably now have once more one yard of correspondence for every mile sailed. There were to be three heats, and in the first the Sappho won easily. The Cambria made some alterations in her bowsprit in preparation for the second, but asked the umpires in vain for "a dead beat to windward," instead of a "half-point off the wind," and, growing sulky under pressure, refused to start, so the Sappho walked over the course. On the merits of the question we are not competent to express an opinion, but it certainly seems as if a fair yacht race were one of the hardest things in the world to arrange. In horse-racing, the one inequality which has to be provided for is age, and this is readily met by weight; but yacht-racing seems to be somewhat like a race between lions, tigers, dromedaries, elephants, and buffaloes, and to tell whether the conditions of the race have been exactly the same for each competitor requires an amount of study, calculation, and familiarity with two or three sciences which few men possess, and yachting men apparently never, if we may judge from the length and unsatisfactory termination of their disputes.

M. Ollivier, as Minister of Justice, has published an official report on the alleged conspiracy against the life of the Emperor, by way of answer to the charges so freely made, and generally believed, that it was what is called in the New York police courts a "put-up job," intended to help the plébiscite. He says the Government was on the track of the conspirators so long ago as October, but dropped the investigation in order not to excite suspicions of using it as an "electoral intrigue;" but, finding that the conspirators went on with their arrangements, and were going to carry out their design on or before May 8, the police were again put in motion, with the result already known. A young man named Beaury, a tool, apparently, of Gustave Flourens, who is in London, has been arrested, and he it is who was to throw the bombs, which were to contain nitro-glycerine, and were calculated to put out of suffering everybody within thirty yards of the spot on which they fell. Twenty-one bombs in all have been discovered. Other persons appear to have been connected with the conspiracy, but Flourens and Beaury are apparently the two principal actors. In the correspondence the explosion is spoken of as an "amputation," the Emperor as "the poor sufferer," and the cost of preparing to blow him up as "the expenses of this sad illness." What with the conspiracy and the majority of the plébiscite, the Emperor appears to be in high feather.

THE END AT LAST.

THERE are two bills now before Congress which, if the Reconstruction process be capable of completion, ought to complete it. One provides for the execution of the Fifteenth Amendment, by forbidding, under the sanction of appropriate penalties, all attempts, direct or indirect, and either of omission or commission, to prevent colored persons entitled to the franchise from exercising it. Another, introduced by Mr. Sumner, provides for the admission of colored persons on equal terms to all hotels, public conveyances, licensed theatres and places of public amusement, and public institutions; and he admits that, if this be passed, there will be nothing left undone that legislation can do to improve the condition of the colored man. We hope they will both be passed without any unnecessary delay. There are so many ways of cheating people out of their votes, and there are so many voters whom it is easy to cheat, that we may be sure, in a large number of places, negroes would, by one trick or other, be robbed of their share in elections, no matter how solemnly guaranteed to them by the Constitution, unless the various modes of defrauding them were enumerated, punishment prescribed for each, and the exact mode of getting it inflicted pointed out.

As regards Mr. Sumner's bill, nobody who knows how a prejudice feeds upon itself—that is, how readily the doing of a thing presents itself to many people's minds as a justification for doing it—will have much to say against it. Nobody denies that if there were no prejudice against color it would be a great gain for the country, and any attempt to diminish it by legislation which does not seem likely to do anything to increase it, is certainly worth trying. It is not possible to allow keepers of public conveyances to shut people out from any accommodation to which their money would otherwise entitle them on account of their complexion, without acknowledging that our equality before the law is a mockery. and we know, as the result of actual experiment in various parts of the country, that the objection to riding with colored people in the cars and stages is a mere whim. When we propose to force hotel-keepers and managers of theatres to admit them on equal terms, we get, naturally, on more delicate ground, and ground on which the law may be more readily evaded, and that it would be evaded somehow we do not doubt; but evading it would be troublesome and expensive, often fully as much so as obeying it, and we have very little doubt that before long landlords and managers both would succeed in persuading white gentlemen and ladies that there really was no strong objection to staying in the same hotel, or enjoying one's self at the same theatre, with colored people, from whom the same guaranties for dress and behavior had been exacted as from the rest of the company.

But then it does seem as if two such measures, which even the most exacting of Radicals acknowledge to be all that can be asked for, ought, in order to ensure their efficiency, to be accompanied by a general restoration of the South to its normal condition; or, in other words, to the government of the majority of its inhabitants. We have no desire to exaggerate the evils of the existing state of things, and have no great pity for the "leading citizens" who are now atoning for the folly of twenty years by temporary subjection to the rule of their former slaves. Those who play high must not whimper if they lose heavily. But then the Government of the United States has something to think of besides either punishing the whites for their treason or rewarding the blacks for their fidelity. The interests of civilization and of good government at the South are in its keeping, and there is no question whatever that both are suffering deeply—not by the accession of the colored people, but by the accession of ignorant people, to power—and may suffer irretrievably, if the present régime be protracted much longer. It is not possible any longer to confine any political or social evil to a particular State. With our present habits and means of intercommunication, everything spreads all over the country, the good as well as the bad. No State can keep its corruption or its bad character, any more than its virtue, to itself; and the seeds of the vices and disorders we suffer to flourish in South Carolina and Louisiana, we may be sure, will be wafted before long further north, and find a fruitful soil enough. The more legislatures we have accessible to temptation, the larger the class of jobbers who live by tempting legislators grows, and the wider the belief that all legislators are corrupt, and may be expected to be corrupt, spreads.

We have spoken several times in these columns of the grossness of the disorders in which the government of several States is plunged in the hands of the negroes and carpet-baggers, gathering our opinions simply from newspaper articles and correspondence and occasional private advices. Very recently, business men of the highest character, both from this city and from Boston, have been examining the state of things there with reference to investments both for themselves and their friends, and, of course, one of the very first things to which their attention was turned was the governmet, for government means taxation, and on the manner and amount and application of taxation depend the rate of profits, the prospects of immigration, and the probability of internal improvements. No man will willingly invest much capital in a State whose revenues he has reason to believe will be squandered, or credit destroyed, or whose legislation cannot be depended on for a reasonable degree of uniformity and honesty. Now the reports of these gentlemen—and the two we have in our eye have been ardent Republicans and supporters of the Reconstruction policy of Congress, and do not believe any other policy was possible or desirable—describe things as being nearly as bad as bad can be. The effect on the freedman of the spectacle of large bodies of his fellows in a state of the grossest ignorance put suddenly in possession of the government of great, civilized, and wealthy communities, is of course as demoralizing as the sudden discovery of a parcel of diamonds, and just as likely to turn his mind away from steady industry, and to destroy his faith in the political value of knowledge. But this is not the worst of it. Their management of the State funds has been such, and is such, as to endanger American credit everywhere, to frighten away capital, and make general bankruptcy at some not very distant day by no means improbable. Moreover, no society was ever long subjected to such a régime without suffering in its very vitals, without finding the stock of honor, truth, decency, and patriotism on which it has to draw every now and then, to carry it through exciting times, greatly and perhaps fatally diminished.

The remedy for all this is to pass an act of general amnesty, and leave every community to its natural action. Let whatever there is of intelligence in it resume its natural weight. It is as much the interest of the negro as of the white man—indeed, far more the interest of the negro than of the white man—that the States should be well governed, and most of the political talent and experience is in the hands of white men, who are either disfranchised themselves, or so disgusted by the disfranchisement of their friends, that they will take no part at present in political affairs. No closing of the Reconstruction process will be safe or real which does not give them their natural influence on the government; artificial influence they have lost for ever; but of the other it is an offense against civilization to deprive them.

JURY MORALITY.

SUCH a failure of justice as occurred in the McFarland case, shocking as it was, would be of some value to the community if it would lead to something more practical than lamentations in the newspapers over the indulgence of juries for certain classes of crimes. There are signs, such as the adoption of the Judiciary Amendment to the Constitution, the new election law, and the formation of the Bar Association of this city, that the popular interest in questions of legal reform begins to revive in this State, and that there will hereafter be more use in calling attention to defects in our jurisprudence than there has been for some years past. Nearly everybody has at last got over the delusion that the election of all officers by "the people" is a cure-all; we shall before long get over the sister delusion that giving everybody the ballot is a cure-all; and then we shall be able to go to work to improve our condition by rational methods.

In the meantime, we wish to call attention to the fact that the tame acquiescence of the bench, the bar, and the press in such verdicts as was rendered in the McFarland case, is really cherishing and spreading the false notions both of public and private morality from which these verdicts flow. The origin of the impunity now accorded to murders committed by men whose female relatives have been seduced, is simply the concession made, we believe, by all systems of law, in all ages, to men who commit murder in a sudden burst of passion. A man who killed his wife's paramour was let go free if he killed him flagrante delicto—human nature being supposed incapable of resisting so great provocation. This rule has, however, under the influence of popular sympathy with men who "have had their homes broken up," and of weeping lawyers, and rhetorical newspaper denunciations of adultery, grown into the monstrous doctrine, which now seems to have got a firm foothold amongst juries, that a man may murder another whom he suspects of having taken his wife from him, whenever he pleases; that he need not do it on a sudden impulse or in a passion; but may talk over it, and brood over it, and dog his victim for years, and finally carry out his design whenever he finds it convenient. The plea of insanity, too, by which murders are now so frequently excused, is receiving similar and dreadful amplification. Thirty years ago, a man who killed another had to show that he was stark mad, in other words, a notorious and unmistakable lunatic, in order to be covered by the plea of insanity. Now, he has only to act peculiarly, or, in other words, by dint of dwelling on a particular subject, work himself into a sort of monomania about it, as the wisest and calmest man in the community may do if he pleases, in order to get himself released from all legal responsibility for his acts, however bloody or atrocious they may be; and the symptoms of insanity have, in the hands of mad doctors, been worked up into a system of extreme delicacy and complexity, in which one of the obscurest of all fields of human investigation is elaborately mapped out and placed before ignorant jurymen with as much confidence as the plan of a house or a topographical survey. Worse than all, in the Cole-Hiscock case the bench made to the theory the startling addition that there is such a thing as momentary madness—so that at ten o'clock a man may be responsible for all his acts; at ten seconds past ten, mad as a hatter, and commit a murder with impunity; and at ten o'clock and fifteen seconds be again perfectly sane—and the jury accepted this ruling, and acted on it.

Now, where is this to end? If the juryman's anxiety about female chastity should continue to develop, and the symptoms of insanity continue to multiply, at the same rate as during the past twenty years, what security will any of us have for his life or limbs? What with the injured husbands and the crazy men, not one of us will, as things are now going, feel any strong certainty, on going out any morning, that he will not be brought home on a stretcher in the evening with two or three holes in his head. From the enraged husbands of course every man has an easy means of escape, but from crazy men nobody who has in the course of his business to offend or annoy anybody can have any security whatever.

Of course we do not mean to say that anything the bench or bar or press can do can change the nature of jurymen, but then there is one way in which something may be done to make their decisions less farcical or injurious in a certain class of criminal cases, and that is the closer regulation by legislation of what may be submitted to them. "Judicial discretion" used to be a thing to which the legislature could trust a great deal, but of late years it is evident that the less there is left to it, the better. It has been found necessary, for instance, to interfere with it in the matter of granting injunctions and appointing receivers; and, since the charge in the Cole case, and the trial in the McFarland case of the charge of "conspiracy" against the writers for the New York Tribune, it seems pretty evident we need some such changes in the criminal procedure as will greatly narrow the field of enquiry over which the juryman's mind may be permitted to roam. For instance, it would unquestionably not be a bad plan to follow the suggestion Governor Alcorn has made to the Legislature of Mississippi, and deprive juries of all cognizance of the plea of insanity, and make it triable either by competent judges or by a medical tribunal, whose decision should on this point be final. This would prevent many great scandals, and put a check on one class of crimes which we are afraid will, under the present system, grow rapidly.

As regards other restrictions to be imposed on juries, in cases like that of McFarland, in which they are likely to make themselves the exponents simply of popular passion, and totally disregard the judge's ruling as well as the evidence, there are two things which might be done. One is, modify the rule of "twice in jeopardy," and make a man triable again, when the jury disregard their oaths, just as he is when they disagree. Of course, this would have to be done with caution, and the power of ordering it should be reserved to the full bench. Excited juries, who have been worked up into a half-frenzy by fights and weepings among the lawyers, and by intense popular interest in the trial, and muddled by ponderous masses of evidence, afford no more protection to life and property than a mob. Readiness to acquit persons who commit murder, in obedience to popular impulse, is just as dangerous as readiness to hang persons who have not committed murder.

The other is the imposition on the judge of some stringent rules as to what he will allow to go to the jury. It must be remembered that our "rules of evidence," as they are called, have no basis in the constitution of the human mind. They are simply a set of contrivances to make the demand on the mental powers of juries, mostly untrained men, as small as possible. They do not exist, or anything like them, in any system of law in which causes are tried by professional judges. For instance, in France, hearsay is received just as readily as direct evidence, and so it ought to be; for, though its proving power may be less strong than that of direct evidence, it has some proving power. But our law very properly shuts out from the juryman's eye all testimony the value of which it is supposed he could not readily estimate, even at the risk of a failure of justice. It allows nothing to go before him which has not a direct bearing on the issue, while, if the trial were a logical process, everything that had the remotest connection with the issue would be laid before him.

Now, in these sentimental murder cases, he is probably in a less judicial frame of mind than he ever is at any other period of his life, and, therefore, needs more of the protection of the court. What those rules ought to be a newspaper is hardly the place to discuss. It is strictly a lawyer's subject, and every lawyer who has paid attention to the trials of sentimental cases will have plenty of suggestions to offer as to the best mode of narrowing the issue, so as to get out of the juryman the least possible amount of his passions and prejudices and the greatest possible amount of his common-sense and his respect for law. For instance, when the plea of insanity is set up, as in the McFarland case, a jury ought not to be allowed to render a verdict of acquittal without saying whether it was rendered on the ground of insanity or not. Had they done so in McFarland's case, he might have been, we believe, shut up. As it is, he is at large, and is believed to be insane, and has committed one murder, and is pronounced by the first authority in this city, on this class of subjects, to be likely to have another attack of acute mania or something like it, and yet there is apparently no way of getting him put under restraint unless he should commit another murder. The very helplessness, too, with which the community submits to such verdicts, which all declare outrage the moral sense and encourage crime, naturally spreads and stimulates the feeling that it is the business of the juryman to express, not the sober second thought of the community, but its first hot thought, and to drown the sense of responsibility for the manner in which jury duty is performed. We moan and groan over the folly and wickedness of such verdicts, but treat them as if they were oracles which there was no gainsaying, and that once we had empanelled twelve men and sworn them to decide according to the evidence, the public had no more to do with the affair than with the thunder or the rain. It is, therefore, not unnatural that when an ignorant and stupid man finds himself charged with a case, he should feel perfectly authorized to substitute his own rough notion of what he would do under like circumstances both for the enactments of the legislature and the rulings of the judge.

VASSAR COLLEGE.

FINDING ourselves, after some years of humble and attentive consideration of what many excellent men and women say at conventions touching the value of the suffrage as a means of improving the moral and material condition of the female sex, unable to see any reason for changing our belief that, on the whole, the prizes of life will always go to the strong hand and strong brain, and that the weak and the stupid, or both, will always in this world have an uncomfortable existence, as long as the social organization is based on individual liberty; and that there is nothing more mysterious or incredible in difference in the powers of the sexes than in difference in the powers of individual men; and being, in common with the vast majority of our sex (the male), firmly resolved to resist to the death, on foot, on horseback, and in steamboat, and with all weapons, ancient and modern, any attempt which ill-advised reformers may make to base the social organization on anything but individual liberty, or to compel us to divide our honest earnings with either Jim Fisk or Daniel McFarland, or with distressed needlewomen or oppressed wives, in accordance with any laws but the laws of trade and the laws for the relief of the destitute poor—we feel the greatest interest in all efforts to improve woman's chances in the race of life which recognize that life is a race, and not a ride in a State omnibus.

Under the influence of this feeling, we went up recently, unsolicited, to Vassar College, in this State, and asked the permission of the authorities to look on at the institution in its ordinary working days, and were at once allowed to plunge into every department, and, indeed, we may say, every nook and corner of it, ask whatever questions we chose, and put what construction we pleased on what we saw and heard. We watched and listened and enquired with two beliefs constantly in our mind: one is, that any system of education for women which seems likely to render them less fit to practise what we may call the social arts—that is, to cultivate the gifts and graces, the ways of thinking, speaking, dressing, eating, walking, which distinguish civilized from barbarous life, and which make a drawing-room, with its owner, a refined woman, sitting in it, one of the fairest scenes, the holiest, happiest, and purest, that human progress has produced—no matter what else it may do for her, is a failure and an offence. Refined homes are the end of civilization. All the work of the world—the railroading, navigating, digging, delving, manufacturing, inventing, teaching, writing, fighting, are done, first of all, to secure each family in the quiet possession of its own hearth; and, secondly, to surround as many hearths as possible with grace and culture and beauty. The work of all races for five thousand years is represented in the difference between a wigwam and a lady's parlor. It has no better result to show. The second belief was that, no matter what Congress or the State legislatures may do, the physical fact of sex will always weigh heavily on women as a class, if they ever attempt to compete with men as a class, and that, therefore, their education must be at least as careful and thorough as men's; and that girls cannot, in these times of incessant speculation about the very bases of society, be brought one minute too soon face to face with the fact that, if they mean to contend for all the prizes of life, they must submit in all things to the rules of the game; and the first of those rules is this, that the person who knows most, and has had the best preparation, and has strongest brains, and best digestion, and can in the greatest number of days in the year approach his or her work with the steadiest pulse, shall have the highest place; that there are no allowances made for age or weakness; and that there is not a single place in the world on which the wearied or wasted can fall back for shelter or refreshment, except the custom-house, and this only in the United States.

Vassar College, too, was interesting to us as an attempt to solve on a greater scale the dormitory difficulty, which, as we pointed out some weeks ago, is the very first difficulty which a young girl has to encounter in seeking a university education. She cannot be flung down in a strange city and left to provide lodgings as best she can, nor will such lodgings as would suit young men very well do for her, because she might be very well lodged for all the purposes of material comfort and yet be exposed to influences which would deprive her, at the age when her character and tastes are forming, of the social training which is necessary to fit her for what we consider, as we have said already, that greatest of women's functions, the government of households. Vassar College lodges all its students, and thus they are constantly exposed, though in the enjoyment of as complete liberty as is consistent with the fact of being in another person's house, to whatever influences are uppermost in the place. In other words, they are constantly taking its tone. We are all sensible, in the case of young men, that the value of a college education lies only in a small degree in the amount of positive knowledge it communicates; that a very large part of its usefulness lies in its giving the student his first taste of liberty, and his first knowledge of the strength and weakness of his own character, and his first chance of finding out by actual experiment what rank he is likely to occupy in the generation in which his lot is cast—that dread experiment on which all enter so joyfully at sixteen, and from which most issue so sadly at forty—resigned, if not satisfied. Perhaps one of the hardest features in woman's lot, hitherto, is that she has been carefully denied the opportunity of trying it; and after a youth passed at home, among admiring friends, and under the flattering eyes of a fond if not foolish mother, enters on life with a thousand dreams and longings and aspirations, and a thousand delusions about her own powers, of which a few years of sharp and real competition and attrition with her contemporaries would have delivered her, and in delivering would have strengthened her.

Unless we were greatly mistaken, we saw plenty of signs at Vassar of the good results of passing in hard work, amidst a great crowd of competitors, the four years usually given up by young women to lovers, novels, music, visits to young friends, and the desultory and rather soporific process called "study" or "course of reading" at home. We believe we never before met so many really simple, unaffected, unconscious young ladies as we saw there. They had acquired what we may be forgiven for calling the sober masculine air of people who have business to do and are quite equal to it, and are too much occupied with it to have time or attention for anything else. This was very manifest in their demeanor both in the classes and elsewhere, and it was so striking as to go far in our minds towards refuting the theory of the constitutional preoccupation of woman with her own appearance. At all events, it went far to prove the power of training to conceal this preoccupation without depriving us of any of its results. For its results were there. There was nothing in dress or manners to make anybody fear that any of the graces of life were going to suffer from the experiment; nay, there were plenty of signs that it was likely to give homes what they have perhaps wanted most of all—the dignity of strength—the repose that comes of knowing exactly where one stands, and what one can achieve. We were, moreover, impressed greatly by the voices and the reading and speaking. Any college which teaches what an excellent thing in a woman a sweet voice is, the depth of the charm that lies in clear and carefully modulated enunciation, will confer an enormous benefit on American society; and we think we can venture to say that Vassar College is doing it, and is sending out every year a hundred women to whose talk it will be pleasure to listen, if not for the sense at least for the sound; and how it accomplishes this we discovered by looking on at most careful and apparently most successful drill in the elocution class.

We must add, too, that the physical results of the training seemed everything that could be wished, so far as they were indicated by the appearance of the girls and by the reports of the doctor. A more robust, plump, and rosy company than the three hundred and seventy we have never seen seated in one room, and one could readily understand how it should be so on considering the purity of the air and the abundance of the temptations to exercise out of doors, in the shape of gardening, rowing, skating, walking, and riding on horseback, to say nothing of regular and compulsory gymnastics three times a week under a lady teacher. We doubt very much whether any institution in the world has ever offered young girls such a chance of combining the physical with mental culture. There are no rules, except that each student must attend the recitations, and be prepared for them, rise and retire at certain hours, and behave like a lady; while in all that regards health, manners, dress, and the minor as well as greater morals, she has an adviser, who stands in loco matris, in the person of the Lady Principal.

As regards the quality of the instruction, we hesitate about basing praise on an amount of observation on which we should not feel warranted in basing censure; but all that we saw impressed us most favorably. The answering, translating, and demonstrating which we witnessed were done in a style which we have never seen surpassed by young men of the same standing, and in the treatment of some subjects—in readiness and cleancutness and dexterity in expression—the superiority to young men was very perceptible. Moreover, we thought we saw evidence of women's superior conscientiousness, in the absence of all attempts to fumble with questions, or taking random shots at them when an avowal of complete ignorance was clearly the only proper way of meeting them. There was one thing, too, plain to be seen in every class, and we were going to say, on every face, and it is something which it must be confessed one rarely sees a trace of among boys, but which one can hardly see on girlish faces without feeling a lump rise in one's throat, for there is infinite pathos in it: and that is the look of earnest desire to make the very most of this day and this hour and this teacher, of gratitude for all these advantages, of intense eagerness that whatever sacrifice has been made to put the girl here, shall not be wholly fruitless. One looked in vain for a reckless or idle or indifferent countenance.

How much this, or institutions like it, will do to open new fields of employment to women, or fit them to compete with men in the various trades and professions, is a matter about which everybody will have his own opinion, and everybody's opinion must for the present be speculative. It is quite certain, however, that everybody is the better of a careful education, no matter what his or her course in life is to be; and even if woman's sphere should never be very different from what it is now, there is enough work to be done inside of it, and as important and delicate work, too, as the world has to show, to make women's colleges always amongst the most important institutions in existence. Helplessness, want of self-confidence, want of knowledge of one's self, the nervous feebleness that comes of want of intellectual method, are just as serious evils in the mother of a family as in a member of the bar; and it is indeed a far greater evil for the community to have women "decline housekeeping," through sheer incapacity, than to have them fail as lawyers or ministers or brokers. There is one reason for thinking, however, that a college will never be to girls, what it is to boys, a place of training for professional work; and that is, that girls, as a class, have, what boys have not, an instinctive leaning to one calling in particular—that of a married woman—and this is a calling which morally and physically disqualifies those who pursue it for any other. The instinctive leaning to it, too, is so strong in the earlier years of every woman's life that, whatever she may say or try to persuade herself, she will never, except in rare cases, make deliberate choice of any other calling, and devote herself to preparation for it with the ardor necessary for success in it, until the age for preparation has passed. We find, accordingly, that the complaints of having no work to do, and no place in society, and of pining away in idleness, do not come from women under twenty-five. Nay, they only rarely come from women under thirty, and hardly ever from any women except those who for various reasons have failed or neglected to enter the profession of matrimony. But at twenty-five or thirty it is too late to enter any other with much chance of success—indeed, with any chance of success—against male competitors, who have from the age of fifteen been steadily working for a certain vocation. Consequently, the fact of which we hear so often, that there are forty thousand unmarried women in Massachusetts, or anywhere else, sighing for employment, proves little or nothing against the present division of labor between the sexes. No woman's complaint on this subject ought to be recorded without adding the age at which she utterly abandoned all expectation of marrying and bearing children, for it was only then that she began to desire to have society reorganized for her benefit, as, indeed, everybody does who finds himself unsuccessful.

ENGLAND.

April 29, 1870.

I am at the present moment at some distance from the great centre of political interest and social gossip. For the last ten days I have been amidst the Yorkshire moors, in the country celebrated by Miss Brontë. Bleak upland pasturages, bounded by stone walls and swept by constant gales, rising at times into massive heath-covered hills, and intersected at intervals by deep and fertile valleys, form the staple of the scenery. There are a few cotton-mills along the course of the rivers, and there are little nooks high up on the hills affording shelter to solid stone farm-houses, with perhaps a stunted tree or two to contrast with the general bareness. The inhabitants are as different from the southern laborers as the country from the rich but rather tame and petty scenery of the agricultural country nearer London. They talk a dialect which at times is scarcely intelligible to the ear of a cockney; and are not very propitious to strangers. They are, in fact, a stubborn, independent race, less amiable and far more prosperous than the average of our population. Their style of conversation may be estimated from the following typical fragment. A stranger meets a rustic on the high road and says: "Good night!" "Good night," is the reply, "and damn you." Still they are a fine race, full of character, and with much intelligence and vigor. I will not, however, enter into a discussion of their merits; only remarking, for the benefit of travellers in England, that by diverging a little way from the beaten tracks they may often come upon provincial populations preserving much that is interesting and characteristic. I mentioned my absence from London by way of apology, in case my news should be somewhat of the stalest. And yet I know not whether it is necessary; for just at the present moment all England is talking about the same subject. You will have heard before receiving this all the details of the massacre of English travellers by Greek brigands. The telegraph deprives me of the chance of ever conveying a piece of news with the bloom of freshness upon it, and I am not sorry to be excused from dwelling upon a very painful subject. At present, the only question seems to be how far we can hold the Greek Government responsible. The brigands were evidently well informed as to the position of their captives. One of them, who was fortunate enough to escape, was an English peer; and two others who were killed were brothers of well-known noblemen. The brigands therefore made a moderate demand in asking for £25,000, and, if the Greek Government had behaved with proper consideration, they would have received it. Where brigandage has been carried out so systematically, and there is a regular connection between the ministry and the leaders of the robbers, it would seem that an arrangement should have been easily made. The Greek Ministry, however, vacillated, and, after promising to facilitate the payment of the ransom, suddenly declined to give an amnesty, and then sent troops to attack the brigands. The result was only what might have been expected; and we have an unpleasant difficulty upon our hands. I presume that after more or less expenditure of eloquence it will be satisfactorily settled, as a government which depends so much upon the good-will of its powerful neighbors cannot afford to allow massacres of their subjects to take place within twelve miles of the capital. The principal interest in the matter to those who have no relatives in danger will consist in the light thrown upon the condition of Greek society.

This Greek trouble has for the moment driven out of our heads another topic which had previously been causing great excitement, and of which we have not heard the last. Mr. Newdegate, as you may be aware, is the great champion of Protestantism in the House of Commons. As a general rule, champions of Protestantism are regarded as bores, and their feeble attempts at rousing the anti-Popery spirit of the nation are unequivocal failures. It so happened, however, that a motion brought forward by Mr. Newdegate for enforcing the inspection of convents was carried by a surprise. Government attempted to meet it by the previous question, but by some unforeseen accident their usual majority was not at hand, and Mr. Newdegate has had a temporary triumph. It is scarcely probable that he will get anything more; but the state of feeling which has been waked is deserving of notice in several ways. Ultra-Protestants of course are exultant, and some of them probably believe with more or less earnestness that convents are the scenes of iniquity and tyranny such as General Garibaldi has attempted to describe. On the other hand, the Catholics are furious; they have held public meetings; they have declared with much emphasis that all the nuns are saints and angels, and all the convents are little heavens here below; and they have declared Mr. Newdegate's motion to be unprovoked and insulting in the extreme. Moreover, they have given very broad hints to Government—or so it is reported—that Catholic members will oppose every Government measure if countenance is given to the obnoxious motion. Considering how much Mr. Gladstone depends upon the support of Catholics in his Irish policy, this is of course a very serious threat.

Meanwhile, what does the ordinary Englishman, who reads his Times and calls himself a moderate liberal and conservative, think about it? I should say that he looked at both sides with a certain malicious amusement. He has long ceased to care much for the old Puritanical prejudices, and considers Mr. Newdegate's zeal to be on the whole a fair matter for ridicule. Mr. Newdegate is a gentleman, and a man of some sense; but unluckily he is seconded by two or three zealots, who are constantly bringing the cause into contempt. Poor Mr. Newdegate was provoked last session into remonstrating with his soi-disant supporter, Mr. Whalley, in public, and declaring that he was bringing the whole cause into contempt. And there are worse men than Mr. Whalley—such, for example, as Mr. Murphy, a vulgar ignorant ranter, who goes about the country getting up, or trying to get up, rows between the English and the Irish laborers by insulting the religion of the last. In short, the old-fashioned and hot Protestant zeal has fallen into discredit, and I fancy will never again show much vitality. But it would be the greatest of mistakes to fancy that this showed any approximation to sympathy with Catholicism. Of course, a good many converts have been made of late years. Catholic churches and chapels have multiplied, and convents have increased still faster. Thirty years ago, convents were almost unknown, and now it is said there are as many as six thousand nuns. But, in spite of this, and in spite of ritualism and similar developments, public opinion is, I fancy, running in a very different direction. There never was a time at which priestly authority was more generally unpopular and even contemptible. The movement towards Rome has included a great many clergymen and many women of the higher classes, but it has entirely failed to strike any deep roots in the nation. The Catholic party has rallied to itself precisely those people who are most averse to the general movement of English thought, and is intrinsically feeble as well as unpopular. Hence, I think, the common sentiment may be expressed somewhat as follows: We think that Mr. Newdegate is a bigot, and many of his supporters are bigots of the most unpleasant kind. We have not an atom of sympathy for them; but, on the other hand, we do not sympathize any more with their opponents. We would rather that nothing had been said about convents, for we do not seriously believe that any great evils are in existence; and we certainly regret that what has been said should have taken a wantonly insulting tone. But as the question has been raised, we would rather have convents inspected than not. Of course, it should be done in such a way as to give no unnecessary offence; but it would be rather a good thing on the whole, and decidedly gratifying to our feelings, to show that we will not trust ecclesiastical authorities further than we can see them, and that we are fully determined to keep a strong hand upon their proceedings. Of course, we leave young women to make fools of themselves (which I fear is the average English expression for going into a convent) as much as they please; but we should decidedly prefer that the priests shall not be left to be their sole superiors. The main argument of the Roman Catholics is that they have perfect confidence in their bishops; and that is an argument which does not precisely commend itself to the English mind. We are more apt to consider all priests as foolish and objectionable persons who will be all the better for lay control; and Roman Catholic priests are the worst examples of the class. I imagine that Government will be able in one way or another to shelve the question for the present; but the feeling which has been evoked is significant of the rising importance of ecclesiastical disputes in general. In every direction there are symptoms that the relations between church and state are bringing on a new series of contests.

Correspondence.

HOW TO DEAL WITH POLYGAMY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir—May a subscriber ask for a place in your columns for some remarks suggested by a paragraph in your issue of April 21?

You say: "In polygamy all parties concerned are consenting parties. The arrangement is what the civil lawyers call consensual. In other words, there is nobody in it calling herself or himself a victim, and appealing to us for protection. . . . The nearest approach to a precedent for the proposed action of our Government towards the Mormons is the dealings of the English Government in India with the Thugs, who held it to be a religious duty to murder and rob. But then they did not practise the rite on one another, but on Gentiles, who were utterly opposed to participation in it, and were therefore entitled to have the Thugs exterminated. We may add, too, that on the simple ground of feasibility there is a wide difference between regulating the sexual relation and any other. Any relation of the sexes generally approved of by public opinion cannot be restrained by law."

This seems to say that, so far as the state is concerned, a man may take a bevy of wives, if all the wives are willing, and the select district in which he lives is not scandalized. Leave the case to the public opinion of the spot to which it immediately belongs, whatever the rest of the country may think of it. If Indian Thugs had despatched only Thugs, the Indian Government need not have stirred. Let Thuggery exterminate Thuggery—a good riddance to it. Now, is this view quite up to the demands of modern ideas? Is not a faithful government in these days expected to stop, so far as it can, the profession and practice of consensual slaughter? If, again, a community should settle itself on an uninhabited tract within the jurisdiction of a civilized power, and bring in a religion of human sacrifice, especially the sacrifice of women, how then? No woman need call herself a victim; every woman would exult in the spiritual despatch. Care being taken to molest no stranger, the lot would fall on the privileged, not on the persecuted. And yet the nineteenth century might hesitate to absolve the state from trying to overthrow the barbarous altar and trample out its fire.

Marriage undoubtedly requires consent; but as an institution it has more than a contract in it. First the contract, then the relation; the contract for the sake of the relation; the relation vital to the state; the state its regulator and guarantor. The sanctity of marriage is a public interest, far transcending the scope of any ordinary contract. Whatever may be set up by way of excuse for polygamy in the East, Western civilization hitherto has loathed it. The idea of one to one has marked, for the most part, the European family of nations, and especially the Teutonic race. To us that moral, spiritual, cordial unitedness of man and wife, which we were wont almost to worship, is impossible on any other basis. The mutual all-in-all of married life is a mere dream without it. A man who gives his heart in twentieths to a score of mates is a twentieth of a husband to each. The harem is a poor mockery of the home, and the home is the last quarter in which the doctrine of non-protection should be applied. Political toleration cannot be bound to remit individuals or societies, however willing, to the license that preceded law.

Can, indeed, a province that, in spite of a degrading taint, is outwardly more than half-civilized, now sequester itself from the vision of the rest of the world? Any peculiar community, in these days of inquisitive travel, is sure to draw private curiosity, and that is sure to end in public gossip—the more peculiar, the more attractive to certain minds; the more coarse, the more fascinating to certain other minds. The United States supply, within their borders and their dominion, a lawless and shameless spectacle to the gaze of mankind.

Even if, for the sake of the argument, it be granted that possible isolation may be a plea for legislative abstinence, where is the lawgiver to draw the line? Shall any grandee plant his free-will seraglio in his secluded park if only he keeps off all trespassers? But it may be said we are dealing with a self-governing commonwealth. In fact, this has been too nearly true. In right, it is utterly otherwise. The normal Territory is neither self-governed nor mature. It governs itself just so far and so long as a higher power chooses to trust it. Theoretically, it is at the mercy of Congress, which—under or not under certain limitations in the Constitution of the United States, not one of which touches the power to interfere, whatever may be said of means—for the gauze of "religion" cannot shelter everything—may at any time revoke and cancel Territorial laws. A Territory is a dependency. Its condition is prospective; it is an apprentice. Probably, in every one of the States into equal partnership with which it aspires to enter, polygamy by name, or in its early stage of bigamy, is treated as a crime, not reducible to a mere breach of contract, to be condoned carelessly or collusively by the parties immediately concerned. The public opinion of the United States is not yet Arabian; the act of July, 1862, which makes bigamy a crime in all the Territories and in all places subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, presumably expresses the general sentiment of the country. It is law in Utah at this moment, though it be still a dead letter. Every Territory is under training. What sort of training for entrance into the company of the States is furnished by an education that saps the very stay of family life? The Territories are nominally open to all comers. The Mormon community recruits itself freely from the dupes and devotees of lust, fraud, and superstition in the Old and the New World. Foul runnels trickle into the great sink. The curse feeds and strengthens itself; for decently-bred persons shun its borders. Thus far, the Territory has been virtually closed against the very settlers on whom a regular State can safely or excusably be built, and the Sultan of Utah faces the President of the United States, peer to peer. Every hour adds to the ugly anomalies that are gathering up against a difficult day of "reconstruction." As if we had not broken teeth enough already on that file. Friction, early or late, must come between this exceptional stumbling-block of polygamy and the accepted pillar of marriage. The thing should have been crushed out at the start. We let the dog in, and now we have the whelps to fight with. We have waited very long on the chapter of accidents. When Brigham Young dies, as saints must, another hierarch may rise to treat on condescending terms with the Gentile of the White House. No doubt, the difficulty of solving this problem is very great. Puzzling questions of various kinds beset it. We have allowed a sort of prescription to overgrow it. But to fold our hands and wait till local opinion comes round—that is, till Satan casts out Satan—because public opinion is law in affairs of sex, if logical, is humiliating. Let us be anxious, at least, to unfold them at the first chance. The situation is not to be too patiently accepted.

One word more. The material prosperity of the Mormon settlement, in the hands of a shrewd and knowing manager, has half-veiled the true character of the government. It is a spiritual despotism, wielded by a carnal priesthood. That is the corner-stone of this sensual and consensual den. Though the degradation of woman, under the forms of "spiritual marriage," be an affair of sex, it is also a good deal besides, and the nation may dare to use the first fair support it can find for a lever to wrench the bolts out of the system. May it find one very soon. Y. Y.

[Our objection to the horse-thief illustration of the Chicago Tribune was that it was not a parallel case, no count being taken in it of the two most important elements in the Mormon problem—the religious feeling in favor of polygamy and the popular approbation of it. It consequently was as an illustration misleading, and not enlightening. We never meant to say or insinuate that horse-thieving, if practised as a religious rite by a whole community, would be a respectable usage which the Government would be bound to let alone. What we meant to say, and said, was, that in considering the best mode of getting rid of it, Government would be bound to take note of the fact that it was a religious rite, and not merely a means of gratifying bad passions, and that it would therefore be doubtful whether the use of force was expedient; or, at all events, whether other influences would not have to be tried first. We mentioned the British dealing with Thuggery in India as a much nearer approach than horse-stealing to an example for us in dealing with polygamy; but pointed out that Thuggery, although of divine ordinance in the eyes of the Thugs, unlike Mormon polygamy, wanted the consent of its victims. In other words, we tried to explain that Mormonism was a novel and peculiar problem, such as no government ever before had to solve, and that it would, therefore, be great folly to attack it with the common law and Hobbes's Leviathan. Our objections to polygamy as an institution are just as strong as "Y. Y.'s;" but they are no stronger than our objections to prostitution and drunkenness, and we are quite sure its influence on society is no worse. Nevertheless, if it were proposed to put everybody in jail for two years who was found guilty of fornication or intemperance, or confiscate his or her property, we should oppose it, and for precisely the same reasons which lead us to oppose Mr. Cullom's bill for the suppression of polygamy. Righteous indignation is a poor guide for a legislator. It is no longer permitted to us to hope, in our time, that the walls of Jericho will fall if we walk round them and blow a horn. We have to plant batteries, open a sap, make regular approaches, and be advised by competent engineers that the breach is practicable before we make our final assault, although we may all the while be firmly persuaded that no city ever did contain so many shameless rascals, or was the seat of so many abominations.—Ed. Nation.]

PUBLISHERS AND COPYRIGHT.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir—People sometimes ask why the copyright question makes so slow progress. One reason is that the matter still remains in the primary and chaotic state, so far as the general public is concerned. The national mind now stands, in relation to international copyright, just where it did in relation to free-trade at the close of the war; that is to say, it has forgotten its previous knowledge, and possesses only the most vague and imperfect ideas. The "Veteran Observer's" notion that revenue tariffs and copyright laws were inconsistent is a case in point—a strong but by no means a solitary case. Some months ago, an editorial acquaintance, in criticising something which I had written for him, quietly taxed me with "entire ignorance" of a material fact. This great fact I had left out of consideration, merely because I did not consider it relevant to the points at issue, though a superficial observer might have imagined a connection. In short, the editor had started a regular game of controversia, or cross-purposes, which I did not think it worth while to pursue further in print; but, when we next met, I explained it to him in a few sentences, and he owned that I was right.

Not to weary you with examples, I proceed to the subject and object of this letter. All the persons whose names appear at the foot of title-pages are indiscriminately spoken of as publishers, and we hear it said that the "publishers" think so and so about this and that, whereas the term comprises two very distinct classes—the publishers proper, and the book-manufacturers. The latter name is not a very good one; it does not explain itself, and, from the apparent analogy of "book-making" and other phrases, may cause confusion; but it is the best I can suggest—in fact, we want a new word for the business. The publisher, pure and simple, only publishes books, that is, introduces them to the public. He has nothing to do with making the materials of his books, that is, the material materials—if you will allow the expression—the paper and ink. He owns no types, no plates, no printing-presses; his printing is done for him by other parties, just as his binding is. The book-manufacturer owns all these things, and makes books on so large a scale that his business as a publisher, extensive as it may be, is quite subordinate and secondary to the other branch. Hence the relations of these two species to authors and to the public differ in many respects, but I only wish at present to call your attention to one of these differences. The publishers proper are all in favor of international copyright; the book-manufacturers are nearly all dead against it.* I do not think your intelligent readers will require an explanation of this fact; but, should the reason be asked for, I am always ready to show how it follows, from the respective differences of the two species.

Carl Benson.

May 4, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. have in press "The Song of the Sower," by William C. Bryant, illustrated; a new edition, revised and extended, of their "Hand-book of American Travel;" "The Lady of the Ice," by James De Mille; "Lay Sermons," by Prof. Huxley; "Primitive Man," by Louis Figuier; and Sir John Lubbock's "Origin of Civilization, and Primitive Condition of Man."——Messrs. Harper & Bros. issue a new edition of "The Literature and Literary Men of Great Britain and Ireland," by the late Abraham Mills, A.M.—a work of which we lately said, it is "a body of sound criticism, by the best critics, upon all noted English, Scotch, and Irish writers, from the days of Alfred to those of Junius; and this criticism is illustrated by selections which are very judiciously made." We also preferred it as a text-book to those compendiums hitherto in use in our schools, and we now understand that the forthcoming edition will find its way into some of our higher courses of instruction, where it can hardly fail to do good.——A life of the well-known New York merchant and philanthropist of forty years and less ago, Arthur Tappan, is in preparation by his brother, Mr. Lewis Tappan, who has also earned a title to be remembered as one who loved his fellow-men. The book will be published by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, and will doubtless have a good deal to tell of the early days of the anti-slavery agitation, when it was not every merchant who was willing to avow himself an abolitionist, or subject himself to mob violence, or redeem the fanatics of that time from the common jail. Messrs. Hurd & Houghton also announce "Paris in December, 1851, or the Coup d'État of Napoleon III.," translated from the French of Eugène Ténot (13th edition) by T. W. Adams and A. H. Brandon, who add numerous original notes. Also, "The Choice of Paris," a classical romance by S. G. W. Benjamin.——With monthly part No. 30, Zell's Popular Encyclopædia completes the letter H and its first volume. This enterprise, though less original and, from its nature, more liable to defects than such undertakings as Thomas's Pronouncing Dictionary and Allibone's Dictionary of Authors, must nevertheless be ranked with these in point of magnitude and utility. A larger staff of editors might, and of course would, have ensured greater accuracy, but even then the "perspective" of the compilation would have been difficult to regulate. There will be one other volume.——Those who were interested in the proceedings of the American Philological Association at Poughkeepsie last July, will find an abstract of them in a small brochure just printed in this city, and to be had, we presume, of the secretary, Prof. Geo. F. Comfort, at Franklin Square, in this city. We learn from an announcement at the end of this report that the Association will hold its second annual session in Rochester, N. Y., beginning on the afternoon of the 26th of July next. Persons intending to be present are requested so to inform either Prof. Comfort as above, or Prof. A. H. Mixer, at Rochester. Notices of a desire to read papers at the convention must be sent to the former by July 15.

—The firms which publish books by subscription have recently united in an agreement that they will discharge and mutually refuse to re-employ any agent detected in selling their books to the trade or to newsdealers, or in any way but as he is engaged to do. The number of firms of this description is stated to be: Hartford, Conn., the headquarters of the business, 12 to 14; Norwich, 1; Springfield, Mass., 3; New York,

* Nearly all. Quarrels among themselves have driven over a few to the other side.

7; Philadelphia, 5; Cincinnati, 5; besides others which we are unable to locate. In the eight years, 1861–68, there were issued from Hartford alone about 30 subscription books, the other cities publishing, perhaps, enough more to make 100. The business in Hartford amounted during that time to $5,000,000, and employed 10,000 agents in disposing of 1,426,000 copies. The character of the works which have been sold in this manner, and the extent of sales, may be gathered from the following statistics: Greeley's "American Conflict," 225,000 copies; "Nurse and Spy," a tale of the war, absolutely devoid of merit, 175,000; Kettell's "Rebellion," a work we hear of for the first time, 120,000; the late A. D. Richardson's "Field, Dungeon, and Escape," 100,000, and his "Beyond the Mississippi," 90,000; Stephens's "War between the States," 62,000; Frank Moore's "Women of the War," 60,000; Prof. Stowe's "Origin and History of the Books of the Bible," 60,000; Mrs. Stowe's "Men of Our Times," 55,000; Mark Twain's "Innocents Abroad," 60,000. An utterly valueless work by the Rev. Matthew Hale Smith, called "Sunshine and Shadow," has had a sale fully equal to the average of those just named, and other adventurers in this same field have been Dr. Holland; the historians, Abbott, Lossing, and Headley; newspaper correspondents, like Junius H. Browne, Thomas W. Knox, and George Alfred Townsend; editors, like the late H. J. Raymond, Samuel Bowles, and Augustus Maverick; law professors, like Chamberlain and Parsons; together with Mr. Beecher, Mr. Parton, Mr. P. T. Barnum, and a few other persons of some note as lecturers or writers, including, among the latest, Miss Olive Logan. The impetus given by the war to this business is apparent, and it furnished not only popular subjects for book-making, but a host of cripples to serve as agents. Religious books, embracing a "Cottage Bible;" medical works; and books for making every man his own lawyer, represent what may be called the natural staple of the subscription business.

—We have not reckoned among these publications "Appletons' Encyclopædia," and similar works, involving an enormous outlay for a period sometimes of years. These exemplify the legitimate uses of subscription agencies, where the public may fairly be called upon to share, for their own good, a burden too great to be shouldered by any publisher. The feature which distinguishes the subscription business that has sprung up during the last ten years is, that it may be carried on with almost no capital, and without any risk whatever—even of bad judgment. We have cited chiefly original works, but an equal number, we believe, are reissues of books that have had their day and dropped out of the market, or, like Smith's Dictionaries, are reprinted from foreign sources. Of the former class is Sears's "History of the Bible," which some of our readers may remember as a new publication, and the plates of which were, after a long interval, offered for sale at $500, probably costing less to the final purchasers, who at once sold 150,000 copies. "Moses and the Prophets," "Indian Massacres," and "Chambers's Information," were in like manner dug out of their graves and set to walking the earth again. Among the reprints, Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" and Baker's "Nile Tributaries in Abyssinia" are the best we can name, though neither could be trusted for typographical accuracy.

—Recurring to the original works of which we have given the statistics, we venture to say, with all respect to their authors, that there is not one the loss of which would have been seriously felt in our literature, and without any qualification we assert that not one was prepared with the conscientiousness and thoroughness that would have been felt necessary in a work designed for the regular trade, or in a work on which the author was ready to stake his reputation. On this last point, especially, we insist, because every author ought, in his slightest work, to have regard to his reputation, and because the requirements of the subscription business are such that it is generally impossible for him to do his best or anything like his best. The elements of success for an original subscription work are these: (1) It must be timely—the subject of a biography, for instance, is hardly cold under ground before the biographer has contracted to deliver twenty or thirty pages of copy per diem until the life is written; (2) it must be "popular," and that is a sufficient reason, besides haste, why it cannot be first-rate; (3) it must be bulky; all the better if in large type and double or triple-leaded, for so the 600 pages will be more cheaply filled; (4) it must be flashily bound and have a very expensive air; (5) it must be high-priced, or else it will never give support to canvassers, whose commissions amount to 50 or 60 per cent. The result is that books of this sort are sold for 25 per cent. more than books of the same style and cost of manufacture are sold for through the trade, and the public is imposed upon in every particular—merits of contents, of paper, type, and binding, and publisher's outlay. In short, to sum up the ethics of this business as now conducted—simply with an eye to profits—we may say that it depends for its prosperity on the want of literary discrimination and practical knowledge of books of the people of the rural districts, and on American good-nature, which cannot withstand the appeal ad misericordiam of a subscription agent in the guise of a one-legged soldier, a widow, a young lady supporting her only mother, or a superannuated clergyman. For the injury done to the booksellers' trade we refer our readers to a series of excellent articles in the New York American Booksellers' Guide for the first half of 1869 and March, 1870. And as for the authors who consent to be demoralized by subscription contracts, we may state that they are allowed but 5 per cent. on the selling price, while their copyright with publishers of the old school is 10 per cent.; and that, obviously, in order to acquire the same income, they must have twice as many copies sold in the first instance as in the second.

—The World has claimed a right of invention in the excellent word "carpet-bagger," but it is at best (like most wit) but a case of re-invention. The word itself is some four centuries older than those who would assert a right of patent in it. In the third chapter of the Second Book of Monstrelet's Chronicles is the following passage: "En ce temps la Comtesse de Hainaut, douairière, fut défiée d'un pauvre saque-main (carpet-bagger) lequel étoit nommé l'Escremot-Câtel, natif de Ligny en Cambrésis, pour lors capitaine de la tour de Beaumont." The parallel is exact. Escremot-Câtel (an unsavory name) was an adventurer from abroad, for the time being in a post of some consequence, and making the most of his opportunity by pillage, as presently appears. At any rate, there is the very word "carpet-bagger."

—The American Law Review, which is now on the eve of entering upon its fifth volume, continues to be the valuable periodical which it has been from the beginning—its digests being serviceable as being practically an index of current decisions both in this country and in England; its reviews of new law books being the work of careful hands; and the articles in the body of the magazine being, if not authoritative—as, indeed, what law can be which does not come from the bench?—at least marked by more than ordinary knowledge, and such as to be in various ways helpful to the profession. It is of course not very often that the literary world, as such, is directly interested in any of the contents of the Law Review, but now and then, as in the number before us, there is a paper which is worth the attention of writers and publishers, whether or not readers need care much for it. "Copy before Publication" is an essay of the kind to which we refer, and its subject is the decision which the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois has recently rendered in the case of Crowe vs. Aiken. Mr. Crowe is the husband of the actress known to the boards as "Miss Kate Bateman," and Aiken is a theatrical manager, who produced without Mrs. Crowe's leave the drama of "Mary Warner," which Mrs. Crowe, or her husband, procured to be written for her especial use by Mr. Tom Taylor. Four hundred pounds sterling the Crowes paid Mr. Taylor for the right of playing the piece for five years in this country, and, as "Miss Bateman" is a "star," who plays here and there and everywhere, it behoved the Crowes to prevent any manager's presentation of the drama in which she does best. They therefore brought suit against Aiken, who seems to have had little or no defence, but whose plea in bar of an injunction has caused the laying down of the following principles, by which, no doubt, the fraternity of authors and managers in this country will be for some time governed. An author, whether of plays, lectures, or sermons, has, before publication, an exclusive right to control the use of his literary productions; and no one in the audience of such author is at liberty to take down in shorthand the play, sermon, or lecture as delivered by actor, preacher, or lecturer. Moreover, at common law, the delivery or representation of a sermon, lecture, or play does not constitute publication; and although, by an English statute (5 & 6 Victoria, cap. 45, § 20), the first representation of a play does constitute publication, our American statutes have never limited the common-law right. So, then, when Mr. Emerson, for instance, asks the press to refrain from giving verbatim reports of a lecture of his, he asks no more than he could, in all probability, safely demand and insist upon. To be sure, says the court, from whose decision we are quoting, a person who, by unassisted memory of a performance that has been authorized by its literary proprietor, can carry it away in his head, may be entitled to reproduce it from his recollection of it—though why this should be so is not too clear, the author's right being the same, the layman might think, whether thieves have extraordinary powers of memory, or only ordinary.

But there will always be a presumption, the court remarks, and a strong one, that an unauthorized representation of a play—and we suppose the same thing holds of the re-delivery of a sermon, speech, or lecture—is not the fruit of an unaided effort of memory, but is proof of stealing, and the burden is laid on the defendants in such cases of showing that they have not been guilty of larceny. Thus much is law, says the court, as regards one or two representations of a play, or repetitions of a lecture or sermon; but as for repeated authorized representations, or regular deliveries by preachers or lecturers—they would operate as a dedication of them to the public, and make them, we suppose, the lawful prey of anybody who could make it appear that he had got them without the help of other people. Probably the cases are few in which the law, as thus laid down, would be invoked by any persons except such as hold the manuscripts of plays, the lectures and sermons being not very many which would be worth anybody's while to steal, unless he could at the same time kidnap the lecturer or clergyman, and exhibit him to audiences; and there being also few "platform speakers" who do not welcome any possible sort of advertising. But it is beyond a doubt that the managers of theatres, the agents of "stars" and "troupes," the authors of "adaptations," and the theatrical world generally, would be all the better for having a sharp eye kept on them. Another of the papers in this last number of the Law Review, in reading which the general reader may take pleasure, is one with a title that most general readers will look at with some small bewilderment. "Contributory Negligence on the part of an Infant" is its heading—a heading of which a full and clear interpretation is furnished by the essay, of which we say no more than this, which is perhaps more than we have any right to say: the subject treated of is interesting as being precisely one of those on which "the common sense of mankind," and the common sense of mankind as expressed by the judges, would seem at first sight to compel conclusions almost directly opposite; and—again speaking as a layman—is precisely one of those as to which the layman, on second or third thought, would coincide in opinion with the judges. The writer of the essay of which we speak is of opinion that some at least of the judges who have decided late Massachusetts and New York cases, involving questions of the contributory negligence of infants, have decided them wrongly, and that he does not establish his view as the true one we certainly are not prepared to say. But there is not much doubt that it would be a good thing if this essay, and others like it, were to be studied by the immense crowd of voters and writers who think that making new laws, instead of understanding old ones, is the right way of keeping government going and making it prosperous. People talk against the jury system; but when one thinks of the contemptuous ignorance concerning the working of existing law, and the ignorant superstition concerning laws to be made, one is excusable for doubting if the faithful juryman may not be the saviour of republican government here, as he has been the defender and saviour of constitutional government elsewhere.

—The Law Review is not always austere, but occasionally permits itself to be decorously jocose, though it cannot be said to exert itself to do justice to the comic side of the profession, and indeed may be conceived of as repelling with dignity the hinted suspicion of its more than tolerating fun. In this number, however, it takes occasion to say that it cannot quite agree with certain remarks recently made by the Louisville Courier-Journal, which has been reviewing "Hardin's Reports"—a volume containing reports of cases adjudged in the Kentucky Court of Appeals between 1805 and 1808. The critic had to speak of several jurists; and among others of Judge Bibb, a judge once very well known west of the Alleghanies, and so well liked that, if we are not mistaken, he did not die before attaining the regular Southwestern and Western immortality of having a county called after him. At all events, Bibb County, in Georgia, bears his name; and that the old gentleman's memory is still green in that region his Courier-Journal reviewer gives sufficient testimony. This is how the latter speaks: "On page 157 we find in a foot-note a query stated in these words, 'Tamen quære de hoc.' How like that grand and simple old judge! Everything about him was fragrant with learning and genius." This little outburst will seem to some people incredible. But it will not seem so to anybody who knows much about the literary ability of the South—which, by the way, finds very good expression in the Courier-Journal, a paper which held and holds the mirror up to the average Southern nature, both political and literary, quite as well as any periodical south of Mason and Dixon's line. The North has had to endure a good deal of tolerably well-deserved caning for its literary deficiencies; and more or less of this was administered by the South, or by foreign critics who administered it directly in the interest of the South; but nothing is more certain than that from the first day when literary work began to be done in this country, it has not lain in the mouth of any Southerner to say with anything like grace any but respectful words of Northern literature. It is not to misstate the facts in the case to say that practically the whole South was precisely as fragrant with learning and genius as Judge Bibb's admirer appears to be. True enough, there is no longer need of insisting upon considerations of this kind, which doubtless were never too profitable.

—If there is anything which experience in educating the young has settled for us, it is that school libraries (and we should probably have the Rev. Mr. Bacon's sanction in including Sunday-school libraries) for the use of the scholars are altogether unprofitable. The money which has been thrown away on them would, if applied to the repair of the school buildings, or to the furnishing of books of reference and apparatus for the teachers, have had an appreciable effect upon the standard of instruction in our common schools. In cities or the larger towns, no school library could compete with the public one, or even with the reading generally obtainable at home; or if it could, it would probably be composed of books which the State would not be justified in purchasing for the young. There is in St. Louis, as we observe from the Fifteenth Annual Report of the School Board, a special provision for school children which we are inclined to think unique. We refer to what is known as the Public School Library, which is now thoroughly incorporated with the general system of instruction. It is a collection of nearly 20,000 volumes, in which novels form a fifth part and juveniles a twelfth, the ratio of demand and issue during the year 1868 having been 31 per cent. for juveniles, 46 per cent. for novels, and 23 per cent. for the remainder. There is also a reading-room well supplied with newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals, American and foreign. Members or officers of the School Board are admitted for life to the privileges of the library, and all teachers in the public schools of the city and the pupils of the Normal School are admitted freely during their connection with the schools; and it is made easy for a pupil in the O'Fallon Polytechnic Institute to obtain a three months' privilege as a reward of faithfulness in his studies, and at the same time to gain credit for life-membership with each renewal of the privilege. Finally, any person whatever may use the library for three months for one dollar, and for life for twelve dollars paid all at once or in the course of three years.

—That part of the St. Louis report which relates to instruction in German is very interesting, and deserves to be printed separately for circulation among the school boards of other cities. It cannot be doubted that this branch of public education, wherever adopted, offers, even for Americans, a powerful inducement to settle there for the sake of their children. The number of enrolled school children in St. Louis during the past year was 21,186, and although 63 per cent. of them were born in St. Louis, and only 2 per cent. in Germany, more than 35 per cent. were of German origin. Not all of the latter attended the nineteen schools having German-English classes, but the report seems to make conflicting statements as to the actual number: on p. 29 it appears as 3,461; at p. 89, as 5,013. The proposed extent of German instruction is, wisely, only to teach how to read, speak, and write the language, all other lessons—as in geography, arithmetic, grammar, history—being in English. Experience has shown that one hundred or more German-speaking children should be in the school where German is introduced. This ensures full employment to the special teacher, and speedy acquirement of the power to converse on the part of the English-speaking scholars. "The German reading book should not be commenced until the second year of progress in the English Reader. Anglo-American children should in no case commence German before the fourth year in school." Recitations should be held in the regular class-rooms and not apart, and should not exceed half an hour in length—in the lowest grades even less. Besides the more obvious advantages of this intellectual fusion of the native and foreign elements of the population, the musical taste and feeling introduced by the latter will exercise a most happy influence on the American character. Finally, "the extra expense per pupil for the year 1868–9 was $3 04 to each of those studying German reckoned in the average number belonging. This amounted to an addition of $0 84 per pupil of the average number belonging to all the schools."

—"Even if we suppose," we remarked the other day, of the women of Illinois,—"even if we suppose the majority to vote in favor of accepting the suffrage, their getting it might be, and probably would be, a concession to a minority—since, in every closely contested election, the majority consists of two minorities." As we have been asked by a correspondent to explain what we meant by this last sentence, we shall instance a case in which, out of a total polling of 1,000, the vote was divided between 520 on the one side, and 480 on the other. Now, this majority we can abstractly separate into two parts, 480 and 40, either of which is a minority of the total vote, and of which the latter decided the election. If the 40 had absented themselves from the polls there would have been no minority or majority, and no decision: consequently we may say that, as the phrase is in regard to third parties, they held the balance of power and determined what should be law for the majority. This is with us of so frequent occurrence, as in a State like Pennsylvania or Connecticut, that the virtue commonly ascribed to the rule of the majority, and the assumption that the voice of the majority is the voice of God, appear a little ridiculous. Very often, indeed, the minority that turns the scale is the unreflecting, negative, and weak-kneed class who vote, as well as they can guess, with the winning side; and too often this minority is bought and paid for. For all that, the majority is the best rule in practice that we have yet found, and nothing is more admirable than the regular acquiescence in it by minorities scarcely inferior in number to the prevailing vote. If the question before the women of Illinois were simply of what they wanted—as whether they would have a prohibitory law, or would grant a railroad franchise, or would order a removal of the State capital—the majority test would be unexceptionable. Where, however, the question was one of rights, the unwillingness to yield simply to the demand of a minority seemed to us to need the reminder that the essential part of many a majority is only a minority in disguise.

—At various times attempts have been made to seduce us into opening a department of "Notes and Queries," a thing that we have always refused to do for several reasons, of which there is one that alone is amply sufficient. Whether or not there is a limit to our knowledge—and we have never pretended to infallibility and omniscience in respect of such matters as are rather curious than of benefit to mankind—there is, at any rate, a limit to the space at our disposal—a limit of which we are seldom without a more or less painful consciousness—for constantly we are compelled to refrain from dealing with subjects that deserve attention, and to which we would gladly give it had we more room. Like other people, however, we occasionally depart from our rules, and are about to do so now, this present departure being made partly for the sake of saying, what we have said above, that in general we decline utterly the attempt to answer such questions as this that follows. A correspondent wishes to know who is the author of the well-known spirited song which begins with the line:

"We meet 'neath the sounding rafter," and which has for a chorus some such truculent lines as these:

"Here's a cheer for the dead already,
And a health to the next who falls."

Spirited we have called the song, and so it is; and although it is too long, and has not the finish which ensures length of days, no doubt it will for some time yet be popular in the barracks and ward-rooms among the gentlemen who used to drink "a bloody war and a sickly season." Moreover, there is something impressive in its grim, not to say ghastly merriment; for it offers itself as the voice of a drinking company of soldiers among whom the cholera is at the moment making havoc. So, at least, we have heard; and its origin we have heard attributed to some verse-maker who was in the British army in India at a time when the pestilence was raging in the camp or quarters. But whether or not this is certainly so, we cannot tell; nor do we remember to have ever heard the author's name, which we hereby promise to print if any one will furnish it to us. So also in regard to the author of the anonymous lines which we quoted from Mrs. Celia Thaxter's last article in the Atlantic—lines which we print again for the convenience of possible informants, and also because they are lines that much more easily can be printed not often enough than too often:

"Ships, ships, I will descrie you
Amidst the main,
I will try you,
What you are protecting
And projecting,
What's your end and aim.
Some go abroad for merchandise and trading,
Another stays to keep his country from invading,
A third is coming home with wealth and costly lading.
Halloo! my fancie, whither wilt thou goe?"

A correspondent writes to us to say that these melodious and captivating verses, which linger in the memory like music, are prefixed to Washington Irving's "Voyage," and are there credited to an "Old Song." Now, says our correspondent, Irving's "Old Song" was much the same as Scott's "Old Play;" that is to say, when he wanted lines for mottoes and the like, he himself made them and attributed them to forgotten authors. To this we shall say, that we should want very much stronger evidence than is here suggested before believing that.

—The British people are being persuaded by their physicians that insanity is greatly on the increase among them, and a writer in the Quarterly Journal of Science has stated that not only is this the case, but that "the cures of the insane in our private asylums are not more numerous than they were from 1748 to 1814, when the treatment of the insane was a disgrace to humanity." In ten years, says another writer, the number of recorded lunatics has increased 45 per cent. The plan of large asylums has proved to be unfavorable to recovery, and yet these have every year to be enlarged to accommodate the growing number of patients. The increase is confined almost wholly to the pauper class, and thus intimately connects the problem with that of pauperism. With us, if we are not mistaken, the most alarming phenomenon in regard to insanity is the increase of it just in proportion as crime diminishes. There being no crime without legal responsibility, and "frenzy" and "temporary insanity" not admitting of the latter, society seems likely to be divided hereafter not into the good and the bad, but the sane and the insane—a distinction which would serve well enough as the basis of a new code if we were not dependent on "experts" to tell us which are which—and all actions into customary and "abnormal." In fact, the practice of summoning skilled witnesses to sustain either side of a case at law has long since condemned itself as wholly untrustworthy and misleading. Medical evidence is even more to be suspected than any other, and we hope the time is coming when no member of the profession who respects himself, and who wishes the esteem of the best portion of the public, will consent to testify at the request of either party in a criminal suit, unless where there could be no difference of opinion among intelligent physicians—that is, where the facts are capable of scientific demonstration, as by an appeal to the microscope. The inconvenience of the conflict between experts before commissioners in lunacy, in the probate and divorce as well as in the criminal courts, has made itself felt in England, where also the law is too vague in defining "unsoundness of mind." The Pall Mall Gazette, in discussing this subject, refers for an example to be followed to the Bavarian Code, as compiled by Anselm von Feuerbach, which "provides that in every case involving questions of medical science, the court trying it shall be empowered to associate with itself a certain number of medical assessors, to participate in the deliberations of the judges on those points with which they are professionally conversant." The advantages of having these assessors paid by the court, and judging as the court and not as partisan witnesses, is apparent. A writer in the Philadelphia Medical and Surgical Reporter, of May 14, a physician, while deprecating the employment of physicians as witnesses, is in favor of openly employing medical, as assistants of the legal, counsel. His argument seems a good one.

—"L'Uomo e la Natura: ossia la superficie terrestre modificata per opera dell' uomo," is the Italian title of the Hon. George P. Marsh's well-known work on "Man and Nature," as published at Florence by G. Barbèra. The inconvenient octavo of the American edition is here exchanged for a handy 12mo, of 644 pages, beautifully printed in clear type. Mr. Marsh says in his preface that he has introduced numerous corrections, both in his facts and in his theories, and added both in the text and in the notes a great quantity of new data and illustrations, besides making some alteration in the subdivision of the work, and suppressing portions which chiefly concerned the American public; though we are glad to observe that these do not include the foot-note near the end of the first chapter, in which Mr. Marsh improves his "having the floor" to wander a little from the subject, and to expose with proper warmth the corrupting influence of railroad corporations, both in this country and in Europe (pp. 60, 61, Barbèra). Neither in his last chapter does he omit mention of the various projects for canals in the United States, like that to make an island of Cape Cod, or that to connect Lake Michigan with the Mississippi. To the Italians, this admirable work in their own language cannot fail to be welcome, advanced as they are themselves in many of the conservative and restorative modes of changing the face of nature. The speculations as to the consequences of opening the Suez Canal, on the fauna of the Mediterranean, and on the productiveness of Lower Egypt, will particularly interest a country which already bears witness to the political transformations due to the international thoroughfare built, in greater measure than is commonly understood, by Italian laborers. Mr. Marsh's book would serve in this country as the best kind of a text-book in Italian.

MR. FROUDE'S LAST VOLUMES.*

That Mr. Froude should close his history with the defeat of the Spanish Armada, in 1588, instead of continuing it to the death of Elizabeth, in 1603, is a surprise and, no doubt, a disappointment to most. We should have been glad of a complete history of the House of Tudor from his hands. But, after all, the limits which he has set to himself have this advantage, that they inclose a distinct period of national development, not merely the life of a dynasty. The reign of a great king often forms an era; but a reign is in itself essentially an artificial landmark, as compared with events which touch the real life of a nation. Mr. Froude's work begins, indeed, not with Henry VII. or Henry VIII., but with the Fall of Wolsey, the era of the commencement of the English Reformation. Fitly, therefore, it may end with the event which formed the turning-point in Elizabeth's career rather than with her death. The decisive events of 1587 and 1588 put an end to the long vacillation of the Queen, and forced her into a bold and honorable policy: "There was no more unwholesome hankering after compromise, no more unqueenly avarice or reluctance to spend her treasure in the cause of freedom."

For Elizabeth's reputation, to be sure, it were to be desired that Mr. Froude should continue the account of her reign, and exhibit to us the decision and energy of her last years as vividly as he has portrayed her earlier irresolution and meanness. These qualities, which Mr. Motley made clear enough, are here displayed with greater minuteness, and on a larger scale. France, Scotland, the Netherlands, Henry of Navarre, the Earl of Morton, William of Orange—all were again and again deluded and thwarted, not to say betrayed, by the utter want of system and vigor in her policy, and of a sense of honor in regard to her engagements. Mr. Froude's severe words seem hardly too strong for the facts which he relates: "She saw no reason to risk her throne for a cause for which she had at best but a cold concern. She preferred to lie and twist, and perjure herself and betray her friends, with a purpose at the bottom moderately upright; and nature in fitting her for her work had left her without that nice sense of honor which would have made her part too difficult" (vol. xi. p. 590).

The popular idea of Queen Elizabeth is different from this. To those who looked back to her reign across the troublous times of the Stuarts, it appeared with a halo of peace and prosperity. It was in truth a glorious period for England—a period of great events, marvellous activity, and genius—a period of new life, heroism, and spirit-stirring adventure. Naturally enough, so long as men saw only results, and could not penetrate to the undercurrent of events, Elizabeth had the credit even of things that were done in spite of her. "The general success of Elizabeth passes for a sufficient answer to doubts cast upon her ability. Effects must have had causes equal to them, and that she left England at her death the first of European powers is accepted as proof that she was herself the first of princes. It was not, however, the ability of Elizabeth, it was the temper of the English nation, which raised her in her own despite to the high place which she ultimately filled. The genius and daring of her Protestant subjects, of whom Walsingham was no more than a brilliant representative, formed the splendid pedestal on which her own small figure was lifted into dignity" (p. 457).

As a matter of personal character, Elizabeth's ruinous vacillation hardly deserves censure, inasmuch as it resulted from qualities in themselves "blameless and interesting. She was a person of clear intellectual perception, but without intellectual passions; singularly careless of herself, and therefore of undecided temperament. On great questions, where arguments are equally balanced, the loves and hates of men, their beliefs and sympathetic convictions, rather than conclusions of reasoning, give them resolution to plant their steps firmly. Elizabeth had none of these, and was in consequence uncertain, unstable, and vacillating" (vol. xii. p. 312). Neither need we criticise too severely her indifference in regard to the great movement going on under her eyes. If all Protestants had been Puritans or Calvinists, and all Catholics had been under Jesuit influences, it would have been a terrible thing for humanity. Luckily, the Lutherans and Anglicans on the one side, and moderate Catholics like Maximilian II. and Henry III. on the other, held the balance between the two extremes. Elizabeth's policy, as Mr. Froude points out, was a wise and humane one in itself. It answered in the first years of her reign, but, as the passions of both parties rose, it became no longer practicable. It was wise and humane to try to calm the fiery passions of both parties, and preserve peace as long as peace was possible; it was weak and cruel to temporize and play false in such a juncture as then was. The times now demanded convictions and action.

However pardonable may have been Elizabeth's private indifference, however laudable her desire to preserve peace, her situation was such that her only safety consisted in boldness and decision—in allying herself frankly with one of the great parties against the other. This her statesmen saw clearly, and we can see clearly now; but Elizabeth could never be brought to see it until it was almost too late. Even in the moment of supreme peril she shifted, held back, tied the hands of her defenders, and withheld resources from them in a manner truly astonishing. A hearty alliance ten years earlier with the Netherlands, the Huguenots, and the Scotch Presbyterians would have led, perhaps, to a terrible and general war; but England would scarcely have been brought nearer shipwreck than was actually the case, and it is hard to say what might have been won for Protestantism by such coadjutors as Henry of Navarre, William of Orange, Burleigh, and Morton. But this was just what Elizabeth did not want; and here lies the peculiar misfortune of the times, that the interests of humanity at this critical period depended upon the whims and accidents of her who happened to be Queen. She is condemned, not as a woman, but as a sovereign. Indeed, if we wish to retain any of that respect for royalty which is naturally inspired by the great sovereigns of the fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth century, we shall do well not to tarry long with the rulers of the last half of the century. We have seen how Mr. Froude characterizes Elizabeth. Of Mary Stuart he says (vol. xi. p. 500): "Accomplished as the Queen of England often showed herself in the art of lying, her genius paled before the cynical proficiency of her rival." Henry III. of France was "weak and vicious," "weak, cowardly, and treacherous;" his brother, Alençon, "an unprincipled fool." Of Philip II. he says that "the 'leaden foot' of the King of Spain was as fatal to his friends as the irresolution of Elizabeth to hers," and that "he lived to show that the most cruel curse that can afflict the world is the tyranny of ignorant conscientiousness."

These two volumes, with the ten preceding, form a somewhat complete series by themselves, beginning with the murder of Darnley and ending with the death of Mary Stuart and its immediate consequences. Naturally, Scotch affairs occupy a good deal of space, and the endless intrigues and revolutions of party in the minority of James are narrated with perhaps more minuteness than is desirable. The last volume is, of course, the fullest of matter, being devoted mainly to the conspiracy and death of Mary Queen of Scots, and the invasion of the Armada. Both these events are narrated graphically and vigorously. The account of the Armada receives a peculiar interest from the detailed narrative of the voyage and sufferings of the Spaniards after the battle of Gravelines—a portion of the story not surpassed by any other in interest, and painful interest.

It is never safe to assume that the history of any period has been written once for all, and that any historical composition, however excellent, is destined to be a κτῆμα ἐς ἀεί. With the present great and increasing industry in searching for new documents in English history, and the masses of correspondence and other original matter that are every year brought to light, it may be that the work which Mr. Froude has done so well will some time have to be done over again. There is this to be said, however, that the weight of the new evidence thus far has told with constantly increasing effect in favor of the two views which strongly characterize this work, as contrasted with the prevailing sentiment a generation or two ago; and it may be fairly presumed that this tendency will be even strengthened. Fifty years ago, it was the fashion to regard Elizabeth as a great sovereign, with a few feminine weaknesses, to be sure, which hardly detracted from the vigor and persistency of her administration; Mary, on the other hand, was looked upon as a lovely and unfortunate woman, whom circumstances had exposed to suspicion and persecution, while her only faults were thoughtlessness and indiscretion. New evidence, and the more careful study of the old, have steadily lowered each of these women in the judgment of the present generation, so that Elizabeth is considered perhaps more amiable, but certainly less great; Mary more and more unprincipled, but also more and more able. "Her crimes," says a recent writer, "done by an ordinary sinner, might have left her the compeer of such a paltry adulteress and murderess as Lettice Knollis. Done by such as she was, they raise her to the level of the Æschylean Clytemnestra."

However it may be with disputed questions such as these, the claims of Mr. Froude's work to the somewhat indefinite rank of a "standard history" are for the present well established. It is the only book that treats minutely of a most important epoch of English history—an epoch less full of stirring deeds, and therefore exercising a less obvious influence on the national development, than the century following, but one of no less vital importance. It is an eminently readable book. Of all Mr. Froude's high qualities as a historian, we should place picturesqueness first; his account of the Armada, for instance, is even finer than Mr. Motley's, and the chapters on the rebellions in Ireland are exceedingly graphic. Hardly inferior to this, if inferior at all, is his power of grasping the essential ideas of the period of which he is treating, and placing them clearly and strongly before the reader; of this, one of the very highest qualities of a historian, we have an admirable example in the opening of Chap. XVI., in the ninth volume; the conclusion is also fine, although perhaps inferior to the passage just referred to. His powers of analysis, both of policy and character, are good, although less marked than the qualities already mentioned. One gets a quite distinct idea of the personalities of the leading characters, but it is in most cases rather from their actions and copiously quoted words, than from any careful judgment of the historian. So with the diplomatic puzzles, and the bewildering politics of the French and Spanish courts; these are carefully analyzed, and made, on the whole, clear and comprehensible; but one doubts, after all, whether the analysis is complete and exhaustive.

* "History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada. By James Anthony Froude, M.A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. Reign of Elizabeth." Vols. XI. and XII. New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1870. 12mo, pp. 702 and 658.

Mr. Froude has been criticised, and we think justly, for neglecting the constitutional history of the period of which he treats, and confining himself almost wholly to the prominent events of the day, especially in their ecclesiastical and diplomatic bearings. We think, for the matter of that, that it is a mistake for a historian to enter largely into questions of antiquities; but antiquarian topics should be handled at least so far as they have purely historical aspects. This Mr. Froude has not done in a sufficient degree, and we must consider it his most serious defect as a historian. Another defect, and this of style, is the degree in which he repeats himself—the same ideas, almost the same words, one meets with again and again. In like manner, the abundant extracts from correspondence and other papers are full of substantial repetitions—a practice serviceable, perhaps, in intensifying an impression, but carried, we think, to excess. While, therefore, we do not think that Mr. Froude's place will be in the first rank of historians, we do not hesitate to pronounce this work an adequate and worthy history of that great period during which the change was made from Popery to Protestantism, and at the same time the English nation entered upon that career of enterprise and adventure, of thought and action, which conducted to the great revolutions and the maritime ascendancy of the seventeenth century.

DR. THOMAS'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.*

DR. THOMAS'S great production, to which long years of conscientious and painstaking labor have obviously been devoted, affords us the rare pleasure of bestowing almost unstinted praise on an American publication of large dimensions, and not restricted to a specialty—for universal biography, like universal history, can certainly not be classified among specialties. In fact, we must declare it the best, as well as the most comprehensive book of its description, emanating from the pen of one writer—in any language—which has come under our notice. In stating this, however, we mean also distinctly to qualify our approbation. What the comprehensive scholarship, perseverance, energy, and critical accuracy of one man may fairly be expected to do in this field, our author has amply done; but whether a task of this magnitude, to be well executed, is not above the powers of any single scholar—whatever his attainments may be—is to us a matter of grave doubt. The best universal history planned on a large scale, if written by one author, can be nothing more than an ably executed abridgment of a number of special histories; an all-comprehending cyclopædia of biography, if not done by a number of scholars, each elaborating his special branch, can at the best be an excellent compilation. Dr. Thomas's Dictionary of Biography is an excellent compilation on a vast scale, here and there interspersed with sketches evincing both independent research and independent thought.

We need only turn a few pages at random in order to be convinced of the extraordinary fulness—we might almost say completeness—of the work, at least as far as concerns the biography of the leading nations and literatures of the world, ancient as well as modern. A single column of almost exclusively French contents presents us with concisely executed notices of the following men, so little known to general fame: Boulard, philanthropist; Boulay, agricultural writer; Boulay de la Meurthe (Antoine, etc.), statesman; Boulay de la Meurthe (Henri George), statesman; Boulay, du, historiographer; Boulay-Paty, jurist; Boulduc (Jules François), chemist; Boulduc (Simon), chemist; Boule, cabinetmaker; Boulée, architect; Boullanger, preacher; Boullemier, ecclesiastic and writer; Boullenger de Rivery, jurist and littérateur; Boullenois, legal writer; Boulliau, astronomer; Boullier, Protestant theologian; Boullongne (Bon), painter; Boullongne (Louis), painter and engraver; Boullongne (Louis), son of the preceding, painter; Boulogne, bishop and writer. These notices are, of course, very brief, but others are expanded in proportion to the importance, historical or literary, of the subjects. Thus, while the majority of the articles are good for reference only, a large number of them, forming a considerable portion of the work, are readable—all being written in a clear, plain style, entirely free from lexicographical contractions and from abbreviations of any kind. The notices of Bayle, Brahe, Buckle, Carlyle, Carnot, Democritus, De Quincey, Descartes, and Dickens, for instance, are both brief and readable; others, like those of Alexander of Macedon, Bonaparte, Brahma, Burns, Byron, Cæsar, Calvin, Confucius, and Cromwell, are extended to the length, and partly elaborated in the style, of independent essays.

We unhesitatingly range ourselves on the side of the critics whom our author, as he expresses it in his preface, expected to "admit that, on the whole, the space allotted to each notice has been apportioned with a fair measure of justice and impartiality." And we must add that his endeavor to deal justly and impartially with his subjects, in this respect, is perhaps most evident there where a contrary inclination might most naturally be expected. Of this a comparison of articles like those on John Adams, John Quincy Adams, or Cooper, with the brief notices of Buchanan, Anna Dickinson, and similar celebrities of our day and country, will easily convince the critical examiner. The brevity of the notice of Jefferson Davis, and the judgment passed on him as leader of the Confederacy, show more than all how little the author is inclined to magnify or to criticise in accordance with newspaper talk. He seems, however, less free from a kind of patriotic Union bias in dealing with the generals of the civil war, as evinced in the notices of Banks, Butler, and others. Too great brevity in some of these notices also makes us regret a slight deviation, in the treatment of the events of that great struggle, from the "principles of perspective" so well established for the whole work. Thus, neither the notice of Butler nor that of Beauregard has any mention of the fact of those generals facing and fighting each other on the James; the latter article has hardly an allusion to that series of events; the notice of Breckenridge contains no mention of his appearing, with Early, before Washington, in July, 1864, only the defeat of their army by Sheridan being stated. In the notice of Burnside we also discover some slight inaccuracies in date—very slight ones, it is true: "Sept. 16," instead of Sept. 16–17, being given as the date of the battle of Antietam; "the 13th of December" as the day on which "he crossed the Rappahannock and attacked Lee's army" at Fredericksburg—which is correct only as regards the attack; and "May 9–11," with the omission of the 12th—the hottest day—as the date of the battle of Spottsylvania Court-House. But even errors so slight as these are exceedingly rare, which is saying a great deal, if we consider that the eight hundred pages before us—the whole will likely embrace about four times as many—contain myriads of dates. Omissions of facts and defective descriptions are much more frequent. Of this the notices of Alexander II. of Russia and of the Duchesse de Berry may serve as examples. Many heads, too, are wanting, such as, of the mythological, Dice; of the historical, Dellius; and of the literary, Büchner—names much more important than Bryczynski, Bube, or Du Buc, which we find on one page.

Of the peculiar features of this dictionary, its ample treatment of Norse and Hindoo mythology, its very rich bibliographical notes of reference appended to the more important articles, its systematic orthographical consistency—not to speak of its admirable correctness in spelling foreign words—and its elaborate pronunciation of the names, when first given, deserve particular mention. The utility, or, to speak more correctly, the necessity of the last-named feature is well illustrated by the author in his preface, in which he ridicules "the utter absurdity of attempting to pronounce foreign names according to the English sounds of the letters." "How, for example," he asks, "should we pronounce the name of the celebrated German poet HEINE, according to such a system? Should the ei be sounded like ee, as in the English words seize, ceiling, etc.? or like a, as in vein, weight, inveigh? or like long i, as in height, sleight, etc? Should HEINE, then, be pronounced heen, hān, or hīn? or should we sound the final e, and make it hee'ne, hā'ne, or hī'ne?" etc., etc. And it may be mentioned here that the author, after having devoted many years of study to the acquirement of a degree of Occidental linguistic knowledge sufficient for his task, in order more fully to prepare for it, spent nearly two years in the East, chiefly in Egypt and India, studying the rudiments, and particularly the pronunciation, of the Arabic, Persian, Sanscrit, and Hindostanee, and vastly extending, as many a page proves, his stock of general Oriental knowledge. Justice to the publisher also leads us to add that the mechanical execution of the work is in every respect worthy of its literary merits.

* "Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology. Containing Memoirs of the Eminent Persons of All Ages and Countries, and Accounts of the Various Subjects of the Norse, Hindoo, and Classic Mythologies, with the Pronunciation of their Names in the Different Languages in which they are Used. By J. Thomas, A.M., M.D., Author of the System of Pronunciation in 'Lippincott's Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World,' and of the Pronouncing Vocabularies of Biographical and Geographical Names in 'Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.'" Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1870. Parts I.—XII. Aa—Dufrénoy.

Alfred the Great. By Thomas Hughes, M.P., author of "Tom Brown's School Days." (New York: Macmillan & Co.)—Mr. Hughes's life of Alfred is a welcome addition to the excellent "Sunday Library" published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. It is such a book as we should expect from Mr. Hughes—a book with a direct, practical purpose, not merely the biography of a great man. He does not profess to be an original explorer in the history of those times; he accepts the results of the researches of men like Pauli, Freeman, and Pearson, and aims to turn the lessons of history to the account of the highest and most pressing needs of his own generation. "How are nations to be saved from the tyranny or domination of arbitrary will, whether of a Cæsar or of a mob? is the problem before us." In answer to this question, "he has learnt to look upon the Saxon King as the representative of the nation in contrast to the great Cæsar, so nearly his contemporary, whose aim was to weld together all nations and tribes in one lifeless empire under his own sceptre." Therefore, "it must be worth while to follow as faithfully as we can the simple, honest life of the great Saxon King, endeavoring to ascertain upon what ground that life and work of the ninth century stood, and whether the same ground abides in the nineteenth for all nations, alike for those who have visible kings and those who are without them" (Preface). Consistently with this professed aim, we find everywhere an earnest religious spirit characteristic of the author.

The book is divided—not in form, but really—into two parts. The first part, consisting of eleven chapters, brings Alfred's life and reign down to the Treaty of Wedmore in 878, when his struggle for his kingdom was victoriously completed, and he was left for some years to reign in quiet. This early period is related consecutively. But the remaining fifteen chapters, which treat of the rest of Alfred's reign, are not arranged chronologically, but the facts and events are grouped under several heads—"The King's Board of Works," "The King's War-office and Admiralty," "Laws," "Justice," "Exchequer," "Church," "Friends," "Neighbors," "Foe," etc. Probably no better arrangement could have been devised than this; down to 878, the interest centres in wars and battles; after that, in those administrative reforms and peaceful enterprises which were distributed through several years.

We cannot much blame anybody who fails to discriminate between the numerous and insignificant Charleses, Louises, and Carlomans who sat on the various thrones of France and Germany during the last half of the ninth century. Still, if they are to be mentioned at all, they should be accurately discriminated; and we will point out that, on p. 241, it was not Charles the Bald that was killed by a wild boar while hunting, in 885 (rather 884), but his grandson, Carloman. The death of Carloman was naturally "the signal for renewed activity amongst the Northmen," for the reason that the heir to the throne was the infant Charles the Simple, who, by reason of the disturbed state of affairs, was set aside, first in favor of his cousin, Charles the Fat, then of Eudes, Count of Paris. Of course, therefore, it was not Charles the Simple (p. 248), but his grandfather, Charles the Bald, who resisted Rollo in 876; for Charles the Bald died in 877. Charles the Simple did not become king until 898.

One is naturally tempted to compare this book with Mr. Freeman's "Old English History," which we noticed a few weeks ago. But, although the two cover partly the same ground, their aim and scope are so different that they cannot be fairly compared. With Mr. Freeman, history is the end, with Mr Hughes it is only a means; his narrative is not so graphic, his historical view is not so broad; but, after all, this only means that he has not done what he did not undertake to do—what he did undertake to do, he has done exceedingly well.

Our New Way Round the World. By Charles Carleton Coffin. (Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869.)—Mr. Coffin, better known as "Carleton," the quondam war-correspondent of the Boston Journal, left this city in July, 1866, and, after traversing Western Europe, passed by way of Egypt to India, China, and Japan; thence crossed the Pacific to San Francisco, and returned to Boston overland, by the new railroad. Our space forbids us to follow this world-traveller through all his experiences, and we can only say, in brief, that in the Levant his impressible nature was duly affected by the relics of antiquity, and that his imagination proved equal to the requirements of every historic site which he visited; though it must be stated that the events which he recalls under these circumstances are often more vividly than accurately set forth. At Bombay he falls in with the Parsees, but differs considerably from the received opinion in regard to their origin; and we cannot altogether accept his views of the history, philosophy, and religion of the Hindus. But he gives some pleasant descriptions of his travels across India, bearing testimony to the excellent moral as well as material effects of the railroad upon the people. A voyage from Calcutta, by the way of Singapore, lands him at last on the shores of China, to which empire he devotes twenty-three chapters of his book. His sketches of the government and religion of the Chinese are not so full or clear as we find in other works. His description of the habits and manners of the people, however, are often good. Mr. Coffin evidently means to be fair, and does not attempt to eulogize or satirize them, though the picture, on the whole, is not a very attractive one. He says decidedly "that the Chinese have not yet learned that honesty is the best policy;" but this defect is not peculiar to that people. He is very complimentary to the Protestant missionaries in China, speaking highly of their personal character, and of the good effects of their labors; says that they are much more intelligent and well-informed, as a rule, respecting the Chinese than those who are engaged in trade; and that, if it were not for the missionaries, the ministers and consuls would find it difficult to get on with their business. Respecting the Roman Catholic missionaries he speaks very unfavorably, evidently having derived his views from their Protestant rivals. His remarks upon the foreign commerce with China indicate rather confused notions in his own mind respecting it, and we cannot recommend that portion of his book as of much worth. He probably obtained his information upon the subject chiefly from his missionary friends, and he frankly admits that, "upon commercial matters, perhaps, their opinion would not be of so much value as those of the merchants." He did not visit the great capital of the empire, for the season of the year was unfavorable; so he passed over to Japan, and travelled for a considerable time among the islands, giving some lively sketches of what he saw there. Once more in his native land, he gives some account of California; but the special object of his interest there was the valley of the Yosemite and its lofty domes. Some of these grand natural features so powerfully affected him as to cause "his brain to reel—his breath to stop—his heart to cease to beat—for a moment;" and they inspired him to produce some of the most effective specimens of his favorite style of writing that the book affords. Travelling eastward, he stopped at Salt Lake City, and observed something of the Mormons; and, as a result, he has given us a catalogue of the names, ages, personal appearance, and character of the many wives of Brigham Young. Should these ladies, thanks to the suffrage lately bestowed upon them, arrive at political eminence, the editors of the daily press will be under obligations to Mr. Coffin for biographical material. Finally, our traveller reached his home in New England, after an absence of two years and five months, not without wise reflections, among which are two to which we heartily respond—namely: "America does not possess all the virtue in the world," and "We have yet much to learn." The book is illustrated with nearly a hundred engravings, and with several maps.

Widow Goldsmith's Daughter. By Julie P. Smith. (Hartford: Brown & Gross. 1870.)—Writing this novel seems to have been a labor of love to its author. To her, at least, her imaginary world and its people have been convincingly real, and she has painted them with a brisk confidence in her subject, and in her own ability to do it justice, which is far from unpleasant. It is not to be called a good novel, certainly, that she has produced. It is full, for instance, of laughable blunders—of misquotations, misuse of foreign expressions, of errors in syntax and orthography, even, with not more than half of which we should feel inclined to credit the proof-reader; and she holds up vulgar and commonplace people to ridicule in a way which, to say the least of it, is not suggestive of over-refinement on her own part. Her heroine, too, belongs to a type which seems to be fatally prevalent in our native novels—such of them, at least, as are written by women—the young woman who is tormented by a thirst for knowledge, who studies German while she washes her dishes, has a French grammar surreptitiously hidden in her mending-basket, and confounds her enemies and moves her lovers with fond pride by coming out at critical moments with pleasing facts in history or the last new thing in science. Still, much of Miss Smith's work is rather effectively done, and the way in which she displays her characters is often suggestive. Oddly enough, too, it is her faults that are her virtues; and with a more restrained vivacity and a keener sense of what ought to be omitted in making her studies from life, though she might produce more unexceptionable work, we doubt if she would be half so amusing as she is at present.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Benedict (Lieut. G. G.), Vermont at Gettysburg	(Burlington)
Boston Lectures. 1870. Christianity and Scepticism	(Cong. Pub. Soc.)
Beekman (J. W.), The Founders of New York, swd	(New York)
Culver (Rev. S. W.), Crowned and Discrowned	(Gould & Lincoln) $0 75
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 30 (Vol. I. A–H.)	(T. Ellwood Zell) $0 50
Chauvenet (Prof. W.), Treatise on Elementary Geometry	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Disraeli (Hon. B.), Lothair: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 00
Gratry (Rev. A.), Papal Infallibility Untenable, swd	(Hartford)
Goddard (S. A.), Letters on the American Rebellion	(Nichols & Noyes)
Gunning (W. D.), Is it the Despair of Science? swd	(Wm White & Co.)
Grey (Mrs.), A Marriage in High Life: a Tale, swd	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 50
Harrison (Rev. H.), Memoir of Hugh Davey Evans, LL.D	(Hartford) 0 75
Kapp (F.), Life of Maj.-Gen. John Kalb	(New York)
Koner (Prof. Dr. W.), Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, No. 26.	(L. W. Schmidt)
Lidell (Dr. J. A.) and Hamilton (Prof. F. H.), Surgical Memoirs of the War of the Rebellion	(Hurd & Houghton) 6 50
McCahon (J.), Cases Determined in the Supreme Court of Kansas	(Callaghan & Cockcroft)
Marsh (Hon. G. P.), L'Uomo e la Natura, swd	(G. Barbèra)
Riggs (S. R.), Táh-Koo Wah-Kán: the Gospel among the Dakotas	(Boston)
Rogers (Prof. J. E. T.), Manual of Political Economy	(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Rodney (R. B.), Alboin and Rosamond, and Lesser Poems	(Philadelphia)
Spielhagen (F.), Hammer and Anvil: a Tale	(Leypoldt & Holt) 2 00
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.) and Baden (Mrs. F. E.), The Christmas Guest, and Other Stories	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Young Wife's Cook Book	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Men who Advertise	(G. P. Rowell & Co.)
Watson (Dr. W. H.), Allopathic Bigotry, swd	(Albany)
Waterbury (Rev. J. B.), Memoir of Rev. John Scudder, M.D	(Harper & Bros.)
Wallace (A. R.), Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection	(Macmillan & Co.)
Wister (Mrs. O.), Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Alfred de Musset	(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50

A Student of Harvard College desires a position of private tutor to one or more pupils during the Summer vacation, between June and October.

Address "Student," Hollis 27, Cambridge, Mass.

REFERENCES: Dr. A. P. Peabody, Cambridge; Prof. F. Bowen, Cambridge; Dr. H. W. Bellows, 232 East Fiftee th Street, New York; Mr. M. W. Lyon—School, 161 Fifth Avenue.

Bookcase, or Bookcase and Secretary combined, wanted at a moderate price. Address, with particulars of size, materials, etc.,

J. KIRBY, 244 East Thirty-second Street.

Monthly Numbers, 50 Cents.
Yearly Volumes, $7 50 and $9 each.

NUMBERS 1 TO 17 NOW PUBLISHED. SENT FREE BY MAIL ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED TRAVELS AROUND THE WORLD.

A SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED AND AUTHENTIC WORK OF TRAVEL.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

R. TURNER, Manager.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co.), 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

SPIELHAGEN'S MASTERPIECE.

JUST PUBLISHED,

HAMMER AND ANVIL.

Attention is invited to the following selections from the large number of favorable opinions, expressed by authoritative critics, of the merits of the novels of Friedrich Spielhagen:

"Such a novel as no English author with whom we are acquainted could have written, and no American author except Hawthorne.—Putnam's Magazine.

"These characters live, they are men and women, and the whole mystery of humanity is upon each of them."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"Terse, pointed, brilliant, rapid, and no dreamer, he has the best traits of the French manner, while in earnestness and fulness of matter he is thoroughly German."—Boston Commonwealth.

"It stands far above any of the productions of either Freytag or Auerbach."—N. Y. Times.

"To Friedrich Spielhagen, comparatively a new-comer in America, must be granted the first place among modern German novelists."—Boston Post.

"Vastly superior to the bulk of English novels which are annually poured out upon us—as much above Trollope's as Steinberger Cabinet is better than London porter."—Springfield Republican.

THE NOVELS OF FRIEDRICH SPIELHAGEN.

In uniform style. 12*mo, cloth,* $2 per volume.

I. HAMMER AND ANVIL. Translated by William Hand Browne.
II. THE HOHENSTEINS. Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere. Second Edition.
III. THROUGH NIGHT TO LIGHT. Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere. Third Edition. Thoroughly revised.
IV. PROBLEMATIC CHARACTERS. Translated by Prof. Schele de Vere. Third Edition.
V. IN RANK AND FILE. (In preparation.)
VI. ROSE, AND THE VILLAGE COQUETTE. (In preparation.)

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, 25 Bond Street, New York.

NOW READY.

Price reduced from $4 to $2 50. A New and Cheaper Edition of

SINAI AND PALESTINE,

In connection with their History. By ARCHBISHOP STANLEY, Author of History of the "Eastern" and "Jewish Churches," etc., and unform with those volumes. 8vo, 591 pp., well printed in clear type, on fine paper, price $2 50, containing all the maps and plates of the fine edition.

A NEW AND HANDSOME EDITION OF

Wit and Wisdom of Sidney Smith;

Selected from his Writings, and Passages of his Letters and Table-talk. Edited, with Memoir and Notes, by E. A. DUYCKINCK.

 A choice impression of this valuable book, on tinted paper, with Steel Portrait and fac-simile Letter. Small 8vo, cloth extra, $2 25.

W. J. WIDDLETON, Publisher,

27 Howard Street, New York.

For sale at principal Book-Stores.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

Rare London Books,

IN ALL LANGUAGES AND EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE, SUITABLE FOR PRIVATE LIBRARIES AND PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

The attention of the literary public is respectfully requested to our extensive assortment of books, now offered for sale AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. The net prices are plainly marked in each volume, thus obviating the annoyance of pricing any work.

About due at this Port, and will open in a few days, a large and fine Invoice, carefully selected in the best foreign markets.

Importations by every steamer. Catalogues issued regularly and forwarded to any address, gratis, on application.

A. L. LUYSTER,

London, and 138 Fulton Street (Up Stairs), NEW YORK,

ESTABLISHED 1840.

POLYDORI VERGILII DE RERUM INVENTORIBUS. The last publication of the Agathynian Club. Superbly printed, paper cover, 8vo, price $3.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address PUBLISHER OF THE "NATION," Box 6732, New York City.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1870.

The Week.

LAST week was entirely consumed by the Senate in passing its bill to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment, and the measure which emerged on Saturday morning, after an all-night session, could only by miracle have been free from imperfections. While its chief object was to protect the colored citizen, Mr. Sherman contrived to make it also a means of preserving the purity of the ballot-box against white "repeating," false registering, false voting, and other approved Democratic machinery. The House passed on Wednesday week the Naval Appropriation Bill, and has since been engaged on the Diplomatic. On Thursday, Mr. Brooks attempted to make a little capital for himself and his party by moving to appoint a Minister to Rome, while the bill only provides for a consul. The scene which followed was almost childish at times, and the heat and bad temper and worse manners evoked were ridiculously out of proportion to the kernel of debate. Mr. Dawes and Mr. Hoar were more than an even match for Mr. Brooks and his allies, while Mr. Bingham's oratory was something to which neither the latter nor many other citizens could well aspire.

The Senate bill has twenty-one sections, and the principal provisions are: Election officers shall omit nothing that will enable citizens to qualify impartially. If the offer to qualify is refused by a judge or inspector, it shall be the same as if accepted. To obstruct the exercise of the suffrage by bribery, force, or intimidation, or by threats to discharge from employment, of ejection, or of harm to the voter's family, are punishable crimes. To oppress or hinder a citizen in respect of any constitutional right by Kuklux conspiracies, is felony, punishable in addition to actual crimes thus committed. United States District and Circuit Courts have concurrent jurisdiction of offences against the act. District attorneys must prosecute, marshals and their deputies must perform their usual duties; the Circuit Courts must, from time to time, increase the number of Commissioners to carry out the act. The latter may create special officers, besides the marshals, who may call on the posse comitatus, the land and naval forces, for assistance. Persons not members of State Legislatures, or of Congress, holding office in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, shall be prosecuted by District Attorneys by quo warranto. To accept office when knowingly disqualified is a misdemeanor. All citizens shall have equal civil rights in all the several States, and immigrants must be taxed alike. Repeating, preventing lawful exercise of the suffrage, false registering or keeping from registering, are punishable crimes; if they defeat the election of a Federal candidate, he may recover his place by quo warranto.

Of the financial legislation of Congress there is nothing new to report, and it is almost safe to assert there will be nothing new. The Tariff Bill, after five months' labor, has been killed; the Funding Bill is as good as killed, and nobody believes its passage is possible; about the currency nothing has been done or attempted. The truth is that the present Congress, not having been elected on financial issues, is utterly incompetent to deal with them, and has never wanted to do so. The attempts which have been made in this direction have been made in obedience to the loud demands of the public, but without the design or the courage to put any plan into execution. The only men who have known from the outset what they wanted have been the high-tariff men, but their schemes have failed, partly owing to the exorbitance of their claims and partly to their quarrelling among themselves. The great mass of members in both Houses have, however, been in a state of utter bewilderment or ignorance on all that relates to the revenues and the currency. They were all elected on the Reconstruction issue, and have accordingly clung to the Reconstruction business as long as possible, and have done their best to exalt its importance and intricacy, feeling that if it were finished they would be out of work. This more than anything else has led to the Georgia scandal. Now that the Reconstruction is over, however, and the country sick of it, there remains chaos. It is safe to say there will be no serious attempts made to deal with the financial situation till a House has been elected on financial issues, and the mind of the country on its leading points been thus clearly expressed.

Mr. Wells has been assailed in succession by the iron, woollen, and cotton interests, and we think we are expressing the opinion of all candid observers when we say that he has in each contest come off more than victorious. The three interests, however, combined their forces last week in the Committee on Manufactures, and secretly prepared a majority report, which was a general review of his statements, and if he had not got wind of it, and it had got into circulation alone, of course it would have been very difficult for him to follow it and meet it, as it would have been circulated at the public expense. The minority, however, let him know what was coming, and he prepared a reply which they have adopted as their report, so that the attack and defence go out together, and we are sure will be good reading, and, we trust, will be widely read.

The Republican party has fared badly in New York at the judicial election, the Democrats getting 60,000 majority in the city, and, it is estimated, 20,000 in the State, and electing as much of their ticket as, under the minority representation rule, it was possible to elect—that is, two out of five judges. Judicially, the Democratic candidates were as good as could be desired, and the State has now a court of last resort which will compare favorably with any similar tribunal in the world, and will before long rescue New York reports from the disrepute into which they have fallen in the eyes of the profession. This, it must be admitted, is—bad as things look in this city and at Albany—a great step in an upward direction. We have one spot of solid ground under our feet at last, even admitting that fourteen years is not as good as a life tenure.

How the Republican party came to be so badly beaten does not seem difficult of explanation. In this city the party is utterly disorganized, partly owing to the conviction that it is useless to contend against the now well-organized and apparently unpreventable frauds of the Democracy, and partly owing to the equally widespread and well-founded conviction that the party is managed by knaves, who keep up the organization simply for the purpose of dividing the Federal offices amongst themselves and occasionally selling out to the Democrats. Mr. Greeley, egged on by the Union League Club, has of late been taking occasional dives into the pond for the purpose of finding out how the water comes to be so dirty, but his flounderings invariably give it a darker tinge, and he comes up looking very slimy, and very funny, to the great amusement of the bystanders of both parties. It is the custom of the press—a melancholy custom, we think, and now more honored in the breach than in the observance—about this time to abuse our "respectable citizens" for not going to the primary meetings and attending to their political duties. It is now well established however, that respectable citizens will not attend primary meetings. We might as well ask them to bathe off the city piers on warm afternoons, and we cordially recommend our brethren to devote themselves to the discovery of some means of carrying on the government without primary meetings—in other words, of adapting the political machinery to the people who have to work it. The present system is nearly as great a failure as the theocratic rule of his Majesty the Sultan.

The condition of the Republican party in the State is not so easily accounted for; but it may safely be said that the goodness of the Democratic judicial ticket did something for their defeat, and apathy did the rest. Apathy is a bad thing, but it is a thoroughly human weakness, and anybody who reviews the history of the party during the past year will not be too severe upon it. With a large majority in Congress, the party has neither reformed the tariff nor the Civil Service, nor funded the debt nor contracted the currency, nor seriously reduced the taxes, nor completed the work of reconstruction; nay, it has brought discredit on what reconstruction it has done by its performances over the Georgia matter. What has been done to improve the public credit has been done by Mr. Boutwell without the slightest help from Congress. Indeed, if it were not for the badness of the Democratic party, it would be difficult to urge a single reason why the popular confidence in the Republican party should be continued. But the popular dread of the Democrats is a thing that naturally wears out with time and use, and under the pressure of such spectacles as the Bullock investigation and the Hartford and Erie operations in Massachusetts. It can never under the most favorable circumstances be made to take the place of positive achievement, and it is to be hoped that the leaders in Congress will not fall into the error of going before the people in the fall with nothing better to show for their labor than they can produce at present. There are eight weeks of the session left in which many useful things are possible.

Our readers may remember that when Mr. Trumbull, some weeks ago, made his severe summing up of the "Georgia difficulty," he hinted in very plain terms that the patriots of the Bullock faction had been guilty of both corruption and intimidation in trying to get their "Reconstruction" bill through, installing themselves in office for two years. By many people this charge was ascribed partly to Mr. Trumbull's hatred of the black man, and partly to his hostility to the pure and good of all colors, and doubtless some asked themselves, as they asked themselves when the Traitor Ross refused to give up his chair to Senator Revels, for the sake of the dramatic unities: "What else can we expect of a man who voted No on the Eleventh Article?" A committee of the Senate was, however, appointed to look into the matter, and they have taken a great mass of testimony and submitted their report. Their finding is—and we blush as we write it—that Bullock and his friends have been for a long time in Washington, complaining of the Kuklux Klan, and asking fresh guarantees for "the persecuted Unionists" of Georgia; that somehow or other, while there, they have had a great deal of money and railroad bonds, which they seemed to have no particular use for themselves; that they tried unsuccessfully to purchase the votes of Senators Carpenter and Tipton against the Bingham Amendment; that harrowing reports of "outrages" in Georgia were actually prepared to order, like boots or dinners, furnished to them and paid for; that the writing of threatening letters to senators was procured in the same manner; that $4,000 were paid to that good and great man, Colonel Forney, of the Washington Chronicle, for "advertising and printing speeches and documents," the Colonel's editorial denunciations of the opponents of the Georgia Bill, we suppose, being thrown into the bargain. The Washington correspondent of the Boston Advertiser—a wicked fellow—adds that some of the witnesses when first examined "were very loth to tell what they knew, and indulged in the tallest kind of lying." The report of the committee is unanimous.

The result of this exposé probably will be that the Georgia question will at last, after a year's delay, filled with this lying and intrigue and corruption, be settled as it ought to have been settled at the outset, by handing the State government back to the electors on the same terms as Virginia, and letting the "Bullock faction" go home and find some means of gaining an honest livelihood. We hope to chronicle this termination of the affair before long, and our readers will bear witness that we have from the outset predicted what has now been revealed; and we cannot help adding that the way the Republican press has either connived at or kept silent over the doings of this disreputable gang, in the belief or under the pretence that they were helping on the work of Reconstruction and of rebel "repentance," has been anything but creditable. With very few exceptions, the papers have treated the ravings of Messrs. Drake and Morton and Stewart on this subject as solid "chunks of wisdom," the Bullockites all the while laughing in their sleeves and chuckling over their prospective plunder. We cannot pass from the affair, however, without bearing hearty testimony to the services which Mr. Trumbull has, by his attitude in it from the very beginning, rendered to truth, justice, good government, and civilization. He has made every honest man, North and South, his debtor, not for being able, for this he cannot help, but for being bold, and hitting hard. "By Time," says Hosea Biglow, "I du like a man that ain't afeard!"

Talking of carpet-baggers, we may be allowed to ask the Independent, apropos of its "rebuttal," a fortnight ago, of our statement about the ignorance of the members of the South Carolina Legislature, a few questions which we hope will not be deemed impertinent about the witness it summoned to convict us of misrepresentation—Mr. Niles G. Parker, the present State Treasurer. It says "he has been nine years a resident of South Carolina, was a Captain in the 33d U. S. C. T., that as State Treasurer he has restored the State to solvency, and has obtained for himself the respect of business men acquainted with her affairs both in this country and in Europe." We should now like the Independent to inform us whether Mr. Parker himself is the kind of politician who is likely to be much troubled by the educational deficiencies of the Legislature? Also, what his occupation and his reputation were in Haverhill, Massachusetts, where he lived, before he enlisted in the 1st Massachusetts Cavalry? What his reputation was in that regiment? What kind of officer Colonel Higginson found him in the colored regiment in which he afterwards got a company? In short, we should like to know what was the nature of the preparation for the responsible office of State Treasurer which he underwent, and by what sort of process he became a South Carolina functionary whose bare statement is to be received as conclusive proof.

The Charleston (S. C.) Daily Republican, the official paper of the State, notices what we recently said about the ignorance of the members of the last Legislature, but does not contradict it. It confines itself prudently to general statements of "the grand work" done by that body. Now we should like the Republican to inform us plumply what number of the members were, in its opinion, able to read a page of the "Pilgrim's Progress" decently, or intelligibly, or to read a page of plain writing at all. We will agree at the outset to admit either of these exploits to be as "grand work" as ever was done by a statesman; but let us have a direct answer, without "ifs" or "buts" or other qualifications, and, if possible, fortified with a little proof, in the shape of statistics.

The official correspondence of the State Department with the Governor of Michigan, who had taken the responsibility of stopping the British steamer Chicora at the Sault Canal, has been published. The Governor's action was approved on the supposition that the steamer was carrying stores and arms for the expedition going to the Winnepeg region; but on representations from the British minister that she was only laden with goods for the Hudson's Bay Company she was allowed to pass through. There was not, in either case, any ground for the prohibition. There was no war raging in the North-west of which our Government had any knowledge, and therefore there could be no belligerent character of any kind attaching to the vessel or her contents; and if there had been a "war" at Winnipeg the prohibition would have been odd, because the Canadian canals, through which a vast American commerce passes, were freely used by the United States, even for the passage of public ships during the rebellion; and it would not have been expedient, because the Canadians might retaliate by closing the Welland and St. Lawrence Canal; and it would not have been creditable, because no people should voluntarily make asses of themselves. Apropos of this affair, there are at the present writing many rumors afloat of the old sort about the departure of "bands" of Fenians for the frontier. There is no doubt of the concentration of a certain number of evil-disposed persons along the Canada line, and the movement is sufficiently threatening to have drawn from the President a very proper proclamation of warning. As usual, the Fenian chiefs are divided as to the opportuneness of the present attack, but Gen. O'Neill seems to have prevailed as the "man of action."

In Pennsylvania, the political nominating conventions will be held next month. The Republicans of Philadelphia are as usual divided into many cliques, the division into Cameron men and anti-Cameron being perhaps the broadest. The contest for local offices has become so violent as to cause a quarrel in the somewhat famous club of young Republicans called the Invincibles, that may end in a split, and even in their dissolution. The judicial nominations are likely to excite a livelier interest than common, owing to recent legislation, by which authority has been given to supplement the salary paid to the judges as State officers with a considerable addition out of the city treasury. As the city is the most frequent and the largest party litigant in the city courts, there is a manifest impropriety in its having the power to increase or diminish the income of judges who are to pass upon its causes. At all events, an additional and unnecessary strain is put upon the virtue of an elective judiciary, its independence is still further compromised, and the proper valuation of the services of the bench is less likely than ever to be brought home to the public mind.

A convention of the Indian Commission has been held in this city, to talk over the rather lamentable state of affairs on the Plains, where a general Indian war has for some time been threatening. The most interesting feature of the proceedings was the reading of a letter from Secretary Cox, who said that the Commission had been organized by the President, and the Indian agencies given to members of the Society of Friends, with the view of bringing the moral and religious portion of the community into more immediate contact and sympathy with the Government work among the savages, but the result had not by any means answered expectation, inasmuch as very few people had ever shown the slightest interest in the movement. This is certainly rather discouraging, and not easily explained. When one considers the amount of abuse expended on the troops for their mode of dealing with the Indians, one naturally presumes that there must be hundreds at least ready and willing to show the soldiers the more excellent way. General Sherman wrote a short and rather discourteous letter to the Convention, saying the matter was a practical one and not one of feeling, and could only be settled on the spot. He came near touching the great fact which lies at the basis of the whole difficulty, which is, that the manners and morals of the white frontiersmen are part, and the most important part, of the Indian problem. To solve it, either the frontier whites must be evangelized or the Indians removed. Red Cloud and Spotted Tail and others are, we are glad to see, coming to Washington. We trust they will see while there the great white chiefs, the Black-haired-Energy-of-the-Impeachment, the Strong-Wind-Blowing-Aft, and the Apostle-John-of-Salvation-by-Impeachment.

The detailed news from Greece about the late massacres sheds some interesting light on the social and political condition of the country. Everything goes to show that the mass of the people are, considering their poverty and misgovernment, very respectable. It is the Athenian politicians who, unlike those of any other country out of the planet Jupiter, are corrupt, depraved, and, indeed, worthless. Mr. Watkin, who made the first railway in Greece, last year, from Athens to the Piræus, and from the Ilyssus to the ancient watering-place of Phalerum, which during the first year of their operation carried one million passengers, writes to the London Times to say that "he has formed a high opinion of the industry, sobriety, and capacity of the real working population, and of the resources of the country at large;" that the true cure for brigandage is roads; that it was roads which put an end to highway robbery in the Scotch Highlands, and even in the neighborhood of London only a century ago; that five hundred miles of good common roads, with police stations and telegraph lines, could be opened up through the country—thus bringing a large area of fertile soil within reach of a market—with the labor of the country, and within five years, for $3,000,000—that is, just the sum which it is calculated the Greeks at home and abroad contributed to the expenses of the Cretan insurrection, and a large part of which was expended in conveying to and fro and feeding the cut-throats who committed the recent outrages, and have ever since been living on the unfortunate peasantry. But nothing Greece can do will put an end to brigandage completely without the co-operation of Turkey, as whenever the brigands are hard pressed they pass the frontier, which is along the whole line a wilderness, or the next thing to it, and practically unguarded.

As an illustration of the way in which the politicians get the better of the people, we may mention that, when the Greek Constitution was revised in 1864, an article was inserted prohibiting the granting of amnesties, in order to put it out of the power of the ministry of the day to shield the brigands, whom, as they occupy somewhat the same relation to the majority in the parliament that office-holders and office-seekers occupy here, it was found impossible to bring to justice. The brigands who "worked" to get the ministry turned out, of course were always amnestied by their successors, if they cared for an amnesty; and as each party wanted to use them, it was as difficult to get active measures taken for their punishment as it would be to get our House of Representatives to pass a Civil Service bill, or give up rotation in office. Curiously enough, however, in this last case this very prohibition was cunningly turned against the ministry, the "opposition," on finding that the prisoners would be ransomed, having urged the brigands to insist on an amnesty, and the head brigand coolly suggested that, if this would be unconstitutional, they might amend the constitution. It must be remembered that these Athenian politicians are preparing themselves for the restoration of the Eastern Empire, and, like some of their brethren elsewhere, are so occupied with annexation of distant islands and the absorption of strange races and the confounding of foreign powers, that the condition of the land they live in does not give them the least concern. Their world is a world of dreams, in which of course everything goes well.

The Spaniards seem at last to have found a king in Espartero, but his origin, his age and antecedents seem to make it pretty certain that his reign will be simply a transition to a republic, not of the modern democratic type, perhaps, but of the Roman type—that is, a government of orators, lawyers, and generals, especially generals—tempered by strong popular traditions and discontent. Portugal, which has kept quiet thus far, has had a little coup d'état, the old Duke of Saldanha having overturned the ministry at the head of the army, apparently to the amusement of the public, and with complete indifference on the part of the king. The beauty of the affair is that it exhibits constitutional monarchy in a more advanced stage than it has ever before reached. All that it has been hitherto supposed capable of bearing was the parliamentary contests of the two great parties, but in Portugal it stands firm while the opposition expels the ministry from office and takes its place at the point of the bayonet.

There has been but little progress made in France in throwing more light on the conspiracy. The fact that a conspiracy was got up before in 1852, immediately before the plébiscite which established the Empire, which was never heard of after the vote was taken, combined with the fact that nobody appeared to have been actively engaged in the present one, even on the showing of the police, except Baurie or Beaury—a vagabond of very bad character—has thrown doubt on the whole story in the minds of the Parisians, in spite of the elaborate report of M. Grandperret, the Procureur-Général, who made the most of it. The only trace of Flourens' connection with the plot was his somewhat obscure letter found in Baurie's pocket, and Paul de Cassagnac came out in the Pays with an amusing swashbuckler's expression of doubt, whether a man who had "crossed swords with him" and "bared his breast" to him could be an assassin. The last news says, however, that Flourens has admitted his connection with the plot, and left London, but has offered no explanation as to its nature. Everybody seems disposed to admit that it is the violence of the Irreconcilables which has given the Emperor his majority, so that the police might save themselves the trouble of getting plots up.

SOWING THE WIND AND REAPING THE WHIRLWIND.

THERE is a struggle going on this moment in Massachusetts to which we respectfully ask the attention of honest men, and indeed of rogues, in all parts of the country, for it is full of doctrine, of reproof and instruction. Massachusetts has a half-finished railroad, known to the world as the Hartford and Erie, which has been, and is now at this moment, in the hands of two or three men, whose knavery nobody has any longer the hardihood to deny. These men came before the Legislature three years ago, and persuaded the State to advance them $3,000,000 to help to complete the road. The conditions of the advance were that, for every $200,000 expended by them, the State was to give them $100,000, and the Company was represented as having $2,000,000 in its possession, with which it would be able to fulfil its part of the agreement. To see that it fulfilled it, and that it properly expended two dollars for every dollar advanced by the State, three commissioners of high character were appointed, without whose certificate the money was not to be paid over to the company. After these commissioners had paid over $600,000 they began to suspect things were not right, instituted an examination, and found that nothing was left of the $2,000,000 reported to be in possession of the company, the knaves having spent it all in speculating in their own stock. The commissioners therefore refused to certify for any more advances of the State money. Whereupon the knaves went to the Legislature, asked for a new loan of $2,000,000, and got it, and moreover succeeded in having the troublesome commissioners legislated out of office. They then went to work and spent the $2,000,000 also. The road is still unfinished and bankrupt. When its affairs were overhauled last winter, it was found that its capital consisted of a four-hundred-dollar bond and a ten-dollar bill. The knaves, nevertheless, are now before the Legislature again, asking for another loan of $3,500,000, and the committee has actually reported in favor of their getting it, of course with due safeguards as to the proper expenditure of the money—as if any safeguards were, or could be, worth anything since the knaves last winter procured the dismissal from office of the very men whom the commonwealth had set to watch them. The Governor, who weakly helped them in getting their second loan, and who weakly—though this is a mild word—connived at their overthrow of the commissioners, now acknowledges that the whole thing has been a swindle from beginning to end; everybody sees it was a swindle; indeed the knaves themselves are willing to acknowledge that it was a first-class swindle—if only they can get this last $3,500,000 paid over to them. Nay, they are, we believe, not particularly anxious that it should now be paid over to them; all they require is that it should be paid over to somebody for the benefit of the road, and are willing to trust to their luck and ingenuity to enable them to get at the fund as soon as the public attention has been turned in some other direction.

To appreciate the full importance of all this, we must remember that throughout these nefarious transactions the Boston press has remained silent and indifferent; that with these evidences of the futility of all precautions against swindling, as long as the State has anything to do with the road, before its eyes, it is at this moment advocating this last advance, with greater or less fervor; that the task of exposing all this villany has been left to the Springfield Republican, a paper published a hundred miles from the place where the Legislature sits and the knaves operate, and that to bring the facts before the public mind in the State capital a new paper, called the Tocsin, has actually been started; that the Massachusetts Legislature has always, and especially of late years, stood higher than any other at the North, and has been generally taken to be, and we believe justly, harder either to corrupt or to hoodwink. Nevertheless, we say deliberately that, low as that at Albany stands, we know of nothing in its history which is more alarming, or threatens greater danger to the pockets and morals of the community, than what is occurring in Boston, and we say this with the operations of Fisk and Gould fully in our mind. Considering what the character of great railroad operators has become; considering what the character of politicians is known to be; considering the apathy with which the public now listens to stories of corruption and abuse; and considering what "potentiality of growing rich" State grants in aid of corporations may be made, and are getting to be, the failure of the Massachusetts Legislature to resist the pressure, and the tameness of the Massachusetts public, in presence of this last great, deliberate, and long-protracted fraud, is enough to excite alarm in the mind of every man in every part of the country who has anything which a knot of politicians can vote away from him and tax-gatherers lay hands on.

And now, what is the lesson of all this? What do we mean by heading this article "Sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind"? We mean that the success of the Hartford and Erie swindle, in the richest, most intelligent, and perhaps, all things considered, most respectable political community in the world, is the direct and palpable consequence of that shameless indifference to the character of public men which a considerable and influential portion of the Republican party in Massachusetts, as well as elsewhere—we were going to say in Massachusetts more than elsewhere—has during the last five or six years not only winked at, but actually cultivated and exulted in. We now see, what it is disgraceful that civilized men should ever have forgotten, that character is the only sure defence of property or institutions. Laws and constitutions are but parchment; they are often the finest reading where the people are most debased; they depend for their whole value on the integrity and courage and self-respect of the men who are to execute them, and the way to have that integrity and courage and self-respect at command when we need it is to honor and reward those who show it. A portion of the Massachusetts press and some of its politicians have, however, ever since the war steadily decried and derided all show of independence and uprightness in public men, and patted on the back, honored, and rewarded any charlatan or jobber who threw his cap in the air for the "main question," and gloried in his want of conscience, and his servile submission of his soul to any caucus who thought him worth using. Even the Springfield Republican permitted party bravoes to revile and ridicule men like Fessenden and Trumbull in its columns for professing to have "consciences" and scruples, and to feel bound by "oaths" (as if it was not consciences and scruples and oaths that held society together), and to glorify Butler for his proposal to cheat the Government creditors in the interest of "the poor man." But we must not be deceived; the laws of the moral world cannot be suspended either for the Fifteenth Amendment or any other great measure. They work, no matter what happens, and retribution reaches those who disregard them, and often through even such vile instruments as an Eldridge or a Drew. Dr. Freeman Clarke, a leading Boston minister, has, we see, been roused by the subject into making some trenchant remarks in the pulpit on the morals of the politicians; but if he wants to go to the root of the evil he must go farther back than the Hartford and Erie swindle. He must touch on the deliberate elevation to the highest place of the base, jobbing, unscrupulous element in politics which the State has been witnessing for some years back.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF ILLINOIS.

OBSERVERS at a distance will look at the new constitution of Illinois to discover, if they can, any evidences of a change in the public mind regarding the principles of social science and their application to the fundamental law of the community. Among the evils which afflict American States, special legislation is perhaps the most grievous, because the most widespread. Illinois has evidently had her share of it, for we find that the new constitution prohibits it altogether in twenty-two enumerated cases, including the granting or amending of charters of cities and towns, the granting or amending of charters of private corporations of any description, the granting of rights to lay railroad tracks to be operated by steam or horse-power, the creating of fees for public officers, locating or vacating of streets or roads, establishing ferries or toll-bridges, etc. All rights and privileges of this kind are hereafter to be conferred by general laws, of uniform operation, but no law can be passed making an irrevocable grant of special privileges or immunities. The other enumerated cases in which special legislation is prohibited are chiefly of a local character, but not the less important, since the time of a legislature is often frittered away on bills authorizing school districts to borrow money, locating or changing county-seats, regulating the jurisdiction of courts, changing the names of persons and places, and tinkering the minor details of county and township affairs—rendering it necessary to pass bills in the "omnibus" fashion, so that any expert in legislation can usually get any bill passed without letting his colleagues, and much less the public, know what it contains. The private laws of the last session of the Illinois Legislature fill five large volumes, and it is safe to say that nobody but the transcribing clerks and the proof-readers know what is in them. There is to be an end of all this folly and knavery. Whether the prohibition of special legislation will utterly extinguish the "third house," as the lobby is denominated in Illinois, it is perhaps too early to determine; but, with the disappearance of special charters for public and private corporations, the subsistence department of the lobby will be reduced to what they can steal from the State treasury.

And here we find very limited picking, for the State is prohibited from contracting any debt beyond $250,000 (except in cases of war or insurrection), and from lending its credit to any person or corporation, or making appropriations to any railroad or canal, and from discharging or releasing any indebtedness due to itself. Counties, cities, and towns are prohibited from contracting debts (including present indebtedness) exceeding five per cent. of the assessed value of their property; and a clause is submitted to a separate vote of the people, prohibiting counties, cities, and towns from lending their credit to private corporations, or taking stock in the same, or making donations thereto. This was one of the vexed questions of the Convention. Illinois has a railroad mania at the present time, and many of her local communities are voting themselves into debt with an alacrity truly astonishing. Railroad companies, without capital or credit, are obtaining subscriptions of "bonds" from towns, in some cases up to the full assessed value of the real and personal property of the communities, the assessed value being about one-third of the actual value; and this in face of the fact that a large number of towns and counties in the neighboring State of Iowa, which had a similar experience some sixteen years ago, are now in the hands of the United States Marshal, who holds executions against them for unpaid interest to an amount greater than the original debts. The principle upon which these municipal subscriptions are voted was ably discussed in the Illinois Convention. It was contended, on the one hand, that no majority, however large, can lawfully place a mortgage on the property of a dissenting taxpayer for any other than a corporate purpose; and, on the other, in a republican government, a majority can do anything. A compromise was effected by submitting the question to a separate vote, the result of which will be looked for with interest second only to that upon the constitution itself. It is impossible to reprobate too severely the theory that A and B, who perhaps have no property, can vote the farm of C as a donation to D, on the pretence that D is about to do something for the common benefit of A, B, and C. When republican government takes this shape, we may well ask what it remains for despotism to do.

The Convention adopted the self-districting system of Ohio for apportioning members of the Legislature, thus dispensing with the process technically known as "gerrymandering," or the arrangement of districts to give an undue proportion of members to the political party which happens to be in power immediately after each new census is taken. According to the Ohio system, the county is taken as the unit of political division, except in counties having more than 200,000 inhabitants, there being only one such county in Illinois. It is unnecessary, for the purposes of this article, to examine the details of the system. It is sufficient that the apportionment of legislative districts is established on a mathematical and not a partisan basis, and that it is beyond the reach of politicians, whatever may happen. Nothing but changes of population or changes of ideas can effect a change in the complexion of the Legislature. This is a very notable reform, but not so notable as the proposed adoption of the principle of minority representation, which is submitted to the people for a separate vote, in the following form:

"The House of Representatives shall consist of three times the number of the members of the Senate, and the term of office shall be two years. Three Representatives shall be elected in each senatorial district at the general election in the year A.D. 1872, and every two years thereafter. In all elections of Representatives aforesaid, each qualified voter may cast as many votes for one candidate as there are Representatives to be elected, or may distribute the same, or equal parts thereof, among the candidates, as he shall see fit; and the candidates highest in votes shall be declared elected."

If this separate clause is ratified, it takes the place of the plan of apportionment in the body of the constitution. This plan for minority representation is commonly called the "cumulative system." Under it, each voter may cast one vote for each of three candidates, or three votes for one candidate, or one and one-half for each of two candidates. A special election is to be held in Cook County (Chicago), on the 2d of July, for three judges, in which the principle of the "limited vote" is to be tested, each elector being entitled to vote for only two candidates. Whether the minority representation clause will be ratified by the people is a question involved in considerable doubt. It has to encounter not only the prejudice which assails every reform, but the ignorance which rejects everything not easily understood, and the selfishness which prompts the majority party in the particular locality where it is dominant to reject anything which looks to giving the opposite faction any chance to get its head above water.

In the treatment of corporations, the constitution proposes some radical and novel changes. It cannot be alleged that the Convention was controlled by railroad companies, for it has assumed not only to confer upon the Legislature the right to establish maximum rates of freight and passenger fare, but to make it an imperative duty to do so. The courts will probably hold that, if the Legislature does not already possess the power to establish such rates of freight and fare on existing railroads, the new constitution cannot confer it. If a railway charter heretofore granted is a contract, no law can be passed impairing its obligation. Indeed, the bill of rights in the instrument under discussion prohibits the passage of such laws, and, if it did not, the United States Constitution certainly does. This objection, however, does not apply as regards railways hereafter constructed, and it remains to be seen whether the new provision will facilitate the construction of new roads. Overissues of stock are prohibited, and all stock dividends, or other fictitious increase of capital stock or indebtedness, declared null and void. It is provided, also, that no stock shall be issued for cash actually paid, except after sixty days' public notice. These provisions are of great importance, not only to the bona-fide stockholder, but to the morals of the community, and are undoubtedly within the scope of the powers of the constitution. It is provided, further, that in all elections of directors or managers of corporations, each stockholder may vote as many shares as he holds for as many directors as are to be elected, or may multiply the number of his shares by the number of directors, and cast them all for one person, or may distribute them as he chooses. This is extending the principle of minority representation to private corporations, and must be regarded as a healthy reform, whether it is legally applicable to existing corporations or not. It is provided, also, that a majority of the directors of all railroad corporations created by the laws of Illinois shall be residents and citizens of that State. The common-law principle on this point is that a corporation can have its domicile only in the State where its charter is obtained, but that it may act by its agents in any other State or country whose laws enable it to do so. It is assumed that the directors of a corporation are its agents, and that they may act in Wall Street or Lombard Street, if authorized so to do by the stockholders. If these principles and assumed principles were the law at the time the charters of the existing railways of Illinois were granted, the provision in question will probably be inoperative upon such corporations. There are undoubtedly many advantages in having railway directors on the ground, in contact with the people whom they serve or govern, as the case may be; but it is also true that non-residents are more likely to send their capital to Illinois, if they are allowed to control it afterward, than if they are compelled to entrust it wholly to the management of strangers.

We see no evidence of any effort at reform in the manner of selecting judges. Perhaps the evils of an elective judiciary have not pressed so heavily upon the people of that State as upon some other communities that we might name. Perhaps there were influential members of the Convention aspiring to the bench through the avenue of universal suffrage. Perhaps others were bashful about admitting that there is anything that universal suffrage cannot do better than it can be done in any other way. Whatever the reasons, it is quite certain that no reform has been effected in this behalf. We hope that the people of Illinois may find no cause to regret that they did not adopt the system under which the Federal judiciary have always been selected, but we fear that not many years will elapse before they will be troubled with decisions prepared in party caucuses or political "rings" before they are announced from the bench.

Among the lesser but by no means inconsiderable reforms, we find that all public officers, both of the State and the several counties, are to be paid fixed salaries, and that all fees and perquisites are to be returned, under oath, to the public treasury, and that the compensation of no officer shall be increased or diminished during his term of office.

The vote upon the new constitution and the separate clauses is to take place on the first Saturday in July, and there is not much doubt that the main instrument will be ratified by the people. It is certainly a vast improvement upon the existing Constitution of Illinois, and it embraces many features that might be copied with advantage by older States.

SOCIETY AND MARRIAGE.

Mr. Henry James, who is both a vigorous thinker and writer, and has made the philosophy of marriage, one might almost say, a special study, has an article in the last Atlantic which is, we fear, not unlikely to assist in spreading what we cannot help considering, in view of what we see and hear every day, a most mischievous delusion, with regard to the place occupied by matrimony in civil society. His text, as might be expected, is the McFarland case, and he makes a statement of the view which society takes of the marriage relation which is well enough as far as it goes. Society, he declares, says to the married couple:

"I did not enjoin marriage upon you. I found you disposed to marriage of your own accord, and what I did was skilfully to provide for my own subsistence and perpetuity, by availing myself of that free and generous impulse on your part, and promising you my countenance and protection in carrying it out. In short, I had no devout, but a purely selfish, end in ratifying your marriage, and have no real solicitude as to whether the marriage itself bring you happiness or misery. Thus you have my consent to be to each other, in all moral and spiritual regards, precisely what you will, so long as you unflinchingly promote my economic purposes, in rearing and educating the family upon which my evolution is contingent. Do this faithfully, and although you should be inwardly or spiritually as disaffected to each other as the poles, I will firmly close my eyes to every outward or moral sign of the inward fact which you yourselves do not actually force upon my attention. Fail to do it, and although I myself all the while have no spiritual, but only a mercenary regard for marriage, I will not fail to stigmatize either party, on the complaint of the other, as an infamous person, for infidelity to it. I know absolutely nothing of marriage in itself, or for its own sake, that is, as a law of human nature. I only know and esteem it for the admirable uses it promotes to me. And you have my cordial permission consequently, so long as you do nothing to estrange it in your own case from these objective ends, to be as untrue to it subjectively, or in spirit, as you please."

The natural result of this view is, according to Mr. James, that "marriage is degraded to the mud of the streets," and that "civilization is a hot-bed of every corruption possible to men's perverted instincts;" that "marriage has become the privilege of every filthy vagabond to whom culture is unknown, and who finds in it only an unlimited justification of his natural egotism;" and that "the scamp, the ruffian, and simple lout," being told by society that "his wife is his personal property," "his chattel," "his thing," it is no wonder if, when he finds her unfaithful to him, "he takes her life, or that of her lover, imagined or real." Mr. James's remedy for this state of things is "the allowing an absolute or independent sanctity to marriage by ceasing to enforce it any longer in any merely civic interest, or any interest below the outraged dignity of human nature itself." If we understand this correctly, what he wants is, that society should treat marriage as simply a means of personal culture or happiness, like religion, or friendship, or music, and leave everybody to seek it in his own way, and take as much or little of it as he found his spiritual needs demanded. If we are not mistaken, we have heard this doctrine preached a good deal of late on the Woman's Rights platform; it has been freely applied to the McFarland case, and is being scattered broadcast over the country by an increasing body of peripatetic philosophers of both sexes. We should be sorry to see a writer of Mr. James's force coming to their support at such a crisis, in a periodical of such high standing as the Atlantic, if it did not afford us a respectable reason for saying what we believe is in the mind of nine out of every ten intelligent men and women in the country, but the expression of which has been hitherto prevented by the very indelicacy, or rather delicacy, of the subject. As we said, however, some time ago, the events of every day show that those who see the good there is in the existing order of things must, if they mean to save it, and save society from a period of great disorder—the laws of nature are, of course, sure to triumph in the long run—cease to be mealy-mouthed, and indulge in as much plain speaking as the case may require.

The way in which most of the new and peculiar views now current about marriage and divorce have been reached and are defended is partly by ignoring the existence of such a thing as sexual passion, or treating it simply as "lust"—that is, a depraved appetite, only found amongst vile men, and not worthy of recognition in making social arrangements, any more than love of alcoholic drinks or of cock-fighting; and partly by ignoring the production of children, either as the proper object or as an ordinary result of marriage. These two elements in the matrimonal problem got rid of, the settlement of the questions what the law of marriage ought to be, and what the views of society about the sexual relation ought to be, becomes easy enough. All the attempts made by law and public opinion to strengthen the marriage contract and to prevent extra-legal connections, or to bind husbands and wives together by a feeling of "duty," become then tyranny. Marriage being simply the agreement of two friends of opposite sexes to live together and share expenses, from a feeling of sentimental attachment, and with a view to the improvement of each other's character, the efforts of society to make the relation perpetual are, of course, as outrageous as would be a similar effort to make the friendship of two men or two women perpetual. Two friends of the same sex separate when one "outgrows" the other; or when one of them ceases to derive comfort or edification from the other's society, or sees another friend to whom he or she feels more strongly drawn; and why not two friends of opposite sexes? That the rule should be the same in both cases—that is, that the continuance of the married relation should be left to the discretion of the parties—is indeed the doctrine now openly preached by the advocates of "easy divorce." It crops out, in one form or other, in most of the discourses on matrimony which pour from the "reformatory" press.

Now, what is the view that civil society takes of marriage, and has taken ever since the institution was founded? What is the view which it must take, not simply to secure its own existence—which is, after all, no paltry end—but to save the race from moral ruin? The sexual passion—the animal, brute passion, through which God, apparently in ignorance of the laws of "moral progress," has provided for the perpetuation of the human species—is the most untamable of all the passions, and is an inseparable concomitant of physical health, and, though susceptible of control by moral means, is not capable of extinction or repression; there is not a particle of reason for supposing that it is any weaker now than it was six thousand years ago, though it seeks gratification in different ways. The experience of the race shows it to exert a more powerful influence on the moral and material welfare of human beings than any other agency whatever. Its regulation—that is, the limitation of the field over which men or women should be permitted to indulge in it—was therefore the very first step in civilization—the first thing which had to be done to raise man above the beast. The foundation of the family was the first attempt to regulate it. The first object of marriage still is to regulate it. It is a matter of individual as well as national experience, that there is probably nothing which does more to brutalize and deprave, to foster selfish and materialistic views of life, than a multiplicity of sexual connections on the part of the same person, and one of the most marked tendencies of the sexual passion is towards satiety and change of object. Moreover, though it makes some difference, it does not make a very great difference in the effect on individual or national character whether this love of change be gratified under cover of a discretionary divorce law, or in open defiance of law and of public opinion. The paltry repetition before a minister or justice of the peace of vows already broken, and which are not meant to be anything but the expression of momentary feeling, can in no degree sanctify or purify either the rovings of a wayward fancy or the promptings of simple lust. That mysterious law of our nature which makes sexual constancy not only one of the signs but one of the conditions of our elevation above the brute works in complete independence of divorce legislation, and no law or custom can save the wife of many living husbands, or the husband of many living wives, any more than the mistress of many lovers, or the lover of many mistresses, from the mark of the beast. We leave it to theologians and moralists to say whether chastity be a virtue in itself, or only a conventional virtue. It is enough for us to know, as a matter of experience, that Burns was a sound sociologist, as well as a good poet, when he said of libertinage that > "It hardens a' within,

> And petrifies the feelin's"—

and that the hymns to Constancy which lovers are always singing, are not the mere outpourings of a sickly sentiment, but embody an unconscious recognition of the source from which all that is noblest and purest in the sexual relation flows.

The second reason of society in making the marriage contract permanent is that the birth of children is, whether the object of marriage or not, one of its ordinary results. Society, therefore, says to couples about to marry: "There is every reason to suppose that children will be the result of your union. The young of the human species are helpless and dependent on their parents for support for about fifteen years; they are dependent on them for education and counsel for at least twenty. I have no objection to your getting married and having children; in fact, I approve of it, and will do all I can to make your lot and theirs comfortable. But then I must insist on your agreeing to live together, barring crime or brutality on one side or other, for the term of your natural lives, because, unless you support your children while they are young and helpless, I, who have plenty of children to take care of, will have to do it, which would be foul injustice; unless you give them moral training they will probably have none at all, and I shall, when they grow up, have to put them in jail or hang them for robbing and murdering their neighbors. Moreover, as the wife during the child-bearing period will be helpless, and as after it is past she will be worn out, I must insist on the husband's living with her and providing for her during her whole life, although he may see a good many other women he would like better, and she a good many men who are in many respects his superior.

"With regard to the observations you have just heard from my esteemed member, Mr. Henry James, let me deny that I confer marriage on the 'scamp or ruffian or simple lout' as a 'privilege.' I simply take him as I find him—an animal, with certain propensities which he is sure to gratify somehow, and most probably will gratify like a brute if I let him; I endeavor to make him gratify them like a human being, by encouraging him to enter into a contract of mutual fidelity and support and forbearance with one woman, if he is lucky enough to find one who will be satisfied with him. Having got him bound, I endeavor to keep him bound by every means in my power—law, custom, and public opinion—and I too often find that they are all far too weak. Doubtless, too, in my efforts to keep down within him the animal love of change and attach him to his home, I excite in his mind extravagant notions of his authority and of the strength of the tie which unites his wife to him, and I confess that from this some women do suffer a good deal; but I am sure the whole female sex profits by it. Ask our good friend Mr. C. L. Brace, or anybody else who has to labor much among the poor, and especially the children of the poor, whether he does not find that the tendency amongst men to cut all connection with their families, and let wife and children go to the devil, is not far stronger and far more mischievous than the tendency to rule them with the patriarchal rod of iron. When, too, people tell you that it is I only who am responsible for McFarland's or any other rascal's killing his wife's lover by my proclamation of the doctrine that a man has 'a personal property' in his wife, do not pay any attention to it. It is one of the comical conclusions that our Woman's Rights friends have reached by pretending to believe that people only marry for the sake of spiritual communion. No doubt, there is still too much of the patriarchal view of the marriage relation still existing among men; but husbands, you must remember, are male animals as well as citizens, and are capable of feeling, and do feel, the passion of sexual jealousy just as stags and tigers feel it; and when they find an attempt made by another male to share the object of their passion, and are but slenderly influenced by moral and religious considerations, do shoot and stab just as the stag gores and the tiger rends. Trying to make my marriage laws wholly responsible for it is therefore reprehensible, because it confuses or perverts a great many feeble minds.

"That marriages are not perfect; that in a vast number of cases the woman marries the wrong man, and vice versa, I admit, my dear friends, with sorrow. But they make the choice themselves, and I have as yet hit no substitute for their freedom. Nor do I see any likelihood that, if I let them divorce as often as they pleased, matters would be any better, for they would be just as likely to err in the second alliance as in the first. My opinion is that all marriages will be those holy, happy unions which it is now proposed to make them by act of the legislature, when all men are wise, just, honest, intelligent, virtuous, and self-controlled, and all women sweet, pure, loving, bright, patient, energetic, healthy, and industrious, and not one minute sooner. In other words, the marriage problem is but part of the greater problem of life. We approach nearer its solution as we rise nearer to God in all our walks and ways, but be right well assured there is no short cut to happiness either in that or any other human relation. In the wedlock into which you have now entered, and in which I tell you frankly I shall do everything I can to keep you firmly bound, the purest happiness the race has known has been tasted, and the noblest men and women the world has seen have been born and bred; in defence of homes such as yours millions have died joyously; and if you suppose the sages of the stump and the lecture-hall are going to supply you with anything better, you are egregiously mistaken. Whether marriage shall prove to you a means of spiritual growth, or a source of pure bliss, or a den of wild beasts, is something which I am as little competent to determine as to determine the effect on your character of any of the other circumstances of your life, your birth or parentage, your education, or your health. To attempt, on my part, to provide for your happiness in it would be an invasion of your moral freedom, which God forbid that I, with history open before me, should ever attempt."

FRANCE.

PARIS, May 6, 1870.

IN two or three days we shall know what the Plébiscite has achieved, and we shall see somewhat clearer into the future that it prepares for us. Meanwhile, there is, in reality, but one opinion upon its danger, and upon the absurdity of having had recourse to it. When I say this, I mean that, out of a little knot of, perhaps, fifty men who surround the Emperor (or rather the Empress) there is not, even in the Bonapartist faction, any one who affects to believe in the Plébiscite. All condemn it alike, from different points of view: the Liberals call it a jugglery; the Extreme Right looks upon it as "revolutionary;" the Extreme Left, as a return to a coup d'état; and the mass of Imperialists, as utterly and entirely useless.

Perhaps the worst of all the many bad features of the Plébiscite is that it has so irretrievably ruined the reputations of the ministers who have allowed themselves to drift into it. To lose at once the last two or three men to whom France thought she might look for administrative guidance, to see them all at once appear as unworthy and incapable, is a terrible blow, for we have no "change" of ministers ready here. The men of the Rouher and Lavalette school are used up, personally odious, and are, in fact, represented by M. Rouher alone; for on an emergency M. de Forcade would only be a subaltern, acting under M. Rouher's dictation. With the real "Liberals," the rupture is now complete, and any return to their policy or to them seems next to impossible, except in a case of "too late" where all such returns are abortive. To be just, too, this party contributed only two individuals to the governing task, M. Daru and M. Buffet, both unattackably honest, but the latter, as a financier, incapable. If you revert to the numerically large class of moderate Liberals who were disposed to try what the present dynasty could do for them if controlled by constitutional institutions, you find that, in reality, their hopes centred in Ollivier. On him they pinned their faith, and on him they relied for obtaining for them not only political liberty, but a large and generous measure of social reforms generally. Not only has Ollivier failed utterly to achieve any part of what seemed his political task, but the mode of his failure has been a disastrous one. He has been drawn into defeat by weakness and vanity, and by the absence of all the higher qualities by which he was supposed to be calculated to be a constitutional minister.

This is a great and serious misfortune. Like most Continental Europeans, the French have a certain instinctive tendency to believe that ability and honesty do not go together; and this remnant of the prejudices of past times, and of the narrowness of education in Europe, is one of the chief obstacles to real progress, particularly to moral and social progress. When Ollivier first rose to power, it was triumphantly asserted by his friends and by himself that his administration would prove how grand a political force was elevation of character, and the pure, simple devotion to the right. The most sceptical were silenced, and the most hostile agreed to wait and suspend their judgment. They did not wait long. The ministers failed in strength of purpose a week after they took office. They were victorious in small things; they obtained the downfall of Haussmann and the privilege of holding ministerial councils out of the Tuileries and unpresided over by the Emperor; they signified to the latter that he was not to correspond with foreign ambassadors; and they then followed the example of Lord John Russell's "Highlander," in the famous Blairgowrie speech—they sat down to "rest and be thankful!" Rochefort's appearance terrified them, and instead of rising to the real height of their position, and disdaining the noisy clamors of the street (backed as they might have felt themselves by the influential Liberal party), they sank under their own fears, and began to commit a long series of mistakes which have at last culminated in the Plébiscite. All these mistakes, too, were committed on the wrong side—on the side namely, of resistance (I will not yet say reaction) instead of progress. The one plain, simple step to have taken obviously and at once—the bringing in of a bill for electoral reform—was left untaken, and was to all appearance an object of terror on the part of the ministers. From this moment the Emperor saw his advantage, and reseized all he had lost. The electoral reform need not have made the dissolution of the Chamber an absolute necessity this year, and that was the only pretext adduced for delay. The fact of at once directing all their energies towards the subject of electoral reform was what was required of the new ministers, and their weakness here proved their original sin. After the prosecutions against Rochefort and against the various Radical papers came the trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte, and the verdict, which was received with universal indignation and laid to the charge of the ministers. Then came suddenly the Emperor's letter to Émile Ollivier touching the modification of the constitution in a Liberal sense. For a moment, it was supposed that faults enough had been committed, and that, at last, political freedom and genuine representative institutions had a chance. It was said that Ollivier had succeeded in convincing Napoleon III. that his son's advent to the throne of France depended on the frank and free return to parliamentary government. Once more there was a glimpse of light and hope, but it did not endure beyond a week. The news of the Plébiscite destroyed everything, and all hope of any genuine or permanent good connected with the Ollivier ministry was scattered to the winds, never more to reappear.

The sole question now which fills men's minds is: What will be the shape assumed by reaction when the votes on the Plébiscite are registered? for reaction is probably inevitable. Shall we pass from Messrs. Ollivier, Ségris, Richard Noir, to Messrs. Rouher, Lavalette, Forcade, Fleury, or to a more mitigated form under Ollivier, Rouher, La Guerronière? or Ollivier, Persigny, and Émile de Girardin? or shall we be blessed with a pure Persigny cabinet, or a pure Palais-Royal one? These are the problems that occupy the public just now, and what the Empire has lost by all this its worst enemies alone realize thoroughly.

For some time after the formation of the Ollivier ministry (from the 2d of January till M. Daru's speech on the 24th of February) the chances of the Orleans princes were looked upon as extinct. They themselves said to their best adherents: "Our part is played; all we could offer is given by Louis Napoleon, and a really liberal Empire can undoubtedly be as useful to France as would have been a liberal monarchy." Nothing could be franker than the admissions made on this head by the princes, and no one more convinced than their partisans of the utter destruction of all the hopes of the Bourbon family of no matter what branch. The Plébiscite has altered all this, and a rumor that is afloat for the last few days adds gravity to the sudden revival of Royalist aspirations. The Comte de Paris and Duc de Chartres are said to have gone to Frohsdorf to visit their cousin, the Comte de Chambord, on the occasion of the death of his mother, the Duchesse de Berry. Some persons affirm that the real object of the visit is the abdication in due form by Henri V. of the sovereignty of France in favor of the Comte de Paris, in which case the once so famous "fusion" would exist whole and entire, and the Legitimist party in France cease all antagonism to the Orleanist one. The effect would be a far deeper one than any foreigner would comprehend. It would (since the recent mistrust of Napoleon) rally to it nearly all the thinking or possessing classes, and what the ultimate result would be no one can predict.*

The one thing achieved by the present ministry, and achieved so that nothing more will disturb it, is the sudden bringing together of all classes and all opinions of society. This, which did not enter into its political programme, has been, in fact, the only achievement of the Ollivier cabinet, and this will endure. With M. Daru came back to open public life all the heads of Orleanist houses; with M. de Talhouët came nearly all the people of Legitimist convictions. During three months, "every one" met every one, and every one went everywhere, and whatever happens now this habit is taken and will not be laid aside. Parties will fight all the same, nay, more vigorously than ever; but they will meet to fight, they will wrestle in the same arena, they will no longer shun each other's contact. This will probably turn against the Empire, but the good it will do to France is incalculable. Up till January last the large majority of the respectable, dignified, intellectual classes in this country stood aloof, and, socially speaking, when you spoke of the "official world" you meant more or less all those who belonged to no other. Such names as those of Broglie, Guizot, Luynes, Rémusat, Thiers, Duchâtel, Noailles, and all who were possessed of any public renown under the governments existing between 1815 and 1848, had retired under their tents; with them, in the provinces for instance, retired also all the so-called "honest," all the socially "responsible." This was one of the causes of the easy dictatorship of "personal power." No one would enter the lists with its followers, no one would touch it. Now all the social and all the political forces of France have come forward, and you meet them at every turn. MM. Daru and Talhouët have mainly brought about this situation, but it is an enduring one. They may both secede (probably M. de Talhouët will), but the forces that have been lured forward by their names will remain in the field and do battle lustily for freedom and national dignity.

Correspondence.

THE MURDEROUS ASSAULT ON MR. SPAULDING.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir:—I do not know any reason, except a love of fair play, why I should take up the glove for the Hon. E. G. Spaulding. I never saw that gentleman, and my slight acquaintance with his writings gives no reason to suppose that, as the French say, he invented gunpowder. He is certainly no match in single combat for Mr. Henry Brooks Adams, but there is reason for believing that he suffers as much from the want of edge of his own weapons as from the quality of his opponent's armor. In his article in the North American Review, Mr. Adams assumes two points, which, as forming the basis of his denunciations, it would have been well to have proved, first, that the Legal Tender Act was not a necessity; and, second, that the depreciation of currency to the extent which has produced such evil results was a necessary consequence of that act. As to the first, I hold it to be incontrovertible that the money of a country must always be a legal tender. Gold and silver coins are always made so by the governments which issue them, and, if paper is not made so, it can only serve as money by being kept constantly convertible into specie. The Bank of England note was a legal tender from the suspension in 1797 till the resumption in 1821, and, indeed, is so now everywhere through the kingdom, except at the issue department of the bank. Now, it is possible that our paper money might have been kept convertible during the war. But this proposition is so totally unsusceptible of proof that it will by no means answer to assume it; and, failing that, there was no alternative but to make the money a legal tender. The controlling the quantity of this paper, by selling bonds at a discount instead of at par, is a wholly different question, and it by no means follows, as Mr. Adams seems to imply, that bank paper could have been kept convertible more easily or surely than direct Government issues. Mr. Adams has professed a high respect for the integrity, if not the intellect, of Attorney-General Hoar. He will find a good exercise for his talents in the argument of that gentleman for the reopening of the recent decision of the Supreme Court.

* This story has since been contradicted.—Ed. Nation.

As to the second point, I believe it is clearly proved that the convertibility of paper money, and its depreciation when inconvertible, depend upon its quantity, and not upon its being legal tender. The evidence upon this point, from English experience, not so much during the suspension as during the last thirty years, is conclusive, and cannot be too much commended to the study of our financiers. Seen from this point of view, the chief offender in our mistakes of currency is the late Secretary of the Treasury, now Chief-Justice Chase. It was he who insisted upon the issue of a flood of inconvertible paper, rather than sell bonds below par; who stopped the sale of six per cent. bonds in the full tide of success, in the hope of floating a five per cent. loan; and who, when Congress refused to exceed the amount of four hundred millions, endeavored to carry out his purpose by means of the National Bank notes.

In seeking to turn the tide of wrath to which Mr. Adams has given expression, my object is to aid in holding public attention to the true issue, which is that specie payments can be reached, and only reached, by contraction or the reduction of the amount of our paper money afloat; and that, as the Legal Tender Act was not in itself the cause of our troubles, so its repeal, in the present state of our currency, would be productive of almost inconceivable disaster. G. B.

Boston, May 16, 1870.

[We are not sure that we understand G. B.'s doctrines about legal tenders. The mass of money in use in this country before the war was not a legal tender. Most of the business of the whole commercial world is done with a circulating medium which anybody may refuse if he pleases. We affirm, moreover, that nobody has ever profited by having irredeemable paper made a legal tender, except existing debtors, and that it was only in so far as it enabled these to cheat their creditors that the legal tender quality saved the greenbacks from depreciation. This particular virtue, too, was of course speedily exhausted, and they went down rapidly to their natural value—that is, to the point to which they would have gone if they had never had it, and for the simple reason that the value of all paper money depends, as G. B. says, on the quantity of it in the market, and the popular estimate of the probability of its redemption; and no government can infuse any other elements than these into its value, except by making it, not simply a legal tender in payment of debts, but a legal tender in the purchase of goods, or, in other words, fixing the price of commodities. You may pass what acts you please about paper money, but you cannot prevent the bootmaker from expressing his sense of its value in the price he puts on his boots; and, as long as you let him do this, your notion that you can keep up its value by giving it a fine name is a pure but not altogether innocent hallucination. But then the burden of proving that it is necessary to make anything which has no intrinsic value a legal tender lies on those who propose it, and not on those who oppose it. On its face it is as dishonest as the adulteration of coin, so that Mr. Adams was justified in assuming that it was unnecessary, and in making Mr. Spaulding show cause for it at the point of the dagger. Governments in making gold and silver a legal tender simply recognize one of the usages of the civilized world. They add nothing, or next to nothing, to the value of the coin. If gold and silver had no intrinsic value, they could do no more for them than they can do for pebbles or paper. Bank of England notes retained their value during the British suspension as well as they did, not because they were a legal tender, but because people believed they would shortly be redeemed, or, in other words, because the credit of the Bank and of the Government continued good. If this Government had not made the greenbacks a legal tender, they would, like the bonds, have circulated at their market value as promissory notes; but inasmuch as making them a legal tender was tantamount to raising a forced loan, or was, in other words, a sign both of unscrupulousness and desperation, it is, we think, quite fair to assume that it did act injuriously on Government credit, and therefore lowered the value of its obligations—in other words, was inexpedient as well as unnecessary.—Ed. Nation.]

"THE SEXES IN COLLEGES."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I have lately chanced upon an article bearing the above title, in your paper of March 3, in which you incline to the opinion that "mixed colleges are not likely to be a success." Suffer me briefly to repeat your arguments, and to present the reflections which they suggest to me.

You say that a college undertakes the double responsibility of training the intellect and morals of its youth, and, while you admit that the coeducation of the sexes is of great benefit both to the male and female mind, you are not led by analogy or experience to hope as much for the character. Depicting the dangerous yet developing freedom of the student life, you apprehend that its liberty, which is so hazardous to our sons, may prove fatal to our daughters. I see no reason, however, why the college—like a true Alma Mater—should not legislate with special reference to the safety of its female students; nor do I believe that they would chafe under peculiar restrictions. The most artless girl knows as well as an experienced sage that a woman is not privileged, like a man, to go to the devil and come back again. Under the knowledge of this fact, and further inspired by her native timidity, she invokes, rather than eludes, that protection which her sex demands. But if, at home, in travel, and in visiting her friends, she quietly, nay proudly, submits to, and even appoints, regulations from which her brother is free, what miracle is it that will prompt her to sudden rebellion at school?

It appears, however, that, for some reason, the demand for education in mixed colleges has declined; and you "suspect that the real cause is that young ladies do not, after all, wish for the same education with young men." In this you are doubtless right. A new and striking idea might give temporary prosperity to the "college course" at Oberlin, and in similar schools, but it would not be long before their female patronage would decline to the steady level of general opinion. But, while I grant that much, I still insist that a public sentiment should be created which will give to women, as it has done to men, the opportunities and the stimulation to acquire a thorough mental training. If college education really confers great benefits, the mere fact that but few women at present desire it does not militate against the experiment of offering it to them. It is only in high-colored rhyme that the heathen

> "Call us to deliver
> Their land from error's chain."

Yet we invade their country with tracts and missionaries, in order to create a healthful sense of ignorance and need.

But is it really desirable that woman should receive the highest culture? You say that there are few girls who have the physical strength to endure the application it demands. The report (1867) of James H. Fairchild, of Oberlin, before a meeting of college presidents, at Springfield, Ill., throws some light upon this objection. He says of those Oberlin students who had completed the full college course: "Out of eighty-four young ladies who have graduated since 1841, seven have died, a proportion of one in twelve. Of three hundred and sixty-eight young men who have graduated since that date, thirty-four are dead, or a little more than one in eleven. Of these thirty-four young men, six fell in the war; and, leaving those out, the proportion of deaths still remains one to thirteen. Taking the whole number of gentlemen graduated, omitting the theological department, we find the proportion of deaths one to nine and a half; of ladies, one to twelve; and this in spite of the lower average expectation of life for women, as indicated in life-insurance tables." Again, he asserts of the young lady students: "Where there has been the same preparatory training, we find no difference in their ability to maintain themselves in the recitation-room."

But you further argue that, even if women could sustain the mental labor of the college course, "quite a different training is required to fit the members of the different sexes for their diverse work." This is unquestionably true; but the college, as you elsewhere state, does not aim to fit men for a special work, but to discipline them into manhood. Can women forego this discipline and attain the full measure of womanhood? The college course is not a special training for woman's domestic life, but neither is it for the business of men, and the same arguments commend or discredit it for both sexes.

I not only approve of the highest education for women, but I confide (especially in view of its moral advantages) in the ultimate success of the mixed college. Women need not only the broader and more thorough religious thought of man, but the refinement of manner and purity of feeling which are fostered by the admiration which these traits excite in the opposite sex; and men require not simply the refinement and purity, but the moral strength of women. Not that young girls enjoy loftier aspirations or juster principles than ennoble the earlier years of young men, but their moral life is better guarded by the fear of temptation, the regular observance of duty, and the conservative piety which so honorably distinguish their sex. Men love truth, women love virtue: the one is the goodness of the head, the other is the goodness of the heart. Each is necessary, yet neither is sufficient; when united, however, they become august. But because men oftenest espouse a just and liberal philosophy, women connect it with their vices, and discard it as the parent of sin; while men, on the other hand, disdain to cultivate virtue and faith, because of the ignorance and bigotry with which women defend them. Coeducation can alone effect that felicitous moral interchange which will give to each sex somewhat of the other's peculiar merit. Thus, truth and virtue, the integrity of the mind and the integrity of the heart, will be oftener united in the same aspirant soul, and man, no longer a spiritual torso, will reveal the clear image of God. ELIZABETH WAKING.

KEOKUK, IOWA.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will soon publish Mr. Hepworth Dixon's "Free Russia;" "The Rob Roy on the Jordan, Nile, Red Sea, etc.," being Mr. Macgregor's account of his latest canoe voyage in Palestine, Egypt, etc.; and "A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language; in which its forms are illustrated by those of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Old Saxon, Old Friesic, Old Norse, and Old High-German," by Francis A. March—a work which we may hope will stimulate the study of Anglo-Saxon.——Besides further of Thackeray's novels, in their illustrated library edition, Messrs. Fields, Osgood & Co. are preparing "Scientific Results of a Journey in Brazil, by Louis Agassiz and his Travelling Companions; comprising the Geology and Physical Geography of the Atlantic Provinces of Brazil," by C. Fred. Hartt; "The Naturalist's Guide," by C. J. Maynard; Volume II. of Mr. Bryant's translation of the Iliad; and "The Seat of Empire," by Mr. C. C. Coffin ("Carleton").——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. will publish a "Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology," by Rev. John Henry Blunt, D.D.; the "Life and Times of David Zeisberger," by Rev. E. De Scheinwitz; "Historical and Descriptive Narrative of the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky," by W. S. Forwood, M.D.; and a reprint of that delightful work, "Flowers from the Upper Alps," by E. Walton and T. E. Benney.

— We are indebted to several correspondents for information as to the authorship of the song, "We meet 'neath the sounding rafter," of which we spoke last week. It may be found printed in Dr. John W. Palmer's "Folk-Songs," published in this city in 1861, and was written by one Captain Dowling, of the East India Company's Service. The small command to which he belonged was stationed at some detached post when the cholera overtook it and destroyed nearly every member, the Captain included, it is said, not long after he had composed his dismal verses. The refrain is not exactly as we quoted it. It should read, according to Palmer:

"A cup to the dead already,
And hurrah for the next that dies!"

—or "One cup," as Dr. Doran prints it in his "Table Traits," Am. edition, pp. 267–8. "Carl Benson" has also tracked for us the old English ballad, "Shipps, shipps, I will descrie you;" one verse, at least, begins with this line, the title being "Halowe my Fancie." It may be found in the Percy Reprint, and also in "Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature," Vol. I., page 393, of the American edition—seventeen stanzas long. Campbell, too, gives it, with some variations, in his "Specimens of the British Poets," as edited by Peter Cunningham (London: Murray, 1841, pp. 320–1). We annex the opening stanza as there printed:

"In melancholy Fancie
Out of myself,
In the Vulcan dancie,
All the world surveying,
Nowhere staying,
Just like a fairy elf;
Out o'er the top of highest mountains skipping,
Out o'er the hills, the trees and valleys, tripping,
Out o'er the ocean, seas, without an oar or shipping,
Holla, my Fancy, whither wilt thou go?"

We may as well state here, that the problem of Professor Schele de Vere and Blackwood, as recently stated by our correspondent "D——n," will probably be solved for most persons who consult page 762 of the June issue of the Baltimore New Eclectic Magazine, which offers parallel passages from the "Vision of Cagliostro" and the "Great Empress."

—From some source the Independent lately obtained and published information to the effect that in Ripon College, Wisconsin, the girls' rank is to that of the boys as 90 to 75, but that "in tardiness and absences the boys excel the girls in the ratio of three to two. The absences," it continued, "are mainly on account of ill health, and during the past two years a much larger number of boys have left school sick than girls." These statistics would have a certain value if correct, but the truth of them is disputed by the magazine published at Ripon, called College Days, which is edited, we may remark, in part by female students. On searching the records, it says, "we found classes in which the ladies excelled, and it would be strange if we had not. But, on the other hand, we also found classes in which the gentlemen excelled in much greater ratio than that given in the Independent," whose generalization is therefore pronounced unwarranted. The point of attendance is not met by College Days, and we regret that the editor did not devote himself to those "days of research" which he says would be necessary for an accurate statement. In the mixed Western colleges it is desirable to learn what is the average proportion of male and female students, and what the proportion of each to the male and female population of the State respectively. It might then appear that in an agricultural community with a surplus of men, we have conditions more favorable to the regular schooling and higher education of women than of men. Until this is shown, however, it will be best to refrain from speculating as to the capacity of the sexes upon the data of a single class or even of a single college. In another column a correspondent furnishes some pertinent statistics as to the comparative robustness of male and female students.

—A New-Englander who reads Mr. Freeman's papers in Macmillan on the "Origin of the English Nation" must conclude that the South had a logical reason for coupling in the same anathema the Yankee and the "Dutchman." In fact, the damnable qualities of either people are very much the same, and the one blood may account for it. This identity of race between the Puritans of England and the Hollanders is the burden of an address by Mr. James W. Beekman, which was delivered last December before the Saint Nicholas Society of this city, and only now is published in pamphlet form. Mr. Beekman, without the least offensiveness, claims for Holland some glories which other nations do not relinquish—such as the invention of printing—and is generally somewhat too ready to adopt historical theories by no means beyond question. With the same confidence with which he attaches the printing-press in the name of Holland and Laurence Koster, he names the date at which a certain Icelandic rover "entered Mount Hope Bay, and spent some time in what is now the State of Rhode Island," and also the year in which the first Christian church was established in the Western world, "dedicated to the patron saint of Holland, our good Saint Nicholas." The address may be read, nevertheless, with pleasure and profit, the intimate relation between England and Holland during the stormy growth of civil and religious liberty in the former country being too little remembered nowadays. We doubt if any one can trace accurately the effect on the English character and polity of Dutch immigrations in the twelfth and subsequent centuries. Possibly, the eastern counties of England have received a peculiar stamp from this infusion of Dutch blood, and yet it may be only very remotely that we owe Bunyan, Hampden, Cromwell, Fairfax, Ireton, Russell, Vane, and Sidney to Holland, as Mr. Beekman pretends. As an asylum for exiled patriots, Holland was of course the mother of a numerous progeny, and we probably are indebted to her for Sidney not otherwise than for Locke. Mr. Beekman's opening remarks on the present state of the Netherlands will be news to most people, and are worth reading.

—Concerning that eminent citizen of Dutch origin, the late Gulian C. Verplanck, Mr. William C. Bryant delivered an entertaining discourse, on Tuesday evening of last week, before the New York Historical Society. Perhaps nothing serves to impress us so vividly with the change that has come over the face of this island in less than a century, as to read that Mr. Verplanck was born in Wall Street, on the site of the present Assay Office, when all to the north of it was country, and then to reflect that he lived to see population cover nearly all the available space between the two rivers, and spread across both, and to become the president of a Board of Emigration which passed at last over 250,000 immigrants in one year into the country. Mr. Bryant dwelt chiefly, and with discrimination, on the principal features in the political and professional career of his subject, who was an independent sort of Democrat, not hating the Bank of the United States, and not disposed to pretend to do so in order to gain office. When he heard that Van Buren's nomination as minister to England was rejected, he declared that would make him President of the United States.

If Mr. Verplanck was a Dutchman on his father's side, he was one of Mr. Beekman's Dutchmen on his mother's; that is, his maternal grandfather's great great grandfather came from Yorkshire. This grandfather was William Samuel Johnson, of Stratford, Connecticut, a notable figure in the Revolution, member of the convention that framed the Constitution, and senator in Congress (1789–91); a lawyer of distinction, judge of the Connecticut Supreme Court, and president of Columbia College (1792–1800), as his father, the famous Rev. Samuel Johnson, had been before him (1754–63). On both sides the mantle of the law descended naturally to Mr. Verplanck, his father having been a judge, and also a member of Congress; and he thus doubly deserves to be placed among Mr. Galton's examples of hereditary genius.

—The spread of public libraries is a subject to which we shall offer no apologies for returning often. This time it is Newport which is fortunate in receiving from an eminent citizen, Mr. Christopher Townsend, a "People's Library" that must prove an additional attraction to this favorite watering-place. Mr. Townsend insisted upon but two things, that the library should not be named after him, or in any way be turned into a memorial of him, and that he should have the selection of the 7,000 volumes with which he endowed it. It may be guessed that he paid less attention to light literature than to works of solid information. With his collection has been joined that of the Free Library already started, making in all 10,000 volumes. Newport has, besides, a Mechanics' Library, and the Redwood, of long date, which the British plundered wofully during their occupation of the city. Their conduct in this respect was remarkably in contrast with that of the army which held Philadelphia, whose officers scrupulously used and respected the libraries there. In Philadelphia, we may note, the Apprentices' Library celebrates its fiftieth anniversary this year by raising a permanent fund and extending its advantages to those beyond boyhood and girlhood. It contains only 10,000 volumes; but it has helped, during the half-century, to enlighten some fifty thousand persons, many of whom, since become rich, are now feeling in their pockets for the proper acknowledgment of services rendered.

—Among the latest English publications and announcements are the following: Of books of travel and geography, the Rev. Henry Seddall's "Malta, Past and Present," which goes back to the days of the Phœnicians; a second and revised edition of J. L. Porter's "Five Years in Damascus;" "Wild Life among the Koords," by Major Millingen; "Eastern Pilgrims," by Agnes Smith, narrating the travels of three ladies; "A Ramble into Brittany," by the Rev. George Musgrave, with illustrations. Also, two which concern our new connection with the Pacific: "Victoria the British Eldorado; or, Melbourne in 1869," showing the advantages of that colony as a field for emigration—by a colonist of twenty years' standing; and "Westward by Rail: the New Route to the East," by W. F. Rae, which is a reprint of that gentleman's letters to the London Daily News, during his recent visit to this country, with additions. History is represented by the concluding volumes of Mr. John Hill Burton's "History of Scotland, from Agricola's Invasion to the Revolution of 1688;" and "The First Lord Malmesbury: his Family and Friends," consisting of a series of letters from 1745 to 1820, edited by the present Earl of Malmesbury. This correspondence covers as pregnant a period as any in modern times, and we are promised "details from the last field of the Pretender to the last of the Duke of Wellington, contemporary fashions, the social history both of France and England during the Great War, the occupation of Paris by the Allies," etc., etc. In theology we are to have a translation of Baron Hübner's "Memoir of Pope Sixtus the Fifth;" "The See of Rome in the Middle Ages," by the Rev. Oswald J. Reichel; and "Ignatius Loyola and the Early Jesuits," by Stewart Rose—works that may all in a certain sense be called timely.

—Not least curious among the other announcements are these, of books which are "nearly ready" and "in the press": "The Civil Service Orthography: a Handy Book of English Spelling, with ample Rules and carefully arranged Exercises; adapted for the use of Schools, and candidates for the Civil and other Services;" and "The Civil Service English History, illustrated with maps, etc." These text-books are a continuation of a series which appears to have been happily begun by "The Civil Service Geography" and "The Civil Service Book-keeping," as each of them has passed into a second edition. They were arranged, it is stated in the title, expressly for examination candidates, by officers of H. M. Civil Service, and that they are appreciated by the class for whom they were intended we cannot doubt. While it is perhaps unlikely that the establishment of the competitive system of appointment in this country will beget similar aids for aspirants to office, owing to the diffusiveness of our public instruction, we need not flatter ourselves that we shall escape the evil of cramming. Of all the modes of concealing ignorance that is one of the most subtle, and the practice of it is one of the chief grounds of distrusting the rank-lists of schools and colleges. So far, nevertheless, from its furnishing valid objection to a civil service based on examinations, it seems to us to be less mischievous here than in almost any other direction. The false honors and degrees which cramming may win, in spite of all precautions, at a university, can never be revoked. But continuance in office and promotion are dependent on the daily application of all the knowledge and talent the incumbent possesses, and the moment his performance proves him a sham he may be discharged. Meantime, his more worthy competitor, whom he unjustly excluded, may apply a second or a third time to be examined, and is never without a chance of succeeding.

—The disestablishment of the Irish Church has naturally not discouraged the enemies of the Establishment across the channel. The next outpost that promises an easy victory is the Church in Wales; and it is hard to see why the arguments applicable in the one case are not sound in the other also. A writer in the London Quarterly for April undertakes the defence of the Church in Wales, but in a way which only proves the weakness of his cause, if the Irish precedent is to have any weight. He first seeks to remove the issue by declaring that, there being no natural boundary between England and Wales, the two should be treated as one country—which might be as well insisted on for England and Scotland; and that, therefore, if the Church be disestablished in Wales, it may as well be in any county—indeed, in any town or village—of England. However, feeling this to be not too solid ground, the reviewer reserves his grand assault for a quite unimportant and subordinate position, viz., that the Church in Wales is in process of decay, and that her power and influence with the people are irrevocably gone. To refute this notion, he consumes the greater part of his space in marshalling statistics of restored cathedrals, new and repaired churches, new parsonages, resident incumbents, travelling missionaries, etc., etc., of which at this distance we are incapable of judging the force or good faith. We should say, however, that, making allowance for the increase in population, the activity he claims for the Church has not been remarkable. He admits, too, that the activity of the Dissenters has been as great or greater, though he objects to a comparison of the number of chapels merely, as every sect doubles its places of worship in order to provide for services in Welsh and in English. After all, he cannot deny—what is the only fact worth considering—that the Established Church is that of a small minority of the total population; and though he is indignant that the Dissenters should have been reckoned as nine-tenths, and would rather regard them as three-fourths, the authorities he cites put the number at about four-fifths. The most favorable proportion is not too cheering for the reviewer, who concludes by a futile appeal to Churchmen and Nonconformists to leave their dissensions for the better work of reclaiming the thousands who are neither members nor attendants of any church whatever.

—A "Liberal Clergyman," who writes to the London Spectator a letter concerning the question of Bible reading in schools, is a clergyman whose sermons it might probably be worth while to hear; certainly one could "sit under them" with satisfaction if the things of the other world present themselves to the preacher with half the definiteness with which he sees the things of this. England, as is known, is just now even more excited than the United States about Bible reading in the schools, and we have not an advocate of the practice, nor hardly an opponent of it, who might not take lessons in zeal from British Christians or British "secularists." What our "Liberal Clergyman" wishes to suggest, as his contribution to the general disturbance, is this: "I wish to suggest that if Lord John Russell's [sic] plan be carried out, of a chapter of the Bible to be read before school, to impart a religious odor to the business of the day, it would be desirable to read it in the original Hebrew or Greek. The reasons for this are obvious: (1) The direct moral effect upon the children would be the same as if it were read in English; (2) The indirect moral effect would be far greater, from the greatly increased sense of awe and mystery; (3) All need of a conscience clause would be done away." If we were compelled to make a guess as to whether this gentleman is or is not in orders, we should say that he is not; and that he is not likely to be; and that, on the contrary, he is a relative by consanguinity of the gentleman who some year or two since used to write to the Pall Mall Gazette occasional brief letters in which was revealed a frame of mind very little calculated to give the Earl of Shaftesbury anything but acute pain. But however that may be, we are bold to say that, in his glancing way, he has come very near to hitting on the gist of the matter in controversy; for we think that the "devotional exercises" of the common schools have at the best no general good effect; and we very much doubt whether their general effect is not worse than nothing—is not worse than if the teachers were to pronounce a certain number of meaningless words in the hearing of the pupils; is not in fact bad. And to this opinion we have not come without having had experimental knowlege; nor without having made comparison of our own opinion with that of others who also have seen something of the actual working of the present New England system of "religious exercises" for the children of the public schools. What, for instance, is the probable effect on an audience of boys and girls, in a school whose head master has just been blessed by the birth of a daughter, when one of the young gentlemen repeats, as his daily verse of Scripture, these words of Jephthah: "And it came to pass that when he saw her he rent his clothes and cried, 'alas my daughter! thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me'"? Or how improving is it when another person says: "For unto us a child is born;" and another follows with the words: "He shall be called Mahershalalhashbaz." And we hear of worse things than these: as of the circulation of marked passages in Scripture—passages which it is just as well that children should not see; of the pretty general surreptitious study of geometry or arithmetic or the Latin grammar, or what not, while the teacher's eyes are closed in prayer; of prayers stereotyped, and, in consequence of their familiarity, made a laughing-stock—in brief, of all kinds of irreverent disregard and trifling. No one would say that there is no good at all got from the Bible readings by anybody whatsoever who hears them. But the question is of the proportionate good and evil got from the maintenance of the custom; and we are but bad observers if the custom is not one which devout people may be very glad to see disused. One would think from the degree of importance attached by some persons to the continuance of these so-called devotional exercises that all the teachers were pious and all the children reverent. In point of fact, a very great majority of the children are as indifferent and careless as are most young men in college in regard to morning prayers. Of the piety of the teachers we say nothing, for we know little. We venture to say, however, that there is not a pious teacher in the country who would not advise all parents and guardians that if they have been neglecting home instruction in religion, with the notion that their children and wards have been getting enough of such teaching in the school-room, they are leaning on the feeblest of broken reeds.

—The final decision of the English Vice-Chancellor James, in the case of the authorized and unauthorized versions of "Frou-Frou," reveals the small amount of protection afforded to French dramatists and their British customers by the Copyright Convention. This prescribes that the French original of any play shall be registered within three months, while a translation sanctioned by the author must be published and registered in a like period after the first registration. It was ruled that an adaptation with the author's sanction was not the same thing as a translation, at least for the purpose of being registered, however it might afterwards be modified in the performance; and, the plaintiff not being allowed to have made a translation, the rival version was on this technicality released from injunction. Apart from the disappointment and loss of the purchaser of the authorized version, the public is somewhat scandalized by the fact that, whereas he had carefully excluded from the play the indecencies supposed to be foreign to the English stage and English manners, these were as carefully preserved in the defendant's more literal version. The Vice-Chancellor is accordingly charged with having decided against common sense and public morality at the same time; but for the latter he was not responsible, and he probably gave the right interpretation to a clumsy statute.

BOWEN'S AMERICAN POLITICAL ECONOMY.*

THE two most sadly abused words in the English language are "practical" and "American." When a man engaged in any pursuit requiring scientific training for its proper conduct is convicted of entire ignorance of every scientific principle, he invariably retorts with the declaration that he is a practical man and not a mere theorist. When the disseminators of some pet theory find it condemned by the voice of the intellectual world as contrary to sound reason or to the spirit of the age, they dub it American. By this device it is expected that all European criticism will be made to pass for nothing, because it is natural that Europeans should criticise everything American. We cannot, therefore, read the title "American Political Economy" without suspecting a bid for the support of the patriots who believe America should have on every subject a distinctive set of ideas of her own, no matter if they are only the cast-off ideas of Europe. Perhaps our suspicion is ill-founded. Our author is no doubt sincere in the opinion "that every country has a Political Economy of its own," and that the universal principles of the science are comparatively few and unimportant. We conceive, however, that everything of value in the work before us lies in the statement of these very principles, and notice with surprise that a large part of the work, American though it be, is made up of quotations from and criticisms of English writers. Take out these criticisms, and we find nothing distinctively American, unless it is the hits at free-trade which are scattered promiscuously through the book, forming for the protectionist the plums of the economical pudding. Considering that what is now called the policy of protection was universal in Europe two or three centuries ago, and is still persisted in by Austria and Russia, we fail to see how it can be claimed as American.

The most striking feature of the work before us is its heterogeneousness. Our American writers on the subject may be divided into two classes: those who accept the modern system—writers of "the school," Mr. Colwell calls them—and those who will have none of it. Professor Bowen accepts the principles of the school, but rejects their applications. He lays down the former with great clearness. No other American writer has given a better account of the limits of the science, the transformation and increase of capital, the relations of labor to capital, the functions of money, or the nature and laws of exchangeable value. If his chapters on these subjects could be cut out and made into a separate work, we should recommend it. But in the practical application of his principles we find qualities so directly the opposite that it is difficult to conceive the entire work as emanating from the same pen. His indignation is profoundly excited against three doctrines which he considers radically English and never tires of attacking. They are the Malthusian theory of population, Ricardo's theory of rent, and Adam Smith's policy of free-trade. The blindness of his attacks upon these doctrines is the more curious in that, unlike most of their opponents, he seems to understand at least the two first. On pages 153 to 157, he gives a statement of Ricardo's theory of rent which is quite fair, the last paragraph excepted. Here he wanders off to the Malthusian theory of population in seeming unconsciousness of any change of subject. He then devotes seven pages to what purports to be a criticism of Ricardo, but is really a sound criticism of nothing but the ideas added to Ricardo's theory by his own vigorous imagination. Among the doctrines refuted is "the great and obvious fallacy of supposing that the population, as it increases, necessarily remains stationary, or on the same spot, so that the grain must be brought to it at a price enhanced by the cost of transportation." Ascribing such a proposition as this to Ricardo, or even to Malthus, is a perversion of their ideas on which we shall not stop to comment.

Having knocked down all his men of straw, Professor Bowen proceeds to establish his own American theory of rent. We enter upon it expecting something very new and striking. What then is our surprise to read on and find that the new doctrine, so far as it covers the ground occupied by the English economist, does not differ from that of Ricardo. It is simply the old doctrine stripped of its imaginary appendages and illustrated by the state of things this side of the Atlantic. He says:

"Rent arises from the excess of the local demand over the local supply, and is therefore ultimately determined by the expense and inconvenience of bringing the food from a distance, or by the discomforts and privations which attend the removal of a portion of the people to a new home." . .

"Not only in America, but in Great Britain and Ireland, and indeed throughout the civilized world, it is notorious that rent is produced and increased or, in other words, that value is given to the land, by creating a market for agricultural produce in the neighborhood of the land whence that produce is obtained, that is, by collecting a town or civic population, engaged in manufactures and commerce, who have the means to buy the wheat."

This is very true, but it is in entire accord with Ricardo's theory. The essential principle of the latter is this: When in the progress of population, a people find the land which is most advantageously situated or most fertile insufficient to supply them with food, and when, in consequence, they are obliged to have recourse to soils less advantageous with respect to situation and fertility, the more advantageous soils will command a rent corresponding to their superior advantages. We are at a loss to infer in what way Mr. Bowen thinks he has modified this doctrine. The point on which he lays most emphasis is this: "Rent depends not on the increase but on the distribution of the population." This is about as much to the point as if he had criticised the popular opinion of the effects of a spring shower by saying that it is not the falling of the rain but its presence on the ground that makes the grass grow. He surely cannot suppose Ricardo or any one else to maintain that, if population should cease to increase, land would no longer command rent. On the other hand, does not every change in the "distribution" of population necessarily imply an increase somewhere? In the very case supposed by Mr. Bowen, that of a city springing up in an agricultural district, is there not an increase in the population of that district? Worse yet, the new theory exhibits the most deplorable feature of the old one. Before the city is built its site is occupied by a farmer who finds the soil of his quarter-section ample for his subsistence. He therefore offers no rent for the adjoining land. After the city is built, this land becomes necessary to the support of its inhabitants, and so commands rent. Why this change? Because the population of the quarter-section has outgrown its means of subsistence. So has the population of every city in the Union, and thus its inhabitants have to pay rent for the adjoining land. Thus we have the Malthusian theory unconsciously naturalized in this country by Professor Bowen himself. In fine, our author's conclusions respecting rent remind us of Pascal's ecclesiastics, who condemned under one name as false, impious, and damnable the very doctrines they themselves maintained under a different name.

* "American Political Economy, including strictures on the management of the currency and the finances since 1861, with a chart showing the fluctuations in the price of gold. By Francis Bowen, Alford Professor of Natural Religion, Moral Philosophy, and Civil Polity in Harvard College." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1870. pp. 495.

Another question, to the discussion of which Mr. Bowen seems unable to bring an orderly arrangement of ideas, is that between protection and free-trade. His treatment of it is noteworthy for its vagueness. From a protectionist point of view this is, perhaps, not a serious objection, as a vague and shadowy proposition suffers less from the assaults of criticism than a clear and precise one. But it is a decided objection to an enquiring student desiring to know exactly what a protective tariff is for and what limits are to be set to its operation. Such a one will get very little satisfaction from the present work; indeed we may doubt whether, if brought to the practical test of voting on the tariff, our author would prove to be a protectionist at all in a sense satisfactory to Pennsylvania politicians. His first allusion to the question contains a statement which affords one of the strongest popular arguments for free trade. "We have in this country," he says, "the largest extension of the system of free trade which the world has ever witnessed; we have free trade between Maine and Louisiana, between California and Massachusetts; and no one doubts that the system is equally beneficial to all these States" (p. 13). Our protectionist friends seem to look upon this extension as on their part a concession so meritorious that the country is unreasonable to want more. But we apprehend this view will fail to satisfy the enquiring masses. They will naturally want to know whether a system which has been extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, with results beneficial to all parties, cannot be advantageously tried a little farther. If they are told that the circumstances of Canada and Mexico are so different from our own as to make that course unadvisable, they will ask by what dispensation of Providence it happened that the political boundaries of our Republic were run along the very lines which mark the limits of advantageous trade. They will ask whether, if Canada is annexed, the introduction of Canadian lumber will still be hurtful to our home industry. The people of the Mississippi Valley may soon begin to enquire whether their industry does not suffer more from the competition of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts than from that of England. They will hardly be satisfied with the reminder that the Europeans are foreigners. They will want to know why it is not as advantageous to enjoy free trade with a foreigner who offers advantageous terms as with an inhabitant of the East.

We find nothing tangible put forward in reply to these questions until we reach the subjects of manufactures and wages. Here we find the baleful effects of free trade with England illustrated by the case of Ireland, in descanting on which our author shows singular ignorance of the industrial history of Ireland, where the woollen manufacture was actually suppressed by act of Parliament, and the export of wool to other places than England actually prohibited till very recently. The result of this free trade, he says, to Ireland was that importations diminished to such an extent that the consumption of British manufactures by each inhabitant was reduced to one-fifth that of a West India negro (p. 184). It must be admitted that this is a novel argument against free trade. Usually we are told that the effect of this policy will be seen in the excessive importation and consumption of foreign goods. To a protectionist at all sensitive on the subject of logic it must be rather perplexing to hear two addresses from the same rostrum, in one of which they are warned that free trade will lead to excessive importations; in the other, that it will stop the consumption of foreign goods. The disagreement extends to the exports as well as the imports. Few exports to pay for the imports, in other words, an adverse balance of trade, has hitherto been the bugbear of the protectionist. But on p. 75 we find that the exports of edible products from Ireland are excessive, having increased from seven million bushels in 1817 to twenty-six millions in 1845. At the same time the Irish do not produce wealth! We infer that "edible products" are not deemed "wealth" in "American" political economy. They do not import manufactured goods, because they are "too poor to purchase them at any price" (p. 76)! So they get nothing in exchange for the edibles they export. To fill the cup of their sorrow, they can make nothing at home because they are unable to compete with English capital. This deplorable state of affairs is the result of free trade, and must therefore, we suppose, be remedied by a protective tariff. But it must be conceded that the idea of levying such a tariff upon goods that cannot be imported under any circumstances is a novelty.

We see nothing in this work that America has reason to be proud of. It presents some of the best thoughts of the great economists of England, but they are so mixed up with discussions which do not rise above the level of the average political newspaper, that it is difficult to separate them. The economical ideas of any young man who has derived all his knowledge from this work must be in a state of great confusion, unless he possess the critical acumen to distinguish the true from the false. If he succeed in this, the total absence of arrangement and classification, each chapter being an independent essay, must interfere with that co-ordination of ideas which is essential to the proper understanding of any complicated subject.

BERNARD'S BRITISH NEUTRALITY.*

THE title of this work indicates the purpose of the author. After a preface in which the causes of our civil war and its first events are briefly narrated, Professor Bernard passes on to the history of the various international questions which came up during the war; and first of the neutrality of the European powers, of the Queen's proclamation, and of the British regulations as to prizes. Then he reviews the complaints of the United States occasioned by the declaration of neutrality; our offer to accede to the declaration of Paris of 1856, and its unsuccessful issue; the case of the Trent; and the commencement of the blockade. The subject of Confederate ships in neutral ports, and the various questions that arose as the war continued, are next discussed. Then follows a very important series of chapters on contraband trade, and ships procured in England by the Confederates; on the Alabama claims; and on Federal and Confederate cruisers. The last chapters treat of questions respecting foreigners in the United States, of the progress and end of the war, and of the later negotiations; and the author closes his work with some remarks in defence of the attitude of his country, and yet kind and conciliatory in spirit.

The chief value of this work lies, as it appears to us, in the historical form which it takes. The author has conferred a great benefit on all students of international law by the documents, or extracts from documents, which he adds to his text, and by the brief judgments on points of international law which are continually given. But the highest praise must be awarded to his candor and fairness of mind. It is not likely, and he is without doubt far from expecting, that all his opinions will be acceptable at present on this side of the water, although we incline to believe that ten or twenty years hence little of what he lays down as law will be denied by our jurists and publicists. But he has pursued the course best calculated to bring about a substantial agreement in the international principles and practice of the two countries—he has stated his doctrine on disputed points with a wise moderation and a spirit quite unlike that of diplomats contending for their respective sides with such arguments, good or bad, as may be at hand.

Mr. Bernard remarks, that the United States, a nation which once pushed neutral rights as far as any other state, showed a disposition during the late war to stretch belligerent rights to an equal extent. In fact, a claim was made in the case of the Trent which we would have utterly repudiated in 1810; and the doctrine of continuous voyages, as applied to the conveyance of contraband and breaches of blockade, has been carried by Chief-Justice Chase beyond the principles which Lord Stowell laid down. A singular circumstance occurred in the case of the Emily St. Pierre, a British vessel captured on the sea a dozen miles from Charleston, and placed under the charge of two officers and a number of men to be carried to Philadelphia. The part of the crew retained on board rose against the captors and succeeded in taking her into Liverpool. Mr. Adams made a demand on the British Government for the restitution of the vessel, and Earl Russell denied that a neutral state had any control over a vessel which had been rescued on the high seas before a Prize Court had decided on the validity of the capture. During the discussions it appeared that Great Britain had made a similar claim against the United States in 1800, which had been met by similar arguments. The two Governments had changed places. There can be no doubt, says Prof. Bernard, "that the American Government was right in 1800 and wrong in 1862, and the English Government wrong in 1800 and right in 1862," and for this dictum he has without doubt good reason. In another place he says, speaking of changes of position as it respects international questions, that "the history of international law is full of such variations and inconsistencies. We ourselves are not clear from them. Among the complaints urged by Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams there are some which seem but reproductions of those addressed by Lord Stormont and Sir Joseph Yorke to the French and Dutch Governments during the war of the American independence. And it would be easy to draw an effective contrast between the severity with which Great Britain formerly enforced the rights of belligerents, and the warmth with which she lately asserted the rights of neutrals." We must admit and confess the justice of these remarks, as far as they relate to the United States, but was not our changed position partly due to the almost exclusive study of British authorities? If our statesmen had been more familiar with Continental doctrine, which has always leaned towards large neutral rights on the seas, we might have avoided some mistakes.

* "A Historical Account of the Neutrality of Great Britain during the American Civil War. By Prof. Montague Bernard, University of Oxford." London: Longmans. 1870.

In regard to blockade, Mr. Bernard makes some wise remarks on the new difficulties arising from the ease with which steam-vessels can slip into ports thus obstructed. He admits that, on the whole, our blockade of Southern ports was rigorous and effective, although in some respects at first irregular. Here the definition of effectiveness, as given in the declaration of Paris, that the blockading force must be sufficient really to prohibit access to the coast of the enemy, which is not without ambiguity in itself, becomes more ambiguous if, through the power of steam, the same vessel can run a blockade many times over, as happened during the late war. What will an effective blockade be, if one out of three vessels can get into port uninjured? Must not in the time to come new rules be made for the protection of belligerents, and for the stoppage of traffic which cannot be effectively stopped, owing to the facilities of running blockades by steam at the mouth of a harbor?

We have no doubt that Prof. Bernard's work will be received with decided favor by all who give themselves to the study of international law, and will materially influence opinion on both sides of the Atlantic.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Atkinson (Mary E.), Ivy Leaves: Poetry	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Beneath the Wheels: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	$0 50
Cocker (Prof. B. F.), Christianity and Greek Philosophy	(Harper & Bros.)	2 75
Clarke (W. H.), Short Voluntaries for the Organ	(O. Ditson & Co.)	1 50
Cooke (Prof. J. P.), First Principles of Chemical Philosophy	(Sever, Francis & Co.)	3 50
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 31, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	0 50
Donald (R.), Wonders of Architecture	(C. Scribner & Co.)	1 50
Drisler (Prof. H.), Yonge's English-Greek Lexicon	(Harper & Bros.)	7 00
Evans (H. D.), Treatise on the Christian Doctrine of Marriage	(Hurd & Houghton)	2 50
Hutchings (J. M.), Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California	(A. Roman & Co.)	3 00
Lifting the Veil	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Lea (H. C.), Superstition and Force, 2d ed., revised	(Henry C. Lea)
Mitchell (E.), Five Thousand a Year, and How I Made it, swd	(Loring)	0 38
Miss Van Kortland: a Tale, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	1 00
Mommsen (T.), History of Rome, Vol. III	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Maine (H. S.), Ancient Law	" "	2 50
McIlvaine (Prof. J. H.), Elocution: a text-book	" "
Ram (J.), Treatise on Facts, 1st Am. ed	(Baker, Voorhis & Co.)	5 00
Seaman (E. C.), The American System of Government	(C. Scribner & Co.)
Shedd (Prof. W. G. T.), Homiletics, and Pastoral Theology, 8th ed	(C. Scribner & Co.)	2 50
History of Christian Doctrine, 2 vols., 8d ed.,	" "	5 00
Sand (Mme. G.), Consuelo: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 50

A Student of Harvard College desires a position of private tutor to one or more pupils during the Summer vacation, between June and October.

Address "Student," Hollis 27, Cambridge, Mass.

REFERENCES: Dr. A. P. Peabody, Cambridge; Prof. F. Bowen, Cambridge; Dr. H. W. Bellows, 232 East Fifteenth Street, New York; Mr. M. W. Lyon—School, 161 Fifth Avenue.

READY ON SATURDAY, MAY 21,

A TOURIST'S GUIDE

TO THE

Yo-Semite Valley,

AND ALL THE

Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California.

Its Big-Tree Groves, Natural Caves and Bridges, Quicksilver Mines, Mount Shasta, the Farallone Islands, Geyser Springs, Lake Tahoe, and other places of interest.

Illustrated with over One Hundred Engravings.

Also, giving Map of Routes to Yo-Semite and Big-Tree Groves, Tables of Distances, Rates of Fare, Hotel Charges, and other desirable information for the traveller. By J. M. HUTCHINGS, of Yo-Semite. An elegant 4to vol., tinted paper, extra cloth, bevelled edges, price $3.

For sale at the principal Bookstores.

A. ROMAN & CO., Publishers,
27 Howard Street, New York.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co., 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

Important Scholarly Works,

IMPORTED AND FOR SALE BY

Scribner, Welford & Co.

654 Broadway.

Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization. By E. B. Tylor. 1 vol. 8vo, $6.

Notes and Conjectural Emendations of Certain Doubtful Passages in Shakespeare's Plays. By P. A. Daniel. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

England to Delhi: A Narrative of Indian Travel. By I. Matheson. 1 vol. royal 8vo, illustrated, $15 75.

Dictionary of Chronology; or, Historical and Statistical Register. Compiled by W. H. Overall. 1 large vol. 8vo, $8.

The Brahmo Somaj. Four Lectures by Keshub Chunder Sen. 1 vol. 16mo, $1.

English Reprints, No. 22, edited with Introduction and Bibliography. Being William Habington's Castara. 1634. 1 vol. 12mo, paper, 50 cents.

Malta: Past and Present. Being a History of Malta from the Days of the Phœnicians to the Present Time. By H. Seddall. 1 vol. 8vo, $6.

Journal of the Ethnological Society of London. New Series. Vol. I., with engravings, $7.

Logic. By Alex. Bain. Part I. Deduction. $2. Part II. Induction. $3 25.

L. W. SCHMIDT,
GERMAN BOOKSELLER,
24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

THE UNDERSIGNED beg to announce to their Friends and the BOOK-BUYING PUBLIC that they have established themselves at

No. 451 Broome Street,

For the purpose of carrying on a

Publishing & Bookselling Business,

Where they will be happy to see them and receive orders. They will keep on hand a full stock of the

PUBLICATIONS OF THE DAY,

Besides the

Works of Popular Standard Authors, Children's Books, Libraries, and Toy Books.

ALSO,

School and College Text Books, Music Books, etc.

Bringing with them an experience of Twenty-seven Years in the "Trade" in this City, they are prepared to transact a FIRST-CLASS business INTELLIGENTLY.

A well-selected Stock from Boston, Philadelphia, and Western Publishing Houses will always be kept on hand. Also,

Bibles, Books of Common Prayer, Churcn Service, and Hymn Books of all denominations,

In the various editions and styles of binding.

Orders from PUBLIC OR PRIVATE LIBRARIES, SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, OR CLERGYMEN will receive a LIBERAL DISCOUNT.

They will guarantee to all customers promptness and despatch in all business engagements.

Soliciting your patronage, we remain,

Yours faithfully,

DE WITT C. LENT & CO.,
Publishers and Booksellers,
451 BROOME STREET
(A few doors west of Broadway),
NEW YORK.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1870.

The Week.

THE bill to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, as amended and improved by the Conference Committee, was adopted by the Senate on Wednesday of last week, and by the House on the following Friday. The Senate has done nothing else of importance. In discussing the Legislative Appropriation Bill, it adopted an amendment of Mr. Trumbull's, equalizing the pay of male and female clerks. The House, after a prolonged and rather bitter struggle, passed the Northern Pacific Railroad Bill, which received the President's signature on Tuesday. The majority in favor of it ranged from three to twenty-four, on its final passage. A case similar to Mr. Sypher's, from a contested district in South Carolina, was decided on Friday in an opposite way, simply because Democratic members were off their guard. Mr. A. S. Wallace, the Republican candidate, was declared entitled to a seat in the House, although he had received but 9,807 votes, against 14,098 thrown for Mr. W. D. Simpson, whose offence was that he had served in the Confederate army, and was therefore ineligible. Instead of ordering a new election, the House ruled that the candidate next in number of votes should be admitted. Mr. Dawes, as usual, protested to deaf ears. On Tuesday, Mr. Lynch's bill to revive the navigation interests of the country was first amended into something quite different from the original, and then returned to the select committee without instructions to report; in other words, killed. Its fate is one more sign of the decline of the protection party.

Monday was Decoration Day, and was observed with a good deal of enthusiasm and solemnity in all parts of the country. We trust the custom may never be less honored, in spite of the objections to it on the score of its tendency to perpetuate sectional feeling. If it was a noble thing for the dead to die, it can never become undesirable to keep alive the recollection of what they died for. It is, we must say, asking a little too much to ask people to try and forget what everybody was trying to induce his neighbor to lay down his life for six years ago, and what a vast number of our neighbors did lay down their lives for without hesitation. The time to have been horrified by the recollections of civil strife was before the fighting began. Dr. Thompson, in his address at the Academy of Music, turned the occasion to good account by reminding the audience of various things which the dead did not die for, such as sectarianism, priesthood, caste, corruption at the polls; and various things they did die for, such as truth and virtue and freedom and justice and humanity and God; and the great use of all such celebrations is, after all, to keep people in mind of the fact that there are things in the world worth dying for.

We wish some orator had also taken this opportunity of reminding the audience that one way of honoring the dead is to cherish more or less respect for the living who fought by their side. The man who has survived the storms of war is just as much worthy of respect as the man whom they have destroyed, which, we are afraid, a great many of us have begun to forget. We are afraid old soldiers are not quite so welcome to all sorts of good things as they were five years ago, and we are quite sure we are all far more afraid lest General Sherman or General Sheridan should have anything over and above a bare subsistence, and lest they should become dukes and marquises, and oppress us, than we ever thought we should be when we heard that the Army of Tennessee had disappeared behind Atlanta, and that Early's flank had been turned at Cedar Creek. If we could only rise up on Decoration Day, with the heart-sickness, the dread anxiety, the tearful exultation, with which we used to stand before the bulletin boards on the same days in 1862–'3–'4, what a day of discipline, reproof, and instruction, and encouragement it would be.

The long-talked-of effort of the Administration to put itself right in New York politics seems to have been precipitated by the result of the State election, and there appears to be now no doubt that Mr. Grinnell is to be removed, and some more active and skilful politician put in his place. Mr. Grinnell's fault has been that he has not taken sides with proper ardor in the struggle between the Fentonites and Anti-Fentonites, the two great parties into which the Republicans are now divided—Fenton being, all things considered, the most active and formidable "manager" the party has produced in these parts since the retirement of Mr. Thurlow Weed, and anybody who wants to succeed must either hate him or swear by him. Mr. Grinnell having done neither, his "rotating" has not given satisfaction, and he is to be thrown overboard, and a gigantic effort is to be made to restore party discipline, which is in a low state. We hope, at the same time, something will be done to improve the party morals, which also would bear a touch or two. The Republicans in the last Legislature made a bargain with the Democrats over the new charter, by which the city was virtually handed over to the Ring for five or six years, the consideration being "a good election law," which was to put an end to fraudulent voting. The law was tried at the last election, and the frauds are believed never to have been surpassed. In fact, there need not, henceforth, be any limit to the Democratic majority in this State; and people are asking themselves whether Tweed and Sweeny will continue very long to go through the process of taking a vote at all. They really, if it were not "for the name of the thing," might as well announce the municipal officers of each year from the balcony of the City Hall without taking the trouble of cheating at the polls; but they will doubtless maintain the forms of republican government, as Augustus did, in order to keep "the people" easy in their minds.

No one has during the last two or three years watched Southern politics and considered them with anything like impartiality who is not now of opinion, we venture to say, that in nearly every State controlled by what calls itself the true Republican party of the South, there is a disgraceful amount of corruption and folly, and that it is at the States governed by the conservative wing of the party that any American must look who does not wish to hang his head in presence of the enemies of popular government. Compare, for instance, the Virginia of Governor Walker with the Louisiana of Warmoth and Wickliffe, the South Carolina of Scott, or the Georgia of Bullock. Bullock's case grows more and more malodorous every day. One might think that nothing additional need be said about him after the revelations of the Senate Investigation Committee which exposed him and Colonel Forney. It appears that by order of the State Legislature the Treasurer has prepared a statement setting forth the number of times and how the Governor has transcended his authority, and violated both the laws of Georgia and her constitution. There are a good many counts in the indictment, and we hope to see them made good in a trial by impeachment—unless, indeed, Mr. Morton, the Governor's other friend in the Senate, introduce a new section into the last Georgia bill, and forbid all impeachment of loyal governors on charges of peculation. One charge is, that Bullock has in an unusual and extraordinary manner disbursed about two-thirds of the Contingent Fund of the State for "incidental expenses of the Executive Department." Another charge is, that Bullock drew warrants on the Printing Fund for means to pay the wages of more clerks in his own office than the law allowed, and that he refused to draw on the same fund for $10,000 with which to pay the printer, and this although instructed so to draw by a heavy vote of the Legislature. There are plenty more charges—as of getting from the Fourth National Bank of this city, and expending it, $35,000 of unappropriated funds; of selling, without authorization, $265,000 worth of State bonds, thereby much injuring the credit of the State and cheating its bondholders; of having used, and allowed others to use, the earnings of the Western Atlantic Railroad in a manner other than that prescribed by law, and so forth and so forth, to any extent. Is it any wonder, seeing what sort of a person Bullock is, and knowing how many like him are in the South and in full view of the people, and hearing men like Messrs. Morton and Sumner patting him on the back, and hearing men like Colonel Forney "reading out of the party" men like Messrs. Ferry and Trumbull—is it any great wonder that Connecticut goes Democratic, and that the majority against the Republicans in New York is eighty-eight thousand, of which twenty-odd thousand votes were cast in the rural strongholds?

There was a "Cuban rally" last week in Congress, arising out of the griefs of a Mr. A. E. Phillips, late United States consul at Santiago de Cuba, who, being there when the two Americans, Wyeth and Speakman, were put to death, and having opposed their execution, found the place afterwards too hot for him, and had to take refuge on board a steamer with his wife. His sorrowful tale appeared first in the Tribune, and was then served up, with some harrowing additions, by Mr. Voorhees in the House, who chanted Quousque tandem over it, and abused Mr. Fish and the Administration handsomely. Whereupon uprose General Garfield, and said he knew something of Phillips; that General Steadman, Phillips's predecessor at Santiago, had died at his (Phillips's) house, in possession of $1,000 in money, and other effects; that Phillips made a brief, formal report of the fact of the death to the State Department, but of the particulars of the General's illness, or of the $1,000 and effects, nobody—not even the family of the deceased—had ever since been able to obtain the smallest information. On that whole subject, Phillips preserved an apparently inviolable secrecy, and somehow about this time he gave out that his own life was in danger, and ran off to an American man-of-war, and, by some process unknown to the law, got the captain to appoint him United States consul to Jamaica; but the State Department not recognizing that appointment, he demanded to be carried back to his old post. Carried thither he was accordingly, but refused to land, to the great astonishment of the admiral, who, on enquiring into the cause, learned that he perceived on the beach the well-known forms of numerous and insatiate creditors; and he therefore turned his attention wholly to the brutal conduct of Spain, from which power he claimed $200,000 damages, for bodily terror, mental anxiety, and other annoyances. This was a painful, and ought to have been a convincing, exposure, but it failed to satisfy the Democratic members that Fish was not in some way to blame, and that if Cuba had had belligerent rights Phillips would not have been different from what he was. Such is the "Cuban question."

The Fenian "invasion" of Canada has ended as most of those who had ever given any attention to the enterprise, or had any knowledge of the class of men who got it up, expected it would. As we have endeavored to show elsewhere, however, it was really a "confidence operation," and not a military expedition; and the chiefs who are now in custody ought, if they got their due, to be indicted for obtaining money under false pretences, instead of for violating the neutrality laws, and get at least six months' imprisonment and hard labor. As common cheats, they have achieved an immense success. Their plan of getting large crowds of poor men together in places some hundreds of miles from their homes, without providing any food for them—not even one meal—under pretence that they were going to dismember the British Empire, seems to have owed most of its success to its sheer impudence. Forty or fifty Canadian militia arrested the invasion with a few shots at Pigeon Hill, on the Vermont line, the United States Marshal, General Foster, covering himself with glory, and making a capital joke, by carrying O'Neill, the Commander-in-Chief, off the bloody field as a prisoner in a hack. At Trout River, farther west, another force, a few hundred strong, and half-famished, crossed the frontier under General Starr, and began, at his suggestion, to throw up an entrenchment within easy reach of the line, but ran off on the appearance of the Canadian regulars and militia, Starr leading the way with as much haste as if they had counted on conquering Canada without interference from the British troops. The collection of money was kept up in the various cities during the whole of this last act in the farce with the aid of lying telegrams, and many poor fellows actually sent to what was called "the front" at their own expense, after the whole thing was at an end.

The best of the joke is, however, now that all is over, the Senate of the "F. B.," or the "Savage Wing," as it is called, has issued a manifesto, coolly informing the victims that they have been paying their money in at the wrong box, and that if they want a genuine invasion, and a real downfall of the British Empire, they ought to subscribe to the Savage plan, which is far superior to O'Neill's in every way. We are glad to say, however, that the press has spoken out on the affair with such unanimity and indignation that a repetition or continuance of the swindle will probably be impossible. There ought to be, though we fear there are not, some of the papers specially devoted to Irish interests honest and courageous enough to warn the poor against these schemes. The "salaried officers" of the Brotherhood will probably now have to face the cold world, and either keep real accounts, which will have to balance, or handle the melancholy spade and dismal hoe.

In talking last week of the attitude of the Massachusetts press toward the Hartford and Erie Bill, we did injustice to the Worcester Spy in not mentioning it, as well as the Springfield Republican, as an able and persistent opponent of the bill in the interior of the State. The bill, we see, making the proposed grant of $3,500,000 has been defeated in the Legislature, and the Governor has been empowered to take proceedings to protect the State interest in the road, or, in other words, to institute proceedings in foreclosure—a very satisfactory conclusion to the contest, which has been one of exceeding bitterness, as it was right it should be. Calmness and good humor are very good things, but when discussing with a man who has already stolen your silver spoons whether you might not as well also lend him your silver forks, they do seem a little out of place; and this is very much what the State of Massachusetts has been doing during the last two or three months. The only salvation for "politics" seems to be the absolute denial—which the new Illinois constitution makes imperative—of all State aid to railroads or canals. The practice of making grants of public money for such purposes is sure to convert—indeed, has already converted—the getting of public money for such purposes into a regular business, and the projection of great public "improvements," with the mere view of drawing "State aid," one of the ready ways to fortune. Moreover, a road which cannot be made, in the hands of a skilful lobby, to appear an absolute necessity for "development" of some kind, must be a very poor affair indeed. Getting people and goods from the interior "down to tide-water" is an enterprise capable of indefinite expansion, and it is just as well to leave it to private speculators. Capital is accumulating in the United States with tremendous rapidity. If there be any difficulty in finding gentlemen to invest money in anything in which a reasonable return is tolerably certain, we have not as yet heard of it.

We are informed that the chances of the adoption of the minority representation clause in the Illinois constitution have greatly increased, and that the prospect of its adoption, which we last week thought very doubtful, may now be considered very good. Its success would certainly be the first real improvement ever made in the representative system, and one of the greatest ever made in the machinery of government, and, though it would still leave the millennium a long way off, would remove one of the greatest stumbling-blocks in the way of other reforms by diminishing the power of the caucus. The adoption of the constitution is looked for by a majority of about 100,000. We may add that the debates in the convention were of a very high order of excellence, and singularly free, as indeed was the whole action of the convention, from party bias.

There has been more or less talk as to the way in which the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments would affect such State constitutions as that of Massachusetts, for instance, where a man may not vote unless he pays a certain annual tax and "can read and write," or that of Rhode Island, where, also, a voter must be a taxpayer. Certain citizens of the latter State have been petitioning the Legislature to enquire whether or not the two amendments do not confer the right of suffrage on every United States citizen resident in Rhode Island, irrespective of the qualifications required by the State constitution. The question was referred to the Judiciary Committee, who give it an answer decidedly in the negative, and so, no doubt, it will be answered elsewhere. It is not debarring a man from voting on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude" to debar him from voting for non-payment of taxes or inability to write his name. Of course, it is within the possibilities that at some time in the future there may, in various parts of the Union, be evasions, in something like the Rhode Island fashion, of the force of the amendments; but, certainly, that is not now to be called the reasonable prospect. There seems, on the whole, a willingness to make political use of the negro, and he, if he has not yet shone as a legislator, works very well in party harness, and will work better the more he works. It may be doubted if five years from now anybody but a Southern woman, or an aged pastor of the Methodist Church South, or some other geographical Christian, will be saying a word against the right of the negroes to vote and to hold all the offices they can get themselves voted into.

We must say that if the American Press Association has the least knowledge or sense in its management, and it has shown signs already of having a good deal, it can easily improve vastly on the European despatches of the Associated Press. The want of sense of perspective in the latter is something curious, although they have greatly mended since the earlier days of the cable, when they used to give us an account of the ladies' dresses at the Ascot races and even predict the price of stocks. But what can induce even a stupid man to telegraph across the Atlantic that "the Saturday Review has a savage article on Beecher's sermons?" If this be worth telegraphing, it shows that the reporter neglects his duties terribly, because we never hear from him of a million of facts of twentyfold greater importance. If the news be of the importance he thinks it is, however, how does he suppose we are going to wait till we see the article? Think of the suspense—ten days long—in thousands of American homes—the dreadful waking, morning after morning, of strong men and tender women, to the consciousness that the Saturday Review's judgments of Beecher's sermons were still on the treacherous sea—and the sermons all the while on our tables!

The most striking incident of the recent news from France has been the storm which has arisen against M. Laboulaye for his adhesion, since the plébiscite, to the Imperial régime. He has undoubtedly plenty of very good arguments with which to defend himself, and a fine character and great services to the Liberal cause to fall back on, but he has unfortunately taken office, and his son is in office, and the result is that he has exposed his opinions to suspicion, and has become an object of intense odium to the Liberals. The Strasbourgers have sent up a deputation to demand back from him a silver inkstand they once presented him, and declare their intention of suing him for it, and the students at the Collége de France refuse to hear him lecture, and have even mobbed him, as they did Dr. Tardieu for his evidence at the Tours trial. Ollivier has given what is considered exceedingly strong evidence of his reactionary tendencies in sending the "conspirators" for trial before the High Court of Justice, from which there is no appeal, even for defects of procedure, and the jury of which is likely to be composed largely of functionaries, and of which he confessed himself somewhat ashamed when the Noir murder case came up, but pleaded the state of the law as his excuse for convening it.

M. Ollivier's press prosecutions are now so numerous and reckless that even Paul de Cassagnac confesses that he is unable to account for them, and M. Ollivier is fast losing all respect whatever on the part of the Liberals. One of the sins for which the Marseillaise is under pursuit is a really good joke, viz., the publication of M. Grandperret's report on the conspiracy as a feuilleton, in parts, each closing with "to be continued." The severity of the Government, however, does not seem to extend out of Paris, and there is much curious testimony as to the freedom with which the troops in the provinces were allowed to receive the electioneering documents distributed by the Radicals before the plébiscite. It is hardly possible to believe that the value of the army for Imperial purposes has not been seriously diminished by the part it has been allowed to take in the late vote. The exact number of "nons" cast in the army and navy is 52,000; and it is large enough, considering to what a soldier exposes himself who is mal vu by his superiors, to excite a good deal of uneasiness at the Tuileries—particularly as it is supposed that the discontent of the privates must have more or less sympathy among the officers.

There has been a curious debate in the English Parliament on the opium traffic, or, rather, opium manufacture carried on by the Government in India. About $40,000,000 a year of the Indian revenue is derived partly from duties on and partly from a Government monopoly of the drug, and the whole of it goes to China, where it pays a 10 per cent. import duty, which the Chinese in vain endeavored to raise to 20 per cent. when making the treaty of Tiensin, in 1860, when the trade was for the first time legalized. Sir William Lawson has just tried to get the House of Commons to pass a vote of censure on the Government connection with the trade, but was stoutly opposed both by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Grant Duff, on the ground, mainly, that the Indian Government and the holders of Indian securities, and the native cultivators of the poppy, cannot do without the money, and that if opium for the Chinese was not raised in India it would be raised somewhere else, and that to give it up, therefore, would be to inflict a fine on British subjects without doing anything for the improvement of the Chinese. This, however, is evidently not felt to be quite sufficient excuse, and a portion of the press—notably the Pall Mall Gazette—has entered into a discussion of the ethics of the affair which is interesting as a piece of casuistry. Whether opium-eating is not of some use; whether it is not the excess in the use of it which is objectionable, and whether, up to a certain point, it does not do the Chinese good, are all debated with much solemnity; but the main point remains after all untouched—whether a Christian government ought to engage actively in a trade which, somehow or other, works enormous evil. The argument that somebody else would carry it on if it did not, if sound, would justify a government monopoly of brothels and gambling-houses. The whole connection of the British Government with opium is an immense disgrace, not simply to England, but to Western religion and civilization, and it is made all the deeper by the spectacle which, we suppose, will now be witnessed every year, of men like Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Grant Duff finding excuses for it.

A correspondent elsewhere gives an interesting account of the preparations going on at Rome a month ago for forcing the infallibility dogma on the Council, as a Congressman would say, under the previous question. There appears now to be little or no doubt of its passage, and the dissentients begin at last to think what they will do next. Strong opposition—stronger even now when hope is gone than while there was reason to believe that the Papal party would yet recoil—shows itself both in France and Germany. Some of the leading German theologians preach against the dogma, and in Paris there is said to be talk of schism among the younger clergy and the gloomiest forebodings among the older. There is, too, a great outpouring of pamphlets from bishops of various degrees, but the Pope lets none of them into Rome, and has the letters of the malcontents opened in the post-office, which the Univers defends, as a very proper mode of preventing "the diffusion of error." Indeed, the proceedings of the Council there have so strikingly resembled the arrangements which we so often witness in this country for packing nominating conventions, that if people can be got to believe that this is now the only mode in which "the voice of God," in our time, makes itself heard by men, it is hard to see why the common domestic caucus, as we all know it, should not at last succeed in clothing itself with the character of an inspired body. It has nearly succeeded in doing so in the minds of many people already. The great difficulty has been the doubts felt whether "wire-pulling" was a proper mode of getting at the Divine will, but the example of the Œcumenical Council seems likely to settle this.

THE REPUBLICAN "APATHY."

We are having just now a good deal of discussion of the condition and prospects of the Republican party, and it has derived fresh impetus from the result of the late New York election, which, while it revealed some rather startling results in the way of frauds on the part of the Democrats, revealed others nearly as startling in the way of "apathy" on the part of the Republicans. The vote of the latter on the judicial ticket was just about half what was cast for Grant in 1868. There has been a falling-off in the Democratic vote in the State also, but a very much smaller one. All the indications one can get at with regard to the state of feeling in other parts of the country, lead us to look for somewhat similar displays of indifference at the coming fall elections. Neither party is much excited or interested just now in politics; but, unquestionably, whatever energy or activity is to be found in either is to be found amongst the Democrats. Republicans have, therefore, begun to ask themselves with some anxiety how long this is going to last, and whether there is no means of getting up a revival of enthusiasm, or, at least, of vigilance, before the next Presidential election.

Harper's Weekly, which is perhaps the most hopeful of the Republican papers which make any claim to independence, in its last number pointed out, by the aid of citations from Democratic articles and speeches, the great danger to the highest interests of the country of allowing the present apathy and dissension to pervade the Republican ranks between now and the choice of the next President; and in doing so, really said nearly everything, as we hinted last week, that can be said just now by way of justifying the claims of the party to a continuance of the popular support. It is, no doubt, quite true that the only legal result of the war which the Democrats have accepted with a good grace is emancipation. Of every other they are ready, or at least a considerable portion of them, to get rid if they can; and it is also true that their success in getting rid of them would be a tremendous calamity. But then it is a great mistake, we think, to suppose that they hope all they wish, or that the policy with which they will go before the country in the next campaign will contain all, or indeed more than a very small part, of their aspirations. They know perfectly well that to win they must either secure a division of the Republican party or draw off a considerable number of Republican votes, or frame a platform that will contain nothing to rouse Republicans from their present lethargy; and there is not a particle of reason for believing that any Republican has the slightest desire to see anything undone that the war has done by way of legislation, or believes in the possibility of undoing it. In fact, if the Democrats wanted to hit upon a plan of rousing the old war enthusiasm and ensuring their utter and irretrievable defeat, they could not do a better thing than get up and declare their intention of opening up all the questions which Congress and the army have during the last ten years been engaged in settling, and they know this as well as anybody. They know that the country is sick of the reconstruction business and wants to have done with it, and that the attempt of the Republican majority in Congress to prolong the controversy over it has, perhaps, injured the party as much as anything; that what the people craves is "new issues;" and that, therefore, any party which took the field with nothing better to offer than a bundle of old ones would be beaten before it got into line. The rant of Mr. Richard O'Gorman, at the Judiciary Convention, about the need of political judges, and the acceptance by the World of the Ring candidates, on which Harper's Weekly comments, are one thing; a platform drawn up by Mr. O'Gorman and the editor of the World for adoption by a national convention would be another thing, as we shall see if they should ever be called on to frame one.

What has brought the Republican party into its present difficulties and has made its future look so doubtful, is this tendency to rely on the badness of the Democratic party as a sufficient substitute for a positive policy of its own. There could not be a greater mistake. No party, no matter what its past services, can hope to remain long in power on the ground that it is the less of two evils, or that if it is turned out something dreadful will happen. The country will bear with this for a while; but an attempt is sure to be made before long to discover a middle way out of the difficulty—that is, to create a party which, while supplying security, will also supply progress. In other words, if the Republican party can do nothing more than keep the Democrats out of office, the country will look about for somebody that can keep the Democrats out of office and do a few odd jobs of reform besides. A majority in power cannot confine itself to standing guard over its conquests: it must march, and make others. People do not believe that everything that needs be done to secure the fruits of the war has been done by the three amendments to the Constitution, or that the war, besides doing much good, has left behind no evils which need immediate removal. The condition of the currency is an evil; the condition of the public debt is an evil; the weight of taxation is an evil; the state of the civil service is an evil; the tariff is an evil; and all are evils resulting directly or indirectly from the war, and they affect not only the comfort and happiness of every man, woman, and child in the community, but the honor and purity and efficiency of the Government. "The revenue of the state," says Burke, "is the state. In effect, all depends on it, whether for support or for reformation. . . . As all great 'qualities of mind which operate in public and are not merely suffering and passive require force for their display—I had almost said, for their unequivocal existence—the revenue, which is the spring of all power, becomes in its administration the sphere of every active virtue. . . . Through the revenue alone can the body politic ever act in its true genius and character, and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue, and as much of that virtue which may characterize those who move it and are, as it were, its life and guiding principle, as it is possessed of a just revenue." The revenue and the mode of raising and collecting it have been during the past winter the two great questions before Congress, and the majority has totally failed in its attempts to deal with them. The civil service, or the machinery for collecting and disbursing it, it has, indeed, openly refused to touch at all. It has put forward only one or two men who have shown either the knowledge or the capacity or the courage to deal with financial problems, while several of the leaders have introduced financial bills which were only prevented from being painful by being ludicrous. The one good thing it has done for the finances—the appointment of Commissioner Wells—it is now half ashamed of, and will, unless well watched, let him go in July.

With regard to the leading foreign questions, it has deliberately flung the Alabama question into a slough from which we doubt if any man in this generation will see it extricated, leaving the individual sufferers to suck their thumbs; and with regard to Cuba, it has taken neither good filibustering ground nor good legal ground, and, while not supporting the Administration, has recoiled from prescribing any change of policy. It has purchased Alaska and then refused to purchase St. Thomas, after the Executive had struck a bargain for it, leaving the world in some doubt as to what its views about expansion are. In short, the main claim of the present Congress to popular gratitude consists in its greater freedom from corruption than some of its predecessors, in spite of the poor element it has received from the South; but here again its virtues have been of the negative order, which in a party in power are only one degree better than vices.

We are sorry to say all this, because we heartily agree with all that we hear about the inferiority of the Democratic party; but the country can never be persuaded very long to content itself with a government which simply refrains from doing evil, and keeps out worse men; and it is time the majority in Congress were made to understand clearly that their performances are far from giving satisfaction. Plain speaking on the subject is all the more necessary because a good many of the Republican politicians are just now going about trying to cover up their own shortcomings by saying "that Grant's administration is a failure," evidently with a view of making this proposition do duty as an explanation of the rebuffs the party is meeting with in various parts of the country. What the Administration has failed in, except in distributing offices to the satisfaction of politicians, we have never yet heard explained, and do not expect to hear. Its great mistake in this, however, has lain in its trying to mix up two totally different principles of selection—that of merit and party requirements. The result has unquestionably been unfortunate, but small blame to the President.

FENIANISM AS A SWINDLE.

The newspapers have almost without exception discussed the Fenian movement against Canada as a military operation, and are loud and indignant in their denunciations of the "folly," "cowardice," and "incompetence" of the leaders. The World, indeed, went so far as to read Starr, the "general" who commanded at "the battle" of Trout River, a lecture on the absurdity of entrenching an invading army, and pointed out to him, with much severity, that the business of an invader is to take strongholds, and not to make them, and that in allowing his forces to begin throwing up earthworks immediately after they crossed the line, he of necessity demoralized them by destroying their confidence in their ability to act on the offensive. In like manner, O'Neill, the "general" who commanded at the "battle" of Pigeon Hill, has been taken to task very harshly for not having crossed the frontier half a mile further to the west, where he could have pushed into British territory over an open meadow, instead of having to force a barrier of rocks and boulders covered with brushwood.

We believe, however, that gross injustice has been done the Fenian chiefs by most of the judgments passed upon them as military men. Every man's performances have to be weighed with reference to what he really aims at, and no greater or more mischievous mistake can, in our opinion, be made than to suppose that the Fenian movement was simply a badly planned military enterprise. Starr, we are quite sure, knew just as well as the World the objections to allowing an invading army to squat down and throw up clay ten minutes after entering the enemy's country. But then, if he were to speak out his whole mind, he would tell the World that it must not look at him as the head of an army intent on reaching Montreal, but as the head of a mob, which had got into a very bad scrape, and which the soldiers were coming to disperse. Had the reporter of the World consulted him as he came running back over the line, we are sure he would have been able to point out the objections to the movement as forcibly, if not as perspicuously, as the editor himself. He might not be able to describe the strategic difficulties of the enterprise with technical correctness, but he had a monitor within which told him better than ten Jominis could have done that the field of Trout River on that particular occasion was no place for a prudent man. So, also, we are quite sure that the reason why O'Neill did not "charge" the Canadians was, not that he did not know that was the proper thing to do in order to clear the brush, but because he did not want to clear the brush, or thought it not unlikely that the brush could not be cleared without greater loss than his followers could stand. Moreover, we may depend upon it, he saw as plainly as anybody the objections to a general's allowing himself to be arrested by a constable on the field of battle, and carried to jail. The reason why he submitted was, doubtless, that he did not wish to remain on the field of battle any longer, and was glad to have somebody remove him.

In short, to pass judgment fairly on this wretched business, we must consider it, not as a military enterprise, but as a mode of raising money, for their personal use and behoof, by a gang of impudent and impecunious persons, averse to industry, without any regular calling or occupation, and fond of notoriety. We believe the aims of the leaders of the Fenian organization to have been neither better nor worse than those of the gentlemen who get up gift enterprises, open mock-auction stores, deal in lottery tickets, and practise the "confidence game" on innocent dealers and country visitors to the city. The Fenian attack on Canada was therefore simply the culmination of a gigantic but vulgar swindle, protracted through several years, and, it must be admitted, attended with a success such as no swindle has ever before had. If we look at the O'Neills, Gleasons, and Starrs from this point of view, we must confess that they are by no means failures. They stand at the head of their profession. They have succeeded in securing the payment to them and their predecessors and confederates, during a period of six or seven years, of perhaps two millions of money, in aid of an enterprise which was on its part wilder than any scheme ever set before the gullible public by any "operator" or Jeremy Diddler who has ever hitherto made his appearance; and of this money they have retained the sole control, without accounts, checks, or auditing. We presume nobody out of their own small set knows what became of it. Some, but probably only a small part, was spent in arms and ammunition, and, doubtless, even in the purchase of these there was the most reckless jobbery, such as the supply of the 20,000 rounds of muzzle-loading ammunition which, we are told, lay on the ground at Fort Malone, for the use of troops with breech-loaders. How easy cheating came to them, we may guess from the accounts in the papers, during the last few days, of orators mounting on benches at any of the Fenian resorts in this city, reading a few lying telegrams from "the front," and then calling for recruits and subscriptions, and of the poor laborers pressing forward, with their five or ten hard-earned dollars, and handing them over, as they believed, for the expenses of "the campaign"—but, as we have no sort of doubt, ninety-nine per cent. for the payment of the orators' board and whiskey bills.

They have succeeded, too, in a country fresh from a gigantic war, and swarming with men familiar with the conditions of active service and with the elaborateness and magnitude of the preparations in the way of drill, organization, officers, transportation, commissariat necessary to enable even the smallest force to keep the field against an enemy, for a single week, in persuading a vast body of their countrymen that it was possible to conquer a province containing over three millions of inhabitants, and possessing a large regular force, and backed by a great empire, by assembling at one or two points on the frontier several mobs of laborers, who had never been drilled, battalioned, or brigaded, and had never seen or heard of their officers, and had no cannon or transportation or provisions or money, giving them rifles in their hands and green jackets, and hurrying them over the border. For this magnificent bit of imposture, too, they secured, if not the connivance, the respectful silence of a large portion of the press and the smiles of many members of Congress—the House actually helping them on in 1866, at the outset of the enterprise, by refusing to lay on the table, and referring to a committee by a large majority, a resolution proposing to repeal the neutrality laws, avowedly to prevent the Government from interfering with their designs against Canada. Nay, when driven by the clamors of their dupes to make an attack on Canada in that year, the President was assailed by the leading Republican organs—the New York Tribune included—for meddling with them, that is, for enforcing the laws against them. It must be admitted that no impostors ever before accomplished quarter as much.

To understand thoroughly the cruelty of the gang, and the wickedness, not to say blood-guiltiness, of those American editors and politicians who have helped them in their frauds, it must be remembered that their dupes are the poorest and most ignorant class of the American population. For the laborers and servant-girls who have been pouring their savings during the last seven years into the pockets of these charlatans, it is impossible not to feel some admiration as well as pity. With all their faults, there are few people in the world so ignorant as they are of politics and war who are capable of the enthusiasm for a remote and ideal good on which the Fenian organization has been based. The fire which has made the O'Neills and Starrs possible could never, it is safe to say, have been kindled in the breasts of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, or even Americans of a corresponding degree of mental darkness. Let us, too, do justice to the unfortunate squads who followed their chieftains over the border, by saying that no men, under similar circumstances, would have done any better. The Irish have given proofs of courage on so many famous fields, that they can afford as well as any men to be repulsed under O'Neill and run away behind Starr. But then their very simplicity and excitability would have saved them from the practices of any but the most hardened knaves, and ought certainly to have prevented the knaves from receiving the countenance of educated Christians and philanthropists.

If it be asked why the impostors take the field, if they really never meant to fight, we reply that, as they collect the money for fighting purposes, the revenues fall off unless every two or three years there is a show of fighting, and it is to be observed that, when they do take the field, they do everything they can to let the enemy know they are coming, where they are going to cross, and in what force. Moreover, when the moment of action comes, they do the least possible amount of fighting, and leave the field in advance of their dupes. The utmost they hope for is an appearance of advantage over the Canadian militia, which they would be able to magnify into a "battle," and raise more money on. Although not men of education, they know enough of war to know perfectly well that, having no supplies or transportation, their armies would have to disband, even after a victory, for want of food, or, what amounts to the same thing, would have to live by marauding. What a prospect this opened up to the Canadian farmers and their families may be guessed by those who are aware of what kind of material enters into the composition of these Fenian armies.

We cannot help believing that the swindle has at last reached its end. The sentiment of the American public about the whole business has at last found strong and united utterance, and even party feeling has not led to attacks on the President for doing his duty in the matter. The New York Tribune, too, which represents to the Fenians the leanings of the Republican party more strongly than any other paper, has on this matter passed under the control of conscience and common sense, and has given vent, apropos of this last raid, to the honest indignation which nearly everybody feels.

ONE MORE ARGUMENT FOR A BETTER CIVIL SERVICE SYSTEM.

Now that the question of civil service reform has passed the stage of vituperation and reached that of argument, it may not be uninteresting to bring before the public a department of the Government where the essential principles of Mr. Jenckes's plan have been in operation for over a quarter of a century. In the United States Coast Survey we have an example of the results of permanence in office, of promotion determined by service and abilities, and of pay graduated by the value of services, and see their results in the devoted labor, so arduous as to require the highest talents of both body and mind, of its members, and in the esprit de corps inciting the officers to their best work—showing how well this system of work is suited to the exigencies of our public service.

The Coast Survey had its nominal beginning almost at the creation of the Government, but its real work began when it came into the hands of its lamented chief, the late Alexander Dallas Bache. Under his supervision, the corps grew from the dozen officers who confined their efforts to certain special points on the shore to a body of more than one hundred. As the survey rose to importance, after President Jackson began the system of rotation in office, and developed under the cautious policy of a chief who knew enough to shelter it from politics, it was so fortunate as to escape the evils of that system. This branch of the public service is organized on a different basis from any other department of the Government. It has but three grades—aid, sub-assistant, and assistant—so that the chances of promotion are quite limited. The pay of none of these officers exceeds that of a captain of infantry of the same length of service. During the past decade, the pay of the aids has not averaged over $600 per annum, and that of the two highest grades has been on the average less than $1,600—salaries not calculated, it would seem, to induce men of ability to seek or retain positions in the service. The duties are severe, equalling if not exceeding in exposure and hardship those of the soldier's or sailor's life. The field parties remain the whole year at their work, employed on different parts of the coast at different seasons.

There are those who will imagine that such a life might have something of sportsman adventure about it. They will soon be disenchanted if they accompany a party into the field. Let them start with the chief of the party and his aids, after an early breakfast, for a day's work which is to last until five, and drag with him through some miles of swamp, determining the position of each lagoon and each bosky island. Let him sleep in a storm-shaken tent, miles away from all the conveniences of life, and repeat this year after year, and look forward to it as the work of his lifetime, and then estimate its fascination. It needs no more extended description to show that this is work which in itself is not highly desirable; that its remuneration is not such as to attract a man into it with the hope of soon accumulating a fortune; and yet no service in any country has been more fortunate in the character of its officers, none where the labor is more faithful and devoted, none where there is so little difficulty in selecting satisfactory candidates for any position which may become vacant. Young men of education, who would be insulted by the offer of any other inferior position in our civil service, eagerly accept the chance of the place of aid, with its pay less than a common laborer earns, though their work may be one continued hardship until their promotion comes.

We do not have to look far to find the main cause of this wide difference in the condition of this branch and the other divisions of our civil service. We find it in the nature of the tenure by which the officers hold their positions. Each appointment being for life, or during good behavior, every member of the corps is sure that diligent service is the only claim to his office, and that while he gives this nothing can ever forfeit his position. Further than this, the young men know that although, during their time of schooling, which lasts from six to seven years, they receive but small pay and occupy quite subordinate positions, they have only to wait and work to achieve the highest position which their corps can give. There is some advantage in the limited extent of the promotion. An able officer arrives at the highest stage of the rank of the corps during his youth, and feels then that the promotion of the future is the elevation in the esteem of his compeers which able work alone can give. The grades of rank are enough to express the successive stages in the educational progress of the officer, without affording an opportunity for the incumbent of any position to be continually seeking promotion, an evil which is likely to exist whenever a whole lifetime may be spent in successive advancements.

There are those who have asserted, some of them no doubt with conviction that it was more than a good war-cry, that any civil service system which embodied the idea of permanence in office and systematic promotion, based on value of services, would lead to the formation of an aristocracy of officeholders. Expressed in this way, the well-informed reader is apt to laugh at the assertion, and think it unworthy of argument; but to credit the propounders of this argument with something better than the silly idea their words express, we will suppose they mean that a body of officeholders, intelligent, trained in the art of association, secured against the world while they fulfilled their tasks, might prove too powerful for safety. With their influence, they might have something of the same dangerous power now held by such large systems of corporations as the national banks. Although the temptations to political efforts on the part of the officers of the Coast Survey have been, on the whole, as great as they could be expected to be in any department of the civil service; although, as a remarkably intelligent body, it would have had great opportunities if such a position could give them, we have yet to hear that the liberties of the country have been menaced by it, or that it is the seed of the coming aristocracy.

Nor can it be asserted that it is the accidents of this Coast Survey service which make its positions seem so desirable to those seeking public employment. There is no showy uniform, no sounding titles bringing a traditional respect. Whatever credit attaches to the service and reflects upon its officers is to be attributed solely to the reputation for skilful work which has been gained by the corps. We must leave it to the microscopic eye of some of the objectors to Mr. Jenckes's plan to discern the reason why this system, which works so cheaply and effectively in the difficult work of surveying our extended coast line, cannot be applied to another coast work, namely, the collection of our customs; or why a plan which secures faithful service from parties of civilians, working in positions where they cannot be closely watched, might not secure a like efficiency in the other branch of our much-abused revenue system.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, May 13, 1870.

I READ in the last number of the Nation that has reached me a letter from one of your correspondents, in which he speaks of the advocates of women's rights in England, and contrasts them favorably with their more enthusiastic transatlantic sisters. It is not for me to reject the compliment, and, in fact, I think there is some ground for it. I must, however point out one mistake into which he has fallen. He says that Miss Garrett has obtained much credit by writing against the "Contagious Diseases Act." Now, Miss Garrett has certainly gained much credit, but it was by writing a very powerful letter in favor of that act. It is a matter which I have refrained from discussing in your pages, for the question is not in any aspect a very nice one. The policy of the act may be disputed, though, in my opinion, the evidence is very distinctly in its favor. I believe that it has done much good to the troops and to the populations of the towns where it is in operation, and that it is more likely to be extended than to be repealed. However this may be, I cannot agree with your correspondent that the ladies have, as a rule, gained credit by their manner of dealing with the question. Miss Garrett is a very honorable exception; but I think I may safely say that few things have recently tended to disgust ordinary men with the women's rights advocates more than their behavior in this case. It is not that they have argued against the act; there are undoubtedly very plausible reasons on their side, though not, in my opinion, conclusive reasons; but the ladies have all along behaved as though shrieking were to be substituted for reason. They have endeavored to get up a popular agitation, and, for that purpose, have not refrained from all sorts of irrelevant, and what old-fashioned people will call unladylike, appeals to buncombe. Of course, I may be suspected of prejudice, as I avow myself to be a partisan of the act. I think I could justify myself, if necessary, by quoting passages from the pamphlets which have been showered upon the world in the course of the contest. However, I must be content to give you my opinion for what it is worth, and to say that, so far as I have observed, the ladies appear to think that argument is irrelevant, and that they can see to the bottom of the complicated question by a species of direct intuition, and answer tables of statistics by texts from Scripture. In short, they have used the logic conventionally attributed to women with such pertinacity as to justify in some degree the sneers generally directed against them by their opponents. I will only add, in regard to this subject, that an enquiry is about to be made into the working of the acts in question, and I may probably have an opportunity for speaking more fully of its results.

Meanwhile, the ladies have had a great, though a temporary, triumph. The second reading of the Women's Disabilities Bill was carried in the House of Commons by a majority of about 30 (if I remember rightly) in a house of over 200. The victory was unexpected except by a few enthusiasts, and naturally caused much rejoicing. By adding to the votes recorded in their favor those which were known to be pledged in one way or other, it was estimated that they could count upon a vote of from 166 to 170 members. The victory was partly due to the action of Government. Mr. Bruce, the Home Secretary, made a speech which was singularly unfortunate. I do not know how it comes to pass, but for some years the Home Secretary has always been the weakest member of the Cabinet. The gentleman cast for the character is generally of the respectable and amiable type, unmarked by any uncomfortable tendency to originality, which is so popular in the House of Commons. Poor Mr. Walpole's tears before the appeals of Mr. Beales are not forgotten, and Mr. Bruce is apparently not much stronger than Mr. Walpole. He has been a good deal badgered of late for certain new regulations in regard to cabs and for various cases of reprieve to criminals. Perhaps this has weakened his nerve; but at any rate he stated that the Government had no particular opinion about the measure, and added, what seems to be rather in the nature of a bull, that he hoped that this statement would not be taken as expressing the opinion of Government. This ingenious exposition of a singularly indefinite frame of mind was probably favorable to the Radicals. If Government could not see their way to forming any definite conclusion on a matter of so great social and political importance, it was hardly worth while for anybody to protest; and the Radicals, as the most enthusiastic party, had it all their own way. During the ensuing week, however, people apparently reflected on the magnitude of the change introduced, and became startled at what they had done. Mr. Bouverie—a good, steady Whig of the old school—moved the rejection of the bill on going into committee. Mr. Gladstone ingeniously apologized for his subordinate, and gave reasons for objecting to the bill. He did not indeed attack the principle upon which it is founded—and it may be remarked that there has been very little direct opposition of that kind—but simply said that at present the desire for the suffrage was not sufficient to justify so radical a change, and that he should vote against the bill. With this encouragement the conservative element regained its vigor, and the bill was rejected by 220 to 96—rather a surprising change from the last occasion. I have not yet seen the division lists, and therefore cannot tell you whether any conversions have been effected, or how it came to pass that the reformers declined so much from their previous demonstration.

I may just notice that the admission of women to the suffrage would not make so great a change here as with you, inasmuch as it would be only householders who would be entitled to vote; and thus a married woman would not generally obtain a vote. In some towns, however, there would be a great addition to the existing constituencies; in Bath the number of voters would be increased by one-fourth, and in Manchester there would be 7,000 new votes. This change might produce very considerable effects; and probably the general feeling is that we ought not to make such a leap in obedience to the demands of theorists. A good many members, perhaps, feel that they might be uncomfortable in their seats if a new set of voters were suddenly added, of whose proclivities we can form no very distinct opinion. But it is also felt more generally that the matter will bear a little more discussion and reflection before we proceed to take a step which, in all probability, we shall never be able to retrace. The facts at issue are too important, and the possible effects upon the social order too far-reaching, to allow of the question being decided, as it were, as a mere insignificant interlude between the main operations of the session.

Although this important change is not to be counted amongst the results of the session, there are better prospects of some good results in the shape of legislation. The Irish Land Bill has at length taken a start. The most critical points have been decided; people have grown weary of discussion; and the general agreement that something must be done has very much strengthened the desire of compromise. As the bill quickens its pace, there comes to be more chance of the Education Bill, and for several smaller projects which are following in its wake. Government has at length come out decidedly in favor of the abolition of tests at the universities, and has actually introduced a measure providing for secret voting in parliamentary elections. It is a sign of the times that this measure has attracted so little notice, in presence of far more important questions, that it will probably pass without much serious opposition. If the Land Bill and the Education Bill pass, the Government will have a fair right to congratulate themselves on having turned out an unprecedented amount of work, and they can only hope that the quality will be as satisfactory as the quantity.

Meanwhile, the great subject of conversation in London (now that the Greek murders are two or three weeks old) is Mr. Disraeli's novel. Opinions vary considerably, according to the political prejudices of the critic. Extreme Radicals generally admire it, to have the pleasure of saying that it is at least far more amusing than Mr. Gladstone's "Juventus Mundi." Extreme Tories are slightly scandalized at the levity exhibited by their leader; and many people are a little inclined to find fault with its singular personalities—especially in regard to a distinguished Oxford professor who takes refuge in America. As everybody agrees that it is clever, and many people think it clever in a superlative degree, I can safely recommend your readers to form their own judgment. Mr. Disraeli is one of those men who are destined to be enigmas to their fellows through the course of their lives. If some people disapprove of him for his want of principle, others admire the cynical candor with which he parts with his principles; and I think that a good many men consider that the difference between him and his more successful rival is that Mr. Gladstone is able to persuade himself that he is always profoundly conscientious, and that Mr. Disraeli is not, whilst at bottom they are much the same. I do not agree with this, for I confess to a considerable belief in Mr. Gladstone, though I come far short of the reverential and almost loverlike sentiments of the Telegraph and the Spectator; but I admit that he reminds me a little too frequently of that gentleman in the French revolution who began to be a bore with his "Etre suprême." Mr. Gladstone is rather too full of his deep moral consciousness, and too innocent of anything like a sense of humor. In Mr. Disraeli the faculties are developed in the inverse ratio, and, if less to be respected, he is certainly more amusing.

May I add one word on another matter? Mr. Lee Warner, writing from England, thinks I have been unjust to Dr. Temple. I do not wish to carry on a controversy with a near neighbor by so roundabout a method. I will only say, therefore, that I should be very sorry to speak disrespectfully of Dr. Temple, whose motives I believe to be excellent; but I continue to think that he made a very unfortunate impression at the meeting of Convocation, and that impression is not diminished by Mr. Lee Warner's arguments. I have no doubt that he will be an excellent bishop, and that he is a man of high generosity and liberal temperament. I only fear that he is a little too anxious to please everybody.

THE CRISIS AT ROME.

[THE following consists of extracts from a private letter from an American traveller, whose opportunities for observation have been unusually good:]

ROME, May 5, 1870.

The importance of the Council in the history of the Church can hardly be overrated. I have not agreed with the Nation during the winter in its views of the probable results of the action of the Council. It has seemed to me, and what I saw and heard in Rome confirmed me in the opinion, that the extreme Papal party is shrewd and worldly-wise in securing the dogmatic definition of Papal infallibility, and in setting the Church in direct and defiant opposition to modern intelligence, and to the principles on which free political institutions are founded. Once admit the original premises of the Catholic creed, and the extremest assertions of the authority of the Church are easily accepted. The doctrine of the immanence of the Holy Spirit in the Church has Papal infallibility as a logical consequence. The charge to Peter is the warrant for the utmost claims of spiritual absolutism. The existing powers in Rome are intelligent enough to recognize that the other churches or sects, that assert spiritual rights over the consciences and thoughts of men, are in a false position compared with that of the Roman Church; are deficient in logic, and have no tradition like hers. The struggle of the Reformation was but to a very imperfect liberty of opinion; it was but a half-victory of free thought. Rome has no real quarrel with the Protestant sects. But this century, beginning to put in actual practice the doctrine of toleration, and asserting the absolute authority of the reason and the right of free thought, has gradually drawn the lines between the Church and the unchurched with great sharpness. The dispute is not now about justification and salvation, about faith and grace; it is between the principle of authority and that of freedom in matters of opinion, between faith and scepticism, between supernaturalism and science, between obscurantism and intelligence. The Church does not blink the fact that "enlightenment," "culture," so-called, is against her in the struggle; but she takes her ground in full view of the camp of her opponents; looking through history, she says the "enlightened" have always been an inconsiderable minority, they have always been disturbers of the established order and disbelievers in the established faith. The majority always rests upon and yields to a well-asserted authority; the majority is unintelligent, does not reason, does not like reasoners, wants to be quiet, and to be assured of its own belief and certain of its own salvation. Power then will rest with the spiritual authority that has the best disciplined forces, that asserts its claims the most positively, and that tries no compromises with freedom of thought. The leaders of the Papal party distinctly mean "obscurantism;" they mean to make all the bishops more dependent than heretofore on Rome, to have all the Catholic institutions of learning wholly under control, to exclude all liberal professors, and to reduce the whole ecclesiastical body, so far as obedience and submissiveness are concerned, to the likeness of the order of the Jesuits. Non homines sed cadavera was Loyola's description of what he required the members of his order to become. Now all this seems to me a shrewd and able policy, and if it is carried out as vigorously and as unrelentingly as it has been entered on, it will not only render the Roman Church a much more compact and united body than it has been, but far more powerful also, and far more dangerous and difficult to deal with in a free state. It makes the question of the relation of the Church to our own institutions more important than it has hitherto been, and makes a demand that will hardly be answered on the foresight of our public men.

Of course one of the most clearly foreseen results of this policy is the more or less rapid separation of church and state in the European countries. The state-paid bishops have had a hard time in the Council. If they voted against the majority, taunts of self-interest and corruption have been freely shot at them; if they voted for the doctrine in favor at Rome, they exposed themselves to displeasure at home.

Indeed, party feeling has run extremely high at Rome all winter, and the bitterness of expression on one side and the other has been as great as if the bishops had taken lessons of Greeley and Brownlow. In Rome itself the importance of the Council has been measured, I think, more correctly than outside of Rome; partly, no doubt, owing to the very partial and unsatisfactory reports of its proceedings in the German and French, as well as in the English papers.

I had the good fortune to find friends and acquaintances at Rome through whom I was brought into the thick of affairs at once. The central power at Rome have used every illegitimate as well as every legitimate means to overcome the opposition, and to carry through its projects; it has persuaded, vexed, threatened, bribed, wheedled, and spied. It has practised all the arts of frightening and of corruption. One instance will illustrate the sort of proceeding that has been common. One day, at the rooms of the International Committee, so-called (a place of meeting of the bishops in opposition), the Bishop of Halifax, who has taken a prominent part in affairs, happened to say, "Well, I have converted a good many men in my time, but I don't think I can convert the Pope." Two or three days afterwards he was sent for by Cardinal Barnabo, who said to him that there were, as he knew, several appeals against him from clergy in his diocese lying unsettled at Rome, and that he could hardly expect the support of the Roman authorities if he were often so imprudent as to imply that he thought the Holy Father stood in need of conversion. The same game has been tried and has succeeded with other bishops. Bishop Kenrick, of St. Louis, has been even more explicitly warned, but he is too stout a man to be scared. He has shown himself in the Council much the ablest of our American bishops, and seems to be regarded by both sides as one of the clearest and strongest-headed men in the Church. He does not speak much, but weightily, and is a tower of strength in his steadiness and unwavering counsel. The real leader and master of the opposition within the Council is Strossmayer; he has shown not only great boldness but great power; he is an effective speaker, and a good logician, as well as a thorough theologian. He has completely broken with the court of Rome, and no man is more hated by the ultra party than he.

The moment that we arrived in Rome happened to be a critical one. Daru's last letter had just arrived. It was a great blow to the opposition, a great cause of exultation to the ultras. Daru's policy has been from the beginning well-meaning but weak, and the interference of the French Government, even if supported by the other powers, so long as the interference was merely verbal (and it could in the nature of things be nothing else than mere remonstrance), was really calculated to strengthen the hands of the extreme Papal party, by affording a practical exhibition of the inefficiency of the only methods which the governments of Europe were prepared to adopt to prevent the consummation of the Papal schemes. The opposition leaders spoke frankly of the position into which the liberal party in the Church was gradually being forced as one of great pain and grave responsibility. It was plain that the doctrine of infallibility would be defined as a dogma of the Church, and belief in it declared essential to salvation. It remained to be seen, however, in what form it would be carried, and how far the opposition might succeed in rendering the form less unacceptable than that which the Papal party would propose. It was plain, however, that that party were resolved, if possible, to drive them from the Church—in other words, to force a schism; but, though communion with the Church might be denied to them, they did not see how, against their will, they could be unchurched. They might, indeed, be refused the holy offices; but then the question would arise, would it be possible for the authorities at Rome so completely to subjugate the whole priesthood that no priest could be found who would administer to them the sacraments of the Church? They were not afraid of this. Priests whose standing in the Church could not be questioned were found to administer the sacraments to men in the kingdom of Italy who lay under the ban of excommunication. But as yet it was hardly needful to consider these matters too closely. The opposition had not determined what course to take if affairs came to the worst; they had been too busy with the work of to-day to consult about that of to-morrow. The interest of the moment was concentrated on the action consequent on Daru's dispatch and on the final votes on the Schema de Fide.

On the Sunday after Easter an open session of the Council was to be held—the third—"open" meaning, in this case, that the close plank barrier that divides the northern transept where the Council sits from the rest of the church, would be in great part taken down, so as to afford to persons in the church a clear view of the Council Hall, and that the tribunes or galleries for the diplomatic body and for other distinguished personages, erected above the benches for the bishops, would be at the service of the persons for whom they were intended. It was understood that at this open session the Constitution de Fide would be put to the final vote, and, receiving the sanction of the Pope, would be established as part of the dogma of the Cnurch. On the Tuesday preceding, the Schema was read for the last time in secret session; a minority of some thirty bishops gave in their placets with reasons, stating their objections to special clauses and phrases. As I understand, these objections mainly bore on certain phrases in the Proœmium, and in the chapter in which the relations of Faith and Reason were defined, which the doctrine of Papal infallibility.

All the forms of procedure in the Council are different from those of common deliberative assemblies, and although the Constitution has passed what may be called the third reading, there was still some reason to hope that the objections of the minority might lead to some modification in the language of the Constitution on which they would have to vote on Sunday. On Friday, however, the Constitution, printed as it was to be voted upon, was distributed to the bishops, and it appeared that the objectionable phrases were not in any respect modified. As the vote in the public session could not be argued, could only be by simple placet and non placet, the minority found themselves placed in this dilemma—if they voted placet, they were entrapped into virtual approval of the claim of infallibility; if they voted non placet, they would appear to vote against definitions and canons in which the fundamental doctrines of Roman Christianity were embodied.

On Saturday, I heard that all had yielded, and would vote placet, except Strossmayer; his course was still undecided. Since then I hear that his resolution was to absent himself from the session.

The next day, St. Peter's was almost as full as on Easter Sunday. Every part of the great church from which a view of the transept could be had was close packed. The crowd at Rome this year is more picturesque even than usual. The Pope presided at the session; the bishops in their white mitres were ranged in rows along the sides of the hall; but the distances in the church are so enormous, and its atmosphere so thick, that when we stood under the dome it was impossible to distinguish the individual features of the bishops, especially hidden as they were under the uniform disguise of their mitres. The reading of the constitution and the voting took a long while; at last they came to an end, and there was a moment's pause, and then the voice of the Pope, remarkable even now in his old age for its sonorous fulness and sweetness, was heard sanctioning and confirming by his apostolic authority the decrees and canons contained in the constitution; then there was another pause, in which some formal acts were accomplished, and then suddenly the Pope's voice was heard intoning the first words of the Te Deum. The whole Council joined, and the responses were made by the faithful in the church. I never heard such a volume of sound in St. Peter's. It was a most impressive moment; a scene quite unmatched in my experience in the variety of its appeals to the imagination. The immense solemnity and importance to those who took part in it of the ceremonial itself, the marvellous history of the Church in which this would always be a memorable event, the strange contrast between the life of the Church and the actual life of the world, between this dogma and the truth, the immense interests involved—interests reaching far forward, the personal passions involved, the place itself—all these combined, as you will well see they might, to touch deeply even one so far removed from Romanism as myself. The Papacy is very great on such an occasion. Its art is almost perfect.

You see that now we are to have infallibility defined and sanctioned at once, before the weather gets too hot. Then the Council will disperse for a time, or for ever, having accomplished its most important object, but leaving undone the larger part of the work it has undertaken; but an infallible Pope will not want it, and very likely it may never meet after its first prorogation.

Correspondence.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Will you allow me space for brief comment on a paper entitled "French and English Illustrated Magazines," which appears in this June number of the Atlantic Monthly? No amount of ignorance concerning that nearly lost and almost unknown art of wood-engraving could astonish me; and yet it did not seem too much to expect in the pages of the Atlantic Monthly at least some glimmer of intelligence. To fully answer the paper would require as much space as the paper itself misuses; I can only hope for your permission to notice the most remarkable portions of it. Setting aside, therefore, the writer's peculiar theories as to the narrow domestic groove in which English printed art (e.g., Punch and the Illustrated London News) is confined; noting only, as samples of the writer's method, his curious lists of draughtsmen and engravers (a third or fourth-rate draughtsman like Morin exalted as the "inimitable master," and Birket Foster as the representative of English landscape, while Hennessy—our best book-illustrator here—is twice conspicuously placed at the end of his array, and Brevière—by far the best of French wood-engravers—finds no mention at all), leaving these matters for the more important, I come at once to mistakes, which show that the writer has no real knowledge whatever of the subject which he treats. These it is the more necessary to point out, because there is a certain grand air of authoritativeness in the writing which partially hides its insufficiency and incorrectness:

"Wood-engraving is the modest art of our home life; and from the old Dutch Bible, with its curious cuts of literal art, to the last Christmas Almanac, what a simple and attractive service it has rendered to literature! Discovered at nearly the same time as printing, it has always marched hand in hand with it, illustrating and popularizing the thoughts and imaginations of poets and artists, and enlarging the experience of the age."

What does the essayist mean by "discovered at nearly the same time as printing"? Is he not aware that wood-engraving and wood-cutting (not to confound the last with "carving") are two distinct processes? Does he not know that the first wood letters used in printing were as much wood-engravings (if he insists on the word) as the cuts of "the old Dutch Bible"—drawn with the same lineal exactness, cut with the same knife-tools, absolutely in the same manner, and with precisely the same amount—and no more—of mechanical or artistic skill? Why, the earliest wooden stamps were wood-cuts; the first name or mark cut on a tree was also a wood-cut; and the discovery of printing was not "nearly at the same time." Wood-cutting was discovered ages before printing, and wood-engraving not till two centuries after.

"It is to the credit of English book-makers that they first secularized the art of book-illustration, and first placed the wood-cut at the service of the people. The English originated the Penny Magazine," etc.

Secularized "is good"—an excellent phrase; but would the writer imply that the Penny Magazine was the beginning of book-illustration? Are Bewick and his peers forgotten, while Birket Foster's box-leaves are so green? Has the writer never heard of Caxton?

"The best drawings upon the block are either very black or very gray, and the very gray are oftenest the most unsatisfactory. If an artist does not see any force or emphasis of shadow or effect in nature, he would do best in using the pure line to express his subject."

From history to practice! Is this the loose statement of a fact or a critical recommendation? Why must the best drawings be either very black or very gray? And how are the very gray the most unsatisfactory? If an artist does not see, let him not attempt to render. Good! but only telling him to confine himself to pure line when he can do nothing else is not very profound criticism. And if he cannot use the pure line? Is "pure line" so easy?

"It remains for me briefly to consider modern engravers upon the wood. The fathers of wood-engraving, who had the simplest method, did not aim to reach the results of the modern engraver. They did not dream of any of the subtle effects of atmosphere and fine gradation of surface which are now produced by French and English engravers. . . . I think they illustrated the distinctive character of the art of engraving upon wood. Holbein's designs are rude and vigorous, but sure and expressive in line. Albert Dürer's are vigorous and simple. None of the old draughtsmen upon wood made so much use of black or color as the modern designers. They seemed to think the line a sufficient means of expression," etc.

"Rude and vigorous, but sure;" "vigorous and simple;" "black or color;" the very expressions betray the ignorance of the writer; but I pass them by to remark that no such thing as a "subtle effect of atmosphere" was ever produced, or attempted, by any French engraver whatsoever; and for the English—the present manner of drawing (which is not the manner of Dürer and Holbein) does absolutely prohibit and prevent either atmospheric effect or gradation of surface. Albert Dürer's drawings are full of color (do not confound that with black), and color is given sometimes by the designers of to-day, both French and English; but the other qualities (atmospheric effect and gradation of surface) are not to be found in any of the books named, or in any work of a single engraver mentioned in this Atlantic paper. On the other hand, the fathers of wood-engraving—Bewick, Clennell, Nesbit, the discoverers of wood-engraving as an art (for wood-cutting is purely mechanical), whose works were known here in America before the incubation of our critic—they did produce the effects which modern engravers (the French remarkably) do not dream of. Will the critic reply that he does not mean these fathers, but the great-grandfathers, Dürer and Holbein? Then I tell him again that Dürer and Holbein drew as they did on wood, not thinking "the line a sufficient means of expression," but knowing the mechanic could cut nothing else.

I might take many more exceptions to the paper under notice. But on some points it may be only a question of taste, and others may be left to your own criticism. What I have spoken of seemed especially within the province of

A Wood-Engraver.

CIVILIAN GENERALS IN THE WAR.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your review of the "Life of Fairfax," in the May 12 number of the Nation, occurs the following: "In our civil war the volunteers failed, almost without exception, as generals, and the West Pointers alone succeeded." It can hardly be claimed that the following-named generals "failed," neither of whom was a West Pointer, namely: Cox, Terry, Blair, Grierson, Jeff. C. Davis, and Logan. At the close of the war, not one of the corps commanders in Sherman's army was a West Pointer.

Very respectfully, J. N. Stiles.

Chicago, May 23, 1870.

[The reviewer, we believe, had in his mind generals holding independent commands. The only volunteer who succeeded in an operation of any magnitude on his own responsibility was, we think, General Terry. Generals acting in the field under orders are not usually criticised as generals, though they may be excellent officers.—Ed. Nation.]

MR. N. G. PARKER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: My attention has been called to a series of interrogatories in your last issue in regard to the character and antecedents of Mr. N. G. Parker, formerly a captain in my regiment, and now State Treasurer of South Carolina. As my name is mentioned by you in connection with these enquiries, and as they seem to call in question the character of a brother officer who is not here to answer for himself, I beg leave briefly to answer them in your columns.

1. Captain Parker was under my command nearly two years, during which he proved himself a very efficient and valuable officer, whom I should have been very sorry to lose.

2. He must have had a similar reputation in his first regiment, the First Massachusetts Cavalry. It was one of the very strictest regiments I ever saw; he held in it the very responsible rank of First Sergeant; and his company commander, Captain (afterward Colonel) Rand, begged me not to obtain Sergeant Parker's promotion, as he "could not spare him."

3. Of his "occupation before enlistment" I remember nothing, if I ever knew anything; but he was very intelligent, was apparently well-taught, and his excellent business habits indicated some business training. Had there been anything against his previous "reputation," I should have been very likely to hear it, but not a breath ever reached me.

4. The "nature of his preparation" for the office of State Treasurer I cannot say; but he reached the post by gradual promotion. After the war, he settled in Charleston. He was appointed by the military authorities an alderman of that city. He was then chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention, where he became chairman of the Finance Committee. The printed record of that important convention shows how laboriously and faithfully he discharged his duties, and how important a part he took in the whole proceedings of that body. It was from this position that he was promoted to the Treasurership of the State. In that post he has brought order out of chaos, and has made South Carolina the first of the seceded States to pay the full interest on her debt.

In what respect this is anything but a manly and honorable record, I fail to see. Mr. Parker's opinion in regard to "educational deficiencies" would be simply that of an able and well-informed man. In this case, however, his testimony seems to bear not upon a matter of opinion but of fact; and it is not to be met, I should suppose, by assailing the character of the witness. Yours truly, Thomas Wentworth Higginson,

Late Colonel 1st S. C. Vols. (33d U. S. C. T.)

Newport, R. I., May 29, 1870.

[We asked the questions referred to in consequence of the receipt of very unfavorable testimony from a gentleman who served with Mr. Parker in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, and, considering the character of some of the Southern office-holders, they were perfectly proper questions to ask with regard to any Southern politician cited as a witness touching the working of the system of government now set up in South Carolina as well as in other States. The matter is, however, as it seems to us, not one of opinion or of fact, but of evidence. Whether the pay-rolls were really signed by members of the Legislature, or whether their signing them was an indication of bonâ fide possession of the arts of reading and writing, depends, for our purpose, on the value of Mr. Parker's evidence, and that depends on the value of Mr. Parker's character—for which we have done, as it seems, the best thing possible by asking Col. Higginson's opinion of it.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens's "Constitutional View of the late War between the States" will shortly be concluded by the publication of the second volume. It will be sold only by subscription, through the National Publishing Company of Philadelphia.——With sincere regret we have to record the death last week of Mr. William V. Spencer, of Boston, than whom no more estimable or modest publisher adorned the profession. The admirers of Mr. Mill and of Mr. Martineau—not to speak of other metaphysicians whose writings are too elevated for a popular audience—knew Mr. Spencer as a benefactor; and he should also be remembered for the care which he bestowed upon the manufacture of the choice books in which he from time to time indulged himself. He published these in a style which the sale never justified, or which he scarcely expected it to justify, and spent money in advertising them which he knew would never return to him. He was, in a word, very far removed from the desire for riches, and very near to the ideal publisher, whose memory is equally grateful to authors, private friendship, and the public.——It is proper, also, to speak a word of respect and regret on occasion of the death of Mr. Eliakim Littell, the founder of Littell's Living Age, which is so well known to the whole American reading public. Mr. Littell was born on the second day of the year 1792, so he had reached a great age; but he was remarkable for his youthful appearance and his well-preserved strength. He was, in fact, an excellent specimen of a sort of men once, perhaps, commoner in Boston than now. It was in 1844 that he established his periodical, which has been from the beginning eclectic, and always, we believe, a weekly magazine. Certainly, it has always been the best of the eclectic magazines, and much of the best of recent English periodical literature may be found in its hundred or so of volumes. Perhaps some other time would be a fitter occasion for saying something about the morality of eclectic magazines.

—The population of Ohio is at least five times as great as that of Connecticut, but the number of divorces granted last year in the former State was but 1,003, while in the latter it amounted to 491. To every twenty-four marriages in Ohio there was one divorce; in Connecticut, one to every nine and seven-tenths. It is clear that the West has no monopoly of immorality. In both the States named the increase of the ratio of divorce is worthy of attention. In 1866, in Ohio, the proportion was one to twenty-six; in 1865, in Connecticut, one to eleven of the marriages. Last year, the three most populous counties in Connecticut showed the largest number of divorces. This was to be expected. The same counties, however, have the largest foreign population; is there any connection between these facts? Perhaps Dr. Allen might here find something to console us natives with. Out of 4,754 marriages, 271 were between a foreign male and an American female, and 181 between a foreign female and an American male. Are there no statistics to show whether such marriages turn out better or worse than when both parties are foreigners or both native-born? The greatest number of births in Connecticut occurred in March and September, and this agrees with what happened in Massachusetts in 1867, so far as March is concerned. We presume that in the one State, as in the other, the greater proportion of the births regularly fall in the latter half of the year.

—The trial of Mr. Buckalew's plan of personal representation in the village where he lives has attracted some notice, though the field was too small to prove much for or against his theory. More interest will naturally be felt in the experiment made last month, and of which the result will soon be announced, of making nominations of overseers by the alumni of Harvard College, according to the system of Mr. Hare. Ten candidates were to be selected, but each elector might name as many as he chose, provided he affixed to each his order of preference. The committee to receive and count the votes then proceeded as follows. Each envelope, as it arrived, was numbered, and, when all were in, they were taken up and opened in order. Each ballot successively was then counted for the first choice indicated upon it, until some candidate had received a tenth of all the votes cast, when his name was regarded as hors de concours. Any subsequent ballot, therefore, which made him its first choice was counted instead for its second choice; and so on, till the ten were elected.

In practice, instead of expecting from each elector a brand-new, original list, the committee sent out a printed list of suggested candidates, with blanks for insertions if desired. In all probability, the ten nominees will be found to have been on this list—which suggests the course likely to be pursued by party managers in politics if ever Mr. Hare's scheme shall be adopted. But the breaking up of artificial district lines and the power to transpose the nominees on the list, and to scratch them all, without abandoning the party or throwing away his vote, will tend greatly to elevate and emancipate the elector.

—The Senate lately voted $100,000 towards the further exploration of the North Pole. If it could do so much in the interest of pure science, it ought to improve a rare opportunity to aid not science alone, but the immediate development of the material interests of this country and continent. If willing to appropriate money for new voyages, it ought to be disposed to to help to utilize the results of voyages already accomplished; and if this would be true in general, it is still more the case now that the Government has undertaken the survey of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and there is in this city a savant who returned only last year from a seven years' journey in Central America, and has probably the richest collection of observations ever made in that region. We refer to Dr. Habel, for many years a well-known practitioner and public officer in this city, and whose memoirs were presented to the French Academy of Science, at the session of July 26, 1869, having the endorsement of M. Sainte-Claire Deville, M. de Quatrefages, and other eminent members. Dr. Habel's explorations extended from Guatemala to Peru, and embraced also the Chincha and Galapagos Islands. From the latter archipelago, made famous by the researches of Mr. Darwin, he brought away exactly the same number of species as the English philosopher, including several that were wholly new to science. Wherever he went, in the various republics of Central America, Dr. Habel studied the geology, hydrography, meteorology, botany, mineralogy, and fauna of the land, and mapped out an exact itinerary by means of the compass, corrected by astronomical observations at the principal stations. He thus discovered that all the maps of this country are more or less incorrect, especially that of Honduras, of which the north and east coast is much exaggerated in extent, the error amounting to an entire degree of longitude. He also ascertained the form and direction and barometric height of the mountains, and made, during a stay of ten months on the Isthmus, a series of meteorological observations forming a complete chain between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. His ethnological researches were remarkably fruitful. He found ruins of ancient cities, one of which was more than three miles long, on the Pacific coast, where their existence had never before been suspected, and they revealed an extinct civilization altogether different from that of the Aztecs. Of these monuments he made scale drawings, which, however, he does not expect will be credited until confirmed by the photograph. And finally, Dr. Habel collected words in nine different Indian languages, mostly of tribes seldom visited; and of one he states that he could easily compose a grammar and dictionary. The preparation for publication of these valuable results of singular scientific devotedness awaits the leisure which Dr. Habel's means no longer permit. It appears to us that they have sufficient national and international importance to warrant the moderate outlay which would suffice to have them put together. His map, at least, might properly be brought out under the auspices of the Coast Survey.

—John Henry Newman has been for so many years so great a name in the literary world, as well as in the Protestant religious world, and the Roman Catholic, that for a long time he has been made—now by the ignorant and now by the interested or the designing—to stand sponsor for many things for which he would be nowise willing to be held responsible. Of this we have been frequently reminded of late. As an example of the sort of misrepresentation caused by insufficient information which Dr. Newman has had to undergo, we may cite what follows: Since the question of Bible reading in the public schools came up for discussion, almost every religious newspaper in the country—so far as we know about such newspapers—has called the attention of its readers to "these significant words of that famous convert to Romanism, John Henry Newman":

"Who will say that the uncommon beauty and marvellous English of the Protestant Bible is not one of the great strongholds of heresy in this country? It lives on in the ear like a music that never can be forgotten, like the sound of church-bells which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities seem often to be almost things rather than mere words. It is part of the national mind and the anchor of the national seriousness. Nay, it is worshipped with a positive idolatry, in extenuation of whose grotesque fanaticism its intrinsic beauty pleads availingly with the man of letters and the scholar. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its verses. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments; and all that there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him for ever out of his English Bible. It is his sacred thing, which doubt never dimmed and controversy never soiled. It has been to him all along as the silent, but oh! how intelligible, voice of his guardian angel; and in the length and breadth of the land there is not a Protestant with one spark of religiousness about him whose spiritual biography is not in his Saxon Bible. And all this is an unhallowed power! The extinction of the Establishment would be a less step towards the conquest of the national mind than, if it were possible (but we are speaking humanly, and in our ignorance), to adopt that Bible and correct it by the Vulgate. As it is, there is no blessing of the Church along with it, and who would dream that beauty is better than a blessing?"

This is expressed well enough to be easily taken for the work of Dr. Newman by almost any reader. Perhaps, however, Dr. Newman would hardly be so lyrical—so to speak—except where his own personal feelings were more directly interested than one might suppose the feelings of any Roman Catholic to be when the thing under consideration is the beauty of the Protestant Bible. Still, it is true that it was once a favorite project of Newman's to prepare for the use of English Roman Catholics an edition of the Bible which should contain the King James's Version modified by the readings of the Vulgate—such an edition as is suggested above. And it is true, too, that he does once in a while allow himself a lyrical outburst which has, seemingly, something of an air of premeditation and deliberate elaboration. So, for example, one might speak of that address to his brethren of the Oratory with which he closes his "Apologia pro Vita Sua." Admirable as his English is, it is not so good as to be always unobnoxious to the charge that it is sometimes poetical prose, or rhetorical prose, rather than prose thoroughly good. But, as a matter of fact, the author of the passage which we have quoted was not Newman, but the Reverend F. W. Faber—a person who, however displeasing to most judges of men and literature, was possessed of marked literary ability of a certain kind, and who, as everybody knows, was warmly interested in the famous "movement" which had for one of its chief results the turning of Newman into a Roman Catholic, and for another result the conversion of Faber also, who followed his master after a month or two. Indeed, it may be as well to say—in order that all the evidence concerning "these significant words" above given may be in court—that Faber not only followed his master, but went beyond him, and far beyond; and he is by no means to be trusted to speak rightly either of things Catholic or things Protestant. Of course Dr. Newman, like every other Romanist who writes on matters pertaining to "the one true faith," often writes so as to bother and baffle the mere intellect, and to confound with great confusion such persons as hunger for ascertained, definite knowledge, and—if the words may be allowed—do not care to formulate into dogmatic assertions concerning certain matters their ignorance concerning those matters. But Mr. Faber seems to like to ignore the existence of the intellect; he usually exclaims, and rhapsodizes, and sentimentalizes, and gushes after a fashion that ought to make even a Papal Zouave sigh for a taste of common sense. Of the "Italianate English" of a couple of centuries ago no very taking accounts are given; but the Ultramontanist English of to-day are more belied than seems credible if they would not be altogether past bearing, were it not that it is forbearance that their fellow-Christians owe them, and that, after all, nobody need care for them.

—We have not at hand the means of giving a specific example of a sort of injustice which, as we have said, Dr. Newman often has to put up with, and which consists in the more or less intentional and wilful misrepresentation of his feelings and opinions. It is not, however, that such misrepresentations are not of frequent occurrence. It would be possible, for instance, to name Roman Catholic periodicals published in this country, and devoted to the unblenching avowal of the extremest opinions of the Society of Jesus, whose editors—even at the moment when they are pushing doctrines which Dr. Newman has said seem to him like an evil dream and worse than atheism—use, without scruple, the authority of his name. They know the respect which is everywhere paid to his genius and character. An unnumbered multitude of these exhibitions of uncandidness Dr. Newman has recently disposed of once for all, in a letter which has become famous, and which is an important part of the religious history of the day. It was written to Dr. Ullathorne, of Birmingham, who is Newman's own bishop, and, though not intended for publication, has got into print, and is seen to be of such a sort as might have been expected by all who are aware that its author is not only a man of genius, but a man of as much courage as of caution and shrewdness. "Rome ought to be," he says, "a name to lighten the heart at all times, and a Council's proper office is, when some great heresy or other evil impends, to inspire hope and confidence in the faithful; but now we have the greatest meeting that ever has been, and that at Rome, infusing into us, by the accredited organs of Rome and of its partisans, little else than fear and dismay." Again, he says: "When has a definition de fide been a luxury of devotion and not a stern, painful necessity? Why should an aggressive, insolent faction be allowed to make the heart of the just sad, whom the Lord hath not made sorrowful?" We may remark, by the way, that the people must be few who have Dr. Newman's power of aptly quoting Scripture. Still more outspoken and more generally interesting is this, which is said further on in the letter: "If it is God's will that the Pope's infallibility is defined, then is it God's will to throw back the times and moments of that triumph which he has destined for his kingdom, and I shall feel I have but to bow my head to his adorable, inscrutable providence." We imagine it may be these last words which cause the Catholic World for June to say it is glad to see that Dr. Newman seems to believe in the infallibility of popes, though he is opposed to having the doctrine defined at this present moment. There may be possibility of so construing his utterances; but any one construing them in the sense attributed to them by the Catholic World will mislead third parties, unless he lays down at the beginning a strict definition of the word "belief."

—As the sessions of the Council go on, it seems to become more and more manifest that the wisdom and learning of Catholicism are firmly opposed to the dogma, on the promulgation of which the Pope and Monsignor Talbot have set their hearts, and in whose favor the heads of all the Jesuits have been exercised during so many years. Dr. Newman's letter is very far indeed from being the only one of its kind, though a better one of its kind we have not seen. One might say, without much fear of inaccuracy, that he looks on the scheme for making the belief in the Pope's infallibility a matter of faith as being due to the present Pope's weakness and to the astuteness of the Society of Jesus, whose wisdom has always been futile, and whom a Yankee would describe as so sharp as always to cut its own fingers. It seems still to be ridden by its old notion that to govern the world it is only necessary to govern certain men, and that it is by the weaknesses of men that they are governed—doctrines which have never been proved sound, and which have an a priori improbability. While we are upon this subject of the relations of Newman to Rome, we may as well quote one other passage from his letter, and this for the sake of making a remark about him which seems to us just, and which it is perhaps worth while to make. Certainly everything about a man so noteworthy, and in many of the most important respects so admirable, possesses interest. "As to myself personally," he says, "please God I do not expect any trial at all. [Any trial of faith, he means, in case the projected dogma is enunciated.] But I cannot help suffering with the many souls who are suffering, and I look with anxiety at the prospect of having to defend decisions which may not be difficult to my own private judgment, but may be most difficult to maintain logically in the face of existing historical facts." Here may be seen, or we make a mistake, the peculiar way in which Dr. Newman holds his religious belief. He seems to be as frankly egotistical, so to speak, in his Catholicism as is Emerson—whom Newman so much resembles in feature—in the religious views, or cosmic views, or whatever else they are, which are held by him. History, logic, everything that to most men would seem absolute over belief, or at least to tend very strongly to determine it this way or that in preference to this other or that other, Newman seems to show himself willing to disregard entirely; it is enough that Catholicism commends itself to him. Thus considered, much that is in him becomes more explicable than otherwise it seems. But we have not space to enlarge on the subject.

—"We want facts," says the North China Herald of late date, speaking of the defective knowledge which Europeans have of China. "At this moment, a British merchant in Shanghae, with every desire to gain some distinct information about the country, is baffled and perplexed by his inability to get together a body of the most ordinary and easily attained facts. The country in the midst of which we are placed is a riddle, and a riddle that everybody gives up directly it is propounded." The Herald goes on to say that there are a few "highly respectable and orthodox volumes which it is impossible to speak of with too much respect," but which still leave our acquaintance with China very imperfect. No work treats adequately or with the proper perspective the history of the empire, or so well as that of Japan has been presented to English readers. In fact, there have been more ready writers on China than careful investigators: "those foreign writers who knew what to say, did not know how to say it; and those who knew how to say what they knew, knew very little that was worth saying." In another and previous article the Herald illustrates this by the uncertainty which exists as to the real population of the empire—a matter which it is a superstition with the Chinese not to report upon, at least with any approach to accuracy. In the absence of any census, one is obliged to accept the fabulous figures of the Peking officials, or to make the most of the estimates formed by those barbarians who have paid some attention to the subject—to believe with Father Amiot that in 1770 China contained 209 millions of inhabitants, or, as Grosier corrected him, 198,214,533, and then to judge for one's self whether the state of the empire has during the present century been favorable to the increase of the population. The customs of the country undoubtedly, in peaceful times, do favor an exceptional growth; but it is evident that at present we have no means of arriving at a trustworthy basis of calculation. Even where the opportunities would seem to be ample for judging, and such that all observers must agree, there is and has been, from the commencement of European intercourse with China, a division into two opposite opinions—for instance, as to the Chinese character. We know that the same diversity exists in this country, among intelligent persons who encounter or have dealings with the Chinese, and it is on the whole gratifying to read the Herald's explanation of the phenomenon. The worst estimate, it says, is traceable to the merchant and the diplomat, each of whom approaches the less favorable side of the Chinese nature. "The Chinaman is seen" by the former, in driving a bargain, "trying to advance his own interest, at the expense of a person whom his creed does not teach him to acknowledge, even with his lips, as his neighbor. Hence he is presented obeying all his lower instincts; and few Christians would show to advantage at such a moment." The diplomat, on the other hand, "gets his experience of the native after he has been subjected to the humiliation of defeat, or when he is essaying the trickery and evasion which are characteristic features of oriental diplomacy;" or when, as now, "after having been knocked down, he is set on his feet again, apologized to, and told that he was struck in mistake," whereupon cringing is exchanged for arrogance. The missionary and the transient visitor call forth better and the best traits of a Chinaman, and their view of his character, if not to be taken implicitly, is naturally accounted for.

—If our knowledge of China is limited, so is that of Chinese Tartary, and the nation which seems likely to contribute most to both is, at this moment, Russia. Taking Kashgar as a centre of interest—a city which recent conquests in Central Asia have brought to the border of European civilization—a contributor to the April number of the Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin compares several of the later works of travel connected with the Russian occupation, and derives a good deal of interesting information concerning the land and its people. The best observation of the position of Kashgar places it in latitude 39° 23′ 9″ North, and longitude 76° 10′ [20′] East. The longitude has been variously fixed at 71° 50′ by Ad. Schlagintweit, and 73° 57′ by the Jesuits. The latter is that adopted in Lippincott's Gazetteer, while the New American Cyclopædia gives 76° 45′, which is more nearly correct. Valikhanoff, whose travels are principally followed in the Zeitschrift, narrates a singular experience of his in Kashgar: "Although," says his commentator, "the Mohammedans of Little Bokhara obey the teachings of the Imam Hanif, which forbid temporary marriages, yet in Kashgar, and especially in the hexapolis of East Turkestan, the custom prevails for all strangers to enter the marriage relation if they stay for any length of time in the city. These contracts are celebrated with due ceremony, the bridegroom being obliged to furnish nothing but a new suit to the bride." To this the Russian gracefully submitted, as did the rest of the caravan, and they were also compelled to exchange their Tartar caps and caftans, which excited too much attention, for the turbans and caftans of the country.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JUNE.

We shall all do well to admit once for all the applicability to individual questions of the maxim which we have all frequently recognized as true in a general way—the maxim, namely, that it is too early yet for any of us to write an authoritative history of the war, and if it is too early to-day, it certainly was a long time too early in the days when homicide was in the hearts of half of us during most of our waking hours, and we were literally giving ourselves, minds as well as bodies, to the cause. It is, however, not too early for us to begin cultivating that calmer, and indeed manlier, as well as gentler, spirit which is to pervade the true histories that are to come. The season might well enough suggest reflections of this kind, for Monday was the time for decorating with flowers the soldiers' graves; but our thoughts have been turned in this direction by the fact that of the writers in the June magazines, three address themselves to contributing to what may be called the inner history of the war. Mr. Jeremiah Black, writing in the Galaxy, deals with Senator Wilson's eulogy of Secretary Stanton, and incidentally defends or attacks several other famous personages; Mr. Thurlow Weed, also writing in the Galaxy, gives an interesting chapter or two from his autobiography, and relates a good many things hitherto not known concerning the earliest days of the recruiting and fighting; finally, an anonymous but careful and clever writer, who seems to know very well what he is talking about, reviews in Old and New the case of Fitz John Porter. Fitz John Porter's case we ourselves have recently had occasion to notice, and, as readers of what we said will remember, we have expressed a decided opinion in regard to the treatment of that officer. But it is right to say that any one whose mind is at present made up adversely to the disgraced General may very probably discover in the Old and New article strong reasons for coming to conclusions less favorable to the court-martial than to the prisoner.

Well worth reading, too, is Mr. Black's attack on Mr. Wilson, an attack which its author considers a needed defence of Mr. Stanton against his eulogist. There is plenty of bad temper in it; and what are its politics, our readers can imagine. We observe that a certain Republican journal published in Massachusetts declares that the editors of the Galaxy disgraced themselves when they consented to print such a copperhead tirade, and the editors themselves appear to have been a little frightened at their own temerity, for they make a sort of half-apology for admitting the article. But surely the time must be almost at hand when we shall bear to hear all the truth, and all the lies for that matter, that any rebel or copperhead may feel called upon to tell in regard to the Confederacy, or Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet, or anything else connected with the late war. What is the need of either the abuse or the apology does not seem too clear. As we say, the article has plenty of ill temper, and Mr. Black partly defeats his own objects. Here, for example, is a stroke in which Mr. Wilson, if he is sagacious, may properly rejoice. Mr. Thompson, Mr. Buchanan's Secretary of the Interior, is the person of whom Mr. Black is speaking to Mr. Wilson: "You may have all the benefit of loyalty, and you may weigh him down with the huge burden of rebellion; nevertheless, his mental ability, good sense, and common honesty put him so immeasurably far above you that you will never in this life be able to get a horizontal view of his character." It is only outside of New England, we suppose, that the last sentence of this could be said in seriousness; but Mr. Black says it in good earnest. But if talk like this requires of Mr. Wilson no answer but silence, there are other things in the article which certainly do call for an answer; and no one is fair who takes Mr. Wilson's estimate of Mr. Stanton without also taking into account what Mr. Black has to say. Mr. Black's veracity is not questioned, we believe, even by the persons who consider him a most mistaken politician, an enemy of his country's best interests, and a lawyer of much greater learning than wisdom.

Mr. Weed's narrative of his services in the early part of the war are very readable and not without value. He here well upholds his reputation for shrewdness and executive ability, and, taking his own story as true, he apparently deserved well of the Republic. This, by the way, is a little incident that it may be well enough to bear in mind when one is thinking of how it is that the best of our public servants get their places, and how they keep them. Mr. Weed is speaking of the news coming in from Ball's Bluff, and tells how he prevented General McClellan's giving to the telegraph a despatch throwing the responsibility for that sad affair on Colonel Baker, a gallant officer whom it would have been shameful injustice to blame; then he adds this: "The body of Colonel Baker was rescued from the field by Louis Bierrel, a soldier from the city of New York, who stood by his gun till the enemy were upon him, when, with a comrade, he bore away the lifeless body of his commander. At the close of the war I obtained a situation for this faithful soldier in the Custom House, but I regret to say that some two years ago, for no fault of his own, he was discharged."

Besides the article which we have already mentioned, Old and New contains little or nothing that calls for special remark. There is, however, a fairly good essay on "Protoplasm" by Mr. Francis Tiffany, who puts in a rather fresh way the old objection to scientific theories of man and nature that they do not account for life; and there is also a pleasing article, which will be to most readers instructive, on Gratry's attitude towards the Papacy; but there is little else. Worth looking at for noticeable vigor and for its music—or rather for the swing of it—is Mr. George Finney's piece of verse called "Mother and Son." There is a queer simplicity about it, too; but the vigor and the simplicity both are pushed pretty far in this stanza:

> "I fainted with the Grief-Burr Choke, clutched Shucks of wasted Love.
> O that the Man who gave that stroke
> May never feel the Stifle-Throat,
> The Heart-Swell, nor the Vitals'-Bloat to crowd his Brain above."

This sounds like mere raving; but though it is the worst part of the piece it is not incongruous with the other and more reasonable parts. Still the fact remains that not only did a man write it, but it has been passed upon by other men, and has been printed for an audience of greater or less size. Perhaps it is, after all, not very different in essentials from a good deal of the poetry, and prose too, which is regularly published in our magazines.

The Galaxy opens as usual with more of Mr. Charles Reade's novel, which a person might almost say begins to be tiresome, or rather which threatens to be tiresome, as being merely more repetitions of the same old tricks, and the characters being next to nothing. "Tobaccophagoi and Tobaccophagism" is by Dr. John C. Draper, and is like most similar essays in that it will please everybody who hates tobacco, and will amuse everybody who loves that herb. Of course it is made clear once again that no one but a desperado would use tobacco except as a medicine. As for gentlemen who have for any length of time been smoking, or snuffing, or chewing tobacco, they simply are alive in spite of themselves. Perhaps, however, they have cancer; or they suffer under a thickening of the Schneiderian membrane of the nose; or they have married late in life and become paralytic; or cannibal islanders have refused their flesh on account of its being saturated with nicotine. Physicians who are opposed to the use of tobacco might do worse, one would say, than to deny themselves paper and ink for a while, and set themselves to discovering an antidote to the ill effects of the plant.

In "Two Women" "the Author of Margaret Howth" again appears; and she makes the same appearance as of old. There is a man who deems it his duty to die of the yellow fever; and there is a woman—big, gross, without a waist, sensual, passionate—who "lights up well" at night and fascinates all males, and who in the day-time drinks brandy and laudanum; there is another woman who is delicate and cool, and wears muslin, and among these women and the man there is much which we are asked to call love and suffering. There is really nothing except an indulgence of feelings, which wise people and delicate people keep under command, if they have them at all, and which they at least keep to themselves. There is, however, at the very end of the story, a not bad turn.

For the rest, the Galaxy has some of "Mark Twain's" fun, "which is alone worth the price of the magazine;" an essay by Mr. Justin McCarthy; some more of "Ten Years in Rome," whose author, we observe, has now dropped out of Anglicanism into something else; a few pages of "Things of the Day," by "Carl Benson," and several other articles which, with those we have mentioned, make a pleasant and readable number of a magazine that is always readable for the moment, whether or not it is very well worth saving. It is certainly conducted with skill, and one or two other magazines which avow a deliberate intention to be "monthly newspapers" might profitably take a lesson from the Galaxy. The Galaxy is a monthly newspaper in the sense of always being of current interest, and not in the sense of always treating scrappily an immense number of topics.

The fourteen or fifteen pages of reviewing at the end of the magazine make the best part of the June Atlantic, which, indeed, is not too good. The book-notices, however, have redeeming power, although there is no doubt that the level on which they were kept while they were the work of a single hand is hardly maintained now that there are several writers at work. Still, there is the gain of variety, and that may properly be held, we suppose, to balance the loss mentioned. In no way a gain, however, are such reviews as that of Miss Phelps's "Hedged In," a book which, we would say, a publisher might safely leave to the charitable judgments of people of discrimination and to the greedy appetite for mingled sensational sentimentalism and piety of people not so discriminating. Galton's "Hereditary Genius" is carefully reviewed, and there is what may be called a "refreshing" notice of the last of Mr. William Morris's many verses. From the time of Alexander Smith, to go no further back, contemporary English critics have united in a loud chorus of praise whenever a new verse-maker came before them, and it is difficult to believe that the men and women of this generation who write current criticism in England have the least right to say a word about poetry. The list of those whom they have of late years judged to have touched immortality is an absurdly long one. There was Mr. Sydney Dobell had done it, and Mr. Gerald Massey, and Miss Jean Ingelow, and George Eliot, and before her, Mr. Swinburne, and before him, Mr. Robert Lytton, and we do not know how many others; and now there is Mr. Morris, of whom debate is made whether it is he and Tennyson, or he and Browning, or Browning and Tennyson, that are the two foremost English-speaking poets of the age. It is a question which doubtless the age will, as soon as is necessary, settle for itself, both on the other side of the water and on this side of it—where also some poetry has been produced in our day. This Atlantic reviewer has, perhaps, a high enough estimate of Mr. Morris.

Of the long articles in the Atlantic, the one which will attract most attention, we imagine, is that on which we commented last week—some of Mr. Henry James's opinions in regard to the relations of society to husbands and wives; and perhaps next in attractiveness is the first of Mrs. Stowe's "Oldtown Fireside Stories." "Uncle Tom's Cabin"—most opportune of novels—made a great stir, but it is in her records of what she has observed of life in New England country towns of thirty or forty years ago that Mrs. Stowe is at her best. A person would not be frightfully heretical, for instance, who should maintain that there is nothing else so good in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" as the picture of Miss Ophelia. In this new story, or rather sketch, Mrs. Stowe takes Sam Lawson, the good-for-nothing "shif'less" fellow of "Oldtown Folks," and makes him exercise for the benefit of a pair of children his faculty of telling stories; so he tells them a rather striking and perfectly Yankee ghost story. When we say that the original figure of Sam, as Mrs. Stowe's eyes transferred him to her memory, has now a little faded, and that the Sam whom she shows us to-day has here a touch of more recent color which is not quite in keeping, we only say what might have been expected. The originals, of which he is a copy, are rarer than they were; and the painter has spent a busy lifetime, caring much for other things since she gave her first and best study to her Yankee personages.

Other long articles that are worth some attention are "Master Treadwell," "The Correspondence of Napoleon Bonaparte," "French and English Illustrated Magazines," and "Let us be Cheerful," though, perhaps, all of this last is not new, and all of the last but one is not to be taken as, to say the least, delicately true in its criticism of various artists.

Harper's is as good as ever, though one would guess that some bore had got hold of the critical department, which is more intrepidly vacuous than almost any criticism done for the American press. "Jottings and Journeyings in Spain" is very good-natured and lively, and may be read with pleasure, and we should think it might be instructive too. "Wine in America and American Wine" is very discouraging in tone, and will be promptly answered, we trust, by some other wine-grower writing for some other magazine. The article before us ought to make a pother among the manufacturers of native wines and the breeders of vines. There is little hope, the writer says, that for many a long day we are going to have in this country wines at once pure and cheap. The high-raised hopes of twenty years ago are flat in the dust, for our vines are predestined victims to the rat or the mildew—new enemies of the grape, which only within the last decade or two have made their power known. So he goes on. For the "total-abstinence men," also, there is something in the essay which altogether is well worth reading. So we cannot speak of "Anteros," by Mr. George Lawrence, which is still quite proper, and, of course, then, is stupid to the last degree. However, it is rather early yet to give up, and something is to be hoped from Carryl Glynne. In the "Easy Chair" the editor talks sensibly to the misguided artists and other such persons who cannot bear the truth and resent criticism. But no good was ever done by such discourses, except, indeed, that young Sulky or old Sulky's mouth is stopped for the moment, and that it is made manifest to the spectator that he is put to confusion. To let them suffer is, we find, the best way to deal with them; and to remind them now and again that "to be weak is to be miserable."

Putnam's has among its other articles a long and careful article, useful for reference, concerning "Proportional Representation;" and another not so long nor so careful, discussing the question, "Shall we have a More Readable Bible?" We should have such a Bible, the writer thinks, and he thinks the American Bible Society is the source from which it should come. But the American Bible Society would not be expected by many persons to do more than remove from the present version some surface roughnesses. This, to be sure, would probably be worth doing, but it seems a small thing when one thinks of how much needed is a new translation. Perhaps never was there within the limits of Christendom so widespread and earnest a desire to seek the truth as regards Christianity—a desire which, in some of its manifestations, frightens some persons who should know better, as well as a vast number who do not know better, and who now stand in the way of profitable discussion.

Professor J. M. Hoppin contributes to Putnam's an essay on "The Outlook of Our English Literature," and makes some sound remarks; but some are open to question. Then, we doubt whether there is much use in disquieting ourselves about "the great American poet" of the future. It is among the possibilities that we are not to have a great American poet at all. The last and previous generation craved one as much as we do, and got only big American poets. Would it not be as well for us of this generation to petition more wisely, and ask for greatness simply in our poets, and care less about the Americanism in them? The Americanism of all that we produce may fairly be left to take care of itself; our concern is with its excellence. Meantime, Professor Hoppin fancies the new star will make its appearance in the West, we suppose under the influence of the better social and physiological conditions—for the poet, like other men, needs good beef and good air—which that region seems to promise to our race. He says: "The great poet of our country will spring up somewhere in the central territories; in some one of those beautiful valleys in the neighborhood or, perhaps, on the other side of the Rocky Mountains, where the skies are clearer, nature larger, life freer, more sympathetic and more national."

The "Editorial Notes" in this number of the magazine are better than either of the two preceding batches, but less would have to be said of the review of current literature—that of foreign literature having more variety than fulness—while the reverse is to be said of the review of home literature, which treats at too great length of books not important, and which shows a want of knowledge.

Everybody may properly wish to see the June Hours at Home, which opens with a number of letters written by Miss Charlotte Brontë to her most intimate friend, the lady who does duty as Caroline Helstone in "Shirley"; and there is also some well-written and judicious criticism of the character and career of the celebrated authoress. Mr. John Bigelow is the person through whom the letters see the light. Mr. Bigelow contributes also the paper on "Beaumarchais the Merchant," which he has read this winter before our historical societies in New York and Brooklyn.

Trollope's "Sir Harry Hotspur" is the most prominent of the contents of the last Lippincott's, but some of the more unimportant articles are pleasant enough. "The coming man is evidently a woman," one scoffer says; and another abuses "Gail Hamilton"—whom he calls out of her name, by the by—and says her last book is "as uncalled for as it is unrefined." "Uncalled for" is precisely what it is, for it is the deadest book of the season, and one does not see why an editor should now be troubling himself about it. "The Revolution at the South" and the article on Lopez and Paraguayan affairs both seem to take right ground, but it cannot be said that the reading public are not a little sick of both subjects. As for the Paraguayan affair, not only was there almost never such a muddle and jumble of writing and opinion, but there has hardly ever been a subject with such capacities of interest which has been treated in so dry and dull and unpictorial a way. Then, too, every observer seems to be a violent partisan.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbott (J. S. C.), History of Hortense	(Harper & Bros.)	$1 20
Annual of Hudson and Menet, for 1870	(Hudson & Menet)
Cupples (Mrs. G.), Driven to Sea: a Tale	(Horace B. Fuller)
Disraeli (B.), Henrietta Temple: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 50
Guilty, or Not Guilty: a Tale	(Carleton)
Honor Bright: a Tale	"	1 50
Myers (F. W. H.), Poems	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 25
Payne (J. B.), Haydn's Universal Index of Biography	(Virtue & Yorston)
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XXVII., swd	(Hurd & Houghton)	0 75
Stone (Prof. J. R.), The Invitation Heeded	(Cath. Pub. Soc.)
Swift (J. F.), Robert Greathouse: a Tale	(Carleton)
Trollope (A.), The Vicar of Bullhampton: a Tale	(Harper & Bros.)
Yonge (Miss C. M.), A Storehouse of Stories	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 50
The Caged Lion: a Tale	(D. Appleton & Co.)	1 25

Fine Arts.

FORTY-FIFTH EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

We have named two French painters as representative of a certain tendency in modern painting, a tendency to which it is dangerous for students to yield too readily, however fascinating the results may seem to them. Now to bring home to New York this demonstration, let us take an admired, influential, and in every way successful New York painter, or rather his works, and find in them lessons for the times, even though the task becomes one of much greater delicacy. Let us take No. 362 of this exhibition, Mr. Gifford's "Tivoli." Without attempting to give this picture its exact place in art, or even in modern art, let us consider it in relation to the external world, that visible world with which painting deals, and to give beautiful, exalted, and essentially true ideas of which is the end and aim of painting. In this picture, then, a moderately extensive and exceedingly varied landscape is seen through a warm yellowish atmosphere; there is no near foreground, and no extreme distance except the sky; there are isolated trees near enough to be seen in all their ramifications, and buildings massive and simple enough to be understood at a glance, as to character and exterior design; there are running streams, deep between strongly marked banks, in what may be called the foreground of the picture. No part of this landscape can be supposed nearer than some hundreds of yards. Now, criticism, not hasty to say "right" or "wrong," but pointing out what is peculiar for its own and its reader's notice and consideration, observes in this instance that the mists and fogs of the north temperate zone partly conceal what is seen through them, often distort and disguise it, and always conceal what is more distant—that is, what is seen through a greater depth of the mist or fog, than what is nearer. Moreover, when the somewhat rare phenomenon is seen of a great body of mist, fog, or cloud, strongly and warmly colored by the sun, it presents this appearance rather as a mass seen from without, and tinged, as it were, outside, than as a dense atmosphere colored throughout its mass, and showing that color to an observer within it. That this latter effect is possible no one can deny who has seen and inhabited a London fog. And a London morning fog in August is not of necessity the gray, pea-soup-colored blindness of the November "London Particular." But in the other respects spoken of above and also in this one, the atmosphere of this picture may be critically spoken of as a conception; an artistic idea rather than a representation of a natural fact. Many of our readers will remember the picture of several years ago, in which a Catskill valley was represented under the same conditions, miles of distance seen through the same yellow haze. All our readers are familiar with this effect, made a part of our American art, in Mr. Gifford's pictures. It is not to be wondered at that these pictures are so popular. They are fascinating on account of their unity, their simplicity of design, their very uniformity of tone. The same charm, a perfectly definite and even explicable charm, which a drawing in india-ink or sepia, a brown mezzotint, or an etching possesses, a charm peculiar to itself, and not to be found in a finished work of full color, is found in these pictures we are considering. But to consider the possible effect upon young painters of pictures so definitely limited in expression, and in such a tempting way mannered, pictures that sell so well, too, let us suppose that a follower of Mr. Gifford learns to paint running streams and their high scarped banks and trees of different sorts, not from nature but from Mr. Gifford's pictures. Is it not obvious that he will go very far astray? The master has studied many phases of nature, and, selecting from what he knows, gives what he thinks his picture will be better for. Perhaps to our mind he gives too little, and the picture is not full enough of the varied impressions, the mystery and the change of nature; but it is perfectly possible that in the attempt to give more matter, some grace would be lost. At all events there is the definite choice, and the result of varied study. But, the pupil who should think that here and not out of doors is the nature for him to study, would be limiting his total range by the limits of the master's chosen field. And it must not be forgotten that even a student working out of doors may be undergoing as narrow a training, may be seeing as much through another's eyes, and may be in his art as feeble a reflection of another, as if he were to work only in the studio. The power of getting only a very little and that not the best out of the infinite fulness of nature, is well exemplified in a host of the sketches in the "Corridor."

In the same South Gallery, and not far from the "Tivoli," is one of the most attractive pictures in the exhibition, Mr. Kensett's "Narragansett" No. 378. It would be impossible to find an American painting more thoroughly representative of the tendencies, good and not so good, of modern art. It addresses the pensive modern regard for natural beauty, which finds its best enjoyment in a sunset sky seen by a placid ocean, with white sails in the distance, which does not look for the structure of rocks or for the sculpture of clouds, but takes the rocks for masses of warm color of prettily varied shape, and the horizon clouds for pale indications of what will soon be vast, towering, fleecy masses, seeming to fill the now unsullied depths of the sky. The picture takes one of the most beloved phases of natural beauty, and represents it exceedingly well—so well as almost to challenge comparison with any similar work. The composition has unity, simplicity not too obvious, and a certain grace; the drawing, without being very subtle, is sufficiently refined; the color is eminently quiet, harmonious, subdued. That the picture represents modern art in its shortcomings as well as its excellences; that, in common with all modern art, it sympathizes too closely with the popular taste to teach it much; that there are many such pictures, and that a nobler task would be to represent each time some phase of nature not before represented; all this is true and should be not forgotten—it is part of the history of this and of other such works of art. But we wish for the next generation of painters, the pupils of to-day, that many of their works may have the easy grace, the completeness within its limits, and the power of pleasing intelligent people, which Mr. Kensett's best works, and this one among them, possess. It is our hope that they will discover that in order to do anything of the kind they must work hard and steadily, drawing from nature. They have no right to expect that just such and such qualities will develop in them, and that such popular favor will reward their efforts in a single direction. They have to meet a public growing daily more exacting, more trained, more observant; less ready to be satisfied with one song sung again and again in different keys. They will have to know all they are likely to know, to hold their own at all.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

LIST OF

New Publications

Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection: A Series of Essays. By Alfred Russel Wallace, author of "The Malay Archipelago." $2.

The Population of an Old Pear Tree; or, Stories of Insect Life. From the French of E. Van Bruyssel. Edited by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." With numerous Illustrations by Becker. $2.

Poems. "St. Paul," "St. John," and Other Poems. By Frederic W. H. Myers. Fcap. 8vo, $1 25.

A Storehouse of Stories. Containing The History of Philip Quarll, Goody Twoshoes, The Governess, Jemima Placid, The Perambulations of a Mouse, The Village School, The Little Queen, History of Little Jack. Edited by Charlotte M. Yonge. $1 50.

Nations Around. By A. Keary, author of "Early Egyptian History." Forming Volume IX. of the "Sunday Library for Household Reading." With Illustrations. $1 75.

Tom Brown at Oxford. By the author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition, with eight Illustrations, $2.

A Golden Treasury of Greek Prose. By R. S. Wright, M.A., and J. E. L. Shadwell, M.A. (Clarendon Press Series.) $1 75.

MACMILLAN & CO.,

63 Bleecker Street, New York.

FOR ONE WEEK—FIFTEEN CENTS WILL BE paid by the Publisher of the Nation for No. 236.

Cheapest Book-store in the World.

Immense Prices paid for Old Books.
12,672 Magnificent Books
AT OUR PRICE.
53,472 Miscellaneous Books
AT YOUR PRICE.
67,432 Books, History, Biography, etc.,
AT ANY PRICE.

Catalogues Nos. 22, 23, 25, free. Send stamp.

LEGGAT BROTHERS,
3 Beekman Street.

New and Old Books.

DAVID G. FRANCIS (formerly C. S. Francis & Co., 3 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, New York, keeps constantly for sale an extensive Stock of New and Second-hand Books in various departments of Literature.

Catalogues, issued from time to time, will be forwarded FREE to any address.

GUIDE TO WEST POINT

AND THE

United States Military Academy,

WITH

MAPS AND ENGRAVINGS.

1 vol. 18mo, flexible cloth, $1.

WEST POINT LIFE:

A POEM

Read before the Dialectic Society of the United States Military Academy. Illustrated with twenty-two pen and ink sketches. To which is added the song, "Bonny Heaven, Oh!" 1 vol. oblong octavo, cloth, $2 50.

History of West Point,

And its Importance during the American Revolution, and the Origin and Progress of the United States Military Academy. By Captain E. C. BOYNTON, A.M. 1 vol. 8vo, with 36 Illustrations, tinted paper, $6.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray Street and 27 Warren Street.

Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price,

J. SABIN & SONS.

Should be in every Family and Sunday-School Library.

THE FAR EAST;

Or, Letters from Egypt, Palestine, and other Lands of the Orient. Illustrated with Engravings, Maps, etc. By N. C. BURT, D.D., Author of "Hours among the Gospels," "The Land and its Story," etc. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, on tinted paper, $1 75.

JUST PUBLISHED,

The Bible in the Public Schools.

1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $2; on tinted paper, cloth, gilt top, $2 50.

IMPORTANT HISTORICAL WORKS.

OHIO VALLEY HISTORICAL SERIES.

No. 1. Bouquet's Expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764, with a Preface by Francis Parkman. Maps and Plates reproduced by the Photo-Lithographic process. 8vo, cloth, uncut, or gilt top, $3. Large paper, imp. 8vo, $5.

No. 2. Walker's History of Athens County, Ohio, the Ohio Land Company, and the First Settlement of the State, at Marietta. Five Portraits and a Historical Map. 8vo, cloth, uncut, or gilt top, $6. Large paper, 2 vols. imp. 8vo, $12.

No. 3. Colonel George Rogers Clark's Sketch of his Campaign in the Illinois in 1778-79, with Introduction by Hon. Henry Pirtle, of Louisville, and Major Bowman's Journal of the taking of Post St. Vincent. 8vo, cloth, uncut, or gilt top, $2. Large paper, imp. 8vo, $4.

No. 4. McBride's Pioneer Biographies. Sketches of the Lives of some of the Early Settlers of Butler County, Ohio, with Portrait of the Author, 8vo, cloth, uncut, or gilt top, $3 50. Large paper imp. 8vo, $7.

IN PRESS.

Dr. Daniel Drake's Pioneer Life in Kentucky, in a series of Reminiscential Letters to his Children.

Colonel James Smith's Narrative of his Captivity among the Indians in Ohio, 1755-58.

FOR SALE BY

J. SABIN & SONS,

84 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

Monthly Numbers, 50 Cents.
Yearly Volumes, $7 50 and $9 each.

NUMBERS 1 TO 17 NOW PUBLISHED. SENT FREE BY MAIL ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED TRAVELS AROUND THE WORLD.

A SPLENDIDLY ILLUSTRATED AND AUTHENTIC WORK OF TRAVEL.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,

596 Broadway, New York.

R. TURNER, Manager.

THE UNDERSIGNED beg to announce to their Friends and the BOOK-BUYING PUBLIC that they have established themselves at

No. 451 Broome Street,

For the purpose of carrying on a

Publishing & Bookselling Business,

Where they will be happy to see them and receive orders. They will keep on hand a full stock of the

PUBLICATIONS OF THE DAY,

Besides the

Works of Popular Standard Authors, Children's Books, Libraries, and Toy Books.

ALSO,

School and College Text Books, Music Books, etc.

Bringing with them an experience of Twenty-seven Years in the "Trade" in this City, they are prepared to transact a FIRST-CLASS business INTELLIGENTLY.

A well-selected Stock from Boston, Philadelphia, and Western Publishing Houses will always be kept on hand. Also,

Bibles, Books of Common Prayer, Church Service, and Hymn Books of all denominations,

In the various editions and styles of binding.

Orders from PUBLIC OR PRIVATE LIBRARIES, SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, OR CLERGYMEN will receive a LIBERAL DISCOUNT.

They will guarantee to all customers promptness and despatch in all business engagements.

Soliciting your patronage, we remain,

Yours faithfully,

DE WITT C. LENT & CO.,

Publishers and Booksellers,

451 BROOME STREET

(A few doors west of Broadway),

NEW YORK.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS'

New Publications.

I.

CAPTAIN JAMES GRANT'S NEW NOVEL.

The Girl He Married. By JAMES GRANT, Author of "The Romance of War," "The King's Own Borderers," etc., etc. 16mo, boards, price 80 cents.

II.

Life. A Book for Young Men. By J. CUNNINGHAM GEIKIE. Printed on toned paper, 12mo, extra cloth, price $1 75.

III.

NEW WORK BY C. J. VAUGHAN.

Earnest Words for Earnest Men; or, The Gospel and the Pilgrimage. By C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D., Master of The Temple. 16mo, extra cloth, price $1 50.

IV.

Saving Knowledge, addressed to Young Men. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D., and W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

PUBLISHERS,

London, and 416 Broome Street, New York.

GIVEN AWAY!

A GRAND NATIONAL WORK OF ART.

MARSHALL'S

Household Engraving of Washington.

A WORK OF WORLD-WIDE FAME, UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED TO BE THE MOST MAGNIFICENT ENGRAVING EVER EXECUTED IN AMERICA.

The Publishers of the Christian Union take pride in announcing that they have purchased the plate of this superb large line engraving of WASHINGTON—a Plate valued at TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS—to be presented to new subscribers to that paper. The yearly subscription price of the Christian Union is $3, and the publishers make the following extraordinary and liberal offer:

TO EVERY NEW SUBSCRIBER FOR THE CHRISTIAN UNION, AT $3, WILL BE PRESENTED A COPY OF THIS SPLENDID, WORLD-RENOWNED WORK OF ART.

THE CHRISTIAN UNION,

HENRY WARD BEECHER,

Editor,

Is the only weekly religious journal for which MR. BEECHER writes, or to which he in any way contributes. It is a paper for all Christians everywhere, being published in the interest of the whole body of Christ's followers. The paper will be made, in various ways, the most attractive religious weekly published.

The Nation says, "The Christian Union is not only the ablest and best, but also, as we suppose, the most popular of American religious periodicals. At all events, it is safe to predict that it will soon have, if it has not already, greater influence than any other religious paper in the country."

It is already the most widely quoted throughout the whole country; its form, sixteen pages, large quarto, is so convenient for reading, binding, and preservation that it has in this alone a special merit not possessed by the large "blanket-sheets," while its literary attractions are not surpassed by any.

Its Price: Only $3 per year.

Subscribe for it! Get others to take it!

List of LIBERAL CASH COMMISSIONS and PREMIUMS sent on application.

SAMPLE COPIES sent on receipt of six cents for postage, or FREE to any one who will try to raise a club.

AGENTS WANTED.

Remittances should be made by Draft, Check, P.O. Money Order, or Registered Letter.

J. B. FORD & CO., Publishers,

39 Park Row, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1870.

The Week.

In view of adjournment, Congress has been unusually efficient during the past week—the House more than the Senate, which has been mostly engaged in discussing the Indian Appropriation Bill, though in a long Executive session, on Wednesday week, it did the country the service of rejecting the Sandwich Islands Treaty. The same day it passed a bill rearranging the judicial circuits. The House finished the Tax Bill on Friday, and settled the income question by raising the sum to be exempted to $2,000, reducing the tax to 3 per cent., and forbidding the printing of the returns. Religious and socialistic communities are to be taxed on the basis of five to a family. A Kentucky member sought to have the Government bonds taxed, and of course had Gen. Butler on his side, along with twenty-nine other Republican repudiators. They were voted down by 110 to 78. On Monday, Mr. Schenck, who had previously offered an amended Tariff Bill as an appendage to the Tax Bill, got the two passed together as he wished. Between the currants and furs of the first section it is provided that printed book matter, bound or in sheets, must pay a duty of 15 cents per pound, and periodicals in pamphlet form a duty of 10 cents, levied in the same way; while the second section makes duty free "books, maps, and charts specially imported in single copies, and not for sale, of which no editions are printed in the United States; and books which have been printed and manufactured more than twenty years." On Monday, also, the Post-Office Appropriation Bill was passed.

Mr. Schenck has got his tariff amendment bill through the House after a fierce conflict, the revenue reformers opposing it on the ground of the rise on steel which it effects under cover of a reduction on articles of popular consumption; but the Republicans afterwards gave up in deference to the large reduction of taxation which it makes—about $60,000,000, of which about $20,000,000 come out of the tariff. Pig-iron stands at $7 a ton; scrap iron at $6; but steel rails are laden at one and a half cents a pound, or about $34 a ton, a clear and enormous increase, and everything Bessemer is to be classed as steel. Books, imported singly for use, that is for rich men, come in duty free. Tea goes down to 15 cents a pound, and coffee to 3. Indeed, the free list is, considering the times we live in, a generous one, and the House peremptorily, and by a large majority, directed the Committee to bring in a bill putting coal in it, so that "the poor man," who has so many of his imaginary wants supplied, but whose real ones excite so little interest, will at least have cheap fuel next winter.

The new funding bill which the Committee of Ways and Means is said to have prepared proposes a thousand-million-dollar loan, at four per cent., redeemable in thirty years, and free from all national, State, and municipal taxation, except income tax, and authorizes the Treasury to receive deposits of gold at three per cent. interest, to be used in redeeming five-twenties. We suppose by way of encouraging foreign capitalists to take it freely, Mr. B. F. Butler, under cover of Mr Beck, seized the opportunity of reviving his old plan of "taxing" the interest on United States bonds ten per cent., or, in plain English, reducing the interest from six to five and forty one-hundredths per cent., and, pushing it to a vote, got 78 for it to 110 against it—29 Republicans voting with him. Of course, calling the sixty cents deduction a "tax" does not deceive anybody as to the real character of the scheme, and we may guess the effect of its revival a second time on the public credit. This effect, too, will be heightened by Mr. Butler's argument that it was folly to expect the holders of United States sixes to give them up for fours as long as the sixes are exempt from taxation, which, we think, is sound reasoning, but then it does not follow that taxing them is the best way to effect the conversion. Few people will care to jump out of the frying-pan into the fire, or attach any more value to the untaxed four per cent. bond than the fraudulently taxed six per cent. bond of a dishonest creditor. But why convert or fund at all? Why not cut down the interest on the five-twenties to four per cent. by bill, and thus save the expense of engraving new bonds and the trouble of "funding," and if any one complain, laugh at him?

Mr. Wells's term of office expires at the end of the present month, and we are sorry to hear that while a sufficient force of the Republican party is ready to vote for its renewal, the President, in deference to Mr. Boutwell, who does not like Mr. Wells's statistics, probably finding that they embarrass him with "the men inside politics," declares that he will not propose Mr. Wells's retention. Mr. Wells has been for the last five years the most creditable person, and his reports the one creditable thing in American finance, always excepting the unbounded readiness of the people to pay taxes; and his being dropped is as distinct a step towards barbarism as if Mr. Boutwell were to begin to keep his accounts by notches on a stick. It will leave the country and Congress completely in the hands of the great manufacturers, who, if they were archangels, are not to be trusted as guides in financial legislation, because they have an enormous pecuniary interest in making a particular kind of legislation appear to have a particular influence on the national industry. The consumers are therefore entitled to the services of a disinterested enquirer, and they will never have anybody better than Mr. Wells. The President seems to be most unfortunately advised on nearly every question connected with revenue, if we may judge from his published utterances about it. In one of his earliest, he expressed his reliance on the Western gold mines for the payment of the national debt, and more recently laid down the astounding proposition that money paid by Americans for the transportation of freight by foreign vessels might as well be thrown into the sea. There has hardly been a single reform in the revenue effected within the last five years which Mr. Wells has not been the first to recommend, and his being permitted to go out of office will be a disgrace as well as misfortune.

The Chicago Tribune, noticing the defeat of Mr. Lynch's bill for the payment of premiums to Americans for running steamers to foreign ports, speaks of his pleasant trick of charging the 109 members who voted against the bill with being under the influence of "British gold," and suggests that, as the period of flinging inkstands and sand-boxes at the heads of impudent members has gone by, the proper mode of meeting such imputations is "to hold none but the most formal official intercourse with the blackguard" who makes them. It would be hardly fair, however, to single out poor Mr. Lynch for punishment for doing what the whole tribe of his prompters and backers out-of-doors are doing incessantly. His is, and has for some time been, the leading protectionist argument. Captain Codman, an old American skipper, who has followed the sea for forty years, has been advocating the admission of foreign-built ships duty free, after having, like a sensible man, paid a visit to the Clyde yards, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with his subject; but he no sooner made his appearance in Washington, and opened his mouth, than he was charged with being a paid agent of the Clyde builders, which has led to his coming to fisticuffs with one Congressman, but nobody supposes the Congressman won't go round the corner and repeat the story with additions. Having previously said that Codman was hired to advocate the admission of Clyde steamers to the American register, he will probably now say that he has seen the draft for the first quarter's salary.

The negro has at last made his appearance at West Point, in the shape of a boy of seventeen or thereabouts from Mississippi, nominated to the school by Senator Revels. A strong effort has been made by some of the papers to make a sensation out of it. Colonel Black, the commandant, has been represented as throwing up his hands and flying in horror at the sight of the new cadet, and the hotel-keepers as having ignominiously expelled him when he applied for lodgings, and the white cadets as scouting the idea of his admission to their ranks. In fact, as dressed up, the incident has looked as if it might be a good thing with which to rouse the fury of the Congressional war-horses against the school, and "to go before the people" at the fall elections. The truth is, however, that Senator Revels has done a very foolish and cruel thing, as far as the boy and his family are concerned, and a very injudicious thing as far as the colored race is concerned, by nominating him—and for the simple reason that the lad is very ignorant, and cannot pass the entrance examination. The colored race ought to learn the lesson of "putting its best foot foremost"—that is, ought to make its début in colleges, and professions, and in the legislature with its best men. Instead of that, it has thus far sent its scalawags and dunces to the bar and the legislature; and now we see a poor boy, without any preliminary training, selected to open its way to scientific soldiering. He was received, we believe, with perfect courtesy and propriety by everybody at West Point. He went to Cozzens's Hotel, and got his breakfast with as much pomp and ceremony and attention as any white cadet would have had shown him, but did not stay either there or at Roe's for the same reason which, alas! excludes the vast majority of men and boys of all races from hotels of this description—inability to pay four dollars and a half a day for his board and lodgings.

A correspondent writes to us to say that the "faithful soldier," of whom Mr. Thurlow Weed speaks in the last Galaxy, in an article noticed by us last week, as having borne away Colonel Baker's body at Ball's Bluff, and for whom he obtained a place in the blessed custom-house, from which he was afterwards discharged "through no fault of his own," was a notorious Boston pimp and bully, who organized the ruffians who carried off Anthony Burns and afterwards assaulted Mr. R. H. Dana, jr., and narrowly escaped hanging for the murder of his first wife. It is not difficult to believe that after a past so stormy as these facts seem to indicate, the soldier did not carry Baker's body off the field, or indeed any body but his own, and we confess that we are not surprised to find that he was subsequently driven from the peaceful shades of the custom-house. The observations which we made touching the civil service apropos of Mr. Weed's story, will now naturally need some slight modifications, which each reader can make for himself.

The late Michigan Legislature passed an act enabling towns and cities to aid railroads by issuing bonds, which was taken advantage of in all parts of the State, there being plenty of railroad enterprises. The town of Salem, on the line of a road intended to shorten the route between Detroit and Chicago, voted, or was thought to have voted, to issue its bonds in behalf of the road; but, afterwards refusing to do so, was sued by the company. The Supreme Court has just decided the enabling act unconstitutional, and the result is widespread consternation, the paralysis of numerous projected roads, and many cases of individual hardship. Abuse of the Court, however, is left to one or two of the less decent newspapers, while the majority of the press and the people recommend that steps should be taken to amend the constitution, first calling an extra session of the Legislature. It is admitted, however, that even this cannot make good the bonds condemned by the Court, and there seems to be no help for the past but in repudiating the engagements made under the act. The Court insisted mainly—so far as we have the particulars—on the essentially private nature of railroads; that taxation must be imposed for public purposes, and according to some equitable rule of apportionment; and that the purpose for which a tax is imposed upon one of the municipal subdivisions of the State must not only be a public one as regards the people of that subdivision, but local also, with a special and peculiar interest for the municipality, so that they, rather than the State, or any larger portion of it, should bear the burden of it. The Court further ruled that the right of eminent domain was not involved in the question, and that the State had no right to engage in assisting or operating private undertakings of the nature of railroads, or to authorize its municipalities to do so; and, lastly, that every individual had a right to insist that the public should not own or control his property for the purpose of donations. Three out of four judges united in this decision, which was based rather upon general principles than upon any close reasoning on the relation of the law to the constitution, and is all the more, therefore, to be recommended to the citizens of Massachusetts for digestion and reflection.

Connecticut has at last undertaken to amend her laws by giving women the absolute control of their own property; and the "married woman's property" bill has also got through the House of Commons in England, so that if the cause of woman's suffrage does not prosper, the cause of justice to women certainly does. Mrs. Stowe has written to the Woman's Journal warning the friends of the suffrage against meddling with marriage and divorce, of which they are justly or unjustly accused by the public. The difficulty will be, however, no matter what the leaders may desire, to keep people from joining the movement who do want to meddle with marriage and divorce, and indeed seem to long for the suffrage mainly for this purpose, and who every time they hear of an unhappy marriage shout out, "Ha! ha! We told you so; there are your marriage laws for you; there's the result of male legislation. How long, O Lord, how long! Let's hold another meeting, and speak plainly."

The majority of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, headed by Mr. Banks, has made a report, a version of which has been published, the authenticity of which he, however, denies; but we may safely presume that it maintains substantially that the duty of the Government with regard to Cuba is to recognize the insurgents as belligerents, and do various other things which anybody can guess who has read the articles in the pro-Cuban newspapers during the past winter, and is familiar with the turn of Mr. Banks's mind. The minority has, however, made a report also, through Judge Orth, of Indiana, in which the passage of the bill reported some time ago by the same gentleman, forbidding the fitting out or equipping of vessels of war in the United States, with the intent that they may be employed by European governments for the subjugation of American colonists claiming independence, is advocated. There is only one objection to it, and that is, that it introduces, or attempts to, a new doctrine into international law, viz., that a regular government may have two kinds of right in territory—perfect and imperfect, or de facto and de jure—and that it is only to the last that the United States are bound to pay full respect. The minority report also denies that the insurgents have set up a regular government in Cuba, or hold any definable portion of the island, or have any claim to the character of belligerents, or ought to be recognized as such. Many of the Spanish "outrages," it says, have been provoked by the conduct of American citizens pecuniarily interested in the success of the rebellion, and it reproaches the "Cuban patriots," of whom we have so many among us, with not going to fight on the island instead of staying here trying to arrange breaches of the law. The policy it recommends to the Government is one of strict neutrality.

The tendency to "go off at half-cock," which has always been strong among members of Congress and politicians, and has been greatly stimulated by the electric telegraph, has been very amusingly illustrated during the past week. A despatch dated from Constantinople was published some days ago, professing to give an account of a wholesale massacre of the Jews by the Christians in Moldavia and Wallachia. It was on its face a hoax. In the first place, the story was a wildly improbable one. There has been barbarous persecution of the Jews in these provinces, but there is an enormous interval between anything that has occurred and a general massacre. In the next place, its coming from Constantinople, and not direct through Vienna and Paris, was highly suspicious. In the third place, it was tolerably clear that the concocter of it did not know very well where Roumania was, as he speaks of it as "a province of Southern Europe."

Indeed, it was so clumsily done, that we had, and have still, our doubts whether it was manufactured in Europe at all, and was not the production of a hard-pressed Bohemian in this city. But it seems to have no sooner reached Washington, than members of Congress began to take off their coats and cravats in order to deal with it energetically. Two or three days elapsed, and there came no confirmation whatever from Europe of this fearful story, but this in no wise abated the ardor of the humanitarians, or caused them to pause in their preparations. The Jews all over the country got fearfully excited, and sent memorials and resolutions to the Senate asking for the President's interposition in behalf of their co-religionists. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Sumner moved, with much solemnity, "in the interest of humanity," for such further information as the President might be able to furnish; and all this, be it remembered, when the news had remained a week nearly without confirmation. In the House, Mr. Schenck gave the thing a smart knock on the head in a few sharp, sensible words. Moreover, a Jew was hurriedly appointed consul at Bucharest, and confirmed in hot haste, we suppose in the idea that when the infuriated Christians of the Danube heard he was coming they would cease from slaughter. Now, we learn positively that the only foundation for the story was a disturbance at an election in a small town. Mr. Crémieux, of Paris, who has been asked for information, replies in a way which shows he was thinking simply of the general persecution of the last two years. We think there ought to be somebody in the Senate with his wits sufficiently about him to prevent these rather foolish telegraphic excitements. Not long ago, a resolution, based on a Cable despatch, was introduced congratulating the Emperor of Russia on his escape from assassination, and imputing the attempt to the enraged serf-owners. It turned out, however, to be a nihilist, or advanced radical, who committed it.

To interfere with effect in the affairs of Roumania, or any other country, some little knowledge of them, let us add, is necessary. Senator Sprague was not so far wrong in what he said about the origin of these Jewish troubles on the Danube as Mr. Stewart's sarcastical observations on the right of rich men to their lives might lead one to believe. Roumanian society is in process of transformation, and the Jews are likely to gain more by it in the long run than any other portion of the community, though just now they are suffering severely. They have for a long while been the only persons in the provinces engaged in trade, commerce, or banking—the Moldo-Wallachians being all either rude peasants or extravagant and reckless landlords or boyards. The consequence has been that not only have Jews accumulated a large portion of the wealth of the country in their own hands, but they hold liens to an enormous amount on the property of the Christians. In fact, the Jews may be said to constitute the creditor and the Christians the debtor interest of the country. The latter, however, were prevented from feeling the burden by the fact that, until recently, the Jews practically had no civil rights, and could not enforce their claims in the courts of law. Under the new constitution they can, and they have within the last five or six years shown a disposition to bring about a grand settlement of accounts which have been current for generations, by exacting payment of their dues. Hence the ferocious hostility to them which has shown itself in the late disturbances. But, of course, this state of things will soon pass away. The Christians will soon, in one way or other, wipe out their liabilities, and, it is to be hoped, will hereafter attend to their own business, and the Jews will gain by it. In the meantime, the notion that the despatch of a Jew to Bucharest as American consul will help the Jews is simply ridiculous. People in the Principalities hate and despise the Jews, and know nothing about the United States, and the poor man will find himself a delusion and a snare. Anything that foreign interference can do for the Jews will be done by France or Prussia, countries in which the Jews are more powerful than they are here, and which the ruling classes in Moldo-Wallachia—ignorant and scampish though they are—know and are afraid of.

The Canadians are having a joyful time over their defeat of the Fenians, though we have no doubt that had the Fenians stood their ground there would have been bloody work; but then, seeing that the Fenians fled almost without firing a shot, and that there were not as many men hurt on both sides as to furnish work for one active hospital nurse, we think that the triumphs of the campaign might be passed over with less uproar. The brave are almost always modest, especially when the foe has run away on seeing them. General Lindsay has been making a speech to the volunteers, in which he declares that it was their own trusty guns which got them the victory, and that neither the President's proclamation nor the United States troops did anything to repel the invasion; a rather foolish speech, which, however, the Toronto Globe heartily commends, and adds some bitter reflections of its own on the failure of the Federal troops to interrupt the Fenian march. There are two ways of looking at this point, however. In the first place, it is ridiculous to expect the United States to line the frontier with troops, out of an army of 30,000 men, in preparation for possible forays of bands of the most uncertain ragamuffins in the world; in the next place, the worst thing that could have happened the Canadians would have been the prevention of the invasion by American troops, as it would have left it in the power of the "Head Centres" and other impostors to say that had the United States not interfered, Canada would by this time have been Fenian soil, and thus the swindle would have gone on indefinitely. The failure, just as it happened, has given the movement a blow the arm of the law could never have given it. And then, ought not the volunteers to be grateful to the President for giving them a chance of covering themselves with glory? It is the first time, we are glad to say, we have ever heard heroes reproaching people for getting out of the way, and letting them get at the enemy. The warrior's worst torment is, as we understand the matter, he who gets in between the opposing ranks and stops the dreadful game.

The Reds in France seem to be in a very bad way. Whatever the plébiscite may have done for others, them it has crushed completely. The enormous majority obtained by the Empire is admitted on all hands to mean that the French people are thoroughly disgusted with Rochefort, Flourens, Grousset, Lissagaray, and all that school of "statesmen." To the peasants, M. Lavergne writes to the Temps, the Empire means order, security, and high prices for oxen, sheep, and hogs. They care nothing anywhere about the Napoleonic glories, and if you began to talk of them would tell you "to keep beef and mutton high, or else good morning." A handbill circulated in the Department of Doubs is said to have had more influence on votes than all the addresses issued by the Paris politicians. It ran as follows: "The principal products of your Department are cheese and wine. Read the following: 1860.—Empire.—Cheese, 100 kilos, 130 francs. 1848.—Republic.—Cheese, 100 kilos, 60 to 70 francs. Do you want to sell your cheese at 60 to 70 francs? Vote No. Do you want to sell it at 130 francs? Vote Yes."

With Italy the financial question is the main question, and its difficulties begin to be absolutely appalling. The taxes have almost doubled since 1861; the interest on the public debt has nearly tripled. For the current year the public expenditure will, it is estimated, amount to $222,374,202, an enormous sum for such a country. It is calculated on official data that the land of Italy is already mortgaged to the extent of over half its value, and the difficulties with which agriculture has to contend under these circumstances may be readily imagined. The Government has exhausted every resource—loans, taxation, and the confiscation of the domains of the church, and irredeemable paper. It is now talking of appropriating the stipends of the parish clergy. It pays interest on $1,057,400,000, while it has actually received not quite one-half that amount. The disorder, too, in the administration of the finances has been very great; the sale of the church lands has been marked by great jobbing. In many districts the discontent, or, rather, lawlessness, is something very striking; in the Romagna, for instance, the provincial functionaries are actually overawed by assassins. One great root of the political apathy seems to be the restriction of the suffrage, not over 500,000 persons out of 25,000,000 being invested with it; so that the government rests on a narrower constituency than any other in Europe which professes to have a popular basis at all.

THE TRUTH ABOUT AMERICAN SHIP-BUILDING.

Now that a Republican majority has consigned Mr. Lynch's bill for the revival of American shipping to the eternal sleep of the Congressional waste-basket, we may perhaps be permitted, without incurring the suspicion of being a paid agent of British ship-builders, to state the precise truth in relation to the whole ship-building business in the United States.

First, to clear away some of the cobwebs spun around it by the spiders of ignorance, prejudice, and selfish class-interests. The question has virtually nothing whatever to do with commerce. The exporting of American produce, the importing of foreign products, which is all that properly belongs to the sphere of commerce, can be carried on precisely to as good advantage to producer and consumer in foreign vessels as in American vessels. It is not commerce that suffers by the decay in our shipping. It is not our merchants, as such, who demand the revival of our ship-building interests. The issue has been purposely raised by the protectionists, in the hope that any loss resulting to "foreign commerce," as they contemptuously call it, would be thought less entitled to consideration, and that they could blind the unthinking to the fact that ship-building is a "manufacturing industry" pure and simple, and that it is precisely one of those very industries which protection was to protect that protection has destroyed. It is, of course, true that ships are largely owned by merchants, just as iron-furnaces and salt-works are largely owned by Congressmen; but that is no reason why ship-builders and ship-owners should not have all the rights of American manufacturers, which Congress so impartially awards even to those who are unfortunately compelled to legislate upon their own interests. Ship-building and ship-owning are just as much special American industries as cotton-spinning or screw-making.

Ship-building and ship-owning are practically one and the same thing. For, in the first place, almost every ship-builder is also a ship-owner; and, in the second place, the builder will not have orders to build unless the owner can employ ships at a profit, and the owner will not be able to run his ships at a profit unless the American builder can make them to as good advantage as the foreigner. Stripped of all sophistries, the question before the country to-day is: Why cannot American ship-builders build ships as cheaply as the ship-builders of other nations? That is the sole question and the whole question.

The history of ship-building in America can be given in a few words. From 1840 on it was one steady and rapid progress in quantity and quality. In 1848 and 1849 the California excitement lent an extraordinary stimulus to the business, and created a sharp demand for fast ships. Under the spur of this demand American mechanics revolutionized the art of ship-building; then arose "American clippers," and the day of "Dutch tubs" was over. So rapid and decided was our progress that we not only increased our own tonnage 40 per cent. in the five years from 1850 to 1855, during which time England increased hers only 22 per cent.; not only did we add so largely to our own tonnage that in 1855 our mercantile marine exceeded that of England by fully a million tons, or nearly one-fourth; but we could also build ships for every other sea-going nation and sell them to good advantage, so that in that very year John Bright could say from his seat in the House of Commons: "The finest vessels which are at this moment performing the voyage between England and the Australian colonies have been built in the United States; in ship-building industry the United States not only compete with, but in some respects excel this country." In 1855 a sharp reaction set in from this almost unnatural growth, a reaction intensified by the previous crisis in the California trade, and by the subsequent financial crisis of 1857, and for two or three years the trade was depressed. But in 1859 and 1860 business rapidly revived, and when the war broke out it found our ship-yards busy and our mercantile marine larger than it had ever been. Up to this point no two persons familiar with the facts differ in their account of ship-building and ship-owning in the United States. The difficulty begins with the war.

All those who are unwilling to have the decline in American ship-building attributed to its true cause assert with the utmost confidence, and the assertion is daily repeated by the unthinking, that American ships were driven from the sea by the Alabamas and other similar Anglo-Confederate cruisers. Now, we desire to give the damage thus done the fullest possible weight. But we cannot resolutely set ourselves against well-known facts and official figures. The official figures show that our tonnage reached its highest point in 1861—5,500,000 tons, and then fell, in June, 1864, to 5,000,000 tons, rising again to 5,100,000 in June, 1865, and showing a total net decline of seven per cent. in four years of war. From this point it fell again to less than 4,000,000 tons in June, 1867, a decline of 23 per cent. in two years of peace, against a decline of 7 per cent. in four years of war. It is furthermore notorious that not only ship-builders (who were partially engaged in building ships of war) but ship-owners likewise were profitably employed throughout the years of war, and that the complaint of the ship-owners or ship-builders was never heard until some time after the peace. It is evident at a glance that other causes have worked at the decline of American shipping besides the Anglo-Confederate cruisers.

In the year 1855, as already stated, our tonnage afloat reached its highest figures prior to 1861, and that year also witnessed the largest tonnage of vessels built in any one year, namely, close upon 600,000 tons. This amount fell off in the year 1859 to 150,000 tons, or one-fourth of what it was in 1855, the smallest tonnage for more than twenty years. Was this due to Alabamas, Floridas, and their consorts? From 1859 the tonnage of ships built increased again, year by year (with the single exception of 1862), until in 1864 it again nearly equalled that of 1855, rising to 515,000 tons, or not far from four times that of 1859. Does this look as though it were caused by Confederate cruisers? From 1864 the annual tonnage built has again gradually declined, until in 1869 it was again scarcely one-half of that of 1864. Political philosophy to the contrary notwithstanding, there is a certain importance to be attached to facts; and the facts so far revealed are these: In 1855 our ship-building industry reached its highest prosperity, and our commercial marine almost its highest tonnage. After a few years of decline, both in tonnage built and tonnage afloat, the total tonnage afloat, by means of very moderate annual additions, again rose to the figure of 1855, and in 1861 even somewhat exceeded it, maintaining itself at near that figure by means of increasing annual additions until 1864, from which point both annual production and tonnage afloat rapidly and steadily declined.

It is very evident that the turning-point in the history of American shipping is to be sought in the year 1855. In that year it became patent to all men that we, the United States, had outstripped all other nations in the art of building wooden ships, and it became patent especially to the ship-builders and ship-owners of England that they must either abandon the entire trade to us, or else discover and develop such new and improved methods of construction as would enable them to still retain a share. Out of that necessity arose the iron screw-steamer. From that day to this, wherever there was free competition, England has been slowly and steadily gaining on us, until to-day, wherever there is free competition, England, to use an expressive sporting phrase, "walks over the track."

But if it is true that since 1855 we have been steadily falling behind England, how was it possible that in 1861 our tonnage afloat could exceed that of 1855, and even our tonnage built in 1864 almost equal that of 1855? The answer is perfectly simple, and furnishes an excellent introduction to another branch of the discussion which has been very successfully used to befog the public. The United States have the longest coast-line and the most extensive inland navigation of any people on the globe. In this traffic we permit no foreign competition. Up to 1855 this traffic employed nearly half our entire tonnage; since 1855 it has employed far more than one-half our entire tonnage. This traffic includes all trade between the Atlantic States and California, and all other parts of the Pacific coast, as well as all trade along either coast, the lakes, canals, and rivers. By our navigation laws, all trade between these points or through these channels must be carried on in American ships, even if foreigners were able and willing to do it for one-half the cost. This large and important trade increased almost steadily up to 1865, and thus furnished profitable employment to ship-owners and ship-builders where competition could not come near them. Although after 1855 our total tonnage for some years fell off materially, the tonnage employed in this coasting and inland navigation never seriously declined, but almost steadily rose from 2,700,000 tons in 1855 to 3,500,000 tons in 1865, which is the highest point reached. The extremely rapid growth and the general prosperity of our coast and inland navigation thus furnished ample and profitable employment at home for our ship-owners and ship-builders, and prevented them from feeling the successful competition of England in the great ocean traffic of the world. The American tonnage engaged in foreign or open trade has never since been equal to that of 1855, and even in the comparatively prosperous years of 1860 and 1861 could not approach the tonnage of 1855, while the English tonnage engaged in foreign trade showed a regular and steady increase in every one of those years, and in 1861 boasted of a 10 per cent. gain against our loss of nearly 5 per cent. This fact is most strikingly confirmed by the details of the building of those years, the number of American ships and barks (mainly intended for foreign trade) built in the three years ending June 30, 1861, being 25 per cent. less than that of the single year 1855.

The fact, then, is, that ever since 1855 we have been steadily losing our supremacy in foreign navigation, owing to England's successful rivalry, but that our ship-owners and ship-builders found a compensation in our growing coast and inland navigation, where competition could not enter. The outbreak of the war increased our coast and inland traffic enormously, the Government giving employment, at fabulous prices, to almost every ton of shipping that could be made to float, and thereby unconsciously still further blinded our ship-owners and ship-builders to the rapid progress of England in a direction which we had entirely neglected. Then, when the peace threw out of employment all the tonnage in Government pay, and when the opening of Southern railroads restored to the land a large amount of traffic temporarily diverted to the sea, and, still more, when the completion of the Pacific Railroad left most of our California ships useless, then our ship-owners again sought their former share of the great traffic of the outside world, and to their amazement found their cumbrous wooden vessels and costly paddle-wheel steamers the laughing-stock of commercial nations. No wonder our ship-yards lie idle, and our shipwrights turn house-carpenters, and our sailors plough the prairie instead of the ocean.

It is a settled fact that the great ocean carrying trade of to-day can only be performed to advantage in iron screw-steamers. Can we build iron screw-steamers? No. Why not? Because by means of a tariff of nine dollars gold a ton on pig-iron we shut out all competition of foreign iron-makers, and enable Pennsylvania to disregard improved and economical processes in her iron-making, just precisely as by shutting out competition in our domestic navigation we tempted our ship-builders to lumber the sea with useless wooden hulks and gigantic wooden side-wheel steamers that are scarcely worth breaking up for junk. Iron that can be made to-day in Tennessee for not much over $20 a ton; that before the war sold for $25 a ton delivered in Boston; that in every other civilized country (not in England alone) can be, and is, produced for less than $25 a ton; that the United States always has produced, and can to-day produce, cheaper and better than it can be produced anywhere else on the face of the globe; that iron which constitutes nearly half the cost of an iron ship is made to cost the American ship-builder $36 or $37 a ton in its raw state, or forty to fifty per cent. more than there is any reason for—forty to fifty per cent. more than it costs the English ship-builder. It is scarcely necessary to say that with such an overweight competition is impossible.

But—say those who are unwilling to have the decay of our commercial marine attributed to its true cause because it points out the direction in which alone a remedy is to be sought—but even if we had not this heavy duty on iron, could we, with our high-priced labor and our high rates of interest, compete with the cheap capital and the pauper labor of Europe? It is impossible in the short space of one article to enter into a lengthy refutation of this objection. But we would ask a few questions in return: What was the rate of interest in 1855 and previous years, when we almost drove the English flag from certain parts of the ocean? It was notoriously double, if not treble, what it is now. Indeed, interest has never been so low in the history of this country as it has been for the last few years. What were wages in 1855, when our tonnage increased yearly ten per cent.? Did our ship-mechanics then work for pauper wages? It is notorious that wages were then proportionately higher than they are now, while wages in England have materially advanced since then. When—and with this question we close—when did high wages or high interest ever prevent American mechanics from successful competition with the mechanics of any other country, in any industry, from making wooden shoe-pegs to raising cotton, from building ships to making chronometers, as long as they had a fair field and an even chance?

PORTUGUESE POLITICS.

After thirteen years of comparative retirement, Marshal Saldanha is again at the head of the Portuguese Cabinet. He has reoccupied this position—probably for the last time, for he is an octogenarian—with the aid of a military pronunciamento, to which the principal cities of the country have given a speedy and decisive adhesion. This revolt, which is not the first the old general has headed, was his answer to the dissolution of the Chamber in January last, and to the great triumph of the Loulé Cabinet in the ensuing elections of March 13. King Luiz has reluctantly given his consent to the change. The dismissed Premier, who is related to his royal master by marriage, has yielded his place not without protest, but without resistance. The so-called revolution has been a bloodless one, as have been, in fact, many that preceded it in the last thirty years. The Portuguese are not a warlike people, and the political frenzy which was kindled during the period of transition from a state of most abject subjection to both royal and monkish rule to a constitutional régime almost, spent its force in the civil war between Dom Miguel and his brother, Dom Pedro, in which it had reached its culminating point (1828–34). The same struggle, in which absolutism, represented by Dom Miguel, displayed itself in so frightful colors as to remind one of the reigns of the most abominable and shameless tyrants of antiquity, gave also so definitive a victory to the party of freedom as to render another serious conflict of the same contending principles morally impossible for generations.

The victory of Saldanha is not the victory of a principle, not even of a party, but of a clique, headed and represented by a prominent politician. Nominally, it is true, this ousting of Loulé will be called a triumph of the party of Regeneration—which owes its origin to the Marshal's similar coup d'état of 1851—over the moderate wing of the Septembrists, of whom the ousted duke is the long-tried representative. But the names of the principal parties in Portugal—Septembrists, defenders of the constitution of September, 1822, an imitation of the Spanish constitution of 1812; Cartists, supporters of Dom Pedro's less radical charter of 1826; and Regenerators, who, between the two other parties, occupy a position analogous to that of the Spanish Liberal Union between Progresistas and Moderados—all outlived their meaning, even in the reign of the first constitutional ruler, Dona Maria da Gloria.

The party strifes under the present reign, like those under the preceding, that of Dom Pedro V., whether carried on chiefly in the Cortes or in the Barracks, have been little more than scrambles for positions and emoluments. Coalitions, fusions, and desertions have gradually altered the composition, and almost entirely destroyed the character, of every political organization. Saldanha himself has served all parties in turns, either as leader, as ally, or as fellow-conspirator. Far from fighting for principle, every party, when out of power, combats its opponents with the very weapons to which it succumbed; and, when again getting into power, proposes, with slight modifications, the very measures which served to discredit the rival organization. These measures are almost invariably of a financial character, for the disordered condition of its finances is the great sore of the Portuguese body politic. The need of a remedy is so great that doctoring experiments are constantly being tried; and nothing exasperates the shiftless people so much as failure. Almost all cabinets perish by failures of this kind.

On other points there is rarely a serious conflict of parties or opinions. The charter of 1826, as modified by the Additional Act of 1852, is the unassailed fundamental law of the land. All Portugal, king and clergy included, is favorably disposed towards liberal reforms. Measures of a very advanced character, like the abolition of capital punishment, are often carried almost without opposition. Complications with foreign countries are rare and transient. The press is free, and, though used with the utmost virulence by the contending camps, is left intact by each of them.

We could hardly find anything more characteristic of the political situation in Portugal, as it was nine years ago and has since endured, than the words pronounced by a member of the Chamber of Peers on the sudden overthrow of one of the strongest cabinets, in July, 1861. "The ministry which has just expired," he said, "has lived, like all other ministries in our country, a life full of trouble and devoid of glory. It has taken many an important initiative, and has left many others for more favorable occasions. It has had many sincere friends and enemies; it has suffered injuries, calumnies, and insults, which it did not deserve. It saw the good, and could not reach it; it saw the evil, and could not avoid it. For doing either the one or the other all the means of government are almost absolutely wanting among us. Such has been the life of the outgoing ministry; such will soon be the life of the ministry that comes in." A Cabinet which was formed in September, 1865, presented itself to the Cortes without a programme, which it declared to be "superfluous, for we are all agreed concerning general principles." It only expressed its intentions to lean upon the national assembly, to govern in accordance with the laws and the constitution, and to study "the questions the solutions of which the country was waiting for." Every succeeding ministry has made the same assurances, but the questions remain unsolved, and the country is still waiting for their solution. The source of the evil is in the general demoralization and impoverishment of the people, produced by centuries of decline, by the protracted war with the French—which was followed by the loss of Brazil—and still more by the horrors of Dom Miguel's usurpation.

There is generally a certain harmony perceptible in the political movements of Spain and Portugal. The movement, however, which has overthrown the Cabinet of the Duke de Loulé seems to be entirely independent of any political current in the neighboring country. Nor has the late Spanish revolution seriously affected the situation in Portugal. The Braganzas are as popular in the latter country as the Bourbons were hated in Spain. The virtues and the sad end of Dom Pedro V.—who was carried off, together with two brothers, by a pestilential disease, towards the close of 1861—have served as much to strengthen the loyalty of the Portuguese people as the shameless vices of Isabella II. loosened that of the Spaniards. The dignified conduct of King Ferdinand, the father of Pedro and Luiz, forms an equally strong contrast to that of the greedy and intriguing Christina, the Spanish Queen-mother. And it is this contrast which, years ago, created in Spain the idea of an Iberian union under the lead of the Braganzas. This idea, which still numbers many advocates in Spain, is scouted, and naturally so, by all parties in Portugal. The principal statesmen, the Cortes, the King, have all, in turns, solemnly declared against it, on the conclusive ground that a close union of the two so unequal sister countries must needs lead to the absorption of the weak Portuguese nationality by the Spanish. Nor have the Portuguese forgotten what loss of power, wealth, and freedom the violent annexation of their country by Philip II. of Spain entailed upon them. In the same spirit of wise moderation, Ferdinand, invited to rule over Spain alone, decidedly refused to accept the offered crown. Even should Spain ultimately adopt a republican form of government, its action will hardly find imitation in Portugal, for Spain is not likely to be a model republic.

REALISM IN DRAMATIC ART—OR, MR. FECHTER'S REALISM.

MR. FECHTER closed last week a series of performances which have not added to, as they have also not diminished his reputation, and by which he must have lost not a little money. He, with Miss Leclerque, a very respectable company, and all fitting appointments, failed to attract the public sufficiently to make his brief lease of the French Theatre at all profitable; and indeed it is safe to say that if his engagements would have permitted his doing so, he would have done wisely to close the theatre at the end of the first fortnight. As Boston, in its first enthusiasm of admiration, said of this distinguished actor, that "New York gave him numbers, but Boston gave him brains," it may be well to record the fact that for some time it was doubtful whether his first engagement here, at Niblo's Theatre, would not prove to be a pecuniary failure, and that it was not until, at the request of the Hon. William M. Tweed, Justice Connolly, and many scores of other "eminent citizens," he appeared in the play in which he is most famous—"Hamlet"—that his performances became remunerative. And as we were deprived of the pleasure of seeing him and Mr. Booth play Othello and Iago alternately on the same stage only because his demands were so large that it was thought more than imprudent to comply with them, his recent failure is worthy of notice other than that which it would receive as a mere piece of current theatrical news. It was, perhaps, not extravagant in an actor so distinguished, and whose performances attracted so much attention, and caused so much discussion, to suppose that he could carry a small theatre through a short season on his own shoulders; but the event has proved that although he could command attention, and cause a profound sensation, he had not so strong and deep a hold upon public favor, in New York at least, as to be both his own manager and his own bright particular star. Curiosity satisfied, his style thoroughly criticised, and his status determined, he takes the place due to an artist of singular and powerful attractions, but not that of one who holds a supreme and absolute position.

And the truth is that at Niblo's we saw all that there is to be seen in Mr. Fechter. We sounded him there from the top to the bottom of his compass; after that he had nothing new to give us, but merely what we had seen with other dressing. Ruy Blas and Hamlet include the whole range of Mr. Fechter's art. Say rather in Ruy Blas alone; for in Hamlet we had merely the style of Ruy Blas, the realistic sensational carried into the ideal and poetic field of Shakespeare's great tragedy.

"The Corsican Brothers," which was the chief attraction of his last series of performances, is suited perhaps better than any other play in his repertory to the display of his brilliant, impressive, and picturesque, yet probably simple method of acting. Its real dramatic value is very small, and as a play indeed it is almost contemptible. But as an evening's entertainment it is both amusing and interesting, although nothing more. It is a very characteristic specimen of that style of play which has been introduced since the beginning of the present century, and which, being neither comedy nor tragedy, and depending for its interest on the one side upon a representation of real life and on the other upon sensational stage-effect, has received as its specific name the very general term, drama. "The Corsican Brothers" has comic scenes and humorous personages; but it is not a comedy; its motive is serious, and two of its principal personages are slain, the second by an intended retributive justice as the catastrophe of the play; but it is not a tragedy, or even tragic. Its dramatic movement depends chiefly upon supernatural machinery, a sympathy of soul between two persons—in this case twin brothers—so subtle and so intimate that one shares the feeling, even the physical suffering, of the other, although they may be separated by hundreds of miles of land and water. It depends upon visions and upon the stopping of an old family clock in Corsica at the precise moment at which one member of that family dies in Paris. It is somewhat remarkable that a drama of which these are essential conditions and striking incidents should be received with pleasure and real interest by the Sadduceeism of the present age.

It is also an equally striking and characteristic specimen of a kind of drama which is the fruit of the personal and business arrangements of the modern theatre. It is written for one actor. Except the part of the two brothers, which is but one part, all the personages are mere ground-work and relief. They are humble satellites of this one, revolving round it meekly and unobtrusively, and casting upon it a reflected light, the sum of which is something, but which in each individual case is almost nothing. Not the slightest interest is felt in any other than the principal personage, and of that personage there is no dramatic development of character from first to last. Even as to him the interest is purely incidental, depending upon what he does and suffers, not upon what he is. His actions, not his mental or his moral experience, command our attention and enlist our sympathies; and these acts might, except for the material conditions of the drama, be almost as well of one kind as of another. There is not a speech uttered, not a course of action taken, not a trait of character revealed from the rise to the fall of the curtain that demands a moment's consideration as to its significance, or that will repay or even bear a moment's reflection. All is as plain as the multiplication table, in which twice two is four simply because it is so. There is no room for doubt, no occasion for discussion as to the meaning of any passage, no question as to the motive of any personage at any moment. Given the situations, we know what the people in them must do; we almost know the very words they will speak. With the plot blocked out for him, almost any clever man of letters could write the play, and would almost inevitably write it just as it is written, unless, indeed, he were a born dramatist. Our attention is kept constantly awake, but—to put the case strongly, though not extravagantly—our interest would be the same in kind, although not in degree, if the personages were represented by puppets. And notwithstanding that the main-spring and motive of the drama is the subtle sympathy of soul between the twin brothers, its real character is gross, material, fleshly, almost brutal. A libertine's trick to betray a chaste woman; the foiling of his plans by Louis dei Franchi, who loves the woman, and who places himself bodily between her and her betrayer; a duel in which Louis is killed, and at the end of which we see him dying, while his antagonist wipes his sword upon his handkerchief; a scene of defiance by the twin-brother Fabian; another duel, bloody, merciless, and brutal, in which the combatants, after their swords are broken, turn the points into daggers by twisting handkerchiefs into hilts for their broken ends, and hack at each other for a while, like two gladiators—these are the chief elements of the success of this one of the most successful of modern sensational dramas. It is as successful in the Bowery as it is in the Fifth Avenue, as it was at the Théâtre Historique; it would have been successful in the Colosseum in the worst days of the Empire.

And yet this gross, tricky, sensational drama, which, compared with real dramatic work, is as the daubing of a savage compared with the significant composition, fine drawing, and life-like color of an accomplished and gifted painter, affords an actor of Mr. Fechter's well-deserved eminence an opportunity of displaying all his skill in that department, or rather that style, of his art of which he is so complete a master. We are all interested in the demolition of the libertine Château-Renaud's plan for the ruin of Madame de Lesparre's reputation, and would be so, no matter what the style of her defender. But Mr. Fechter shows us here, with fine perception and admirable art, the manner of a man of character and urbanity, a man of a strong and earnest nature, an honest man, a man of the world, a devoted and impassioned but self-restrained lover, a perfect gentleman. His deference and tenderness to the woman he loves, his quiet but immovable defiance of the scamp who, relying on his audacity, his adroitness, his unscrupulousness, and his mastery of the sword, has undertaken to compromise her, command the homage of every spectator, enlist all sympathies. There is not a man in the audience who does not wish that he might so defend his mistress; not a woman who does not wish too that she might be so defended. And in the hall of the old castle, where he plays the courteous and hospitable host, and the tender loving son of a noble mother, he again carries with him the sympathy and approbation of every spectator. There is not a man there who does not long for the art of so putting a guest at his ease, not a mother who does not think how happy the woman must be who receives such filial attention. And in this scene Mr. Fechter shows, with even unusual impressiveness, the power he possesses of bearing himself simply, naturally, and with an apparent absolute unconsciousness of self. He seems absolutely absorbed for the moment in his every act to do nothing for the effect it will produce; effect being all the while the object of his every movement. The very way in which, as he talks, he rolls his cigarettes and lights them one after the other, lingering now a moment before the ample fire-place, then putting his foot on a chair as he chats with his guest, being never afraid to turn his back to the audience, to whom he never plays, and whose very existence seems unknown to him, is charming, and is a part of this man's consummate art, the result of his ability to give his whole mind to the scene before him, even in its minutest detail, as if he were really living the life of the man whose character he has assumed. In this reality of the impression he produces upon his audience, Mr. Fechter is without an equal on our stage, almost without a rival.

And yet this art is an inferior not to say a low art; being so simply because of the reality of the impression it produces. It is like real life. It is real life. Could we unroof the castle hall of a real Fabian dei Franchi, and see him there with his guest and his mother, gossiping while supper was expected, sitting at table after it was spread, staying his own repast, and smoking a cigarette as he told a tale to amuse his guest, we should see exactly what Mr. Fechter showed us—that is, if our Fabian dei Franchi were a perfectly simple, frank, and well-bred man. Mr. Fechter's art here attains the difficult end of presenting us with the reality of life. His art is inferior because it does no more. It suggests nothing. It is like a swan that swims without a shadow; it is not the poetry of art. True, such scenes as these do not admit a higher style of treatment, and the actor is therefore free of all censure for shortcoming; but the point to be observed and kept in mind is that such acting is not great because it is natural and finished; that art on the stage, as well as in its other departments, may be perfect but not high.

Mr. Fechter is a good lover, he also is a good hater. When he meets the slayer of his brother, the fell purpose which has brought him post-haste from Corsica to Paris appears in every line of his face, in every movement of his body, in every tone of his voice. You see that he means to kill that man—that he means to do it then and there, and that he is conscious that he will do it. That is the whole aim and object of his life. And when he fights, it is with a cool and pitiless bloodthirstiness which might be called savage, but that the savage is inferior in this respect, as in all others, to the civilized man when the latter gives himself up to an absorbing passion which is decided and controlled, but not subdued, by his trained and cultivated intellect. Yet such scenes as that which closes the action of "The Corsican Brothers" are barbarous and degrading. That a theatre full of people should sit absorbed in the spectacle of two men seeking with cool desperation, and all the skill of which long practice can make them masters, to run each other through the hearts is pitiful and deplorable, though one of the men be a villain and this time justice is triumphant. And that such a scene as this should be not only the inevitable end of the action of the drama, as for instance the combat between Richard and Richmond is, or that between Macbeth and Macduff (with which, however, this fight has nothing in common except that it is a fight), but that it should be the chief object and purpose of a play which is one of the most popular and successful of the period is a fact of very considerable significance in evidence of the deterioration of taste in the audiences of our day.

We repeat the expression of our admiration of Mr. Fechter's vivid, picturesque, and impressive style of acting, and again hold it up as an example to other actors of that which almost every other actor on our stage (comparing him of course only with the more eminent) so greatly needs—the result of the study and imitation of real life; yet we cannot yet accept him as an artist of the highest class, but only as first in the second rank of the realistic French school which now controls the stage.

FRANCE.

PARIS, May 20, 1870.

THERE is, in France, but one word by which to describe the condition in which the country has been placed by the plébiscite and its consequences—and that word is "gâchis." Men of all opinions agree in saying: "Nous sommes dans le gâchis jusqu'au cou." The real translation of the word is, "mess." And it is true; France is "in a mess up to her neck." Every fault that has been committed, every evil that has been brought on, it was so easy to avoid, nay, it was so *un*easy to perpetrate. It was simply necessary to walk straight, to do that which came naturally to hand: it was, namely, simply necessary to dissolve the Chamber, and set to work at electoral reform.

This was the obvious measure to adopt at once—a week after the formation of the ministry; this was the one step to take, the one object for which the ministry was formed, and for not having understood this all the mischief we have witnessed since has been occasioned. When, on the second of January, the men of the left centre were joined to the Imperialist liberals of the Ollivier stamp, every one knew that a vigorous initiative must be taken by some one or that nothing whatever was gained. M. Daru would have taken it, but was over-persuaded to "wait," and be "conciliatory." He did so, and persuaded M. Buffet to do so too, and at that moment everything was lost. Had, in the very beginning, the four liberals of the left—Messrs. Daru, Buffet, de Talhouët, and Louvet—stood firm and insisted on the electoral reforms, there would have been no possibility for Émile Ollivier to resist them (it was too early in the day to do so), and there would never have come the notion of a plébiscite. By allowing time to be wasted they lost everything, and when once they perceived it the opportunity was for ever gone.

The new ministers are universally regarded as provisional, and are of no weight, of no importance whatever, either personally or politically. M. Mége, the new Minister of Public Instruction, is the mayor of the town of Clermont: an Auvergnat, a countryman and creature of M. Rouher's, it is M. Rouher who has placed him in his present position. He is a thoroughly fifth or sixth-rate personage, only signifying something by the fact of M. Rouher's protection. M. Plichon, the new Minister of Public Works, is a man of average industrial capacity, deputy for one of the northern towns, strongly clerical, and narrow-minded. As to the Duc de Gramont, his nomination has two or three different causes. 1st. His inferiority of both talent and character. 2d. His readiness to side with all shades of parties (who will accept him). 3d. The absolute unimportance of the Foreign Office just now. M. de Gramont's notorious inferiority of talent pleases Émile Ollivier, who longed for the post of Foreign Minister but could not obtain it of the Emperor (or Empress), and M. de Gramont's inferiority pleases the court, to whom he will be utterly subservient. Amongst really respectable people in this country M. de Gramont is not regarded with favor on account of the strangely ungrateful part played by himself and his family to the Bourbons of the elder branch, who are said to have for years contributed to the comforts of the house of Gramont. However, it is certain that there is so very little to do now in the foreign affairs of Europe that the individuality of the man at the head of the Foreign Office matters relatively little.

A slight attempt at reaction against this notion is being made by the official press, and some fussy people are getting alarmed at an article in the Constitutionnel, which tries to blow the war trumpet and look threatening; but all this comes in reality to nothing at all. War is impossible; no one in France would consent to it, and those who know the minds of the men in the barracks of Paris affirm that the cause of their 34,000 adverse votes lies simply in the fact that they will no longer agree to the idea of being "food for cannon," and that they repudiate the notion of thousands of human creatures being drawn up in battalions to exterminate thousands of others whom they do not know, and against whom they have no grievance.

Just now, the society of Paris is occupied with more peaceable considerations; there are five fauteuils vacant at the Académie Française, and M. Villemain, the Perpetual Secretary, is dead. One must be born French, or have lived so long in France as to have become French, in order to comprehend thoroughly the importance attached by the educated society of Paris to everything connected with the French Academy. Strangers scarcely ever take in what the Academy really is: "L'Académie Française est le dernier salon de l'Europe," used to say Villemain, who had been its representative for forty years. When Cardinal de Richelieu founded the French Academy, it was not with the intention of making of it a literary assembly—it was to promote the taste for letters in the wealthy and high-born, and to help to polish and refine the manners of students and purely literary men. There are many other associations where talent only is the requisite, but the Academy was meant especially and exclusively to bring together in constant contact the élite of cultivated society. It was intended that the greatest duke in the land should be proud of having done something which connected him with the progress of thought in France.

> "I twine
> My hopes of being remembered in my line
> With my land's language," says Byron in "Childe Harold": and so it has been for two hundred years with the Montmorencys, Noailles, Broglies, and all illustrious names in this country. Whatever else they may have done, they aspire to have merited also, by some written page, the honor of counting amongst the "enlightened few"; and, on the other hand, however high may be the mere literary achievements of a poet, or historian, or publicist, it is meant that he shall, by his manners and politeness and refinement, make himself socially the equal of the noblest born in the whole land.

This it is which foreigners appear so rarely to understand, and which makes them commit so many mistakes in their estimate of French civilization. In reality there has twice, within three hundred years, been an equalizing medium in France—once intellectual, and the second time military. The equalization by intellect was first imagined by Richelieu when he founded the French Academy, and was most actively practised under Louis XIV., when Colbert, the son of a clothier, rose to power, and married his three daughters to the three greatest dukes in France, who held themselves honored by the alliance. Afterward, the might of all parties diminished. Royalty was weakened, lost respect, and grew despotic in form only; the noblesse came to despise political activity, and to adhere to small social vanities alone, and, the levels being lowered, no one aspired to raise himself, but merely to pull others down.

After the great Revolution came the Empire, and the principle of equalization by military glory. This had its time, but was never either so powerful or so lasting as the equalization by intellect. The glories of the First Empire have passed away, and are now matter for both mockery and odium on the part of the rising generation, whose tendencies are wholly peaceful and industrial; the glories of the Second Empire are looked upon as a pale imitation of those of half a century ago, and excite no feeling save that of reproval (besides which, they have ended unluckily); but the names which intellect and political might illustrated remain honored still, and the principle of equalization by intellect is still living and strong in this country. "Our last aristocracy should be the Forty of the Academy," used to say Villemain, the authority above quoted, than whom no one knew his countrymen or his Academy better. Villemain was in truth the very incarnation of the intellectual genius of France, and his loss is felt more severely than I can hope to make you comprehend.

To show to a stranger the real significance of the Academy, perhaps the best example is Émile Ollivier. No sooner had he succeeded in obtaining what was then hoped to be the dawn of freedom in France, and no sooner had he achieved that general fusion of parties which followed on the formation of the Daru junction with the Imperialist liberals, than such Academicians as Messrs. Thiers, Guizot, Villemain, Mignet, etc., thought instantly of the supreme consecration of the spontaneous election to a fauteuil at the Academy. Poor Montalembert, who did not know that he was within a few days of his death, dictated a letter to Ollivier, saying that it was a duty on the part of the Academy to elect him, and that he, Montalembert, would have himself carried to the Institute to give his vote. His death followed his letter, and Ollivier's election was ensured.

When, by the plébiscite (and by so many other faults), he disappointed all the serious thinkers of the nation, Ollivier's election was settled; promises had been given—given to the dead—and there was no means of receding. Had it not been for this, Émile Ollivier would never have seated himself in Lamartine's fauteuil, and almost every man who voted for him openly deplores having done so now. Five chairs remain to be filled; but the elections only being fixed for next winter, many a political influence may be modified between then.

Correspondence.

MR. HENRY JAMES ON MARRIAGE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: It is no doubt true that there is on every hand a widespread criticism of marriage as at present administered, since very many persons regard it as far too loosely administered, and very many others as far too strictly administered. Now, I side with neither party to this controversy, my whole purpose being to show that marriage has become the hotbed of fraud, adultery, and cruelty, which in such innumerable cases it actually is, and the parent consequently of our existing lasciviousness and prostitution, only by its being so persistently administered, not primarily in the interest of its own purity, but in that of our established civic order. Nothing can be more logical in this state of things than that you should deny either my premises or my conclusion, or the concatenation I allege between them. But, instead of doing any of these legitimate things, you confine yourself to hinting a dread lest I turn out the virtual accomplice of certain nameless persons who have not the honor of marriage at heart. I know nothing of any such persons, and prefer to be judged upon my own merits. I conceive that the only practical dishonor which befalls marriage arises from its not being freely honored, or honored exclusively for its own sake. You, on the contrary, hold it to be properly honored when it is enforced by some external sanction, as the regulation of men's passions, and the consequent advantage of our existing civic order. This is a lawful disagreement. But I confess that it strikes me as decidedly comical to find you entertaining hereupon so lively a concern on my account, as being especially liable to the reproach of dishonoring marriage.

So much in self-defence. Let me now glance at your own attitude towards "Society and Marriage." Your doctrine, not too clearly enunciated by the way, is, apparently, that marriage exists primarily for the regulation of the sexual appetite, and, subordinately thereto, for the interests of civic order. The sexual passion is, in your opinion, the most "untamable" of all the passions, and marriage is a social invention for taming it. Then, again, society is impotent to provide for the children which are born to it, and hence devolves that providence upon parents exclusively, who are constituted such by marriage. In a word, you hold marriage to be necessitated, first, by the imperfection of human nature, and, secondly, by the imperfection of human society. Man is, by the necessity of his nature, incompetent to himself, incompetent to the regulation of his destiny. And society, by the necessity of its nature, is incompetent to itself, incompetent to provide for its own subsistence. Thus there is somehow a very important screw loose in man, whether we regard him either as naturally or as historically posited; and marriage is the sovereign winch designed for tightening it. It empowers man to govern himself, and it empowers society thereby to subsist and persist.

You say that I am right up to a certain point, and I indeed agree with you to a certain point. I agree with you that marriage has always had this provisional character, or conventional subserviency to something beyond itself. But I differ from you in maintaining that this subserviency is noway essential to the institution, and ought to be disowned as fast as possible, if marriage is ever to bring forth its proper fruits, or avouch itself for what it truly is, the controlling law of the sexual relations. In other words, while I do cordial justice to the utilitarian theory of marriage, and willingly admit the benefit derived from it to our imperfect civilization, I, at the same time, see it to be no longer congruous with the dignity of the institution. I insist, in fact, that this utilitarian view of the institution is "played out," as the newspapers say, and that we must either come to regard marriage as a finality—i.e., as existing solely in its own right—or else expect the hideous carnival of crime in which, so far as the sexual relations are concerned, we are now festering, to prolong itself eternally. In short, I deny what you affirm, namely, that the passions of men are disorderly in themselves, and require therefore to be regulated from without. And I affirm what you deny, namely, that all the disorder which we habitually charge upon the passions is due not to the passions themselves, but solely to the coercion or constraint put upon them by the exigencies of our ungodly and inhuman civilization.

But now observe: when I say "passions," I mean passions, the normal passions of human nature, such, inter alia, as love, friendship, familism, ambition, and not any supposititious thing it may suit a reasoner in distress to foist into their place. Any of these normal and honest passions of our nature may be forced, of course, into treacherous and revolting action —how? By being denied free play, or driven to seek their legitimate satisfaction in clandestine ways. But plainly this is not the normal or spontaneous activity of the passions; it is an altogether perverse or diseased activity, forced upon them from without; so that you are not a whit more entitled to affiliate the murder, the adultery, or the theft I commit, to my passions, than you are to affiliate my small-pox, my strabismus or club-foot to my morals. The relation that my passions are under to the crime I commit is at most one of maternity; and notoriously the mother does not individualize the child, that is, give it soul or specific form, but simply identifies it, that is, gives it body or generic substance. No, we must concede that the paternity of all our existing crime refers itself straitly to our infirm and vicious civilization, that is, to a condition of human life in which its masculine, public, or universal element is paramount and not subordinate to its feminine, private, or individual element. And it is simply idle, therefore, to expect crime to cease until the advent of a true society upon earth, or a condition of human life which shall at last convert this world of strife into a peaceful home, by making the homo (or men's material interests) no longer primary but secondary to the vir (or their spiritual interests). No doubt that, in order to account for physical disease among men, you have got to postulate the existence of such a radically false relation between universal man and nature as fitly announces itself in all manner of sharp and loathsome disease, and by that tormenting goad lashes us on to demand and seek a change of relation. In like manner, to account for moral disorder among men, you have got to postulate such a radically vicious relation between the individual man and society as fitly announces itself only in his profoundest personal desecration and infamy, and so stings him at last, in pure self-defence, into insisting—peaceably if he can, forcibly if he must—upon revolutionizing the situation. But, pray, tell me, what does all this prove? Surely not that disease or disorder is the normal state of man, whether you regard him on his physical or on his moral side; but rather that it is an abnormal state, occasioned by the dense ignorance and inexperience he is under of the essentially commanding relation he sustains, by right of his divine origin, both to nature and to society, and contingent, therefore, for its duration only upon the duration of such ignorance and inexperience. In a word, the true inference in question is, that disease or disorder is noway incidental to man's nature and history, but simply accidental; and, if this be so, then, of course, your conception of marriage as being designed primarily for the rectification of the passions, and, subordinarily thereto, for the maintenance of our existing civic order, falls to the ground, and with it the very ingenious but very fallacious reasoning you have built upon it.

In fact, the ingenious change you seek to put upon the marriage controversy is only ingenious, and has no other merit. It cannot be tolerated in point of fact for a moment, either from your own point of view, which is strictly utilitarian, and discards all final causes, or from that of abstract justice. The implication throughout your article is that society is endowed with the spiritual responsibility of its subject, or has in view his strictly individual well-being. Explicitly, to be sure, you do not say as much, because this evidently would be to handle the question theologically and not scientifically, and you have no desire to identify yourself with the theologian, but only with the political economist. Implicitly, however, you do little else, since you make the primary object of society in ordaining marriage to be the saving of man from moral ruin, and, only subordinately to this, its own preservation. And "to save man from moral ruin" is precisely what the theologian alleges as the sole scope of God's providence in organizing our religious, our civil, and our social experience; so that you are so far forth an unexceptionable theologian. But, in this case, what becomes of your political economy, which repudiates final causes, or, what is the same thing, universalizes our individuality, and so makes all social phenomena strictly empirical, in fact a strictly necessary evolution of experience? Society, according to the political economist, means man universal, the unconscious man, or homo; and does not mean man individual, the conscious man, or vir, which plainly it would be required to do, if, as you say, it undertakes to provide for the individual dignity of its subject or harmonize by marriage his active and passive nature. In short, society, from the point of view of political economy, and a most important point of view it is, is a purely material phenomenon with a purely material destiny: so that any attempt on its part to spiritualize itself, or constitute itself individually, would be fatal to its existence.

But, adjust yourself as you may to the exigencies of your own position, let me say, in conclusion, that the moral purpose you assign to society in instituting marriage is both directly and indirectly disallowed by the obvious logic of the case. For if society has a moral consciousness or identifies itself in any degree whatever with individual in contradistinction to universal ends, then palpably it is no longer society, inasmuch as it denies its own unity and so ceases to exist. What makes the distinction between an organic society and an inorganic herd or mob of men is that the former coheres wholly from within, the latter wholly from without; thus that the consciousness of the one is essentially unitary or harmonic with itself, of the other essentially divided or conflicting. But your position is indirectly met as well by the obvious consideration that society does not institute marriage, but, on the contrary, is instituted by it. Society does not base the family unity, but is based upon it, and notoriously the sole bond of the family unity is marriage, monogamical or polygamical. Society, scientifically viewed, is at first the promising flower, and finally the ripe, succulent fruit, of which the family is the coarse, obdurate husk, and marriage the invisible seed. To make marriage accordingly date from society and not society from marriage is virtually to make the flower and fruit of the plant precede the stalk, and the stalk itself grow, not from the seed, but from the indiscriminate earth.

I remain, Mr. Editor, yours very truly,

HENRY JAMES.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., May 28, 1870.

P.S.—I do not stop, mind you, because I have even half said my say, but because I have already exceeded the limits of your ordinary indulgence to correspondents.

[Mr. James not having said half what he has to say, we shall not say even a quarter of what we have to say in reply to him. We have denied his premises—namely, that marriage as at present administered is the cause of "the hideous carnival of crime" from which society is suffering—as plainly as possible. We said nothing about final causes, because we know nothing about them, and—with the greatest respect for him—neither does he. He can no more tell why McFarland and his wife led such a shocking life for nine years, or why all marriages are not happy, than we can. If he could, he would have the secret of the universe, and there would be a rush to Cambridge from all parts of the globe. Moreover, though treating marriage from the utilitarian point of view—or the politico-economical point of view, if he prefers it—we were not thereby debarred from saying anything about the moral ends of marriage. A man is morally ruined, in the eyes of the economist, when he runs about whoremongering, instead of working at his calling and supporting his wife and children; he is morally ruined, in the eyes of the theologian, when he disobey's God's law. But there is nothing necessarily incompatible in the two views.

We believe, as Mr. James does, that "there is a screw loose in man;" but we never said that marriage was "the sovereign winch designed for tightening it." Marriage is simply, like education and other things, one of the means of reducing the amount of damage done by it. As Mr. James truly remarks, "it is simply idle to expect crime to cease until the advent of a perfect society on earth;" in the meantime, however, it would be very foolish, he will admit, to dismiss the police, demolish the schools and jails, and shut up the courts. Now, let us get down to the bottom of this discussion. There are four things society can do about the sexual relation:

1. It can either cover it with the marriage contract, as it now does, and render this contract indissoluble, except for causes prescribed beforehand and by the judgment of a legal tribunal.

2. Or it can make the contract dissoluble at the discretion of the parties, on proper notice, attaching to it, however, certain consequences as regards property and children.

3. Or it may refuse altogether to legislate with regard to the sexual relation, and leave men and women to pair under the influence of passion or fancy, or whatever one pleases to call it, as the lower animals do.

4. Or it may impose marriage on its members as a status, and mate men and women by legal machinery created for the purpose, or, if it finds that couples do not suit each other, separate them and mate them up in fresh parcels.

Now, Mr. James must desire one or other of these four arrangements, and we should like to know from which of them he expects "that perfect state of society" to which he looks forward to flow. Which of them is it that is to put an end to the adulteries, incests, fornications, and murders which now afflict "our ungodly and inhuman civilization?" Under No. 3, adultery and incest will be clearly impossible, just as much as in a herd of cattle; but what about rape and murder? As regards the results to be expected from the others, we need say nothing. Everybody knows them, or can picture them to himself.

We have not accused Mr. James of "dishonoring marriage," but of supplying loaded shells and other highly explosive compounds, which should never leave his philosophical laboratory, to the band of light-headed magicians who are now going about the country trying to persuade people that they can make marriages happy, and divide child-bearing equally between the sexes, by a show of hands and a judicious distribution of tracts, and who, if left to themselves, would have nothing more dangerous with which to draw the crowd than damp crackers and torpedoes. We are not at all sure, however, since receiving his letter, whether he ought not more properly to be accused of confusion, that is, of including two totally distinct things under one term. We suspect the real cause of this controversy is his meaning spiritual marriage when talking of legal marriage. Legal marriage, to be sure, is, or ought to be, but the outward and visible sign of spiritual marriage, but then with the latter the state has, and can have, nothing to do, beyond leaving men and women their liberty of choice. People will not make love before a commissioner of deeds, and the Patent Office may be searched in vain for a suggestion as to the best means of promoting the union of souls. But we may rest assured that, during this geological period at least, the union of souls will have to be based upon, or grow out of, the marriage contract, and will be oftenest found where the marriage contract is most sacred and most permanent. Happy are they to whose lot it falls to know it. They live in a region where the people's writs do not run, where the legislature never meets, and the dismal ding-dong of the reformer's bell is never heard; where the roses are always in bloom and the skies always bright, "the shining table-land, to which our God himself is moon and sun."—Ed. Nation.]

THE STATE TREASURER OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: My attention has been called to an article in the New York Independent in reference to our State Treasurer, Niles G. Parker. He is spoken of as having restored this State to solvency, and obtained for himself the respect of all business men both in this country and in Europe. I enlisted this Parker in the First Massachusetts Cavalry Regiment, at Haverhill, Mass., where he had been the unsuccessful proprietor of a restaurant and bar. After he left the army he commenced business in Charleston, where he failed, and is now restoring himself to solvency by compromising with his creditors for about twenty-five cents on a dollar. Since 1865, I have held a claim against him for several hundred dollars, which my attorney has settled recently for thirty cents on the dollar.

It is my opinion that the amount expended by Mr. Parker for diamonds since he has been State Treasurer would more than pay all his debts in full.

It is well-known that there were many members of the Constitutional Convention and of the General Assembly who had been drilled so that they could barely write their names, and yet could hardly write a word in the English language.

I cut the enclosed from the Beaufort Republican. There were no members of the General Assembly in times past who could neither read nor write. This State was represented in the Assembly by men of the highest culture and of ample means. I am and always have been a thorough Republican, but am opposed to being any longer misrepresented by incompetent, corrupt men. Very respectfully,

J. W. Collins, Post-office Box 33.

Beaufort, S. C., May 29, 1870.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINES AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: So far as my article on "French and English Illustrated Magazines" touches the subject of wood-engraving, "Wood-Engraver" is entitled to attention. Objecting to my phrase concerning his art—"discovered at nearly the same time as printing"—he says: "Wood-cutting was discovered ages before printing, and wood-engraving not till two centuries after."

My critic seems to be ignorant of the fact that the oldest impression, the first historic proof of wood-engraving, the date of which is not contested, was taken in 1423. This old proof ("Saint Christopher") is the historic fact that determines the time of the discovery of wood-engraving. The propriety and truth of the phrase—"discovered at nearly the same time as printing"—and the error of my critic, are manifest in the light of this fact. And if upon the first question of fact, about his own art, "Wood-Engraver" betrays ignorance of the oldest example of wood-engraving, while he has the hardihood to locate the birth of his art two centuries later than the time of the first historic example of it, you will justly appraise his objections to my personal impressions as of about the same value as his knowledge of the date and origin of his art. It is not my purpose to reply to his impertinent reflections upon my understanding and expression of the relative worth of book illustrators; nor do I intend to correct my classification of names to suit his conclusions. But enough. I have no claim to use your space save to determine a matter of fact. With your permission, I will dismiss the subject, for the reason that the staccato of statements and questions with which "Wood-Engraver" seeks to break and degrade my conclusions in regard to "French and English Illustrated Magazines" is designed to be personally offensive. The discourtesy of much of the language of "Wood-Engraver" is not likely to make me overlook the fact that my critic is a wounded partisan of outraged vanity. I do not admit the conclusions and reflections of an interested "Wood-Engraver," for the reason that they have no value in my judgment. To say the least, his characterization of Morin as a third or fourth-rate draughtsman—an artist "on the block" who has a host of imitators in Paris—and his shameless impeachment of my personal impressions of Holbein's "line," and the "atmosphere" which I maintain is rendered by Pisan, are not calculated to command my respect. Yours truly,

Eugene Benson.

New Haven, Conn., June 2, 1870.

[As there appears to be a prospect of warm work in case this controversy is continued, we must decline to give further space to it.—Ed. Nation.]

A LUTHER MONUMENT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: From the accompanying you will please see that it is proposed to erect a monument to Martin Luther, the founder of Protestantism, at the place of his birth, Eisleben.

The Committee, composed of the most respectable men, mean to give it a universal character, and, therefore, feel at liberty to solicit contributions from Protestants of all countries and nationalities. Perhaps among the readers of your journal there may be some who would not spurn the opportunity offered by this Consulate-General to participate in the demonstration by offering a contribution, which will be forwarded and duly accounted for. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHANNES RÖSING, Consul-General.

NEW YORK, June 3, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE present rank of Williams College among similar institutions demands imperatively, we are informed by circular, "a periodical which shall be an adequate exponent of her interests, and shall secure her a fit representation among college exchanges." Accordingly, the senior and junior classes are about to undertake the publication of the Williams Review, a monthly paper of sixteen pages, quarto, we presume, at two dollars per annum. Most of the College faculty have promised to contribute, as have also Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. Joshua Leavitt, Rev. W. R. Alger, Wm. Cullen Bryant, John Bigelow, J. T. Headley, and others.——Steiger's Literarischer Monatsbericht entered last month upon its second volume (counting twelve to the volume). It contains as usual a large amount of interesting reading, one of its articles being upon Mr. Friedrich Kapp, who is worthy of several, and who was lately one of the best illustrations that could be desired for the writer of the prize essay announced by Mr. Steiger in this number: "Historical Sketch of the Intellectual Vigor and Progress of the German Population in North America." The fortunate competitor is to win eight hundred dollars. He must be particular to exhibit the influence of the German-American press on the development of American institutions.——Messrs. Pott & Amery have in press "Letters from Rome on the Council," by "Quirinus," an authorized translation from the Allgemeine Zeitung. The present volume is the first of the series, contains twelve letters, and narrates the preliminary history of the Council. It will be a book worth owning and reading. Also: "Letters of Spiritual Counsel and Guidance," by the late John Keble, uniform with the "Memoir" of him; "A Lost Piece of Silver," by the author of "Edith Vernon's Life Work;" and "A New Commentary of the New Testament," according to the authorized version, by various authors, Rev. W. W. How being the editor.——A new edition of the "Modern British Essayists" is to be issued by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., at the rate of one volume per week, beginning with Carlyle's "Miscellanies." The same house announces "Lessons for Children," in English and French, after Mrs. Barbauld's method; and "Breezie Langton," a novel by Hawley Smart; together with Mr. Disraeli's novels, in a cheap and uniform style.——Mr. G. W. Carleton announces "Rambles in Cuba," by an American Lady.——Among works in preparation by Messrs. Lippincott & Co. are "A Reply to John Stuart Mill on the Subjection of Women," the author's name not being given; volume four of the "Ancient Classics for English Readers," which is Mr. Anthony Trollope's "Cæsar;" "Bound Down; or, Life and its Possibilities," a novel by Anna M. Fitch; and "Rougegorge, and other Short Stories," reprinted from Lippincott's Magazine.——Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. have in press a work of general interest: "The Laws of the Domestic Relations: Embracing Husband and Wife, Guardian and Ward, Parent and Child, Infancy, and Master and Servant," by James Schouler.——Messrs. Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co., one of the largest and most respected school-book publishing houses in the country, have just removed their offices and salesrooms to Nos. 138, 140 Grand Street, about as far to the east of Broadway as the Messrs. Appleton, on the same line, are to the west. Their manufactory still remains in Greene Street.

—We have received through the American Publishing Company, of Hartford, a letter addressed to the Nation by a Pennsylvania "Country Editor," taking exception to our recent remarks upon the business of publishing books by subscription. The letter is too long for us to print at this time, even if we left out the charges of "ill-natured statements" and "unkind flings and sneers," and of conspiracy with the trade to injure the subscription business. But it also does little else than deny without proofs what we asserted, or allege that the regular trade sins in the same way with its subscription rivals. "A Country Editor" is not well informed when he says that the Hartford edition of Baker's "Abyssinia" (an exceptional specimen of subscription manufacture) is cheaper at $3 50 than Lippincott's at $5, or quite fair when he omits to state the reason of the difference in price. And in taking no notice of the statement we felt at liberty to adopt on good authority—that perhaps half of the subscription books forced into circulation are old ones vamped over—he does not prepare us to believe him when he says that a less proportion of these than of the issues of the trade are worthless. We do not mind admitting that we could name several "regular" publishers whose productions are uniformly trashy or worse than trashy, and which might be destroyed as issued with real benefit to the human intellect. We are not defending the shortcomings of the trade, and if it were wholly bent on money-making, as we are almost persuaded the subscription companies are, there would be little to choose between them except as to their modes of soliciting custom. Nor did we undertake to estimate the damage inflicted by the latter upon the former. We only referred the curious to the Booksellers' Guide. "A Country Editor" says that he lives in a county of 70,000 inhabitants with only three bookstores, none of which is confined to this line of business, but which, making school-books their staple, "eke out an existence with drugs, wall-paper, stationery, and newspapers." He says truly that they cannot afford to advertise their new books, nor order a full assortment on a venture; and that country people will not buy a book they cannot first examine. For this state of things, however, he thinks the subscription agents afford a remedy, and here we disagree with him. We see, rather, an opening for the book-pedlar, whether as an independent dealer or in the employ of the local bookseller. Perhaps a living could hardly be got by this means now; yet we are not sure that with proper system and support the pedlar could not drive the agent from the field in which he is now a nuisance and a bore.

—While writing these lines a correspondent sends us the following latest specimen of the kind of book most favored by subscription publishers, and of the way in which they cultivate literary taste and discernment among the people of the rural districts. It emanates from a Massachusetts house; and we commend it to "A Country Editor" as a complete justification of our general remarks, and in particular of what we had to say about the printing and binding of subscription books:

"AGENTS WANTED—$100 to $200 per month—Clergymen, School-Teachers, Smart Young Men and Ladies wanted to Canvass for the New Book,

'OUR FATHER'S HOUSE; OR, THE UNWRITTEN WORD.'

By DANIEL MARCH, the popular author of 'Night Scenes.' This master in thought and language shows us untold riches and beauties in the Great House, with its Blooming flowers, Singing birds, Waving palms, Rolling clouds, Beautiful bow, Sacred mountains, Delightful rivers, Mighty oceans, Thundering voices, Blazing heavens, and vast universe with countless beings in millions of worlds, and reads to us in each the Unwritten Word. Rose-tinted paper, ornate engravings, and superb binding. Send for circular, in which is a full description and universal commendations by the press, ministers, and college professors, in the strongest possible language.'

—American scholars, and especially those who are interested in the progress of philology, will be glad to learn that a well-merited compliment has lately been bestowed on Professor W. D. Whitney, of Yale College, the Corresponding Secretary of the American Oriental Society. On the 16th of May last, the Royal Academy of Sciences, in Berlin, decided, at the instance of a special committee, to bestow a Bopp prize of three hundred thalers on Professor Whitney for his excellent publication of the "Taittiriya Pratiçakhya." This work, which included the original Sanskrit text, with a translation and notes, appeared in the ninth volume of the "American Oriental Society's Journal" (where it occupies 241 pages), published at New Haven in 1869. The Bopp fund, if we are rightly informed, yields a certain income to be bestowed in prizes for meritorious publications in the department of comparative philology. Nothing is offered in competition for this honor, but the Academy of Sciences decrees the prize for such work as it regards as the most deserving. The prize conferred on Professor Whitney is the only one which has been given for Sanskrit work during the three years which have passed since the fund was instituted. Simultaneously with the prize to Professor Whitney, the Academy decreed a second prize (one hundred and fifty thalers) to Dr. W. Thomsen, of Copenhagen, for a work on the influence of the German language upon the Finnish-Lapp.

—"The curse of twin capitals" has just been agitating the people of Connecticut. An amendment to the State constitution, providing that hereafter Hartford shall be the sole seat of government, was adopted by a majority of the House last year, but, having failed to be ratified by two-thirds of the present House, the submission of it to the people has been defeated. The Courant (May 21, 28) has published two interesting articles on the history of the two capitals, from which the precedence of Hartford over New Haven appears very plain, the former colony being the original "Connecticut," with which the latter afterwards became incorporated. It was in October, 1701, that the General Assembly first sat, for that portion of the term, in New Haven—a change enacted, according to the writer in the Courant, with reference to the then feeble health of Governor Winthrop and his deputy, for whom the journey to Hartford was too tedious, but without whom the Assembly could not be held. The disadvantage of removing the public records to and fro between the two capitals was soon felt, and in 1712 New Haven was thrown out. The next year, however, sectional feeling was strong enough to reverse this order of the General Court, and when, in 1717, the question of a new State House arose, it was complicated with that of the settlement of the "Collegiate School," now Yale College, which had deserted Saybrook for Wethersfield. Hartford has already made a bid for the school, and would have got it of the Assembly but for the petition for delay of the so-called "sea-side" trustees, who were in the majority and who presently voted in favor of New Haven. Instead of refusing to ratify this selection, the Assembly accepted a compromise, giving the State House to Hartford in exchange for the college. While the building was going up, however, the October court continued to be held at New Haven, and the "sea-side" agreement went unfulfilled till 1818, when a constitution was substituted for the colonial charter, and the New Haven interest succeeded in engrafting upon it a provision for holding the Court of Election, or May session, in New Haven, though the convention twice voted down the proposition, and, says our writer, the people would have rejected it a third time if they could have done so without endangering the whole instrument.

—Number 13 of the Bulletin of the Boston Public Library, as usual, contains information of value to scholars and specialists. The catalogue of the Prince Library, it announces, is now completed, with an historical introduction. It is divided into three parts: the first, titles of books printed in or relating to America; the second, titles of the ancient theological library of the Old South Church; and the third, a synoptical summary of the manuscripts of the collection, now for the first time thoroughly executed. The Bulletin catalogues the 5,100 bound prints of the Tosti-Appleton collection, leaving about twelve hundred, more than half of which are framed, to be still catalogued. We presume that this and the Gray collection, at Harvard, will ultimately be deposited in the projected Museum of Fine Arts. An attempt has been made by the Public Library to supplement its collection, of which the strength lies in the Italian school of engraving, with general lexicons of art and monographs on particular artists; and it has also sought to develop its architectural department, which already is scarcely surpassed in the city. The library is making a special collection of memorials of Boston, illustrating in any way its history or topography. Finally, it is preparing a card catalogue of the books kept in what is known as Bates Hall, as distinguished from the Lower Hall or circulating library.

—A very interesting and exhaustive monograph on the Indians of Cape Flattery, by James G. Swan, is among the most recent of the Smithsonian publications. The writer accompanied General Isaac I. Stevens, when, in 1855, as Governor of Washington Territory, the latter concluded with the Makah tribe the treaty which left them their present reservation—the extreme north-western point of the United States. Afterwards, Mr. Swan was appointed to the Government agency there, and remained several years as a teacher and dispenser of medicines. The Makahs have undergone some admixture with Spanish and Russian castaways, and present, therefore, a considerable diversity of color and feature. They and their kinsmen, of what is known as the Nootkan family, are quite different from the Indians living to the north of them, who have, the writer says, the physical characteristics of the Tartar hordes of the Siberian coast, their probable ancestors. The Makahs are essentially a race of fishermen, and Mr. Swan has much to tell of their modes of catching the whale, seal, and halibut especially. In other respects they appear to be a fairly ingenious tribe, but without very great capacity for development, and with the usual superstitions. Their diet is gross and fills them with humors, and they are neither long-lived nor fertile. In 1861 they numbered 654, and in 1863 only 663. One of them at 60 is as old as a white man at 80, and yet their regular dose of "white" medicine is but half that which would be given to white men. Their memory is poor even of events that they have experienced, and their traditions, besides being scanty, are generally worthless. They seldom address the Supreme Being openly, and Mr. Swan first heard this done in the case of an Indian chief called Captain John. "He was taken with a violent fit of sneezing, and as soon as he recovered he repeated aloud several short sentences, accompanying each with a blowing noise from his mouth. I asked him what he was saying. He replied that he was asking the Hatartstl Cha-batt-a not to kill him by sneezing, but to let him live longer. I have on other occasions, however, noticed that the Indians, upon sneezing, repeat a few words, and think it very probable they all do as John said he did—ask the Great Spirit not to kill them. John told me that, if they did not utter this brief petition, the top of their heads would be blown off when they sneezed." The coincidence between this and the universal European custom in the same circumstances is quite striking. Mr. Swan describes very fully the principal Makah festive, religious, and other ceremonies, and adds a vocabulary of the commonest words. A slighter contribution to our knowledge of the Indians of the Pacific Coast may be found in the American Naturalist for May, where Mr. Edward E. Chever records some of the leading traits and habits of the Indians of California, living west of the Sierra Nevada. He speaks of them with a certain respect, and of their treatment and probable fate with regret. In passing, he indulges in a bit of art criticism worth quoting: "The Indians hunt for one kind of game only at a time, and each kind when they can be taken most advantageously. When I saw every kind of game represented together at the Indian encampment in Bierstadt's celebrated painting of the Yosemite, I knew the camp had been introduced for effect, from this evident ignorance of or disregard for the habits of Indians." We may illustrate this from the Makah names of the months, thus: December is the moon in which the California gray whale makes its appearance; March, the moon when the finback whales arrive; October, the moon for catching the tsa-tar-wha, a variety of rock-fish.

—With the first number in May, Macmillan's weekly journal of science, Nature, entered upon its second volume, and the projectors and conductors of it have the satisfaction of knowing that it has already made a name for itself, and supplied a real and not a fancied want. Its scope is very broad, and its discussions catholic and full of instruction. Among its contributors have been men like Wallace, Tyndall, Huxley, and Keith Johnston, but yet in a good sense it has helped to popularize science. It is a model of typography, and withal very cheap even for transatlantic subscribers. Another English periodical, hitherto a monthly, the Diplomatic Review, makes in its May issue the announcement that on the first of July it will appear as a quarterly. This curious semi-French, semi-English publication is the organ of Mr. David Urquhart, a Russophobist of the first water, and who is calculated, if believed, to make his readers conclude that another half-century will see Western Europe "all Cossack." The number for May 4 has two leading articles on Mr. Urquhart's darling topic—one, "Russian Progress in Central Asia," the other, "Mémoire sur les Relations de la Russie et de l'Europe." And the department, "Events of the Month," opens with a paragraph in which the late murders by the Greek brigands only serve to remind the editor that "all the convulsions of Europe have come out of Greece; all the recent plots and schemes and wars and dangers spring from the classic passion for Greece, which furnished to Russia the occasion and to the British Minister the cloak for compromising the governments of Europe in secret and criminal negotiations." Admiral Persano's second volume also fills the editor with "astonishment that such infamies should be revealed by one of the great actors therein." And when we say that he looks hopefully to the Council for a "solemn, special, and precise declaration on the question of the jus gentium, with reference to the times in which we live, and in which crimes hitherto unknown have been perpetrated" (meaning Garibaldi and Cavour performances, and the like), our readers will know pretty well how to judge of the Review, and of the propriety of its subsiding into a quarterly.

—Prof. Franchi, who so offended Signor Crispi's sensibilities by editing the Correspondence of La Farina, has just published, in two volumes 16mo, the Political Writings of the same (Milan: L. Bortolotti). A third edition will embrace La Farina's literary remains. A large part of the Correspondence was, of course, political writing, so that the whole of the statesman does not appear in either collection. The present volumes contain every composition, however brief, in which La Farina expressed his own ideas, judgments, and sentiments, or which serves to illustrate his character and career. There reigns in all these, says Franchi, though they cover a period of sixteen years and relate to the most diverse times and events, a unity and harmony that reflects the entire life of the writer. In seeking examples of great men to hold up before the young, Italy does not need, in fact, to go outside of herself. Nevertheless, there is manifestly a disposition to draw strength and guidance from the experience of countries longer free, and to present as models of industry and intelligence the great men of England and America. Franklin has thus been used by the translation of his economical works, and not long since Smiles's "Self-Help" was translated into Italian. Still more recently, Craik's "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties" has been reproduced as "Costanza vince ignoranza, ossia la conquista del sapere malgrado gli ostacoli." The translator, Pietro Rotondi, has added to the English examples such names as Muratori, Parini, Oriani, Alfieri, Bellini, Rossini, etc., etc.

ART.

TWO PAINTINGS BY MICHAEL ANGELO.—The gallery of Lord Taunton (the Hon. Mr. Labouchere) contained some valuable pictures, which have been sold in London since his death. Among these is Allston's "Elijah Fed by the Ravens"—a picture purchased by his lordship during his visit to this country, to which it will doubtless return, as it has been bought by a Boston lady. A critic thus describes it:

"In the foreground is a blasted tree (painted in cool grays) standing in the midst of a rough rocky country, giving an idea of solitude and desolation, the only living objects being the ravens and the prophet. The soft landscape in the background is gloriously painted with rich browns and luscious greens. The general coloring reminds one of Titian, notably of that wonderful work (alas! now destroyed) 'The St. Peter Martyr.'"

The gem of Lord Taunton's collection—an unfinished picture in tempera of the Madonna, Infant Christ, St. John, and angels—which attracted so much attention at the Manchester Exhibition in 1857, has been bought for the National Gallery, where it now hangs close to the "Entombment," a masterpiece, apparently, painted by the same hand. According to the critic of the Athenæum, the juxtaposition settles this question in the affirmative. That that hand was none other than the hand of Michael Angelo there can be but little doubt; such, indeed, was the opinion of the best judges at Manchester in regard to Lord Taunton's picture, and no one can see the "Entombment" without being instantly reminded of it. As there is but one easel picture known to have been painted by the great Tuscan, namely, "The Holy Family in the Tribune at Florence," critics were slow to believe that two others had been discovered which could with any show of probability receive the same lofty ascription. To these a third was soon added, by the chance discovery last year of the long-lost "Leda," painted by Michael Angelo for the Duke of Ferrara. The history of the three forms a curious episode in art annals. Lord Taunton's "Madonna" came into the possession of an English artist at Rome many years ago, and was brought to England by his widow, who sold it to Messrs. Colnaghi, the well-known print-dealers in Pall Mall. They offered it to the directors of the National Gallery, who did not esteem it sufficiently to pay the moderate price asked for it as the work of Ghirlandajo, or of an unknown Florentine painter of his school, and preferred to purchase a second-rate Rubens which Messrs. Colnaghi happened to have on hand at the time. The Hon. Mr. Labouchere, struck with its beauty, had the wisdom to secure it, and Manchester set the seal upon his judgment by pronouncing it to be an early Michael Angelo of rare beauty, painted, in all probability, while he was a pupil of Dominico Ghirlandajo, or shortly after he began his independent career. No one who has seen it can forget the majestic dignity of the "Madonna," and the tender beauty and grace of the angels on her left hand. The corresponding groups of angels on the right is merely outlined upon that green background commonly used by Florentine painters of the time, which gives so peculiar a tone to the transparent shadows of the flesh. Among the countless treasures of pictorial art exhibited at Manchester this picture, which is in every respect superior to that in the Tribune at Florence, left perhaps the most enduring impression upon the mind. The "Entombment" underwent many vicissitudes of fortune before it found a permanent resting-place in the National Gallery. At some unknown period it was painted over, and being apparently a mere daub, lay stowed away with other works of a low order in a corner of Cardinal Fesch's gallery at Rome. At the sale, which took place after the death of the Cardinal, it was bought by a carpenter for a trifle, and taken to his shop, where he was about to plane it down, when he was observed by Mr. Macpherson, artist and photographer, who, thinking it might repay closer examination, bought it for a few scudi. As soon as he had it in his atelier he proceeded to clean it, and, as he removed the superimposed crust of dirt and pigment, discovered to his joy an admirable painting in tempera of the "Entombment," which at the time he attributed to Luca Signorelli. When the affair got wind, all Rome went to see the newly-found treasure, and the carpenter, finding that he had sold his right "for a mess of potage," demanded a large share of its estimated value, and when it was refused to him instituted a suit to recover damages. The Roman government also interfered and forbade its removal from the city. After endless trouble and long delay Macpherson succeeded in carrying off his prize, which he now looked upon as a Michael Angelo, to Leghorn; after the lapse of ten or twelve years he removed it to England. There he offered it to Mr. Boxall, the Director of the National Gallery, for £4,000. This price being considered too high for a picture whose authenticity could not be guaranteed, was eventually reduced by one-half. Its peculiarities are so striking, and certain defects in the relative proportion of figures and perspective are so manifest, that many artists and critics have hesitated to ascribe it to Michael Angelo. Other equally good judges are, however, troubled with no such doubts; and, indeed, the grandeur of the composition and the masterly drawing displayed in the figure of the Dead Christ seem to us to give them reason. As no other Florentine painter was capable of such work as this, to whom else can it be ascribed?

Like the "Entombment" the "Leda," also painted in tempera, had been painted over. It remained for years, despised and neglected, in the restoring-room at the National Gallery, until by some accident, as it stood, face upwards, near an easel upon which a picture was placed to be cleaned, the restorer, Sig. Pinti, happened to spatter several drops of turpentine upon it, which, running down, left a smooth, firm surface in their track. This attracted the attention of Mr. Boxall, who was in the room, and he immediately had the whole false coating removed. The original painting was found in a somewhat injured condition, but still susceptible of skilful restoration. Those who have seen it speak of it in the highest terms, and do not hesitate to class it as the third rediscovered Michael Angelo.

—The Littlefield-Gugler portrait head of Abraham Lincoln differs from all others in being of life size. The artist and engraver are the same who had made before a well-known head of General Grant. Encouraged by the success of that undertaking, they went on to do what is seldom done, to engrave in pure line a head as large as life, taking this time for their model such record of the great President as they could find—portraits by other hands, and photographs of many sorts. We have spoken before and at length of Marshall's engraving, and Carpenter's vignette in line and stipple. Considering now the three portraits side by side, we find Carpenter's still the most artistical, the pleasantest picture, and containing the best ideal likeness of Mr. Lincoln considered as a gentle, humorous, and rather melancholy spirit; which perhaps we may safely assume him to have been. Marshall's picture gives more of that rough, barky, Western-looking outside. Those persons who saw Mr. Lincoln often during life are generally of opinion, we find, that Marshall's engraving gives rather than Carpenter's the usual everyday look of the man. Now comes Littlefield's, and, less veritable in lines and details than the one, less pathetic and inwardly true to our memories of Lincoln than the other, unites what qualities should make a good portrait perhaps better than either. It is not a highly finished engraving, it looks even as if it had been hurried, and the copies taken off when another six months' work would have done the plate good. It is unfortunately and unwisely surrounded by a ridiculous imitation of a marble carved oval frame and spandrils; but the execution of the work is very judicious and solid, the scale is carefully preserved, the lines of the engraving lend themselves well to the effect to be produced. Taking into account its unusual size and its real merits, we think the medal should be given to the new-comer, though the persons who may continue to prefer one of the others, especially the Carpenter, will not be abused by us as being of the blindly ignorant.

—"Pictures of Life and Character from the Portfolio of Mr. Punch" is the fortunate title of the largest collection there is of John Leech's designs. There are other collections made up from the volumes of Punch, of Leech woodcuts; thus the large full-page "cartoons" for the first ten years or so of Leech's connection with the paper form a volume of the shape of the original, with perhaps a wider margin, and are called "Early Pencillings from Punch," and other cartoons compose "Later Pencillings." The cartoons are nearly always political. There has been magnificent satire in them, and shrewd foresight, and capital hints as to the cracking of various political nuts; and, withal, a kind of artistic merit which is generally banished from whatever comes within the limits of the field of party contests. But the smaller pictures—those at tops of pages, occupying their width and not quite half their height, the still smaller ones occupying only half a column or so, and the head and tail pieces and ornaments to initial letters—all these, for which the best name in the world is just "pictures of life and character," are gathered into the work so named. The fifth part of this has been published recently (New York: Scribner, Welford & Co.) As the fourth appeared before the artist's death, if we are not mistaken, certainly long ago, this one may be supposed to contain the final gathering up and to be the last. We think that an examination of a set of Punch, including the Almanacs, and of these five series, would show that pretty much all the material had been used. The five parts are in oblong folio volumes, rather awkwardly long to open out on a table; but the form is probably useful for the arranging of so many different sized little pictures. Taken out of their original places and shuffled together—the observation of the folly and fun of yesterday mingled with that of twenty years ago—they make evident the singular universality of Leech's humor and satire. And the pictures are universal in their power of giving enjoyment, too; even the people who cannot appreciate delicate and well-put fun (and there are plenty of such people, for whose finding out a Leech drawing is a good touchstone)—even these unfortunates can enjoy the hunting fields, or the children, or the street-boys, or some of Leech's dramatis personæ. A gentleman we could name, who owns a set of Punch, the which he is perpetually engaged with when relieved from business, dipping now into a volume of 1848, and now into one of 1865, makes frequently the most amusing mistakes as to the point of the jokes. Like Tennyson's model wife—

"He does not understand—he loves."

But the children, also, those of them who love pictures and can sit alone with a picture-book and with content, love these books beyond others even at the age when they cannot read, nor understand when read, Leech's capital inscriptions. We hold that a set of Punch is, really, a book which no gentleman's library ought to be without. But we hold, also, that no family room ought to be without these encyclopedia picture-books. Fortunately, they are so cheap that the children may be allowed to have them.

LOTHAIR.*

When that only authentic historian, Diedrich Knickerbocker, hath occasion, in the course of his immortal History of New York, to record a jest of one of the renowned Dutch governors, he judiciously adds that, "though the joke was not much of a joke in itself, it was good enough for a governor." So, we suppose, when a sometime First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer condescends to the low estate of us common people so far as to write a novel, it becomes us to admit that, though perhaps not much of a novel, it is as good as one could expect from a prime minister. It has been said that it was many years before the Tories of England could forgive Mr. Disraeli for having written novels, so as to be willing to take him into favor and make him their leader in the Commons. We grieve to say that our memory runneth back to the very beginning of Mr. Disraeli's literary career, even to the first sprightly running of "Vivian Grey's" impertinences; and we are afraid we have wasted a good many hours in company with "Henrietta Temple" and "Coningsby" and "Tancred," and the other children of his brain whose names we cannot recall just now. It is so long, however, since we parted company with the latest of them that nothing but their names, and hardly these, remains with us. But we must say, in justice to the English Tories, that, if those former novels were no better than this last ensample of Mr. Disraeli's handiwork, they were quite right in looking upon them as no recommendations to their especial favor, and in demanding other proofs of his abilities before taking him into their service.

"Lothair" is certainly free from the prevailing vice of the present age of novels. It is in no degree tainted with sensationalism. It has as distinct a purpose as a Parliamentary Blue Book, and is about as exciting as one. Its object is to expose the arts and wiles of the Catholics, clergy and laity, to entice into the fold of Rome young noblemen and gentlemen of great estates. If our indistinct recollection of Mr. Disraeli's former novels does not much mislead us, their fundamental error, as works of art, lay in their being virtually pamphlets in the disguise of stories, to prove this or that theory of politics or morals. Children of larger as well as of lesser growth always resent the endeavor, however well meant, to disguise their medicine in its vehicle. Both prefer their rhubarb and their currant-jelly separate. The method of the immortal artists is very different from this. They instruct without being didactic. Fielding and Jane Austen and Walter Scott and Thackeray teach, but it is without intending or knowing it. The motive, to speak musically, of this novel was unquestionably the perversion of the young Marquis of Bute to Catholicism, and its design to show how the mischief was done, and how any imaginary young lord might have escaped such snares. As is generally the case with novels written for warning and reproof, whatever interest the book has centres in the personages the author intends his readers to disapprove of and dislike. Cardinal Grandison and Monsignor Catesby (whom Mr. Disraeli, singularly enough, always styles Monsignore Catesby, forgetting that the final "e" of that designation is always dropped when used before a proper name) deserve a certain degree of admiration, if not of respect, for the persistency of their purpose and the ingenuity of their devices to entrap their prey; but there is hardly a character in the whole range of fiction, not meant to be ridiculous, more pitiably weak, irresolute, and vacillating than the hero whose adventures Mr. Disraeli has thought it worth his while to relate.

Lothair is a young nobleman, yet a minor when the book begins, of "a vast inheritance, which was in many counties and more than one kingdom." His actual rank is never stated, but, as it was below that of a duke, the inference is that he was a marquis. He was in charge of two guardians, one a grim Scotch Presbyterian, the Earl of Culloden, and the other a dignified clergyman of the English Establishment, who has gone over to Rome and become a cardinal before he makes his appearance on the stage. The Scotch lord had possession of the person of the heir, and had kept him from all communication with the Scarlet Gentleman during his nonage, and had brought him up with much strictness in Scotland. He goes to Oxford, however, by the express directions of his father's will, and, while there, goes up to London, and makes the acquaintance of the cardinal, who, with his subordinate priests, Monsignori Catesby and Berwick, do their best to inveigle the young lord into the pale of the Church of Rome. Their plot, indeed, is all the plot the book has, for nothing can be less artificial or ingenuous than the contrivance of the story. As we have said, the cardinal and the monsignori monopolize whatever of character there is allowed the personages of the tale; but we cannot but think that the mighty hunters of Rome are usually more careful than were these how they lay their snares in the sight of their game. Still, the story of their proceedings is not without ingenuity and interest.

Mr. Disraeli's readers cannot complain of the society to which he introduces them. It is of the very finest kind. Hardly one of his English characters is outside the sacred ranks of the peerage. Lothair's attorney and man of business, Mr. Putney Giles, and his pushing, tuft-hunting wife, are almost the only creatures of common clay. For we cannot consider as of this vulgar mould a most marvellous painter, Mr. Phœbus, who had a steam-yacht, owned an island in the Mediterranean, carried about with him in his cabin a chest full of velvet bags filled, "one with pearls, another with rubies, others with Venetian sequins, Napoleons, and golden piastres." Moreover, he was the descendant of a noble Gascon family, and had married one of the Cantacuzene family, descended from the Greek emperors, and niece of the Prince of Samos. All which certainly redeems him from the level of a vulgar artist. We are introduced, at the first going off, into the bosom of a delightful ducal family, in company with Lothair, who had formed an intimate friendship with the eldest son of the house. All the daughters were married, excepting one, and "they were all alike, with their delicate aquiline noses, bright complexions, short upper lips, and eyes of sunny light." The judicious reader need not be told that Lothair falls in love with Lady Corisande, the youngest, "whose beauty was even more distinguished and regular," with "dark brown hair and darker eyes." But the duchess, superior to the consideration that he was the richest match in the empire, when he asks for her consent, advises him to wait and see a little more of the world before committing himself, which he accordingly does.

The visit of Lothair to the cardinal is subsequent to that to the duke, and, in consequence of it, he is introduced to the intimacy of a great Catholic family, that of Lord and Lady St. Jerome. Here he meets his lordship's niece, Clare Arundel, a damsel with "large violet eyes, darker even than the dark-brown hair, gleaming with intelligence, and her rich face mantling with emotion," who is as fanatical as a Catholic as Lady Corisande is firm as a Protestant. It is quite unnecessary to say that Lothair falls in love with Clare Arundel too. Not long afterwards he meets with another divine lady, of mysterious antecedents. She has reminiscences of sleeping in the streets of Paris, with her tambourine for her pillow, yet she is apparently of a great Italian family, who has lost her father in an attempt to deliver Italy; and, though her name is Theodora, she is the original Mary Anne, which our readers know, or should know, stands for the republican conspiracies all over Europe. This lady suffers under the disadvantage of being married, but this does not hinder Lothair from falling in love with her too. She also agreeably differs from his Catholic and Protestant loves in having no religion at all, excepting that of Madre Natura, or Mother Nature. The husband is only a colonel and an American, but let not the fastidious reader think he is getting into low company on that account. As the duke justly remarks of him, "You know he is a gentleman. He is not a Yankee. He is a gentleman of the South. They have no property but land; and I am told his territory was immense. He always lived at Paris, in the highest style—disgusted, of course, with his own country. It is not unlikely that he may have lost his estates now; but that makes no difference to me. I shall treat him, and all Southern gentlemen, as our fathers treated the emigrant nobility of France."

* "Lothair. By the Right Hon. B. Disraeli." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.

Colonel Campian, however, had saved enough from the ruins of his fortune to be able to inhabit Belmont, a palatial residence, erected by a former minister of state on a slice of a royal park, granted to him for that purpose by a grateful sovereign. This was important for the preservation and the unities of the work, as we are never introduced, as guests, under any roof of less dignity than a palace, with the exception of Mr. Putney Giles's house in Hyde Park Gardens. We cannot spare space for any description of this palace and its fairy gardens. We can only stop long enough to express our disgust at Colonel Campian's having adorned it with the two statues of Cleopatra and the Sibyl, to the encouragement of a mere Yankee sculptor. For we must hasten onward. Of course, there is nothing improper in the relations of Lothair and Theodora. No; as he tells her, she must have felt that "I am not insensible to your beauty and infinite charms, still, it is your consummate character that has justly fascinated my thought and heart; and that I have long resolved, were I permitted, to devote to you my fortune and my life." This offer she accepts, it appears, as we next find him with the Garibaldi volunteers, in Italy, making ready for the assault on Rome. Theodora was the mainspring of this as of all other revolutionary movements. At a battle, not recorded, we believe, in history, the volunteers, led by a mysterious general, a cross between Garibaldi and Mazzini, with a dash of Kossuth, are victorious, through the rallying of the patriots at a critical moment by Theodora, with a sword in one hand and the banner of the Republic in the other. But in the moment of a victory she receives a wound, of which she shortly dies, after requiring a promise of Lothair that he would never be reconciled to Rome. "And now," she said, "embrace me, for I wish that your spirit should be upon me when mine departs!"

Lothair is left wounded and insensible on the field of Mentana and carried to Rome, where he is nursed by Miss Arundel, in the Agostini palace, tenanted by the St. Jeromes, where the cardinal and the monsignori again weave their toils for the prey which had escaped them by his flight from England. In this they are assisted by the St. Jeromes and all the Catholic grandees of Rome. The story is spread abroad that he had been wounded fighting on the side of the Pope, and the priests try to make himself believe that it was even so, and his own impressions to the contrary a delusion. A miracle is also arranged by spreading a report that the woman who told Miss Arundel of Lothair's extremity, who was a tailor's wife in reality, was no less a person than the Virgin Mary. He is kept under constant surveillance, of which he is aware, and from which he wishes to escape; but it never seems to have occurred to him that a great English nobleman, with a fortune sufficient to buy out all Rome, might have walked out of the Agostini palace any morning, and gone to the Hôtel de l'Angleterre, and defied the Pope and all his works. In the agony of his irresolution, he escapes from his keepers one night, and wanders about the streets till he finds himself in the Coliseum, where the ghost of Theodora opportunely appears to him and reminds him of his promise to her when dying. He is found in a state of insensibility and carried back to the palace. During the delay in the execution of the priests' schemes consequent upon this agitation, Lord St. Jerome, who, though a Catholic, is a gentleman and an honest man, and who is rather scandalized by their proceedings, insists on his seeing an English physician, who has small patience with Popery, and who orders change of scene. Accordingly, he is conveyed to another palace on the coast of Sicily, with a monsignore still keeping watch of him. Wanting resolution and strength of mind to free himself from their spiritual espionage otherwise, he hires a fisherman to put him over to Malta in his boat, thus saving himself by flight.

From Malta he returns to England. Miss Arundel takes the veil, and he falls in love again with Lady Corisande, who, it appears, has been all along in love with him, and it is to be hoped that she kept him safe within the pale of the English Church. Such a weakling as he would need some one to hold him up and lead him by the hand all the days of his life. We presume that all the characters in the novel are parcelled out by London society among prominent persons in England. Monsignor Catesby is admitted to be meant for Monsignor Capel, and Cardinal Grandison would answer well enough for Archbishop Manning. We should think that the noble persons, whoever they may be, to whom the other characters may be assigned, would hardly regard the attribution as complimentary, for duller and more stupid specimens of porcelain clay—more flat, stale, and unprofitable—it is to be hoped are not common in high life. Mr. Disraeli goes out of his way to make an attack, which is as stupid as it is malignant, on an eminent gentleman, formerly an Oxford professor, who has transferred his labors to this country. Had that gentleman been indeed addicted to the snobbishness (of all things in the world!) attributed to him, we imagine he would not have received the praise in disguise of Mr. Disraeli's satire.

To conclude a notice already much longer than the intrinsic merits of this novel deserves, we would say that Mr. Disraeli's fame as a novelist will depend on his prestige as a public man. His characters have no color nor reality. They do not live and breathe like the personages of the great enchanters. They are inexpressive as the shades of the magic lantern, with scrolls coming out of their mouths for talk. Mr. Disraeli's permanent reputation will rest upon his parliamentary speeches, some of which may long survive the best of his novels. Indeed, it is hard to see how a man capable of those caustic, bitter, cruel diatribes of twenty years since against Sir Robert Peel could be capable of the platitudinous dulness of "Lothair." It shows at least how very absurd a novel a very clever man can write—which is consolatory to the average stupidity of mankind.

Mrs. Gerald's Niece. A Novel. By Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Author of "Grantley Manor," "Too Strange not to be True," etc. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1870.)—We should suppose that this novel might prove agreeable reading to most people who take any interest in the state of the controversy between the Anglo-Catholics and the Mother Church. The story is hardly to be called a continuation of the "Grantley Manor" of years ago, but one or two of the characters of that novel reappear in this one; and Lady Fullerton, who is not to be called a good writer, has yet a certain soberness, and an air of dealing with real things, which give her personages a solidity which our recollection of her work—a recollection which we admit, however, to have been very vague—would not have led us to expect. The novel is, of course, a Catholic one, and the characters are mostly English Ritualists, of whom the most devout and intelligent become Catholics in the end, being persuaded to that result by the usual and obvious arguments—arguments which, as between these particular opponents, would seem to have, in Lady Georgiana's eyes, a perfectly sufficient cogency. For the rest, the novel has a certain old-fashionedness about it which, in its way, is not unpleasant. There is a good deal more plot, of an innocently complicated sort, than is usual nowadays, and the characters have a way of mentioning Miss Yonge's writings with great respect, and of quoting at length from Mrs. Norton's poetry, which fits in so accurately with the whole scope and spirit of the novel itself, as to give the reader, however illegitimately, a sense of artistic perception on Lady Fullerton's part which nothing else about her work would ever convey.

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Abbot (J.), The Juno Stories: Juno and Georgie	(Dodd & Mead) $1 25
" " Mary Osborne	" " 1 25
Aikman (Rev. W.), Life at Home	(S. R. Wells) 1 50
Alcott (Louisa M.), An Old-Fashioned Girl	(Roberts Bros.)
Bastian (Dr. A.), Die Weltauffassung der Buddhisten, swd	(L. W. Schmidt)
Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, No 2, swd	" "
Bright (J.) and Rogers (Prof. J. T.), Speeches on Questions of Public Policy, by Richard Cobden, M.P., 2 vols	(Macmillan & Co.) 9 00
Clarke (Rev. J. F.), Steps of Belief	(Am. Unit. Assoc.) 1 00
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopœdia, No. 32, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell) 0 50
Darlington (W. M.), Remarkable Occurrences in the Life and Travels of Col. James Smith	(Robert Clarke & Co.) 2 50
Frothingham (Ellen), Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea	(Roberts Bros.)
Good Things, Selected from the Congregationalist, for Sunday Schools	(W. L. Greene & Co.) 1 25
Greene (S. D.), The Broken Seal: Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder	(Boston)
Guest (W.), The Call of the Hour, swd	(D. Lothrop & Co.) 0 20
Hepworth (Rev. G. H.), Rocks and Shoals	(Am. Unit. Assoc.) 0 60
Holmes (Rev. P.), Writings of Tertullian, Vol. II	(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 3 50
Marsh (Prof. F. A.), Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language	(Harper & Bros.)
Porter (Mrs. A. E.), Glencoe Parsonage	(D. Lothrop & Co.) 1 00
Rossetti (D. G.), Poems	(Roberts Bros.)
Sanson (Abbé), The Paradise of the Earth	(John Murphy & Co.) 1 25
Spring Grove Cemetery, Cincinnati	(Robert Clarke & Co.)
The Workshop, No. 5, swd	(E. Steiger) 0 50
Walker (A.), Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, and Revelations	(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 3 50
Warren (S.), Popular and Practical Introduction to Law Studies	(J. D. Parsons, jr.) 4 00

THE

New Books of the Spring,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

 Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE. A Novel. By Charles Reade, Author of "Hard Cash," "Griffith Gaunt," etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated. From the Author's early sheets, by arrangement with Messrs. Sheldon & Co. 8vo, paper, 75 cents; 8vo, cloth, $1 25; 12mo, cloth, $1. (Ready June 14.)

THE HISTORY OF HORTENSE, Daughter of Josephine, Queen of Holland, Mother of Napoleon III. By John S. C. Abbott, Author of "The French Revolution," "History of Napoleon Bonaparte," etc. With Engravings. 16mo, cloth, $1 20. Uniform with Abbott's Illustrated Histories.

THE VICAR OF BULLHAMPTON. A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "The Bertrams," "Castle Richmond," "Framley Parsonage," "Orley Farm," "Small House at Allington," etc. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, $1 25; cloth, $1 75.

YONGE'S ENGLISH-GREEK LEXICON. An English-Greek Lexicon. By C. D. Yonge. With many New Articles, an Appendix of Proper Names, and Pillon's Greek Synonyms. To which is prefixed an Essay on the Order of Words in Attic-Greek Prose, by Charles Short, LL.D., Professor of Latin in Columbia College, N. Y. Edited by Henry Drisler, LL.D., Professor of Greek in Columbia College, Editor of "Liddell and Scott's Greek-English Lexicon," etc. 8vo, sheep, extra, $7.

ANGLO-SAXON GRAMMAR. A Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language; in which its Forms are Illustrated by those of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Old Saxon, Old Friesic, Old Norse, and Old High-German. By Francis A. March, Professor of the English Language and Comparative Philology in Lafayette College, Author of "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "A Parser and Analyzer for Beginners," etc. 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

MISS VAN KORTLAND. A Novel of American Society. By the Author of "My Daughter Elinor." 8vo, paper, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND GREEK PHILOSOPHY; or, The Relation between Spontaneous and Reflective Thought in Greece and the Positive Teaching of Christ and His Apostles. By B. F. Cocker, D.D., Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy in the University of Michigan. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 75.

BENEATH THE WHEELS. A Novel. By the Author of "Olive Varcoe." 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE LIFE OF COUNT BISMARCK, Private and Political. With Descriptive Notices of his Ancestry. By Dr. George Hesekiel. Translated and Edited, with an Introduction, Explanatory Notes, and Appendices, by Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie, F.S.A., F.A.S.L. With upward of 100 Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $3.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN SCUDDER, M.D., Thirty-six Years Missionary in India. By Rev. J. B. Waterbury, D.D. With Portrait of Dr. Scudder. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

BAFFLED; or, Michael Brand's Wrong. A Novel. By Julia Goddard, Author of "Joyce Dormer's Story," "The Search for the Gral," etc. Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Arthur Hughes and Sidney Prior Hall. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

SELF-HELP; with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Perseverance. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "The Life of the Stephensons," "History of the Huguenots," etc. A Revised and Enlarged Edition. 12mo, cloth, $1.

DEBENHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By Amelia B. Edwards, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew," etc. Illustrated. 8vo, paper, 75 cents.

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. By John W. Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. In 3 vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, cloth, $3 50 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, $1; cloth, $1 50.

Illustrated Travels around the World.

Vol. I. Plain cloth, $7 50; extra gilt cloth, $9

The World Before the Deluge.

233 plates, $5

The Vegetable World.

471 plates, $5

The Ocean World.

427 plates, $5

The Insect World.

576 plates, $5

Birds and Reptiles.

307 plates, $5

Chefs-d'oeuvre of the Industrial Arts.

200 plates, $5

The World of Wonders.

Illustrated. $5

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN

(R. TURNER, Manager),

596 Broadway, New York.

THE UNDERSIGNED beg to announce to their Friends and the BOOK-BUYING PUBLIC that they have established themselves at

No. 451 Broome Street,

For the purpose of carrying on a

Publishing & Bookselling Business,

Where they will be happy to see them and receive orders. They will keep on hand a full stock of the

PUBLICATIONS OF THE DAY,

Besides the

Works of Popular Standard Authors, Children's Books, Libraries, and Toy Books.

ALSO,

School and College Text Books, Music Books, etc.

Bringing with them an experience of Twenty-seven Years in the "Trade" in this City, they are prepared to transact a FIRST-CLASS business INTELLIGENTLY.

A well-selected Stock from Boston, Philadelphia, and Western Publishing Houses will always be kept on hand. Also,

Bibles, Books of Common Prayer, Church Service, and Hymn Books of all denominations,

In the various editions and styles of binding.

Orders from PUBLIC OR PRIVATE LIBRARIES, SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, OR CLERGYMEN will receive a LIBERAL DISCOUNT.

They will guarantee to all customers promptness and despatch in all business engagements.

Soliciting your patronage, we remain,

Yours faithfully,

DE WITT C. LENT & CO.,

Publishers and Booksellers,

451 BROOME STREET

(A few doors west of Broadway),

NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED,

BY

Charles Scribner & Co.,

I.

Lifting the Veil.

1 vol. 16mo, cloth, very beautifully and tastefully bound in extra gilt, price $1 25.

This work is by no means modelled on the stories having somewhat similar title which have recently appeared. It is a quiet, unexaggerated drawing-out of a sorrowful experience; it shows how slowly but surely every true soul emerges from the deep waters of affliction, cleansed and strengthened for the labor that lies before. It is altogether elevating in tone, and will be read by many with a tearful recognition of its tenderness and truth.

II.

Seaman on Government.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT. Its Character and Workings, its Defects, Outside Party Machinery and Influences, and the Prosperity of the People under its Protection. By Ezra C. Seaman, Counsellor-at-Law, and Author of Essays on the Progress of Nations. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

In this work Mr. Seaman endeavors to point out certain defects which he has discovered in our representative and elective system, and then suggests what he regards as suitable remedies.

ALSO JUST PUBLISHED.

VOL. III. OF MOMMSEN'S ROME. Crown 8vo, $2.

PROF. McILVAINE'S ELOCUTION. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 75.

SHEDD'S HOMILETICS. New Edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo, $2 50.

SHEDD'S CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. New Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo, $5.

MAINE'S ANCIENT LAW. New Edition. 1 vol. crown 8vo, $2 50.

FROUDE'S ENGLAND. Popular Edition. Vols. I.—IX. Price, per volume, $1 25.

FROUDE'S ENGLAND. Library Edition. Vols. XI. and XII. Crown 8vo. Price, per volume, $3.

BOWEN'S POLITICAL ECONOMY. 1 vol. crown 8vo, $2 50.

MRS. JERNINGHAM'S JOURNAL. 1 vol. 16mo, 75 cents.

These books for sale by all booksellers, or sent, postpaid, by the publishers upon receipt of price.

CHAS. SCRIBNER & CO.,

654 Broadway, New York.

Valuable New English Works

JUST IMPORTED BY

Scribner, Welford & Co.

654 Broadway.

Physical Geography. By Mary Somerville. Sixth Edition, thoroughly Revised by H. W. Bates. 1 thick vol. crown 8vo, $4 50.

The Commentaries of Gaius. Translated by Abdy and Walker. 1 vol. crown 8vo, $6 25.

Other Worlds than Ours. By Prof. Proctor. 1 vol. crown 8vo, with Engravings (some colored), $5 25.

A Critical and Commercial Dictionary of the Works of Painters. Comprising 8,850 Sale Notes of Pictures and 980 Original Notes of the Subjects and Styles of Various Artists who have Painted in the Schools of Europe between the Years 1250 and 1850. By F. P. Segnier. 1 vol. royal 8vo, $10 50.

Johnson's English Dictionary, Revised and Enlarged by Dr. Latham. 4 large vols. 4to, price reduced to $56.

Or, in the finest half-Russia, extra, best style, $76.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1870.

The Week.

THE Senate has discussed the Indian Appropriation Bill, the bill abolishing the franking privilege—on which Mr. Sumner delivered an elaborate speech—the bill making a new apportionment for Representatives, and a railroad land bill of some importance. The two last were passed, the number of Representatives being fixed at 300 instead of 275, as the House had chosen for itself. Mr. Garfield's Currency Bill, and Mr. Davis's bill to establish a uniform system of naturalization, met a like reception at the hands of the House, and were both given up for dead, but were afterwards revived in a mutilated form, and the latter passed—the Democrats not even valuing the appearance of virtue which a vote in favor merely of punishing naturalization frauds would have lent them. On Saturday, the House passed the Army Reduction Bill as it came from the Conference Committee. In discussing the Senate's amendments to the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Bill, several important ones were defeated—viz., those raising the salaries of United States judges, authorizing a new building for the State Department, extending the Capitol grounds, and appropriating $100,000 for the North Pole expedition. Without positively equalizing the pay of male and female clerks, the House agreed that they should be employed indifferently, without discrimination of sex. On Monday, it passed the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill. The greater part of Tuesday was occupied by Mr. Banks in replying to the President's message on Cuba.

The most interesting incident of the week at Washington has been the visit of the Indian chiefs. Their intercourse was merely complimentary till Friday, when the treaties of 1867 were produced, and the lands the Indians had conveyed away by them pointed out on the map, when Red Cloud, the others assenting, declared it was all a swindle, and that they did not know what they were signing; and he is reported to have passed the evening in despair, on going back to his quarters. Since then, however, he has been pacified, and goes home in a more contented frame of mind. But it is hard to say what has been gained by the visit except a clearer knowledge than ever of the absurdity of making "treaties" with these poor savages, and then punishing violations of them by indiscriminate war. It is clear that the Indians labor under a constant sense of wrong; that they have a constant feeling that they are being driven to the wall; and that the whites would be glad to see them all dead and buried, which is not far from the truth. They are confirmed in this impression by the conduct of the frontier population, which, in spite of its many virtues, is, perhaps, the most ruffianly population in the world, and it is not wonderful if, under these circumstances, the Plains should, at the best of times, be in a state of suppressed war. Congressman Hooper testifies that the Mormons have never had any trouble with the Indians; the Russians have had none; the Canadians have none; and it certainly does seem sad and extraordinary that the United States should never have anything but trouble.

The message with which the President, on Monday, so cruelly took the wind out of Mr. Banks's sails, reviews the progress of the rebellion in Cuba, and in judging the conduct of both parties strikes a balance of inhumanity which will be generally admitted to be just. Proof is given that, since his annual message in December, no change has occurred in the situation to invest the struggle with those "conditions which amount to war in the sense of international law," but the contrary. The neutral practice of the United States is then discussed at length, and the question of the recognition of new Powers. Finally, after denying the existence of a state of belligerency in Cuba, the consequences of Congress declaring it to exist are clearly exhibited. If the Cubans who have taken refuge in this country from the risks of war at home should effect what they desire, then "the commercial marine of the United States becomes liable to search and to seizure by the commissioned cruisers of both parties; they become subject to the adjudication of prize courts. . . . The carrying of contraband, which is now lawful, becomes liable to the risks of seizure and condemnation." The probable complications with Spain that would thus arise from the exercise of her rights as a party to a maritime war are worthy, the President reminds Congress, of a little reflection.

The time for the ratification of the St. Domingo treaty has been extended to the 1st of July, and the President has sent a message to the Senate, requesting the insertion of certain amendments, providing for the reduction of the entire amount of liability to be incurred by the United States for the island to $1,500,000, and the creation of machinery for the application of this sum to the extinction of the various debts due by the Dominican Government. The President supplies some additional arguments for the ratification of the treaty, part military and part economical, and the economical ones are so curious as to increase the public curiosity touching the source from which he draws his views on this class of subjects. That they are not his own, one can see at a glance. We are to annex St. Domingo, with its 120,000 barbarians, because the Monroe doctrine "forbids American territory being any longer considered a fit subject of transfer to any foreign power;" and yet the President declares that if we do not annex it, a European power stands ready now to pay $2,000,000 for Samana Bay, and asks "with what grace can we prevent this foreign power from attempting to secure it," if we refuse it—a singular question in presence of the Monroe doctrine which he has just been pleading. The Monroe doctrine does not say that Europeans may have whatever the United States do not want: it says they may not have anything.

The economical arguments are that commerce with the island will be immense, and go far towards restoring our lost mercantile marine; but if the President will ask Mr. Greeley, he will tell him that commerce with the island is a curse which ought to be prevented by heavy penalties, as it brings in either luxuries which we do not need or commodities which we can or ought to produce ourselves. He says, too, "it will give us those articles which we consume and do not produce, thus equalizing our imports and exports," which Mr. Greeley's keen eye will recognize as an identical proposition; that annexation will draw thousands of laborers from the adjacent islands, especially slaves from Cuba, and St. Domingo will thus become a large consumer of the products of Northern farms and manufactories, and its production of sugar, coffee, tobacco, and tropical fruits will be enormous; "and cut off more than $100,000,000 of our annual imports, besides largely increasing our exports." "With such a picture," the President adds, "it is easy to see how our large debt abroad is ultimately to be extinguished." We confess that at this point we became ourselves a little confused, but, looking into our family copy of Mr. Greeley's great work on political economy, we found, we think, the key to the puzzle. Foreign imports are a great curse and evil, if the place from which they come is called foreign soil; but if it is called American soil, they are a great gain. If you buy sugar from a citizen of St. Domingo, you lose on the transaction; if you hoist a United States flag on his house, and call him a citizen of the State of Dominica, and then buy sugar from him, you make money by it. If St. Domingo sends Massachusetts $100,000,000 a year of tropical products in return for $80,000,000 worth of shoes, it is a dead loss of $20,000,000 to Massachusetts; if the State of Dominica sends $100,000,000 worth of the same commodities to the State of Massachusetts for $80,000,000 worth of shoes, there remains, somehow, a balance of $20,000,000 for the payment of "our large debt abroad." How this comes to be—why the money should be disposable for the payment of the foreigner in the one case and not in the other, we do not know; we do not believe anybody knows. No doubt good government will greatly increase production and population in St. Domingo, but if the population increases, as the President says it will, under annexation, and we have to supply the government, and the civil service is not reformed, and the morals of politicians are not improved, the island will be a hot-bed of other things than bananas, and sugar, and coffee.

The treaty, however, does not seem to find favor with the Senate, and is creating a great deal of excitement in that body. General Babcock, who acted as the President's agent in negotiating it, is accused of having connived at the imprisonment, by Baez, of an American, named Hatch, who went to the island on business, with the view of preventing his giving testimony unfavorable to the treaty, which led, in the Senate, to savage denunciation of Hatch by the usually polite and moderate Mr. Chandler, of Michigan, and to a fierce assault on General Babcock by Mr. Sumner. There are other scandals of the "corruptionist" kind, and, on the whole, the affair thus far is well calculated to make the intelligent citizen wish St. Domingo, coffee, sugar, and all, at the bottom of the sea. One is disposed to wish it all the more when one sees the way the Danes have been treated about St. Thomas. When the time for acting on their annexation treaty came up, the Senate did not so much as deign to discuss it, but simply let it go by default; whereat the Danish Government naturally feels deeply offended. There have not been in the history of international intercourse many, if any, such cases of incivility. Poor General Raasloff, who conducted the negotiation, has resigned his place in the Danish cabinet in a pathetic speech, in which he ascribes his overthrow to over-confidence in American honor and good faith.

Whittemore, who was expelled, or rather resigned to escape expulsion, from the House of Representatives, for having sold a nomination to a cadetship at West Point, has been re-elected from the same district by a majority of 8,000 or thereabouts. This man is an embezzler from Massachusetts, whom the persons he defrauded ought to have hunted down and brought to justice; instead of which, they let him go into the army as a "chaplain," of all things in the world, in which capacity, as might have been expected, he was not above reproach either. The war over, he became part of the corrupt gang who fastened on the State of South Carolina, and are now using its people and resources to push their own political fortunes, and have secured, apparently, a hold of power, by display of devotion to the ignorant colored people. Whittemore, for instance, is said to have spent a large proportion of the money he got for the cadetship on the negroes of his district, and that he should be able to cheat the negroes in this way is not wonderful, when we find good white Christians at the North disposed to accept his willingness to spend part of the money in charity as palliation of his dishonesty, forgetting, apparently, that Dick Turpin was always kind to the poor, and that Hadji Stavros had a really warm heart. The truth is, however, that your philanthropic rogue is a far worse enemy of civil society than your hardened and cruel villain. The House will be placed in a difficult position when Whittemore reappears; but we hope that even if it be found that existing precedents are in his favor, it will make a new one in his case, which will not only cover him, but all his kind.

The Vermont Constitutional Convention has, as was expected, and, indeed, intended by the electors, rejected the amendment giving the suffrage to women, by a majority of 231 to 1. The minority of one has certainly covered himself with glory. On the other hand, both Houses in Congress have adopted the amendment placing female employees of the Government on the same footing as the males. So that, as we said last week, the rebuffs experienced by the suffrage movement are in some measure compensated for by solid acquisitions in other directions. The New York Suffrage Association has had rather a sad week, owing to its having taken up, and introduced to the public as a lecturer on Woman's Rights, apparently without consideration or enquiry, Mrs. E. C. Stanton presiding, a young woman calling herself the "Princess Editha," and representing herself as the daughter of Lola Montez and the King of Bavaria, but in reality the daughter of a German clerk formerly of this city. The lecture was a very painful exhibition, the lecturer proving to be insane and subject to epileptic fits; she is now, we believe, in the lunatic asylum. The affair resembled, in many of its features, the celebrated movement got up by the same body some time ago in behalf of the Philadelphia female convict. In England, the women are plunging the kingdom in an uproar, owing to their having taken hold of the nastiest of all earthly subjects, known as the Contagious Diseases Act, which they are handling without gloves; and the lecture-halls of the kingdom are resounding with debates, carried on by both sexes, such as were never before, we are glad to say, heard except at hospital clinics, and not even then, for doctors don't discuss the moral side of diseases. We are clearly entering on an era of plain speaking, and all we have to say is that we trust it will not be confined to one side. We must not allow society to be revolutionized on a half statement. Modesty will apparently have to be put away in the garret by conservatives as well as radicals, until the return of quieter times.

We thought a fortnight ago that we and everybody else had done for the present with the Hartford and Erie Railroad, but a bill has been introduced authorizing the road to take from the State treasury about $3,600,000 worth of its own first mortgage bonds, deposited as security for past loans, and now worth about thirty-five cents on the dollar, and leave in their place a new issue—its own second mortgage bonds—which have no value whatever. The thing for the Ring to do will then be to get hold of the first mortgage bonds, and sell them for what they will bring, and come in with the money to New York, and leave the Commonwealth to finish the road by some other device.

Mr. George Walker, who was sent to Europe last year as a special agent for the State of Massachusetts to negotiate a loan, "with the hope of saving a portion of the profit on re-sale, which was understood to have been large," has made a written report of his mission, but it does not altogether support the rumors which have been afloat since his return, and to which we have at different times given currency in the Nation, with regard to the causes of his failure. He sets down, among these causes, Mr. Sumner's speech; the ignorance prevailing on the Continent about Massachusetts securities; the presence in the market of bonds already issued to the Hartford and Erie Railroad; the greater popularity of the United States bonds; and, perhaps greatest of all, the current belief "that Massachusetts was always borrowing." When Mr. Walker told the Barings that, beside the $2,000,000 he was instructed to offer, there were $15,000,000 of sterling bonds impending, including $5,000,000 for the Hartford and Erie Road, those gentlemen, the report says, "expressed surprise that the aggregate amount of these authorized loans was so large," or, we suppose, to put it into more familiar phrase, looked rather blue. The result was that not only could Mr. Walker not sell his bonds at 90, as he had hoped, but did not succeed in getting any offer that would have brought the Commonwealth more than 85. The report does not show, however, that it was a special horror of Eldridge & Co. which caused the failure, but rather that distrust inspired by the readiness of the State to borrow contributed to it.

A notorious "Fourth Ward rough," named Hernan, who had been several times in custody for acts of violence and disorder, and was once a ringleader in a riot, engaged with others at a late hour the other night in an assault on a police officer, whom they knocked down, and were engaged in murdering by kicks and blows from his own club. The policeman fired and killed Hernan, who, it then came out, was a letter-carrier—of all things in the world, in the service of the United States Government. The funeral was attended by the "Letter-carriers' Association," and the police authorities were so afraid that the ceremony might be enlivened by a riot, that they had a powerful force in readiness in the neighborhood of the house of mourning. This is all sad, but the worst of it is, that according to those great philosophers of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Bingham and Maynard, if we made any change in the system which commits the letter-delivery of a great commercial city to shoulder-hitters, and cut-throats, and gamblers, we should be setting up an "aristocracy." How the devil must wag his tail when he finds that the flower of all governments, the last hope of the oppressed, can't be carried on without office-holders drawn from his own nursery and bred under his own eye.

The news of the massacre of the Jews in Roumania seems to have produced a singular effect on many great minds, but in no case, as far as our observation has gone, have the resulting phenomena been so interesting as in that of our contemporary, the Worcester Spy. According to this paper, the bloody deed took place not in Roumania, but "in Roumelia, or, as it is sometimes written, Roomelee, the metropolitan province of Turkey at the south-eastern extremity of Europe, embracing the territory of ancient Thrace and Macedonia, and containing the city of Constantinople and several other towns of considerable population." It was in this beautiful and historic region, it appears, that the Christians rose, on a Sunday morning, and butchered all the Jews they could lay hands upon, and without the least reason, the Spy says, except religious intolerance. The horrid work began in the towns but extended gradually to the country, "the authorities being credulous or indifferent, and Prince Charles, the hereditary ruler of the province under the Sultan, being absent." As this is the first time that "Prince Charles of Roomelee" has made his appearance on the stage of events, and as it is quite certain that if the Sultan hears he is ruling "Roomelee," either hereditarily or otherwise, he will have him strangled, we shall gratify a legitimate curiosity on the part of the public, and probably relieve the anxiety of the Spy, by mentioning that, on hearing of the disgusting behavior of his Christians, he, the Prince, determined not to return home—absconded, in short—and his whereabouts is now unknown, and is likely to remain so.

It really begins to look as if the regeneration of Greece was at last going to be brought about by the late exploit of the brigands. The incident has let in a flood of light on the state of politics and society in that unfortunate country; and there are marked signs of shame among the Athenian politicians. The French Minister has had to fight a duel with the brother of the Minister of War, whom, on account of his more than suspected complicity with brigandage, he accused of impudence in showing himself at the funeral of the Marathon victims; and the French Government has been much harsher in its treatment of Greece than the English, having announced since the late murders that it will, in case any Frenchman is captured or injured, exact satisfaction of the whole Greek nation. Lord Clarendon, defending himself in the House of Lords for having pressed the Greek Government to grant an amnesty, declares he did so because the constitution had been again and again violated in this very way, large numbers of brigands having actually been amnestied to enable them to go to Crete during the insurrection. Retired brigands may be seen in the streets of Athens every day, gorgeously dressed, and living on pensions drawn from the Government, and flaunting their finery in the faces of the poorly-paid officers and soldiers whose duty it is supposed to be to hunt them down. As an illustration of the state of society, the diaries of the murdered travellers show that the brigands did attend church with their captives in a large village. Worse than all, they record that they more than once met parties of soldiers, as large as their own, who "fraternized" with the brigands, the officer dining with the chief. There is now a strong probability that the protecting powers will insist on road-making and police as a condition of their keeping the wretched little kingdom in existence any longer. The position of the honest Danish gentleman who finds himself playing the part of king in the midst of the tricksters who largely compose his cabinet and parliament, is enough to excite the sympathy of all civilized men. Luckily for him, England has guaranteed his salary of $20,000 a year; otherwise the place would not be worth having.

The Austrian Government, two years ago, compelled its creditors to accept a conversion of their bonds of 1852 and 1859, which were secured by a definite sinking fund, into other bonds for which no sinking fund was provided, but which bore fifteen per cent. greater face value, and with coupons the amount of which was diminished by a special "tax," as Butler calls it, of fifteen per cent. The protests of the holders having produced no effect, the Committee of the Stock Exchange has directed the Austrian Government securities to be struck from the lists, and forbidden their quotation hereafter until the just claims of the creditors have been satisfied. What is curious about this is that the Stock Exchange should not see that if the Austrian Government had not compelled its creditors to convert, they would not have converted, and there would consequently have been no conversion, or that it should be annoyed by having fifteen per cent. detached from the interest, seeing that the deduction is a "tax," which every government has a right to impose. The case of a private debtor's cutting down his creditor's interest is a very different thing, as that is not called a "tax." If it was called a "tax," it would be entirely justifiable, as seventy-nine members of the House of Representatives will tell them.

The accounts of the state of Italy, of which we spoke last week, do not improve. The political discontent seems to spread wider and go deeper week by week. The Mémorial Diplomatique reports the students of the Universities at Naples, Pisa, Bologna, and Turin as having asked for a reduction in the length and bulk of their curriculum, so as to give them more time for "politics"—the rage for politics, as an occupation, apparently taking hold of them as it has done of the Athenians. The Mémorial innocently declares, however, that this longing of the students to escape from study is inspiring the Government with great alarm, lest in a few years it should experience a dearth of trained functionaries, and the machinery of state be thus brought to a standstill. The Italian minister at Washington can reassure it on this point, as he can show them by the example of our civil service that officials for government work can never fall short in a civilized country—the refuse of all other callings amply sufficing for that purpose. Precious few able-bodied graduates of universities are found or called for in the cloisters of our custom-house. We reserve our public offices for the nobler purpose of furnishing a retreat for the sinful, the unfortunate, and shiftless. That the state of feeling between the extreme radicals and the Italian Government is pleasant may be inferred from the fact that Menotti Garibaldi, in a published letter, calls the latter body "an assemblage of thieves and blackguards."

The great labor question moves all the cities of Europe as much as ever, and the masters are at last beginning to see that to continue the war is useless, and to ask themselves whether there is not some basis of accommodation. A meeting of German, Swiss, and French employers of labor was held in January at Berlin, at which it was determined to hold a great convention, at Bonn, on the 14th and 15th of the present month, to consider seriously the difficulties between capital and labor, and the moral and material condition of the working-classes—and the best means of improving it—under the heads of family life; education of children; relief for the sick and the aged; and facilities for saving and investing; and they invite everybody who is seriously interested in the labor question to attend. We are sorry to say, apropos of the labor question, that the accounts of the working of the industrial partnerships—that is, of the arrangements by which workingmen were admitted to a share in the profits, partly in lieu of wages—do not represent it as succeeding as well as could be desired in cases in which it has been tried, except where labor, rather than machinery or material, played the most prominent part in the enterprise. It has worked well among the coal-mines and house-painters; it is failing on the Orleans Railroad, owing to the decline in the profits of the road, as the line has been extended in branches through poor districts; and has not succeeded at all in certain iron-works which have tried it in England. In one great French cotton factory where it has been tried, a considerable dividend goes to the workers, but hardly sufficient in amount to warrant us in looking to this for a very early solution of the wages difficulty. One of the curious incidents of the day is that M. Cernuschi, the Italian banker who has recently been expelled from France for his subscription in opposition to the plébiscite, is not only one of the acutest economical writers in France, but one of the bitterest opponents of all attempts to base the relation of labor and capital on anything but competition.

"THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS" IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

We asked the Charleston Daily Republican, a fortnight ago, how many members of the last South Carolina Legislature could read a page of the "Pilgrim's Progress" intelligently, or read any plain writing at all, and requested that it would, if possible, fortify its opinion with some statistics. For statistics, it refers us to Treasurer Parker's safe and ingenious statement in the Independent, that all but three members signed their names to the pay-rolls—the value of which, as an indication of the condition of their education, anybody who has ever seen the laborers' signatures to the pay-roll of any large public work will appreciate. As to their ability to read a page of the "Pilgrim's Progress"—about the easiest reading extant—the Republican says it cannot tell, "never having heard any of them read from that particular book"; that they did not graduate at Harvard or Yale; but they could read "a 'Pilgrim's Progress' of their own quite similar to Bunyan's and eloquent; the story of a journey from the City of Destruction, fenced with slavery, to the celestial land of liberty," etc.; that "dozens and dozens" of them "could write such a page of common sense on the politics of South Carolina as has not appeared in the Nation for many a day." It alleges further that, no matter how illiterate they may have been, "their legislation was invariably on the side of human freedom," and avers "that there is nothing like a begging of the question in all this"—the writer evidently feeling a little uncomfortable about the look of the argument. It is quite evident that we shall not get from this quarter any information as to the mental condition of the Legislature.

People, we are glad to say, are beginning to understand this sort of talk. The legislation of all popular bodies everywhere is "now on the side of human freedom," for the simple reason that the big battalions are on the side of human freedom. Open hostility to individual rights we shall probably never again see expressed in laws. The frank and formal assertion of class interests, if not at an end, is very nearly at end. The reign of brute force, against which the world has been so long contending, is nearly over; the enemies with which the next age will have to cope are fraud and chicane, working under the forms of popular government. When William M. Tweed and Peter B. Sweeny were trying to get control of the government of this city, which they now hold more securely than Louis Napoleon holds the government of Paris, they did not begin to abuse the Irish and Germans, or advocate restrictive legislation directed against "the poor man." They proclaimed themselves his champions and defenders; stoutly opposed all attempts to keep him out of the public-house or to exact qualifications of him for the exercise of the elective franchise; and they may truly say that all legislation in which they have had a hand is "on the side of human freedom." But their rule is, nevertheless, as abominable a yoke as the poor man has ever lived under. In no capital in the world is so much of his wages taken by thieves, and so much disregard of his highest interests displayed in the work of government. In other words, he is oppressed through his ignorance and his vote combined. One of the awful crimes of the old slaveholders was their deliberate, legislative denial of knowledge to their laboring population. That alone was sufficient to cause the Furies to be let loose on them; but if they had done it through sheer hate of the colored people, which we do not believe, they could not have wished a better sequence to their reign than the election, under the régime of freedom, of such a Legislature as has been sitting in Charleston during the past winter. Better means of bringing freedom into contempt and of making the restoration of pure, honest government difficult and distant, could not have been hit upon, nor could a deadlier blow have been struck at the colored race. The man who flogged or imprisoned a negro for learning to read committed a great crime, but it was, we say deliberately, a far less crime than is committed by the man who persuades a whole county of negroes that Whittemore is a proper man to represent them in Congress. The one foully oppressed the body, but the other corrupts the conscience and perverts the judgment—in other words, spreads a disease for which in one generation there is hardly any cure possible.

Those who advocated, as we did, the extension of the suffrage to the blacks as an essential feature of reconstruction, have naturally more to answer for in this matter than anybody else, and it would be wrong, even if it were not futile, to try to escape the responsibility. We believe still, in spite of all that has happened, that it was the best, if not the only, course open to Congress. We wish sincerely it had been coupled with an educational test, imposed on all colors equally. We have no doubt the effect would have been admirable, and we should, for the purpose of giving such a test time to work, have been willing to see military government maintained till this moment in every one of the States. We have heard, during the past winter, one of the ablest of the lady teachers who went down from the North to labor among the negroes, after the war, tell of the way in which the schools in her district (in Virginia) were crowded with adults during the reconstruction debates in Congress, while it was still believed that the franchise would not be bestowed without exacting educational qualifications for its exercise, and of the way in which they were deserted as soon as it became certain that no qualification whatever would be required. Such stories, of course, set one inevitably to what is sometimes a very unprofitable occupation, thinking of "what might have been." But in this instance they contain a lesson which is still of use. It is bad enough, of course, that the blacks should be ignorant voters, but we verily believe that, ignorant as they are, their votes would serve the legitimate purpose of protecting them from oppression and class legislation, and helping their political and social training, if the passage of a general amnesty secured the admission of the Southern whites to their natural share in the government of their States. It is prolonged exclusion from politics of the intelligence and culture of the South, and not the ignorance of the blacks, which is working the present mischief, and making so many of the States the prey of unscrupulous Northern adventurers—perhaps the worst enemies the negro has ever had.

These gentry, and their Northern allies, are now trying hard to retain their hold on power, and continue their nefarious calling, by representing everybody who calls attention to their performances as "an enemy of the colored man and the Unionist"—in other words, are trying to live off Northern patriotism and humanity. But it is high time the honest, Christian people of the North used their influence to bring this little comedy to an end. Its continuance is a disgrace to the country, and will ruin the party if it lasts very long. When the Committee of the Senate the other day exposed the doings of that eminent "Unionist," Governor Bullock of Georgia, and pointed out, amongst other things, that he or his confederates had paid $3,500 to the Washington Chronicle for helping him with its articles, the editor opened savagely on the Committee, and pronounced their examination of his books, which had been altered to cover up the real character of the transaction, "a deliberate outrage on justice, and an equally deliberate insult to the Republican party," and asked solemnly whether "it would not have been more consistent with the duties of this austere quartette if they had shown a little more of the same eagerness to investigate the cruelty of the rebels upon the poor Union people of the South?" Now, it is about time that we ceased helping rogues to make fortunes out of "the cruelty of the rebels," and ceased accepting the plea of faithful service in the war as a defence of roguery. We must cease it, if we do not wish the next generation to look back to the war as a curse, and as the beginning of a political dry-rot. The Chicago Tribune, commenting on this very case, makes some remarks which we wish could be read in all churches every Sunday for the next two years:

> "The late war was a great war and a holy war. It had a noble purpose and a glorious result. A great many people were engaged in it, and some were very good people, some not so good, and some, we are sorry to say, were quite indifferent characters. Now, many of these indifferent characters, we are afraid, went into the war not so much because they understood or cared how great its aim was, or its end would probably be, but because they saw it was popular, and thought it a good thing to go into. But the war was fought out by the good people, the bad people, and the indifferent people, with such motive as they had; and the country and the world possess, and will possess, for centuries to come, the fruits thereof. We give praise and thanksgiving, and other generations will be thankful and be full of praise therefor. All this is true, has been said before, and will be said a great many times again. But, nevertheless, we protest that, because it is true, every honest man who may turn out to be a rogue, or every rogue who may be shown to be a rogue still, shall not make the fact that he was faithful during the war a plea in mitigation of punishment for his roguery. He may have fought well, or he may have otherwise served his country well, either with a good motive or a bad one, and, so far as that question goes, let him have due credit and such fame and such power as he may have gained, without question as to what his motives were. But, if he commits forgery, or steals, or murders, or is otherwise derelict in any of his relations to society, let him take the consequences as though no war had ever been fought; as though no Republican party had ever existed; as though he had been Robert Toombs himself, or any other of the wickedest and most virulent of the rebel gentry. Hold him up to the light, or apply even the microscope to him, if need be, and have it understood, once for all, that 'long and weary years given to the Republican party' cannot be pleaded in bar of punishment for any sort of rascality whatever."

This is as sound and saving doctrine as ever was preached. The salvation of this and of all other countries depends, of course, in some degree, on the laws, but in a greater degree on the character of the men who make them, and execute them, and live under them. The laws of Greece and of Mexico will compare favorably with those of the United States; indeed, we believe the Greeks beat us by far in their criminal code. What makes the difference between our social and political condition and theirs is the difference in the quality of our legislators, and judges, and sheriffs. As soon as this disappears, we shall be even as they are, no matter what acts we pass.

THE CHURCH AS A REFORMATORY AGENT.

The singularly unfortunate discussion raised the other evening by a member of Henry Ward Beecher's church, as to whether Charles Dickens was a Christian, coming close upon several strong manifestations, on the part of various ecclesiastical bodies, of a desire to bring the influence of the church into play for the reform of such of the gross political abuses of the day as result from a bluntness of the moral sense, either in politicians or voters, has set a great many thoughtful people to asking more seriously than ever, what can the church as an organization do in the matter? We believe it is admitted by all sects, that in the first ages of the church pure living was the test, the distinguishing mark, of a Christian. It was only later, after the philosophers had been at work at the faith, that doctrines or points of belief assumed the importance they have since held. In the first century and second century, a man proclaimed his faith in Christ by his morals, and the principal vices of paganism were of a nature to make the line between the church and the world very broad and distinct. Those vices were cruelty and licentiousness. A body which made love the basis of their dealings with their fellows, or which practised chastity as one of the most solemn of obligations, therefore readily became conspicuous and influential. Every member of it was a missionary, and helped it to conquer the world by the mere spectacle of "a godly, sober, and religious life." In short, the Christian faith was largely spread by contrast.

The church has in our time, in a great degree, gone back to its ancient ways. It has nearly passed out of the doctrinal period. Not only have doctrines within the last century undergone great modification, but they are held with such looseness that it is difficult to put on paper any string of propositions to which any denomination would give an unqualified adhesion. The clergy have ceased to be metaphysicians and logicians, and have become, as the earlier pastors doubtless were, moralists, and philanthropists, and reformers. They console, and educate, and relieve, but they do not argue, or define, or construct theological dilemmas, as they did for many centuries. The laity themselves have grown weary of dogmas, or care but little about them, and put their faith in doing justice and loving mercy.

Under these circumstances, one might naturally expect the Church to display once more the energy of its earlier days, the energy which enabled a few mechanics and peasants to build up in a couple of centuries an organization which took possession of society, and became the sole guardian of civilization and morals. The difficulty is, however, that "the world" which it has to deal with is no longer the world which the apostles and evangelists went to work on. Its vices have greatly changed, and so have its virtues. What with the influence of Christianity and the growth of civilization, cruelty may be said to have disappeared, or to be held in the greatest reprobation; licentiousness, though far from extinct, has greatly diminished, or is veiled. Many of the stronger passions, such as hate and revenge, have lost a great deal of their force. It is, therefore, no longer the distinction it once was for a man to be temperate, chaste, and affectionate, self-sacrificing and forgiving. The practice of these virtues has become so easy that thousands practise them without the aid or stimulus that comes from sympathy, or from belonging to an organization, or without ever entering a church door. If an early Christian, whose faith was kept warm by the sight of the wickedness which surrounded him, were to come on earth again, he would find some of his greatest glories commonplace enough.

The vices of our time—that is, of a commercial and scientific age—are fraud, chicane, falsehood, and over-eagerness in pursuit of material enjoyment, and scepticism as to the existence of anything higher or better. The political corruption of which we complain is only one of their manifestations. There is nothing coarse, or violent, or striking about them, however. All our offences against bona fides are committed in the quietest and most unobtrusive way, and our pleasures are marked neither by cruelty nor gluttony. They are indeed, in the strict sense of the word, refined. Now, vices of this kind it is no easy matter to stigmatize; and, consequently, it is almost impossible for a man to display his horror of them by attaching himself to a religious organization, or for the religious organization to get the credit of his virtuous living. The complexity of modern commercial operations is so great, the line between what is fair and what is foul so faint, the legitimate rewards of enterprise and foresight so hard very often to distinguish from the gains of improper concealment or evasion, that it is often very difficult for a man to say himself whether he is acting honestly or not, and much more so for a bystander. The result is that the church itself contains all kinds of people, and its existence is no longer a protest, as it once was, against the sins of the day. Great numbers of the knaves of our time—that is, the equivalent of the fornicators, and adulterers, and gluttons, and lovers of gladiatorial shows, against whom the early Christians testified in blood and tears—are in the church, and even active in it, and call themselves "Christians" as a help in their business; and their presence, great and small, has robbed the church, we do not hesitate to say, of a large portion of its power as a reformatory agency. If it is ever again to play the part it once played, as an organization, in purifying human society, it must devise some means of making its membership really a sign of pure living, that is, not simply of abstinence from vices which are no longer in vogue, but of vices by which we are all tempted a thousand times a day. We do not now find it hard work not to attend prize-fights or to avoid gross impurity, but we do find it very hard to avoid lying, cheating, and stealing, because their rewards in honor and profit were never before so great.

One sect—which, we are sorry to say, is rapidly declining in numbers—has succeeded to a great extent in furnishing the kind of ecclesiastical organization which the times call for, and which all sects will have to become if the church is to be anything more than a means of individual edification or of æsthetic culture; we mean the Quakers. They have by means of careful training, and rigid—doubtless over-rigid, as the decline of the body proves—discipline succeeded in making their name stand in people's mouths and minds for that of a body of men eminently just and true in all their dealings; of men who, while pursuing the goods of this life with eagerness, are careful to cultivate such contempt for them as comes of the remembrance that there are things far greater and better, of which even in this world a foretaste is to be had. A knave cannot stay long, or stay comfortably, among Quakers, and they have succeeded in convincing the world of this fact to such a degree that, as in the late choice of the Indian Agents, for instance, the President turned to them instinctively for faithful instruments. We do not mean to say that their discipline can be imitated by other denominations, or that it is desirable it should; but if other denominations wish their denunciations of fraud and corruption to have weight, and their reproaches of such men as Dickens for not being Christians to be anything but impertinences, they will have to weed themselves in some way of their tainted members, and prevent themselves being used to push trade.

CHARLES DICKENS.

DOUBTLESS in all the world there is no man of letters whose death could cause so widespread and sincere a grief, and a grief that was in very many hearts so profound, as that caused by the death of Mr. Dickens on Thursday last. Not only wherever the English race exists—in the British Islands, in India, at the antipodes, and round the world again to America, where he has given happiness to millions of readers—but also in almost every country, of whatever race, within the limits of civilization, the creations of his pen have for many years been familiar figures, and have attracted to him the strong liking as well as the high admiration of innumerable men and women and children. Every great author has multitudes of friends whom he has never seen and will never see, but there can none be named, of any tongue, who might not be taken away and leave behind him regret for his loss in fewer households than have been saddened, the world over, by the death of this most beloved of story-tellers. Opinions might differ as to his place among men of genius; and there have even been more opinions than one as to his right to be ranked among men of genius at all; nor has he been without enemies; nor did it happen to him more than to others to go through life without giving to his enemies some grounds for their attacks; but that he had a generous and loving nature, delighting in happiness and in conferring happiness, was never denied by those who cared for him least; and in hearts that knew the kindness of his he has long had a home. It is good criticism of him—whether or not it was meant to be other than eulogy and a tribute of admiration—when Thackeray, at the end of the "English Humorists," relates of one of his little girls how when she is sad she reads "Nicholas Nickleby;" when she is glad she reads "Nicholas Nickleby;" and when she is tired or ill she reads "Nicholas Nickleby;" and when she does not know what to do there is always "Nicholas Nickleby" to read; and when she has done reading it she begins it over again, and is constantly asking her papa why, instead of writing certain other novels, he does not write one like "Nicholas Nickleby." Mayfair, and Brighton, and the conversation in the club-room windows, and Mr. Pen's indifferentism, must indeed have seemed either meaningless or hateful to the soft heart and the untutored taste of the little reader when she put her father's work into comparison with the lampblack-and-lightning picture of the villany of the wicked old Ralph; and the patience and impatience under all he had to put up with of ragged Newman Noggs; and the cruelty and subsequent righteous downfall of Mr. Squeers; and the badness of the young Squeers; and the wretchedness and piteous end of poor Smike; and the heartiness of Mr. John Browdie, and of his Yorkshire puddings and game-pies. In all this, a kindness of heart which everybody can appreciate, and a disregard of the niceties of art, or, indeed, an obvious ignorance of them and insensibility to them, are the things most striking.

However it may be with writers and readers whom it is not in the end much worth while for any good reader or good writer to have, it is probable that no truly good writer gets his true audience in his own generation. He must wait, and must learn to be content at first with being liked for things in him that are not essential. His true public, which values him for what in him is really and always valuable, is made up from the capable readers and writers of successive generations. We do not know with precisely what accuracy it is said, but they say that of all Dickens's stories the one most successful with the contemporary public was that in which is narrated the life and death of "Little Nell." And it would, perhaps, be possible to prove—as, indeed, it would be not unconsonant with the affection for him that most of his readers feel—that it is for his pathos, or at least for his sympathy with the suffering, rather than for any other quality of his, that most of his admirers admire him. He himself, as he read his works, seemed to value as much as anything such things as the account of "Tiny Tim" in the "Christmas Carol," and it is to be presumed that so experienced a reader to popular audiences knew what hit the popular taste.

But that in estimating the true greatness of the man we shall do better, as regards success in getting at his exact value, to put out of consideration all the pathetic parts of his writing, and everything in his books by which he has a hold on the tender-heartedness of his readers, there seems to be little room for doubt. It is not by his "Little Nells," and "Paul Dombeys," and "Smikes," and "Tom Pinches"; nor by his attacks on the workhouses and the Circumlocution Office, that he is to live; and his title to enduring fame is more firmly based on the "Pickwick Papers" than on "Bleak House," or the "Old Curiosity Shop," or "Barnaby Rudge," or the "Tale of Two Cities." Strong as he is as a melodramatist, and elaborate as he is in his appeals to the feelings, and earnest as he no doubt was in his hatred of injustice, and skilful as he now and again shows himself to be—as for instance in the case of the hero of the "Tale of Two Cities"—in divining the depths and intricacies of a real character, and voluminous as he is—for he must have been one of the most industrious as well as prolific of the authors of our day, and leaves behind him an enormous number of printed pages—noteworthy as he is in these various ways, it seems certain that he is to be read by our children's children for the use he made as a humorist and a humorous caricaturist of his remarkable powers of observation. Mrs. Nickleby and not Lady Dedlock, Mr. Micawber, Tony Weller, the Shepherd, Sam Weller, Mr. Bounderby, Mrs. Jellaby, Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Winkle, Old Willet, Dick Swiveller, Captain Cuttle, Mr. Pogram, Mr. Hannibal Chollop, Mark Tapley, Mr. Toots, Susan Nipper, Mr. Simon Tappertit, Mr. Wegg, Mr. Alfred Jingle, Mr. Pecksniff, the young man by the name of Guppy, and the young gentleman known as Young Bailey, and, greatest of all, Mrs. Gamp the friend of Mrs. Harris—doubtless it is in virtue of having produced these figures, representing with the truth of humorous distortion some laughable trait of character, some class in society, some odd phase of humanity—that the favorite author of our generation will go down the stream of time. Many a generation will read him for his fun that will shed no tears over him—whose tears there will be contemporary pathos to call out, for the benefit of writers who will know how to touch the easier springs of tears as well as any of us know, or any of the men and women knew who made our grandfathers and grandmothers weep and who make none of us weep now.

The list we have given of vividly colored figures which it is not too much to say have now for years been a portion of the mental furniture of millions of mankind, is a long one; but how it might be lengthened everybody knows. There are Master Bitzer and Cousin Feenix, and Joe Bagstock, and Mr. Barkis, and Mr. Venus, and Uriah Heep, and Miss Trotwood, and Mr. Dick, and a hundred more whose right to enumeration might be insisted upon. Perhaps, had the list of his works been shorter we should not now be lamenting the death of the artist, who crowded into his lifetime a quantity of work which gives as strong evidence of his capacity to labor and his industrious habits as the quality of his work gives of the native power of his mind. Dying in his fifty-ninth year, he was the author of eighteen or twenty long novels, of scores of short stories, such as the "Christmas Carol," of columns on columns of writing for periodicals, of two or three of which he was editor, of countless speeches, and of letters unnumbered. This strength and activity he may be excused for having tried too much, for they must have seemed to him unbounded.

He began life as a student of the law, his father, who was at one time a Government clerk, and afterwards a short-hand reporter, having articled him to an attorney, to whose office we may suppose ourselves indebted for some part of Mr. Sampson Brass, and Mr. Swiveller, and Messrs. Dodson & Fogg, and Sergeant Buzfuz, and Mr. Spenlow. Using his eyes on the outsides of attorneys and bailiffs was, however, more to the taste of the student than using them on the insides of law-books, and it was not long before Mr. Dickens found himself on the press, and studying short-hand. He is said to have made a very good parliamentary reporter, and everybody will remember how in "David Copperfield" he describes his troubles as a learner of stenography. Some of his late speeches, too, bear witness to his having experienced some of the trials of the journalist. But as he later discovered, when he attempted to conduct the Daily News, that it was not in the higher walks of journalism that he could do his best work, so he early discovered that he could do better work than reporting, and he was hardly of age when he published his "Sketches, by Boz," which, although timidly written, are specimens of the vein which very soon afterwards he opened in its full richness. They resemble the sketches now known to all the world as "The Pickwick Papers," which probably may, as a whole, be called his best work. Here and there in the other books there are to be found particular passages and personages which may perhaps be considered better than anything in "Pickwick." Mrs. Gamp is perhaps still better than Tony Weller; but though Mr. Dickens afterwards brought to his work greater power of thought and greater depth of feeling and more artistic faculty, it may be maintained that his best writing in his proper line he did at the age of twenty-five. Having written the "Pickwick Papers," which at once became irresistibly popular, Mr. Dickens became convinced, evidently, that he had found his true vocation, and thenceforward he was a story-teller and humorous caricaturist—now in magazines, now in pamphlets, now in volumes, sometimes melodramatic, sometimes humanitarian, always with effusive good nature, often with defective taste, never, apparently, with a just notion of the limitations of his powers, but always attaining the story-teller's success of having an immense number of eager listeners, and with each new story making it plainer that as a humorous caricaturist he was without an equal.

Of such a man, living such a life, and of books such as he has left, a thousand things might be said and will be said. Those who knew him personally will long be busy repeating proofs of his activity, his usefulness, his courage, his kindness; and the books are secure of being regarded as a part of the intellectual wealth of the world. It is enough to say of him now and in this place, by way of expressing the respect which it is proper to express at the grave, that he was as widely beloved as he was widely known, and that he has so much that is permanently admirable that he can afford to lose most of his present admirers.

A TALE OF ANCIENT WRONG.

ABOUT this time of the year, as regularly as the seasons roll, the newspapers begin to discuss the subject of "country board," and to receive letters about it from that large class of dwellers in cities to whom the expensive joys of Newport and Saratoga and Sharon are forbidden, but who, nevertheless, want to get to the country with their families during the hot weather, and, partly for the sake of seclusion and plain clothes, and partly for the sake of economy, resort to the farm-houses. The number of farm-houses which now receive city families in July and August is practically unlimited. The boarders, however, generally come back to town feeling swindled, attenuated, badly bitten, and somewhat run down in digestion, and possibly with the seeds of disease implanted in the children by poor fare, vowing, if not swearing, that they have had the last of "country board." By the time the summer comes again, however, the memory of last year's woes has grown faint, and the grass and the foliage become tempting, and the streets look hot, and dusty, and lonely, and the children look pale, and another trial is made; and so on from year to year, till some people are lashed into fury by the mere sight of a farmer, and think of a farm-house as a den in which strangers are starved and cheated, under pretence of being fattened and strengthened; and their indignation is favored by the press, which, in May and June, remonstrates savagely with the agricultural population upon its beds, its beef, its butter and milk, and, indeed, its whole manner of life.

We are not so vain as to suppose that anything we can say can bring the parties in this controversy to an understanding. There are some woes which nothing but the consolations of religion can assuage, as the lady said apropos of the expensive clothes of her next door neighbor's daughters, and we are far from flattering ourselves that we can pluck from anybody's brain the bitter memories of saleratus bread, and boiled pork, rancid butter, skimmed milk, or other country delicacies. But we think we can give some reasons why a city family of moderate means and average fortitude should accept the existing condition of country living with at least as much resignation as it accepts the narrowness of fortune, or the dust of the cars, or the dulness of trade, or the weight of taxation. In other words, we think there is more to be said for the farmer and his wife than this pair of badly fed extortioners are likely to say for themselves, partly, no doubt, owing to their callousness, but somewhat to their defective literary training.

In the first place, we think the ideas of farm-house life formed by city people are greatly colored either by boyish recollections of the enjoyment of things only enjoyable when one is very young, very poor, and very inexperienced, or by the literary view of country life derived from magazines and novels. According to the novelists and magazine writers, the farm is a real Arcadia, flooded, however, with the light of modern thought. The air is ever heavy with the scent of the flowers and the blossoms and the new-mown hay; the orchards are laden with golden fruit; the barnyard swarms with tender chickens, and the shelves of the dairy groan under the cream-pans and the cheese; and of these nothing goes to market till the family have had their fill. The farmer himself is a jolly and open-handed man, full of wise saws and modern instances, and his wife, an industrious, bustling, efficient person, with her head full of receipts for dainty dishes, which it is her special delight to prepare, and which she revels in seeing other people eat. The picture of the daughters, too, is well calculated to fire the dullest imagination. They make their own clothes, of plain, sensible materials, it is true, but cut on patterns furnished by Harper's Bazar, so that, as far as externals go, they are not distinguishable from really good city girls. They do nearly all the work of the house, and delight in it—in fact, consider it "fun"—without ever soiling their dresses, and almost without soiling their fingers, and hate the sight of Irish "helps." They take "a Robinson-Crusoe-like pleasure" in the chores. Every morning "they give the coffee-pot a ration of fragrant beaten paste—the brown kernels mixed with an egg;" into one frying-pan "they set the milk for the brewis, into which, when it boils up white and drifting, go the sweet fresh butter and the salt, and then the bread-crumbs; and the result is a light, delicate, savory bread-porridge, to eat daintily with a fork, and be thankful for." In the other pan "are the fried eggs and the sprinkle of salt and pepper," and "over it stands Barbara, with a tin-spoon, to toss up and turn till the whole is just curdled with the heat into white and yellow flakes, not one of which is raw nor one dry." When the breakfast is on the table, Rosamond puts a tea-rose in a glass vase at the edge of the white waiter napkin, and through the three cool west windows the morning breeze comes in, and "overbears the remembrance of the cooking and the reminder of the stove." After breakfast, "Ruth picks up the dishes, and it is something delicate to see her scrape them clean with a pliant knife, as a painter might cleanse his palette, and then they are set before mother in files and groups on the Pembroke table. She sits in her raised arm-chair, as she might sit making tea for company, and has her little mop and three long, soft, clean towels beside her." We need hardly say they also contribute to the Atlantic and Galaxy, and read Emerson. When they propose to take a few boarders in summer, what wonder if people from the city fly to them, and smack their lips over the prospect of the coffee and the brewis and the scrambled eggs, and sniff in anticipation the aroma of the tea-rose?

The unvarnished truth—the horrid truth—is, however, that farm-life in the United States, as in all countries in which labor is scarce and dear, is a very hard, coarse, monotonous life. The lovely farm-houses of the poets and novelists are places in which servants abound, in which stout dairy-maids milk the early cow and make the fragrant butter, and stout cooks serve the delicious coffee, and the savory brewis, and the perfect scrambled eggs; and in which stout kitchen-maids scrape the dishes, not as the painter scrapes his palette, but in whatever fashion will take the grease off quickest; and stout laborers handle the shovel and the hoe, and the farmer looks on and grows fat, and his wife compounds receipts and follows up the maids, and the girls of the family have time to trim the roses, and train the sweetbrier, and ride the pony. The farmer who offers you board every summer, dear city people, is a very hard-worked man, who, by constant toil with his own hands from morn till night, all the year round, barely makes ends meet, and lays up something for his old age, and to give his boys and girls a start in life, or send them to school or college. His wife is just as sorely tried as himself, and has for many years found the preparation even of the fare you turn up your noses at such a very dismal task—the stove so hot and her back so weary—that not only is her repertory of receipts very small, and not only does she not care to add to it, but she wishes in her heart there was no such thing as food known, and would herself, were it not for the cravings of her men folk, gladly live on tea and bread or coffee and pie all the year round. The girls, instead of looking forward eagerly to your coming, and being ready to discuss Shakespeare and the musical glasses with you, have probably gone off to teach or work in a factory, as the readiest way of supporting themselves and lightening their father's burdens. Even if you should find them at home, however, so far from wanting to make coffee and brewis and bake bread for you, they have been so long and so faithfully learning the great democratic lesson of equality, that the last thing in the world they wish is to wait on you. They think you are quite competent to wait on yourselves, and that if you did more of it it would be better for you; so they set themselves resolutely to keep you in mind of the futility and baselessness of the little airs of refinement and social superiority which you bring down with you from the city.

It must be borne in mind, too, which it seems not to be by many persons, that farmers who offer country board are not induced to do so by a feeling of compassion for the city people, or from a desire to bring the roses back to their cheeks. They are induced to do it by the hope of making a little money with the least possible outlay on their part, and the least possible disturbance of their daily life. People who complain of the coarseness of their fare and the badness of their beds talk as if they deliberately went to work to set up a poor boarding-house, and that the poverty of their table was the result simply of a desire to cheat. It is nothing of the kind. The way that the farmer asks you to live is rather better than the way he and his family live all the rest of the year. The saleratus bread is the bread always consumed in the family, and if he sends his fat chickens, and his lambs, and his best vegetables to the market, it is because he has always done so; if he were to let you eat them, he would probably make little or nothing by keeping you. What you ask him to do when you call for good bread and fresh meat every day, and good vegetables and milk of the first quality, is to rearrange his whole life and business for two months in the year. If he were to give you such a table as you ask for, he would have to get from New York such a cook as you pay sixteen or eighteen dollars a month to; and, instead of the wild "help" whom you see rushing to and fro furtively between the kitchen and the wood-pile like a guilty thing upon a fearful summons, probably picked up in the nearest settlement at five or six dollars a month, he would have to get a waiter or two from the city at double that sum. In short, for the number of boarders his house will contain, the thing would never pay. He does not want to go into a new business; he simply invites you, if you want country air, to share the fare and conveniences of his own household.

The remedy is to be found—if remedy there be—in the multiplication of boarding-houses, managed by people who understand keeping them, and make a business of it. Boarding city people cannot be tacked on to farming, as American farm life now is, and as American women now practise cookery. What we want is a greater number of country inn-keepers, who know what city people need to make them comfortable, and are not above trying to supply it, instead of making, as so many "hotel-keepers" do, a steady effort to reform city manners, and show guests that their desires are unreasonable. Let us suggest, too, that, now that women are looking about so eagerly for new fields of employment, and are so fretted by the public disinclination to let them be lawyers and brokers, that there is here an excellent opening for farmers' daughters. A company of young women, in any healthy and picturesque locality, who could furnish amongst them really good cooks, chambermaids, and waiters, and were not above being polite—not servile, but polite—might, we are sure, reap a golden harvest every summer. There would be little difficulty in their finding houses or capital, if they gave any evidence of ability to make use of them; and they might rob the summer of the terrors it now has for so many thousands of families.

But of the improvement of board in farm-houses we cannot conscientiously hold out any hope. It cannot come without a total reorganization of American agricultural life, and the breaking up of many very deeply rooted habits, and these we are not likely to see in our time. People who cannot stand farm-house board, and cannot afford the great hotels or country houses, would therefore do well to stay at home. If they have to do so, too, we see no objection to their persuading themselves, as so many do, that the air of Murray Hill is as pure as any on the continent, and that, for real coolness and repose, there is no place on a summer evening like the stoop of a New York house. But there is little use in abusing the farmers, and just as little in dreaming golden dreams of the summer that is to be. All board is vanity and vexation of spirit, whether it be in town or country. There is probably no image which so many active and subtle brains have delighted in conjuring up as the ideal boarding-house-keeper. Many is the pillow on which she has spread succulent beefsteaks and potatoes done to a turn, and light, wholesome, and well-baked bread, with a winning and respectful smile. But the vision fades with the morning light, and we fear it will be long before poor humanity sees it embodied in flesh and blood.

ENGLAND.—THE IRISH LAND BILL—CRIMES.

LONDON, May 27, 1870.

I HAVE spoken recently of the improved temper in which the House of Commons have met since the Easter vacation. The general conviction that some measure would have to be passed this session, and the utter weariness produced by the long-continued debates, have certainly led to much greater activity. The Irish Land Bill has finally passed through committee, and will doubtless be sent up in its present state to the House of Lords. That it will pass that body also substantially in its present form cannot be seriously doubted. The legal peers will, it is to be hoped, remove some of the inconsistencies and perplexities which naturally result from the process of patching, tinkering, and overhauling to which the bill has been subjected; but they will not make any material alteration. I may, therefore, take the opportunity to notice shortly one or two of the main results which have been obtained.

The chief object of the bill was to render evictions for frivolous purposes more difficult. The landlord cannot get rid of his tenant in future without making compensation for improvements effected at the tenant's expense, and paying him a considerable sum for turning him out. The difficulty is, of course, to determine in any given case on what principles the amount of compensation is to be settled. A great many regulations are laid down in the bill for this purpose, of which it is the general tendency to lay the burden of proof upon the landlord. In cases of dispute, the local courts will have to decide the question, and it is obvious that a great deal will depend upon the view which they take of their duties, and the interpretation which they may put upon various clauses of the act. The bill has thus been shortly described as a bill for enabling landlords and tenants to go to law, whilst giving certain advantages to the tenants. The opponents of the measure fear that an enormous amount of litigation will be caused, and it has been said that its success depends upon the degree in which the attorneys can be kept quiet. Considering the keen eye which gentlemen of that profession generally exhibit in regard to their own interests, the prospect would not be very encouraging, and it is plain that the judges will have a difficult task in making a satisfactory valuation of the claims of contending parties. For these reasons, it is argued, that although in a general way the tendency of the bill is to increase the security of tenure and give additional protection against arbitrary evictions, it is not at all clear that the working of the act will conduce very decidedly to the pacification of the country. It requires more knowledge of Irish matters than I can affect to possess to pronounce any confident opinion upon these points. Meanwhile, however, certain alternatives have been proposed which deserve a little attention. In the first place, the measure originally proposed by Mr. Bright has been added to the bill, and it is singular that it was passed with an almost entire absence of discussion. When originally suggested a very few years ago, it was denounced as revolutionary in the extreme. Now it has been quietly accepted with scarcely a word of protest, and nobody on either side seems to have taken much interest in its fate. Mr. Bright's plan, as I may perhaps remind you, was to advance money to the tenants to buy up their holdings. The main objection raised is the simple one that, in this case, the state will put itself in the place of the landlord, and will draw upon itself the odium to which he was exposed. In bad seasons there will probably be a considerable pressure upon Parliament to lower its demands, and it will be difficult and invidious for officials to enforce the payment of the debts by evicting the tenant. Whatever may be the force of this objection, the plan was quietly adopted; though there seems to be great difference of opinion as to the extent to which people are likely to avail themselves of the offer. Another scheme, proposed by Sir John Gray and Judge Longfield, attracted more notice, and was remarkable as being demanded with great unanimity by a large number of the Irish farmers. The plan, as proposed by Sir John Gray, was to enable the tenants and landlords to agree voluntarily upon a scheme of tenant-right. A landlord, that is, might give a fixed tenure to his tenant, subject to valuations by Government inspectors at the end of every fourteen years. In this way, the landlord would in fact be reduced to the position of the holder of a permanent rent-charge. Judge Longfield proposed to avoid the difficulty of recurring valuations by an ingenious expedient. The landlord might, if he pleased, raise his rent and demand from the tenant a higher rent; if, however, the tenant declined to accept the offer, the landlord would be obliged to buy him out at a rate calculated on the scale of his own valuation. Thus there would be a kind of self-acting check which would render unnecessary any cumbrous machinery for valuation or arbitration. It is needless to discuss the merits of this plan, as it was rejected by a very large majority. Consequently, the bill such as I have shortly endeavored to describe will go up to the House of Lords only modified by a few corrections which Government have found it necessary to make. Its success must be decided by the future; but I do not think that it will be received with much enthusiasm in the first instance, or that the Irish will in general consider it to be a final solution of the question. Whatever its imperfections, it is certainly sincerely meant, and is a great effort to settle an exceedingly complicated problem. Government has so large and well-disciplined a majority that it could almost dictate its own terms; and, in spite of some occasional recalcitrations, no effective stand has been made by any party—either by the extreme radicals or by the steady conservatives. The success up to this moment seems to prove that the Education Bill will probably go through the House of Commons with an equal degree of success, and, if so, we shall certainly have seen an unusual amount of work in the course of the session.

Other topics of discussion, of considerable though minor interest, are by no means wanting. A great debate, for example, took place in the House of Lords the other night upon the Greek murders. It is difficult to say what will be the final result, or whether there will be any great result of the indignation which has been pretty freely expressed. After a very good speech from Lord Carnarvon, who is the cousin of one of the murdered travellers, Government made an appeal for the adjourment of the debate, to which, of course, no opposition could be made. The general feeling, I think, seems to be that the matter was thoroughly muddled by the Greek authorities, but that, on the other hand, our minister, Mr. Erskine, by no means showed any particular discretion. He certainly seems to have been in great degree responsible for the advance of the troops, which was the immediate cause of the murder of the captives, and was a principal cause of complaint against the Greek Government. Consequently, our claim for redress is somewhat modified, although the whole story is disgraceful to everybody except the unfortunate gentlemen, who appear to have submitted to their fate with a courage which we are glad to describe as English. Further explanations must be received before we shall be able to arrive at any final conclusion; but I imagine the end will be that, after a certain amount of diplomatic remonstrance on our part, and of apologizing and compensation on the part of the Greeks, the affair will blow over. Meanwhile, we have a crop of murders in our own country of so horrible a kind as to go a long way towards distracting public attention. Within two or three hundred yards of the room where I am writing, a man murdered an aged clergyman and his housekeeper the other day, buried the clergyman in a drain in his garden, and then put the housekeeper's body in a box, with a view to sending it off by railway. The carman to whom he applied to take away the barrel found that blood was oozing from it, and immediately seized the murderer and fetched the police. The motive of the crime was simply plunder, with the view, which you will appreciate, of settling on the proceeds in the United States. We had scarcely heard this story when another still more frightful crime was made public. A man went into a house for the purpose of petty robbery, was met unexpectedly by the owner, knocked him down with a hammer, then killed in the same way the wife and sister-in-law of his victim, who were rushing in on the alarm, and completed his infernal atrocities by killing three or, I think, four little children in the house. This wild beast, for he seems to have been little more, put on the clothes of the murdered man, and was shortly afterwards arrested, with the most convincing proofs of his crime still upon him. Anything more hideous or more grossly stupid it would be difficult to imagine, and it makes one shudder to think of the human brutes who are rubbing shoulders with us in the streets. It almost seems as if the contagion of Traupmann had spread, and as if it was beginning to be a recognized mode of rising in the world to kill off a family and emigrate with their property to New York. Luckily the scheme does not seem to have been hitherto very successful.

To turn to an offence of a lighter kind, though it also is rather unpleasantly significant, some young gentlemen at Oxford have just contrived to eclipse the former follies of many generations of undergraduates. They got into the library at Christ Church one night, took out a valuable bust of Dr. Gaisford, the late dean, and a statue of Venus. Having erected these objects of art in the middle of the quadrangle, they, or I believe another party of graduates, hit upon the brilliant idea of making them the centre of a bonfire, and the statuary was thoroughly destroyed. Perhaps it is scarcely worth mentioning these playful tricks of young Oxford, except for one reason. They have certainly gone some way to increase a rising feeling against the relaxation of discipline which has become too common at our universities. Athletic sports of various kinds have superseded study in the minds of a large part of the youth, and, on the whole, we are beginning to think that it is possible to devote too much energy to acquiring perfection in cricket and rowing. This, however, is comparatively trifling; but when one sees pure rowdyism coming to such a head as this last exploit indicates, one begins to think that Oxford is made rather too pleasant for luxurious and indolent young men. After all, it ought to be a place of study rather than a place where overgrown schoolboys may play pranks to the height of a drunken fancy. Meanwhile, three of the young gentlemen in question have been expelled, which is a serious punishment, as affecting their future character; and perhaps a few weeks in the house of correction would have been a better warning and exercised a stronger influence.

I may, before concluding, notice one curious circumstance. The debate on the Contagious Diseases Act came on on Tuesday evening. A member used an almost obsolete privilege by insisting upon the withdrawal of strangers, and consequently no report of the debate has been published. The performance will probably lead to a repeal of this last relic of the old-fashioned days when reporting was held to be a breach of privilege. The reason of the exercise of the right on the present occasion was rather curious. Some ladies who have been agitating for the repeal of the acts were present in the gallery, and refused to withdraw from the discussion of a subject so little suited to feminine ears. This is an illustration of a remark I made in my last letter; but the part which the ladies have taken in this dispute does not increase the favor with which most men regard the agitation for women's rights. The conduct of those who were present was not precisely accordant with old-fashioned notions of female decorum. I may add that Government has declared its intention of issuing a commission of enquiry into the subject, and I gladly put off any further remarks upon a disagreeable topic until some more trustworthy information has been published.

Correspondence.

THE DIFFICULT QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir—Will you allow some notice of the communication signed J. P. T., in the Nation of April 28? The writer is incorrect in representing the advocates of the Bible in schools as the aggressors. The Cincinnati resolution of Nov., 1869, was not simply the "repeal" of an act, leaving things as they were before it, but a direct prohibition of what had been sanctioned by long usage, dating back to the very embryo existence of the nation. Had the Board contented themselves with resolving that the reading of the Scriptures should not be compulsory, their case would have been a fairer one. When, however, they go beyond this, and resolve that the Bible, together with all religious instruction, be absolutely prohibited, it puts an entirely new face upon the matter. It is no longer a favoring of religion; it is no longer indifference or neutrality, but a favoring of irreligion. There is involved that fundamental question, which must be thoroughly examined on the very threshold of this controvery, whether non-religion or atheism—for it is coming to that at last—is a mere negation, an indifference, or, on the other hand, a most positive, active, and intolerant principle—a sect, and the worst of all sects. We suggest it to "J. P. T." as an ethical and philosophical, as well as theological, enquiry, that is to have a most important bearing on this great war which he fears is coming. And it most assuredly will come. However much the religious party may concede, it is not in the nature of the other to remain quiescent. Nothing is so aggressive, so intolerant, as irreligion; and this free country, above all others, is destined to show it.

"J. P. T." misstates the question when he speaks of "legislation by the state avowedly in the interest of Christianity, by its authority as a religion, and for the support of that authority in the community." That is not asked. It is simply the acknowledgment of Christianity as a fact deeply entering into the social life, and to be had in regard whenever the political action comes in contact with it, as it must do in many cases, and especially when the state assumes to educate. In such cases, can there be that perfect neutrality which to some minds seems so easy? That depends entirely on the nature of Christianity and of its antagonist. The former, says "J. P. T.," "is a subtle [subtile?] unorganized influence, by its ethereal and spiritual principles pervading every department of society, the family, the school, the state." How Christianity is "to pervade the school," when it is not permitted to enter it, it would be hard to say. But let that pass. In calling it "unorganized," or inorganic, he uses the term which, of all others, is most unsuitable to it. Christianity is not like a school of philosophy or art. It is an organic and organizing social power, and, where it exists as a predominant fact, not to treat it as such is acting a political falsehood. To put it on a par with other things, inferior, worthless, or positively malign, is gross injustice; to ignore it altogether is downright hostility. It is easy to start objections and difficulties here, but we are dealing with facts and inevitable consequences. If the state were like a bank or a railroad company, or some other mere "business concern," according to Macaulay's low argument, there might be some plausibility in the assertion that, as such, it had nothing to do with religion. Again, if it were nothing more than a huge mass-meeting, coming and going, without any continuity of life, without any organic personality, or any moral responsibility, as such, it might be said, on the other hand, that religion had nothing to do with the state. In like manner, if Christianity were only a "subtle influence," as "J. P. T." says, it might be too intangible a thing to be brought in question. But Christianity is also an educating power, and if the state, too, assumes this office, they must be either in agreement or collision.

But these obstructions, as some might call them, may be best illustrated by two most practical questions. They are suggested by the somewhat exulting manner in which "J. P. T." seems to speak of "the Cincinnati lesson." First, Are those who advocate the Bible's exclusion, on the grounds generally alleged, prepared for the concession of full reciprocity? "No religious teaching," says the resolution—what is such, to be judged of by those opposed. Turn the tables, then. There are reading-books in our common schools, there are text-books used in our state-patronized colleges, to say nothing of law-furnished libraries and reading-rooms, which sincere, conscientious, and intelligent religionists regard as having an irreligious tendency, or as making it less easy for their children to hold the faith of their fathers. Shall they be excluded? If not, why not? Or why is not the objection as good, to say the least, in the one case as in the other? Second, Are the advocates aforesaid prepared to go the full length to which the plea of the non-religionist must inevitably lead, if applied, as it most surely will be applied, to all cases in which there remains the least shred of acknowledgment by the state of any religious observance or idea?

There is a wonderful consistency, as well as persistency, in the movement of the irreligious party in this country. They demand nothing less than a perfect wiping out of everything in the Constitution, the statute-book, in political or judicial action, that favors, or seems to favor, any religious principle whatever. They demand the abrogation of all Sabbath laws. They declare that Sabbath observances by public bodies are a violation of this alleged principle of neutrality. Courts and legislatures have no right to waste the people's time and money by adjourning on one day in seven, out of deference to any religious idea, however long its standing, or however deeply it is connected with the social life. The oath must be abolished; it is a religious act, a recognition, moreover, of God and retribution. Prayers in Congress must cease; the practice is "the entering wedge of church and state." Chaplainships in the army and navy must be discontinued. However perilous the condition of the country, there must be no proclamations from Presidents and Governors appointing days of supplication to any Supreme Ruler; there is no power higher than the people, and magistrates must not defer to individual superstition. On the same ground, they are opposed to all legislation for the improvement of public morals. The state, they boldly and consistently say, is not a moral power, and cannot act from moral reasons. Is all this to be conceded? Why not, if the premise involved in this school question, this "entering wedge" of Antichrist and state, be sound and consistent? Perhaps "J. P. T." is right, but is he prepared to go all the way in which this road must lead him? Is he ready for the bald proposition that the state, as such, "knows no God," no power higher than itself which shall judge it for its political acts?

But take his own proposition. Christianity he describes as an "ethical influence pervading every department of society—the family, the school, the state—making a nation Christian in spirit, tone, customs, laws, without attempting to formulate itself into the civil code." To say nothing now on the suggested question, whether a power or principle can "pervade every department of society" as an organic structure, without in some way or in some degree formulating itself, let us take the proposition as stated. If Christianity "thus pervades every department of the state," the recognition of the fact (to say nothing of any "formulation") is certainly a part of political philosophy, and one, too, that we may say holds a very high place. Its religiousness cannot take away its philosophic character, or its political importance. May it not, then, be taught in the schools, whether they be high or low? Is not such a grand truth, such an all-pervading truth, entitled to a place as much as the laws of commerce or of political economy, about which also men greatly differ? But the Cincinnati resolution against all religious instruction (for it does not lose its religious in its philosophical character) would shut it out. The same consistent principle would banish it from our colleges. The Nation itself, as a paper containing it, could not be read—an exclusion which certainly would be a great loss to our political education.

The question is indeed a most difficult one, especially as it comes up in the present unfortunate state of our heterogeneous society, and all charity should be exercised towards opposing opinions as held by earnest, religious men like "J. P. T." It involves, too, some of the deepest principles of political philosophy. We cannot silence it by the cry of church and state, or by any empty chattering about "the American idea."

T. L.

Schenectady, April, 1870.

Notes.

LITERARY.

"First Steps in English Literature" is the title of a text-book prepared by Mr. Arthur Gilman, and to be published, for the use of schools, this fall, by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. The specimen pages submitted to us indicate a handy volume, of course elegantly printed, and the plan of the work seems well adapted for the end in view. Three introductory chapters serve for a brief account of English history, a definition of literary terms, and a survey of the languages of Europe. The body of the work consists of brief biographical and bibliographical notices—"characterizations," "vignettes," as the circular calls them—of the authors of the various periods of English literature. Mr. Gilman makes three of these: (1) The period of Immature English—divided into Original English, prior to 1150; Broken English, 1150–1250; Dead English, 1250–1350; and Reviving English, 1350–1558. (2) The period of Mature English—divided into the Italian Influence, 1558–1649; the Puritan Influence, 1649–1660; and the French Influence, 1660–1700. (3) The People's Influence—divided into the Age of Pope, 1700–1745: the Age of Johnson, 1745–1800; the Age of Poetical Romance, 1800–1830; the Age of Prose Romance, 1830–1870. These subdivisions need not be criticised too closely. We should say the usefulness of the book would depend very much upon the teacher.——Old and New has passed into the hands of Messrs. Roberts Brothers, who doubtless appreciate the advantage enjoyed by those publishers who own magazines. They announce for the second volume a serial story by Mrs. Stowe, called "Pink and White Tyranny," and a serial story for children, "John Whopper, the Newsboy," by "a distinguished American scholar."——Messrs. John Ross & Co. announce for immediate publication "The Mother's Register," a sanitary family record, from the French of Professor Fonssagrives.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son will publish immediately a sketch of the life and works of the late Charles Dickens.——Mr. Black having undertaken to rectify history in the Galaxy, his example is about to be followed by ex-Secretary Welles, who in the July number will repel some charges of Mr. Thurlow Weed's, made in the number for this month. A serial story is also announced to be written for the same periodical by Mr. Justin McCarthy.——Macmillan & Co. announce "In Exitu Israel," by Rev. S. Baring-Gould, a historical-ecclesiastical romance of the time of the French Revolution; "Political Economy for Beginners," by the wife of Prof. Fawcett; "The Story of Wandering Willie," by Lady Augusta Kippel, daughter of the Earl of Albemarle; and the recent Oxford "Lectures on Art" of Mr. Ruskin, forming a new volume of the Clarendon Press Series.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton intend to add "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" to their editions of Mr. Dickens's works.

—Prof. Ch. Fred. Hartt, well known for his valuable explorations in Brazil on two former occasions, is on the eve of starting for Pará, with one associate, a professor of botany, and nine assistants from among his pupils at Cornell University. The field to be investigated, for geology and natural history, is part of the Amazonian valley and of the coast southward to Bahia; and the Professor hopes, while training the students, to amass a large quantity of specimens as the basis of a collection for the museum of the university. The expedition will, in short, be a second Thayer expedition, with one of Prof. Agassiz's then subordinates at the head, and the results of it, while specially beneficial to Cornell, will be to the advancement of universal science. Though enough money has been raised for the mere journey, the sum of $5,000 is yet wanted to ensure the desirable collections, and a patron, of Mr. Thayer's liberality, is therefore in request. He can have, if he wishes, the honor of giving his name to the expedition. Other persons may assist by ordering of Prof. Hartt, and paying for them in advance, sets of stereoscopic views of all the places of interest along the route, at the rate of $15 per hundred. The importance of establishing at Cornell, and at other seats of learning, such nuclei of scientific activity as now exist at Cambridge and Salem, cannot be overestimated.

—That excellent weekly publication, the New York Medical Gazette, which has just entered upon a new volume, and deserves all its prosperity, offered last autumn a prize for the greatest accepted number of clinical reports, and has just awarded it to Mrs. Melissa M. Webster, M.D., a recent graduate of the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania. The editor, in making this announcement, speaks of the "clearness and succinctness" of the articles published under this lady's initials, and of his genuine surprise at finding the writer to be a woman. He gracefully welcomes her to the profession, and recants much of what he has formerly said in oppo sition to female practitioners. The Bureau of Education has lately received some intelligence from Switzerland, showing the progress of medical study at the University of Zurich, where ladies have attended the medical courses since 1864, and, in 1867, a young Russian lady took the degree of doctor of medicine, surgery, and obstetrics, passing a remarkable examination. Last winter there were fourteen lady students at the university, of whom all but two followed medicine. Lately, on enquiry from the medical faculty of Würzburg, Bavaria, the Zürich faculty replied that there never had arisen the least difficulty from the attendance of ladies at the anatomical and clinical lectures and experiments, and that, in their opinion, the mixed system was of mutual benefit to the students of both sexes.

—It is already difficult to keep pace with these evidences of the rapid advances which women are making in their least-disputed right, to education. On the 31st of May, Philadelphia was again the scene of concession to what may now be almost called public sentiment in this regard. The names of three ladies were proposed, without application from them, for membership in the Academy of Natural Sciences, and were admitted by a large majority. They were Miss Grace Anna Lewis, whose writings on ornithology have not needed the praise we were glad to give them when occasion offered; Miss Hannah T. Smallwood, an artist, who makes scientific diagrams her specialty; and Miss Ella Hornor, a mineralogist. The Academy has not heretofore excluded women from its privileges, but these are the first who have ever been made members. They, and women like them, are fast settling the question whether woman's ambition shall be also her vocation. On this women in general are divided among themselves, and even the reformers have split over it. Miss Betsy Perk, for example, having founded, at Schiedam, in Holland, Notre Ambition, a weekly journal devoted to the development of woman, and then having quarrelled with the editor, goes off and publishes at Delft Notre Vocation, calling it the organ of the women of the Netherlands; and the rival editors are engaged in abusing each other from week to week, while awaiting the ruin of each other's enterprise. They might follow a better example across the Channel, where, says a late Publisher's Circular, the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine and Beeton's Young Englishwoman "are conducted without the slightest falling-off in their vigor," and, we presume, in perfect harmony.

—The New York Times entertains such an antipathy to Mr. Goldwin Smith that the main value of "Lothair," in its eyes, appears to lie in the attack on him which it contains. It is not unnatural, therefore, that when an unfavorable review of the book appeared in our columns, it should say "the Nation had come to the assistance of Mr. Goldwin Smith." If anybody enjoys "Lothair," it must be because he hates Goldwin Smith; if anybody condemns it, it must be because he likes Goldwin Smith. The whole thing, in short, turns on Goldwin Smith, the Times thinks. As far as we are concerned, however, it is mistaken. We do not mind saying, since our motives have been called in question, that our real object in abusing "Lothair" was to help Monsignor Capel, whom we consider a badly used man. If the Times wonders why we should have fixed on him for our protégé, we must remind it that tastes differ. As regards Goldwin Smith, we do not hesitate to acknowledge that we consider Mr. Disraeli's attack on him both malignant and silly and untruthful; about this, we believe, there are only two opinions current, the Times holding one, and the rest of the world the other. Mr. Disraeli's position and age only render this mode of paying off old scores all the more disreputable. We may add that we perceive as strongly as anybody the indiscretion of Mr. Smith's reply to him; but we can, we think, understand how it is that Mr. Smith fell into the delusion of supposing a reply to be necessary. Our opinion about "Lothair" is shared by the great majority of its critics.

—The English papers are making merry over a new venture in the field of periodical literature, or rather over a venture that is new in the field of periodical literature in England, for over here we have in the Waverley Magazine something pretty much the same as the Amateur Poetical Magazine, which has just been causing so much of that horse-laughter in which the British Critic now and again indulges himself. The gentleman who owns the Waverley Magazine, having had some experience in various newspaper offices, learned—as everybody learns who has made acquaintance with the nature of the average volunteer contributor to the columns of the press—in the first place, that the name of such contributor is Legion, and, in the second place, that he will keep on writing year after year for no fee or reward except the joy of seeing himself in print and feeling himself an author. "He," we say; but the well-informed know that men are possibly the chief, but are by no means the only sinners in this respect. Young women not yet married, girls in high-schools and seminaries, and an occasional married woman of the weaker sort, make up a great army of story-makers and verse-makers and feeble social philosophers—an army so great as of itself to provide the paper for which it writes with an audience of remunerative size. Doubtless, many men had for many years known all this; but it was reserved for a certain journeyman printer of Boston to see how to turn the knowledge of it to account, and make himself a rich man by utilizing the gentlemen and ladies who in other offices than that of the paper which he founded are looked upon as so many sources of human misery. He projected the Waverley Magazine, which still flourishes, and still, we should say—judging from a copy of it which has recently fallen under our observation—is managed in accordance with its founder's original idea of printing for the perusal of the writers of them the articles which all editors who pay for articles would certainly reject. This is not quite the whole story, for the editor of the Waverley seems to have known that his paper must never offend against morals; and of course he knew, too, that there is in the community a class of readers who, while they never commit themselves in print anywhere, still are on the intellectual level of the poets and novelists of the Waverley school, and read with avidity what these write. But, on the whole, it is a not insufficient description of his paper to say that it publishes rejected articles and sells them to rejected contributors. This, we take it, is what the Amateur Poetical Magazine will do; and if anybody says, with a writer in the London News, that the Poetical Magazine "will serve as a museum of practical stupidity, if the amateur basis is thoroughly adhered to," we shall not contradict. It happens now, as formerly, that men and women incapable of poetry get fame and money as writers of poems; but if there is to-day any poetical writer of merit, or even of promise of merit, who has need to seek an audience by giving his work for nothing to the publisher of a magazine for "amateur poets," we do not know his name. The reading public is so large, and so hungry for amusement, and so willing to pay for its amusement the small price which in these days of cheap periodicals is demanded, and the publishers are in such close and business-like connection with the reading public, that there is almost no man of any ability, not a specialist, and a specialist in a very narrow sense of the word, who cannot safely demand pay for what he produces.

—England is indebted to Boston for the idea of the Amateur Poetical Magazine; but perhaps it is she who furnishes Boston with a notion which in turn may fairly repay America for the hint furnished by the Waverley Magazine. Or, perhaps, it is in Messrs. Scribner & Co.'s Book Buyer that we are to look for the origin of the Literary World, a Boston paper, of which the first number has just appeared. "Choice Readings from the Best New Books, and Critical Notices," is the second title of the Literary World, which is edited by Mr. S. R. Crocker—a gentleman formerly connected with the Boston Commercial Bulletin—and which is intended to do for our booksellers what its English prototype is understood to have done successfully for the publishers on the other side of the water. Mr. Crocker proposes to publish monthly an octavo paper, of about the size of the Nation, but containing a few less pages, which shall be, in the language of the prospectus, "a vehicle of fresh, interesting, and reliable literary news." "Much space in its columns," the editor goes on to say, "will be devoted to reviews of new books, with the special object of setting forth impartially the merits and distinguishing features of each. By reason of this specialty, it is hoped that the paper may become, to a certain extent, a help and a monitor to book-buyers and readers." Fifty cents a year is what the subscribers to the Literary World must pay for it, but readers who frequent libraries and reading-rooms will find it at their service for nothing, Mr. Crocker's intention being to scatter it freely wherever book-buyers congregate; and, so far as we can learn from an examination of this first number, we should say that the subscriber for the new paper will get a good fifty cents' worth. It contains reviews—which often give copious quotations—of Dall's "Alaska and its Resources;" the third part of Morris's "Earthly Paradise;" Parkman's "Discovery of the Great West;" Harte's "Luck of Roaring Camp;" Fette's "Dialogues from Dickens;" Coffin's "Seat of Empire;" Miss Phelps's "Hedged In;" the second volume of Allibone's "Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors;" Hesekiel's "Life of Bismarck;" Dante Rossetti's "Poems;" of Bryant's "Homer;" and of two recent American novels—"Miss Van Kortland," and "Life and Alone." It contains, also, a couple of pages of literary news, and a readable attack on the Saturday Review's criticism of Professor Winchell's "Sketches of Creation"—an attack which seems to show that if Dr. Winchell is not the most intelligent of men, no more is his rather insolent reviewer. These notices are well written, too, and though, of course, the publishers pay for them, and they are not in any good sense critical, nor to be relied upon by any one who would learn the exact value of the book noticed, still they can be read; and even they may be profitably read, if the reader will remind himself now and then that they are paid for, and are eulogistic and not critical. This, however, is saying no more against them than may be said against the so-called critical notices which appear in nine out of every ten newspapers in the country. Most American criticism is dishonest criticism—and the matter is not at its worst, either, when the dishonesty is the result of our national good-nature or of ignorance, for hardly a book issues from the American press concerning which editors do not for money say things which they know to be false, and which they intend shall deceive. Whether the publishers will find it worth their while to keep the Literary World going seems to us doubtful; we are very much inclined to think, however, that the public might do a good deal worse than assist them to keep it afloat.

—Leonardo da Vinci is the commonest and perhaps the most striking example of many-sided genius, but it would appear as if we still were ignorant of some of his greatest claims to admiration. A writer in Nature (May 19) refers to an article in a new botanical journal, published at Florence, Nuovo Giornale Botanico Italiano, giving extracts from a section of the artist's treatise on painting, entitled "On Trees and Vegetation," which has hitherto escaped notice, as being found only in the Roman edition. The observations he there makes have hitherto been supposed to have originated not earlier than the seventeenth century in any case. Yet he discovered the three systems of phyllotaxis, or arrangement of leaves on the stem, and inferred that, "inasmuch as branches grow from buds generated in the axils of leaves, the arrangement of branches on the stem necessarily corresponds to that of the leaves on the stem;" he showed how the age of exogenous trees could be determined from their annular structure, and the southern side distinguished from the northern by the trunk's eccentricity; and, finally, he noticed the mode in which exogenous stems increase by the formation of new wood beneath the bark. On many other points he was equally well informed, though these are the strongest evidences of the profundity of his researches. Mr. Bennett adds that Sir Charles Lyell honors Da Vinci as among the first to apply sound reasoning to geology, and to teach the organic origin of fossils.

—In the Galaxy for June, the author of some notices of Italian literature mentioned casually the name of Giuseppe Giusti as a poet held in esteem by his countrymen. Generally these notices wanted perspective, and it might be suspected that a writer who would speak of Silvio Pellico as the great Italian dramatic poet, might fail to do justice to some others. Giusti ought to have been better known to him, for he has enjoyed the highest repute in Italy, and it is doubtful if as a political satirist he has been surpassed by any writer of our time. He was a Tuscan, and was born of a noble family, in 1809, and died in 1850, at Florence. The following poem is one of his best, we think, though it is not one of the best known or the most popular. It explains itself as something addressed to an Italian holding office under the Austrians, and it was written in 1846. The translator, who is Mr. W. D. Howells, wishes us to say that his version is not so literal as he thinks translation should be, and that it might be indefinitely better than it is in every way and not misrepresent the original, in which there is a luxury of epithets and a fineness of phrase not attainable in English. But probably our readers will feel inclined, for the sake of what they do get, to overlook the translator's failure to give them all that Giusti wrote—especially as, from the time of the building of Babel until now, the literal translator of poetry is a person who has been more diligently than successfully sought for. In fact, his existence begins to be disbelieved in entirely. This translation, by the way, forms a part of the lectures on "Early Italian Literature" which have been among the best and pleasantest of the literary courses of University lectures at Harvard:

SAINT AMBROSE.

Your Excellency is not pleased with me
  Because of certain jests I made of late,
And, for my putting rogues in pillory,
  Accuse me of being anti-German. Wait,
And hear a thing that happened recently
  When wandering here and there one day as fate
Led me, by some odd accident I ran
On the old church St. Ambrose, at Milan.

My comrade of the moment was, by chance,
  The young son of one Sandro*—one of those Troublesome heads—an author of romance—
  Promessi Sposi—your Excellency knows
The book, perhaps?—has given it a glance?
  Ah, no? I see! God give your brain repose:
With graver interests occupied, your head
To all such stuff as literature is dead.

I enter, and the church is full of troops:
  Of northern soldiers, of Croatians, say,
And of Bohemians, standing there in groups
  As stiff as dry poles stuck in vineyards,—nay,
As stiff as if impaled, and no one stoops
  Out of the plumb of soldierly array;
All stand, with whiskers and mustache of tow,
Before their God like spindles in a row.

I started back: I cannot well deny
  That being rained down, as it were, and thrust
Into that herd of human cattle, I
  Could not suppress a feeling of disgust
Unknown, I fancy, to your Excellency,
  By reason of your office. Pardon! I must Say the church stank of heated grease, and that
The very altar-candles seemed of fat.

But when the priest had risen to devote
  The mystic wafer, from the band that stood
About the altar, came a sudden note
  Of sweetness over my disdainful mood:
A voice that, speaking from the brazen throat
  Of warlike trumpets, came like the subdued
Moan of a people bound in sore distress,
And thinking on lost hopes and happiness.

'Twas Verdi's tender chorus rose aloof,—
  That song the Lombards, there, dying of thirst,
Send up to God, "Lord, from the native roof."
  O'er countless thrilling hearts the song has burst,
And here I, whom its magic put to proof,
  Beginning to be no longer I, immersed
Myself amidst those tallowy fellow-men
As if they had been of my land and kin.

What would your Excellency? The piece was fine,
  And ours, and played, too, as it should be played:
It drives old grudges out when such divine
  Music as that mounts up into your head!
But when the piece was done, back to my line
  I crept again, and there I should have stayed,
But that just then, to give me another turn,
From those mole-mouths a hymn began to yearn:

A German anthem, that to heaven went
  On unseen wings, up from the holy fane:
It was a prayer, and seemed like a lament,
  Of such a pensive, grave, pathetic strain
That in my soul it never shall be spent:
  And how such heavenly harmony in the brain
Of those thick-skulled barbarians should dwell
I must confess it passes me to tell.

In that sad hymn, I felt the bitter-sweet
  Of the songs heard in childhood, which the soul
Learns from belovèd voices, to repeat
  To its own anguish in the days of dole:
A thought of the dear mother, a regret,
  A longing for repose and love, the whole
Anguish of distant exile seemed to run
Over my heart and leave it all undone:

When the strain ceased, it left me pondering
  Tenderer thoughts and stronger and more clear:
These men, I mused, the self-same despot king,
  Who rules in Slavic and Italian fear,
Tears from their homes and arms that round them cling,
  And drives them slaves thence, to keep us slaves here:
From their familiar fields afar they pass
Like herds to winter in some strange morass.

To a hard life, to a hard discipline,
  Derided, solitary, dumb, they go:
Blind instruments of many-eyed Rapine
  And purposes they share not, and scarce know:
And this fell hate that makes a gulf between
  The Lombard and the German, aids the foe
Who tramples both divided, and whose bane
Is in the love and brotherhood of men.

Poor souls! far off from all that they hold dear,
  And in a land that hates them! Who shall say
That at the bottom of their hearts they bear
  Love for our tyrant? I should like to lay
They've our hate for him in their pockets! Here,
  But that I turned in haste and broke away,
I should have turned a corporal, stiff and tall,
And like a scarecrow stuck against the wall.

—A correspondent, whose business has brought him for some months past into the interior of Pennsylvania, writes us that he has been "duly shocked by the constant misuse, even in the pulpit, of the auxiliaries shall and will." But he is thrown almost into despair by reading, in the Atlantic for June, Mr. Parton's version of Napoleon's proclamation on the eve of entering Italy: "I am about to lead you into the most fertile country of the world. You will find honor, glory, and riches. Soldiers of Italy, will you want courage?" We presume the writer thinks that, when the Hub blunders over the auxiliaries, there is no hope for the rest of mankind. However, this instance is easily explained away. Mr. Parton, of course, uses shall and will after the fashion of the non-New-Englanders

* Alessandro Manzoni.

among whom he lives. We, for our part, have been more surprised and pained by a recent letter from a Boston merchant (whose name is doubly identified with New England) to one of the city papers, in which he says: "If it pleases you to notice my unfortunate failure, I will be pleased to have you do so." That is better evidence of infection than Mr. Parton's. The truth is, that New England is in nothing so conspicuously "out in the cold," as respects the rest of the Union, as in its naturally correct use of the auxiliaries. Go where you will else, there is chaos, and we fear our correspondent is very far from being alive to the dreadful fact. What is more, there is not an immigrant, of any nationality except the English, who does not bring with him into the country an incapacity to distinguish between shall and will. The Continental peoples, of course, cannot, without more study than they or anybody else will give to the subject, and the Scotch and Irish are among the worst offenders we have. The late Sir Edmund Head, whose invaluable little work on "Shall and Will" (London: John Murray. Second edition, 1858) ought to be in the hands of every editor, teacher, minister, and college-student in the country —in the hands of all whose example may corrupt or guide aright—very acutely guessed that the author of "Vestiges of Creation," while yet unknown to be Robert Chambers, must be a native of Scotland or Ireland rather than of England, from a single passage in which shall was used for will—the opposite of the vulgar error. If the Scotch-Irish who settled the southern border of Pennsylvania had landed on Plymouth Rock, it is doubtful whether this country could now point to any considerable part in which the purity of the auxiliaries was maintained. The intuition of the born-Yankee, even, succumbs when he has been long settled away from New England.

HEPWORTH DIXON ON RUSSIA.*

This new "sensational" book of Mr. Dixon's is almost too absurd for sober criticism, and were it by an obscure author we should pass it without notice. The name of Hepworth Dixon is, however, so well known as that of a writer of "picturesque" and somewhat peculiar books, which are always widely read, that we feel compelled to pay some attention to "Free Russia." But before we examine the book itself, let us tell how it was made.

Mr. Dixon, it seems, in looking round for new literary worlds to conquer, bethought himself of Russia, and, all equipped, landed at Archangel last August, under the firm conviction that that was the original starting-place of Russia. Finding soon that this idea was wrong, he said, "It is all the same. Archangel was an early colony, and must, in spite of Finns and Lapps, bear more traces of primitive Russia than Moscow, which the Tartars overran, or even than Novgorod itself." Going up to the Monastery of Solovetsk with a band of pilgrims, he invented a curious theory of the church, that the orthodox are dissenters and the dissenters orthodox, and studied the condition of some crazy prisoners whose stories fill a great part of the first volume. From Archangel to St. Petersburg, Moscow, Nizhni, and Kazan, down the Volga and the Don, back through Odessa and Kief to St. Petersburg again, with pencil always in hand to jot down private names and scraps of misunderstood conversation, was the work of the next three months, and by the middle of November the happy author was home in England with note-books full of observations, stale anecdotes, and private histories. The proofs were sent for correction to Professor Kapustin at Moscow, and to an English Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg, who, as might be supposed, were in despair at the mass of mistake and absurdity presented to them, and contented themselves with corrections in detail and spelling, putting merely notes of interrogation and exclamation opposite the theories and statements of the author. Every page was, however, full of corrections, the most of which have passed unheeded, till Professor Kapustin wrote at last: "I cannot undertake to correct the errors of the book, for it is one vast error."

It is a pity that any one will undertake to write on a subject about which he knows little, and that little wrongly; and it is a great pity that a man of Mr. Dixon's talent should think that, without knowing a word of the language, he would be able in three months to judge a vast empire, and give solutions of questions that vex men who have been intimate with them all their lives. For Mr. Dixon there is no excuse. He stayed with men who are intelligent and have carefully studied the country, and whose talk was full of instruction; he had full access to the best sources of information, he took everywhere valuable letters of introduction, and travelled in part with such a man as Mr. Michell, yet he has nothing better to tell of than "convent spectres" and crazy prisoners and dissenting merchants. There is more information, a more lively picture of Russia as it is, and of its needs, and even better English writing, in the report of Mr. Michell on "Land Tenure in Russia," just published in a parliamentary blue-book, than in all Mr. Dixon's seven hundred pages. Yet Mr. Dixon saw a good deal of this report as it was written, and heard the whole subject thoroughly discussed.

One of the questions which have been most frequently asked of Americans in Europe of late years is, "What do you think of 'New America?' Is it true?" The answer is always difficult, and one has generally to reply: "The facts are in the main true, but the deductions and the tout ensemble are false. The details are each rightly drawn; but from want of perspective, and from improper grouping and proportion, the picture is very false to nature." It is much the same with "Free Russia." The descriptions of Archangel and Solovetsk are excellent and true; but Archangel is no better than most Russian towns, nor more peculiar. The accounts of pilgrims and monks are interesting; but pilgrims and monks play in reality an infinitely small part in the drama of modern Russia. The sympathy with which Mr. Dixon regards the efforts at development and progress in Russia is praiseworthy; but that sympathy is so misguided that the reforms are slurred over in favor of influences and events that are petty and without result. And, when we come to those parts of the book which develop more particularly the theories of the author, not even the facts are to be depended on.

The reader of "New America" will remember two of the theories advanced in that book: one that the Americans are gradually receiving the type and character of the Red Indian; the other, and chief one, that the various religious and socialistic sects will have a great influence on the future of the United States. In the book before us there are two ideas somewhat similar to those we have just named: one is the oriental and Tartar character of Russia; the other the influence of religion, and especially of dissent and sectarianism, on the national life and development.

It is curious to note the grave persistence with which Mr. Dixon adheres to the literal meaning of the word oriental in his efforts to prove the Russians are Asiatic people. A dozen times he reminds us that "Archangel lies a little to the east of Mecca and Trebizond;" that St. Petersburg and Moscow are east of Constantinople, or that Nizhni and Voronezh are in the longitude of Bagdad. We are not aware that parallels of longitude or latitude have been so nicely used before for determining the ethnological and social characteristics of a people. There is no idea which has been so dwelt on and so abused as this of the Tartar and Mongol character of Russia. The greater part of Russia was for about three centuries, it is true, tributary to a Tartar khan, but that was all. The Mongol yoke left but few traces on the impatient neck that bore it. There was almost no mixture of blood in the population. One will find among the aristocracy a few Tartar families who long ago embraced Christianity and became absorbed in the nobility; but among the lower classes there has been nothing of the kind. Districts which were Tartar three hundred years ago remain Tartar still, and mixed marriages, though they sometimes occur, are very rare. The mixture in the Great Russian blood, which has made it so much better than the Little Russian, is with the Tchudes and Finns, the aboriginal inhabitants of the North. In the language there is very slight trace of Tartar sway; in fact, there are not more Tartar words in Russian than Arabic words in English. In the traditions, popular customs and habits, things by which a people may be known, there is nothing that can be shown to be of Tartar origin. The punishment by the knout and the severity of the laws were almost the only permanent remnants of the Tartar domination. On the distribution of land the Tartars had no influence at all; and the laws of Boris Godunoff, which made serfage a fixed institution, are like nothing Tartar (it is, by the way, a misfortune that Mr. Dixon did not know that Godunoff was of a Tartar family), but are much more likely, as Herr Faucher suggests, imitations of the poor and vagrant laws of 14 and 43 Queen Elizabeth.

In spite of all his talk of serfage being an historical phase, coupled with his wild statements that it began in Russia after it was completely ended everywhere else in Europe, Mr. Dixon understands serfage quite as little as he does the origin and colonizing force of the Russian village and the Russian monastery. Tartar is with Mr. Dixon a sort of generic term for everything which does not coincide with his preconceived ideas of what is pure Russian; he even calls the Perse (as he chooses to write it) a Tartar, and ascribes to Tartar source such things as the tchin (a pure Slavonic word), which was borrowed by Peter from the German court hierarchy, and tsek and artel, which are of the clearest Slavonic origin. He reminds one of the ordinary traveller who sees something so very Eastern, Tartar, and Mohammedan in the churches of Moscow, all from Byzantine models brought from Constantinople before Mohammed was born, with Slavonic variations—such as are seen in Bohemia—and especially in the Church of St. Basil, which was built besides by an Italian architect.

* "Free Russia. By William Hepworth Dixon." With original illustrations. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1870. Pp. 352, 344. New York: Harper & Bros.

The greater part of the book is devoted to showing the religious feeling of the Russian, and the extent to which this does and will influence him. That religion is deeply implanted in the Russian peasant's heart, and that almost every action is bound up with some observance, which, though it often seems a formality, is really felt, no one who has been long in Russia would deny. In fact, the longer one resides there, the more one feels that it is earnestness and not mere formality. Yet, at the same time, it is a second nature, and exerts little real influence on the actions. The village priest, instead of being reverenced by his flock, has almost no influence on them at all. He lives in the same wretched way, he dresses no better, knows no more, gets drunk with them, and has no effect on them for good. The religion they have is maintained more by tradition than by what they hear in the church. This is the special strength of dissent. But the dissenters, or Old Believers, though numerous, have by no means the influence or the organization that Mr. Dixon describes. They are reactionists, and want to go back rather than forward, and as education is spread among the masses they are sure to decline. The doctrine of the Old Believers differs from the orthodox church only in some minor points, such as the way of making the cross, the spelling of the name of Jesus, and the ritual, which Nikon simplified and shortened, instead of amplifying and making gorgeous, as Mr. Dixon supposes. The danger that the state apprehends from them consists in their adherence to a priesthood holding its seat in Austria and Turkey, and their exposure to foreign influences. Instead of being enlightened, the dissenters are excessively ignorant; and instead of "founding a majority of burses at the universities," they oppose the education of their own children. One thing is peculiar: their religion never stands in the way of money-making. Many dissenters have become excessively rich because they managed to get the use of special secret church funds, and often peculiar tenets about marriage and progeny have assisted in concentrating the money of many into the hands of a few. That some of the richest merchants at Moscow are dissenters is hardly a proof of their general prosperity. The influence which their position as the few rich heads of a fanatical community gives them is enough to make them keep to dissent, and even bring up their children in it. The children, however, with their money born to them, like the world rather better than their fathers, and often become orthodox in form while infidel at heart, for nowhere does education so entirely destroy religious belief of all kinds as in Russia. Any one who has been in the houses of Morozoff, or Soldatenkoff, or some of the other rich dissenters Mr. Dixon names, will see how little the fathers even live according to the precepts of their sect.

The greatest danger to the social organism in Russia is from the secret sects, such as the Skoptsi, Khlysti, etc., which Mr. Dixon dismisses very briefly. Not all in Russia are so ignorant of them as he, and if he had made up half of his book from the revelations and documents which Mr. Livanoff has recently published about many of these strange sects, he would have done his reader an immense service, and his chapters would be far more interesting as exhibitions of extravagance and fanaticism than anything he ever told about the Shakers, the Mormons, the Oneida Community, or about spiritual wives.

The other wild and wrong-headed theories in Mr. Dixon's book we must pass by. What, however, is pleasing in it is the kindly and appreciative spirit with which he regards Russia. Though his points of view are often wrong, he is animated by no hostile spirit; in fact, he is often too anxious to see good. In this respect the book is very different from those of most travellers, and marks a change in English feeling concerning Russia. When the author describes what he has himself seen, as his visit to Solovetsk, he is interesting and entertaining, though we have to deduct many impossible conversations, especially where no interpreter was present. Chapter XXXIII. is, we hear, a positive imposition; that soldier is simply impossible, and his story is told as he could not by any chance have told it. When Mr. Dixon theorizes, and even when he states facts, we must beware of him, especially when we find his "six hundred and ten thousand parish priests" dwindle down to 40,169, and when "a little salt and wine, a few saw-mills"—chiefly for foreign account—"which come back from England by way of barter with the north," means, in 1868, manufactured goods to the amount of 79 millions of rubles. "The Russian trade with England is wholly an export trade," says Mr. Dixon; that is, there are 106 millions of exports to 79 millions of imports; and with Europe, in general, there are 255 millions of imports to only 209 of exports.

The "picturesqueness" of Mr. Dixon's style becomes very fatiguing at last, and even at the beginning its mannerisms are painfully apparent. It is too strained and too affected. Those who heard one of the "two Englishmen" relate the simple incident told in the last chapter, and then read Mr. Dixon's account of it, have never failed to burst into laughter; and everything else is in the same style.

LEIGH HUNT'S "DAY BY THE FIRE."*

Of liking a certain sort of writers, writers who are mainly humorists, or who have at least something quaint about them—a peculiar flavor which addresses itself to a taste not strictly natural and simple, whether or not it is to be called whimsical or even somewhat vitiated—of liking this kind of writers there seem to be two common ways. One man will be fond of Walton, for instance, because of his simpleness of purpose, his poetical sensibility, his beautiful natural piety, and his way of suggesting to the reader the very spirit of the fields and brooks amid which he sought his contemplative recreation. Another man is so taken by what is to us of to-day the quaintness of Walton's manner—"quaint old Ik Walton's" manner, such an admirer would call it—that he nauseates everybody but virtuosi like himself by constantly exhibiting a sort of mock enthusiasm about everything for which Walton expressed a real enthusiasm—by "babbling of green fields" in a jargon no more genuine and real than Walton's was ungenuine and affected; by talking of "your pike" and "your perch" instead of saying "pike" and "perch," as Walton would if he were now alive; and by finding "mine hosts" and milking-maids where the man they pretend to love, and whom they patronize, would honestly find a tavern and a hired man, in cowhide boots, perhaps, with a "patent milker," and sure to be entirely contemptuous of lavendered sheets and madrigals made by the ingenious Master So-and-so. Lamb is another man who suffers from these parasites; no doubt, he is by some persons less liked than he deserves, because of the tasteless adulatory worship offered up by some of his admirers who know the surface of him, and do not perceive and cannot know what it is beneath the surface which makes him essentially what he is and renders him admirable. Doubtless, however, the Elianites are to be looked on with less unalloyed and unhesitating disrespect than the Waltonites. That Lamb was deliberately whimsical, and had, as one may say, a natural affectation, the indulging of which was as much of an avowed amusement to him as the results of its indulgence were to others, is probably not to be denied; and the man who talks of "the gentle Elia" and imitates him may, conceivably, be a man of like mind, and honest and humorous in his affectation; while a Waltonite, or Ik Waltonite, can hardly be other than downright affected when he prates to-day in Walton's words of the things about which Walton, two centuries and more ago, talked sincerely in the natural speech of the men and women about him.

The patronizing tone which these idolaters take in worshipping their idols is as exasperating as anything else in their worship. "Will Shakespeare," they say, when they speak of that benighted person, who was born in a less admirable age than this, but who really deserves to be patted on the back; "rare Ben" and "honest Ben" is their way of designating Jonson, whom one wishes to have alive for a few minutes that he might lay hands on them; Marlowe is "Kit," Chapman is "Old George," Chaucer is never anything but "Dan Chaucer," and there is no one whom they honor with their appreciation whom they do not similarly insult.

It is well when this patronizing spirit exists in conjunction with a spirit of sincere and intelligent admiration for the objects of its regard; but this conjunction, rare in any case, is almost unheard of in the case of any really fine writer who needs the aid of true admirers in order to be brought forward before the general public. Mr. J. E. Babson, of Boston, who has been an assiduous collector of neglected pieces from the pens of Lamb and Hunt, affords almost the only example we can recall of a rather patronizing, and apparently not altogether unaffected, lover of a certain class of writers, who is also a genuine lover of them and a serviceable friend. His last work in his chosen field is a collection of short essays which Hunt contributed at various periods of his life to several London magazines and journals. "A Day by the Fire" is the first paper, and gives its title to the volume. Then follow essays on "Fairies," "The Satyr of Mythology and the Poets," "The Nymphs," "Sirens and Mermaids," "Giants, Ogres, and Cyclops;" some talk about "Commonplace

* "A Day by the Fire, and Other Papers. By Leigh Hunt." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1870.

People," "A Rainy Day," and "Talking of Nonsense;" a critical commentary on Crashaw's description of a contention between a nightingale and a lutist, and several other papers similar in subjects, all together making a pretty duodecimo of some three or four hundred pages, all of which are light and pleasant reading.

No doubt, the most valuable part of the book is the criticism of poetry, for which work, so far as delicate susceptibility to the beauties of the less thoughtful and weightily imaginative kinds of poetry fits a man for the criticism of poetry, Hunt was peculiarly well fitted. His susceptibility was so delicate and so little imbued with thought as often to seem overdainty and finical, and, in great part, merely sensuous and of importance to him individually rather than to anybody else. Still, on the whole, to hear him comment upon poets is well worth while, for one is then listening to the reading of a singularly sympathetic lover of poets, who are only to be understood by persons of refined taste; and perhaps one might say it is all the more worth while to hear them talked about by a fond lover of them, because Hunt's favorites are apt to be poets who are not those the most in the world worth looking up and studying, nor those whom the world is most likely to keep alive unless it has help. Spenser, for instance—who was "the poet's poet" when the poetical fraternity were more careful of manner than of matter, and who now is no longer hardly anybody's poet—seems to be more to Hunt than Shakespeare or Homer or Sophocles; while Dante he appears even to dislike, and apparently the Hebrew poets have never had very much of his attention. Here, for example, is how he likes Shakespeare. He quotes from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" a song describing a fairy damsel's occupations:

"'Over hill, over dale,
Thorough brush, thorough brier,
Over park, over pale,
Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander everywhere
Swifter than the moonis sphere;
And I serve the fairy queen
To dew her orbs upon the green:
The cowslips tall her pensioners be;
In their gold coats spots you see;
Those be rubies, fairy favors:
In those freckles live their savors;
I must go seek some dewdrops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.'

"Flowers, in the proper fairy spirit which plays, betwixt sport and wisdom, with the profoundest mysteries of nature, are here made alive and turned into fantastic servants. In fairyland, whatever may be, is. We may gather from this and another passage in 'Cymbeline' that Shakespeare was fond of cowslips, and had observed their graces with delight. It is a delicate fancy to suppose that those ruby spots contain the essence of the flower's odor, and were presents from their ruling sprite. And the hanging a pearl in every cowslip's ear (besides the beauty of the line) seems to pull the head of the tall pensioner sideways, and make him quaintly conscious of his new favor.

"'THE BOWER OF QUEEN TITANIA.

'I know a bank whereon the wild thyme blows,
Where oxlips and the nodding violet grows;
Quite overcanopied with lush woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine;
There sleeps Titania, some time of the night,
Lulled in these flowers with dances and delight.'

What beautiful lines are these!"

That the lines last quoted are beautiful everybody has agreed; but that the song first quoted has much in it, or that Hunt's remarks are not wilful and fantastical, and marked by over-refining upon things not particularly well worth much attention, there will not be very general agreement. Such, however, is his usual manner of criticism—or rather this specimen which we have just given is a specimen of his usual manner, with its inherent defect so exaggerated as to make it plain how little he is to be trusted to do anything but report to us the impression made on his own mind by the sort of poetry which he likes. It is true, nevertheless, that he usually is far more successful in taking us along with him; and that often he takes us whither, without his assistance, we could hardly have gone, and yet whither it is well that we should go. But, at the best, it is to some bower of some Titania that we are taken.

The finicalness, so to speak, of Hunt's disposition, and the egotism, to give it somewhat too harsh and too big a name, with which he airily buttonholes us and makes us the confidants of his sensations when sitting before a coal-fire, or when looking at a sunset, or when eating muffins, or when in the same room with a cat—which animal, we learn, was once his aversion, but afterwards seemed to him commendable—is perhaps more obvious when he is writing of other things than the poets of his choice, though there is no time when one is secure from a little information as to his likes and dislikes, and of what aromatic pains he most easily dies. But, on the whole, if one does not feel too much respect for our author, one does not dislike him. He is so contented with himself, and so pleased with his own feelings, that it does not occur to one to be grateful for his good temper and cheerfulness; yet there is something admirable and likable in a man who, tried so much in so many ways, is never despondent, and who, sensitive and presumably sentimental as he was, never obtrudes on his readers any of his sorrows nor parades his griefs of spirit. Moreover, it is a thing to be liked in him that, if he has not the best words for the best men, and has too good words for men not the best, he is at least never bitter nor envious nor malicious, but always is kind and sunny, unenvious of friends, and just, so far as he knows, to enemies. Beyond a doubt, too, Hunt was a brave politician, a good hater of every form of oppression, and a man ready to earn hatred by speaking bold words, and to suffer without flinching the consequences of what he felt bound to say. The men are few, so far as we have record, who have had at once so much sensibility and so much strength of a certain kind. His books, however, as it happens, give positive and direct expression to the excess of his intellectual and physical and spiritual sensibility, and only by implication express most of the moral and intellectual strength which he had, and he bids fair to be remembered as rather a slight man, though he deserves remembrance as something better than that. It seems certain, too, that for a long time he will have the liking of the literary world as being a man thoroughly saturated with the distinctively literary spirit; and, indeed, this quality of his exercises a legitimate charm.

THE INDIAN PROBLEM.*

Mr. Disraeli, in his novel, "Lothair," makes it the part of the accomplished "Bishop of the diocese" to say that to him American ladies are very unintelligible—"a sort of confusion between Mrs. Beecher Stowe and the Fifth Avenue congregation and—Barnum." If the bishop had wished to give another horn to his dilemma, and had added an Indian, he would have shown a knowledge of American society quite uncommon in an Englishman. And if he had further proved his intimacy with us by explaining the Indian satisfactorily, many American readers would thank him; for Americans themselves, unless they be Indians or soldiers on the war-path, or philanthropists by the Atlantic sea-board, do not pretend to be otherwise than confused when the Indian is spoken of. As a people we have not been able to solve "the Indian question," or it would not any longer be the loud-echoing question that it is. We should be greatly obliged to any one who would convince us of the true answer and let us get rid of it. Meantime, it is a comfort to know that a little light is shed on its difficulties almost daily now—military despatches come often from the Plains; peace commissioners meet in our cities and talk; "Red Clouds" roll in from the far West to illuminate the subject; and besides all these we have before us a book which will be useful in the emergency. The author accompanied General Sheridan in his winter campaign of 1868–9, against the hostile Sioux, Cheyennes, Arrapahoes, and other tribes with whose soft names and hard characters we have grown quite familiar. He tells first the usual tale of travellers who have followed the rough route to the outpost forts in the Indian country before the rails met in mid-prairie; then he briefly alludes to the threatening attitude and outrages of the Indians, which determined General Sheridan to let them see that his troops could punish them in spite of wintry weather. It was a hard campaign that ensued—the weather was bitter, the snow deep, and the hardships were sometimes almost past endurance; but the author reports how cheerfully it was undertaken, and how successfully carried out. The march is too long for us to follow; but whoever reads the author's account of it will learn more of the Indians and frontiersmen at home, of the land they inhabit, and of the practical Indian question, than perhaps can be learned elsewhere this side of the Plains. "The Last of the Mohicans" is a more fascinating book, but Hawk-eye and Uncas are gone, and none of their descendants are worthy of their fame. Romance will have to wait if the red man and his white foe of to-day must furnish such heroes as shine on us from Cooper's novels; but the frontier must speedily be made safe for traffic and for people who choose to dwell there.

When the present author has told all that he saw, he comments on the administration of Indian affairs, and he seems to have a right to express an opinion, having looked the Indian question very fairly in the face. His point of view was chiefly military, it is true, but so is the Indian question chiefly a military one; and it cannot be made otherwise in a day if the Indian is left to his choice and prefers the war-trail to the paths of peace.

* "Sheridan's Troopers on the Borders: A Winter Campaign on the Plains. By De B. Randolph Keim." With numerous engravings. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1870.

Experience makes it clear that some of the Indians are for war—deluded they may be, shamefully maltreated they may have been; but, knowing that they might now have peace, they have chosen not to have it, and they know their own minds. The option being with them, they have decided for war, and they are malignantly aggressive. Whatever good cause they have sometimes had to take up arms, they have not been lately acting in defence of their lives or their horses: these would be in no jeopardy if they proclaimed for peace. But they have sought the lives and property of the white settlers, and these it is the duty of the army to protect. Finding the Indian roaming at large, and in this temper, it is not a point for the army to decide what excites him to deeds of blood and pillage—whether revenge or natural depravity; but it certainly must decide how its protectorate over the settlers shall be enforced. If a "Piegan massacre" results (at which the West cries "Thanks!" and the East cries "Shame!"), a policy is to blame which leaves Piegans at liberty to murder and rob. Honest people will welcome the time when all this is changed, and will diligently seek to change it; but the taming of the wild Indian is not an easy work, and the way to bring it about is open to discussion. How he came to be what he is need not be argued. It is safe to admit that official corruption and bad faith have ridden rough-shod over all promises made to him, and that he has found his best reward in compelling the Government to buy him off from actual warfare. How to win him over to a civilized life is what the argument must dwell on. The peace commissioner would adopt peaceful modes. He urges, in effect, that the Indian who reveres the Great Spirit can be led to do right; but the frontiersman replies: "When an Indian talks about the Great Spirit and his Great White Father, I always corral my mules." Officers who have served in a campaign against them, or have lived in their country, say that among the hostile tribes there is no ambition but to get scalps or animals from the whites; the young men have no consideration from the women until they have made their hands more red with blood. And this report is confirmed by the letter which the Jesuit priest lately brought from the Piegans to the President. How desperately they will fight to gain this distinction, and how cruel they are in earning it, our troops and the settlers know well, and Mr. Keim tells in his story, very simply, and in a style quite different from that which generally is laid, like war-paint, on the face of frontier life. The horrid fate of Major Elliott and his party of eighteen, who fell in Custer's attack on Black Kettle's camp, should make us hope that no settler or soldier might ever fall into an Indian's power. They were found naked and horribly mutilated, and Major Elliott's condition was thus officially described by the surgeon: "Major Joel H. Elliott: one bullet-hole in left cheek, two bullets in head, throat cut, right foot cut off, left foot almost cut off, calves of legs very much cut, groin ripped open, and otherwise mutilated." All the rest were as bad or worse. Close by was the body of a young white woman, who had been a prisoner, and her child was not far off, a blow on the head having easily left it dead like its mother. But those things are common on the Plains. Every one knows of them, of course, and we have picked them out from other matters of more weight, as some would think, only because they are often flippantly ignored or wisely excused in arguing the Indian question. We are told, also, how Colonel Forsyth, a most gallant officer of General Sheridan's staff, had "a life" on the Plains—that is, he and a party of fifty scouts under his command narrowly escaped the awful death that Major Elliott met. The attack on Forsyth was made by ten times his force; his quick decision in seizing the best ground available; his cool courage in meeting the fiery onset of the Indians; his own desperate wounds and the death of both his lieutenant and surgeon (Beecher and Moers); his keeping command after he was wounded; his repulse of fresh assaults notwithstanding his casualties in killed and disabled; his sending out men on foot, at night, to seek relief a hundred miles away; his loss of animals—all shot down; his living for days, as did his men, on putrid horse and mule meat, the whole air filled, meanwhile, with the stench of carcasses; his patient waiting till relief came—for it did come—all this would enrich the noblest romance; but more than that, and this is why we speak of it, it is a scene on the frontier, true to the life, and something like it may be going on there now. What is to be done? We shall have made some progress when we stop discussing why it is so, and admit the fact that there is enmity between man and man in the Indian country, and that the army has to stand between the red man and the white.

This being true, it would seem to be proper that counsel should be taken of military men on Indian affairs. In extenuation of the destruction of the Piegan village by Colonel Baker, General Sheridan has recently described to General Sherman what the army has to do: the immense territory it has to guard; the railroads and helpless settlers demanding protection; the small number of troops for this hard duty. And in Mr. Keim's book there is a short letter from General Sheridan to him, in which the General says: "I may say, in reference to the management of Indians, the reservation system is the only one offering any prospects of success, but all experience has shown that the wild Indians will not adopt it until he is forced to do so. . . . After the wild Indians are put upon the reservations a strong military force will have to be kept there to protect the agents and others required in the work of civilization, and also for the subordination of the Indians and their protection against the encroachments of the white settlers who otherwise would take possession of their lands." Here, it seems to us, is the Indian question "boiled down," as they say out West. It is conceded that the white man's hand is against his red brother, and extermination is not advocated, so the friend of the Indians ought to be appeased. And it appears from this letter that the army can be used as an arbiter and peace-compeller between the races now at war. Without distinction of color, one is not to trample on the other. Bygones are to be remembered only to be no more re-enacted. The Indian is to have a comfortable home, undisturbed by the settler's greed; but he is to live on it, willing or not. There he will be within touch of philanthropy which never could reach him while his home was on horseback and his rein free. Perhaps in these new circumstances he may lose a liking he has acquired for strong waters, and grow fond of the purer element; he may come to regard a carbine with abhorrence; may no longer covet his neighbor's horse or scalp; may put away paint and feathers, and, being among friends, let his hair grow; may wear a silk hat; may adopt pantaloons; may treat the women of his tribe as the women of our day wish to be treated.

We hope that many people will read Mr. Keim's work. It is not a book of any great literary merit; it is not showy, but it is serviceable. When it is read, whatever may be the reader's feeling on the administration of Indian affairs as it has been, we think he will agree, as the author does, with the suggestions in General Sheridan's letter. And we hope that the Government—in which, of course, we include Congress—will promptly adopt the Indian policy so concisely sketched. Any one who read the reports of speeches delivered at Washington by "Red Cloud" and the other chiefs could see well enough that these men will not keep the peace except on their own impossible terms. They will fight if Fort Fetterman is not abandoned, and they will fight to prevent railroads or other highways passing through their lands. Civilization cannot be brought to a halt on its march because savages choose to get in the way and cry "No thoroughfare." And hence it seems to us more than ever inevitable that Indians shall for some time to come be under military control, and we believe that through the honesty, patience, and power of the army the red man on the reservations would, as a rule, get equal justice with the white settler. By these fair means, sooner than by any other, peace and prosperity will gladden the Plains.

Apostles of Mediæval Europe. By the Rev. G. F. Maclear, B.D. (New York: Macmillan & Co. 1870.)—Mr. Lecky has argued that the conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity is easily explicable from the general tendencies of the age; and especially from the adaptation of Christianity to meet the yearnings after a higher faith and virtue that arose upon the disintegration of the old religions. But the conversion of Mediæval Europe was a task both strange and formidable; the Church then had to deal with turbulent masses of superstition and barbarism, held together by no framework of law or authority such as the Roman Empire provided even down to the verge of its own fall; and the absence of this force of social organization was not yet supplied by that spirit of community which characterizes the modern world. "As the Roman Empire sank beneath her feet, its last embers trampled out by Alaric, the church found herself confronted with one of the most stupendous tasks that could have been presented to her to accomplish. Scarcely recovering herself from the shock of the barbarian invasions, she was called to train and civilize races fresh from their native wilds, filled with all the ardor and impetuosity of youth, and ignorant of the first principles of order and settled life." How this was done is a story of missionary zeal, which, though it comes to us adorned with legends and marvels, furnishes authentic examples of faith and heroism that command our admiration—a Patrick, a Columba, an Augustine, a Boniface, an Auskar, an Otho, pioneers of civilization no less than preachers of the cross. It is beginning to be recognized by the Protestant world that the Mediæval period of the Christian church was not one of unmitigated darkness and corruption, that the inspirations that proceeded from Rome were not always evil, that the graces and virtues of the Gospel were not altogether unknown before the Reformation, and that the very doctrines of the Reform, especially in the prominence given to faith and love, had fed manly hearts and nourished noble enterprises all along the centuries from the sixth to the sixteenth. Those who have not access to original sources nor time for reading the larger church histories will find in this little volume of Mr. Maclear a sufficiently full and varied sketch of "the Apostles of Mediæval Europe" to acquaint them with these forerunners of our modern civilization, and the breadth and power of their humanizing work. It is curious to observe how, in the course of centuries, the poles of influence are shifted—a fact most strikingly exemplified in the religious history of Ireland. That island, which is now looked upon as the most abject of the dependencies of the Pope, was evangelized by men like St. Patrick and St. Columba, remarkable for the simplicity of their faith in Christ, and a race that is despised by the Englishman and Frenchman of to-day gave a large impulse to Christian civilization in Scotland, France, Switzerland, and Germany. Among the apostles of Christianity to Continental Europe none were more earnest or efficient than the Celtic missionaries.

Mr. Maclear's narratives are written with ease and vivacity, and in a candid and catholic spirit; and his volume closes with a chapter or two of reflections, which, though conceding too much to individuals, are mainly just and sound. In popularizing the lives of the Mediæval apostles, he has done a good service both to history and to Christianity. "Take away these men, blot out their influence, and how materially would events have varied, how much the entire history of the Middle Ages would have been altered! They had their defects, the defects of their day and generation. But it becomes us always to speak with gratitude and kindness of men who counted not their lives dear unto them if they might win over to the truth the Teuton and the Sclave, and to whom modern Europe owes much of its present civilization."

Synchronology of the Principal Events in Sacred and Profane History, from the Creation of Man to the Present Time. Compiled from the most authentic sources, including the following standard works: "The Chronology and History of the World," by Dr. J. Blair; Archbishop Usher's "Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti," "Haydn's Dictionary of Dates," etc., etc. (Boston: S. Hawes. 1870.)—This compilation, consisting of three hundred octavo pages, is, from beginning to end, a tissue of inaccuracies of the grossest kind. In fact, we find it hard to characterize the literary meanness of its execution. And this is perhaps all we should say about it—trusting that our readers would for once accept a sweeping assertion of ours without proofs, and thus release us from the disagreeable duty of critically dissecting what is below all criticism—were not a list of testimonials and recommendations from journals and scholars of repute annexed to the book, which the publisher affirms have not been bought, and on the aggregate authority of which many a reader of ours might after all believe it to be a "multum in parvo, the quintessence of many libraries condensed into one volume," of "general accuracy and value," and deserving "a place in the family next to the Webster Unabridged," and in consequence suspect our dissenting judgment to have been bought, of course by the publisher of some rival compilation. This possible suspicion compels us to substantiate our assertion, especially as the New York Tribune thinks "the accuracy of such a work can only be tested by long use," adding that "it seems to be tolerably complete, and we have discovered no serious errors." We open a page of modern chronology, and we read: "1518. Magellan, in the service of Spain, first discovered the straits of that name in South America." This is justly contradicted under "1521," where we find that Magellan, having been killed on his homeward passage, "returned to the same place he had set out from in 1519." The intervening lines show that the "1518," which stands for 1520, the true date of the discovery, is no misprint. We read on: "1522. . . . Rhodes taken from the Turks by the Knights of St. John, Dec. 25." This stands for: Rhodes taken from the Knights of St. John by the Turks, Oct. 24. Next comes: "1523. . . . Denmark. Frederic. Revolt under Gustavus Vasa. The Danes expelled. . . . Frederic I., King of Denmark and Norway." To the full appreciation of the "general accuracy and value" of this passage it is necessary to keep in mind that the "Frederic" and "Frederic I." are identical; that the revolt of Gustavus was begun two years before 1523; and that he did not expel the Danes from Denmark, but from Sweden. Under "1525" we have the following double mention, in different style, of one event: "Prussia made an hereditary dukedom by A. de Brandenburg" —"Albert Duke of Prussia." Sultan Solyman's victory at Mohács, the death of Louis of Bohemia and Hungary, and the fall of the latter kingdom are epitomized in these words: "1526. . . . Turkish invasion of Hungary." A subsequent line adds: "Hungary. John Sepusius; deposed." It stands for: John Zápolya elected King of Hungary. The continuation is still more curious: "1527. . . . Bohemia. The Emperor Ferdinand I. marries Anne, sister of Louis, the late King, and obtains the crown of Hungary." The facts are that Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, married Anne six years before 1527, obtained on the death of Louis the crowns of both Hungary and Bohemia, and became Emperor thirty years later. Having thus deprived Charles V. of his imperial crown in favor of his brother Ferdinand, our author, in compensation, bestows upon him, under "1556," the arch-ducal and royal crowns of the latter, and extends his reign "over . . . Austria, Bohemia, Hungary." When Charles's son Philip married Mary Tudor seems to have considerably puzzled the compiler "from the most authentic sources," for we read that "Mary, daughter of Henry VIII., . . . married Philip II. of Spain" in 1554; that "Philip II. married Mary of England" in 1555; and, again, that 1555 was "the second year of Philip and Mary." The first event mentioned of the reign of Mary's successor is this: "1560. . . . Queen Elizabeth was presented with a pair of black knit silk stockings by her silk-woman, Mrs. Montague, and she never wore cloth ones any more." That Gustavus Vasa died in the same year, 1560, is not stated. On the contrary, the death of his successor is given under "1556," thus: "Sweden. Eric XIV. died in prison." He revives, however, shortly after, for we read: "1561. . . . Sweden. The titles of count and baron introduced by Eric XIV." And again: "1566. . . . Sweden. Eric XIV." Whether the last mention means to refer to accession or death we are at a loss to ascertain, the fact being that Eric neither ascended the throne nor died in either of the years given. The same "general accuracy" characterizes our author's ancient chronology and history. Thus, he places the burning of the Alexandrian library in the year preceding "the war of Alexandria," amidst the tumult of which the conflagration took place. He makes Cæsar finish that war after his victory over Pharnaces, and then "come into Syria." Of the battle of Munda we read that "Pompey"—meaning the sons of the assassinated triumvir—"lost 30,000 men, and Cæsar only 1,000 and 500 wounded," implying, as it seems, that the 30,000 were all killed. We then read the precise number—"1,192,000"—of men killed by Cæsar; a brief mention of the war of Perusia as "Persian war," which may be a misprint; and, under "31" B.C., after "the battle of Actium," the following: "M. Antony drives Ariarathes out of Cappadocia and sets Archelaus in his place"—which event took place six years earlier. Under "30" we hear of the end of "the kings of Alexandria." The chronology of the American civil war equally swarms with errors. The following is the description, in full, of the battle of Gettysburg, which we shall not insult our readers by commenting upon: "Battle of Gettysburg, Penn. Gen. Meade attacked the rebels near Gettysburg, and after a three days' battle drove them from the field, leaving five thousand killed and wounded in our hands. Meade took 20,000 prisoners. Major-General Reynolds, commanding the first corps of the Union army, was killed."

 Publishers will confer a favor by always marking the price of their books upon the wrapper.*

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Aguilar (Grace), Woman's Friendship	(D. Appleton & Co.)
A Reply to John Stuart Mill on the Subjection of Women	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Bishop (L.), Teuchsa Grondie: a Poem	(Albany)
Bray (W.), Memoirs of John Evelyn	(G. P. Putnam & Son)	$2 50
Byington (Rev. C.), Grammar of the Choctaw Language, swd	(Philadelphia)
Channing (Rev. W. E.), Complete Works, 1 vol	(Geo. Routledge & Sons)	1 75
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 33, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	0 50
Colt (J. B.), The First and Second Part of a Work on Government, swd	(Hartford)
Disraeli (Rt. Hon. B.), Contarini Fleming: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 50
Franco (S.), Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus	(John Murphy & Co.)
Miller (H.), Leading Articles on Various Subjects	(Virtue & Yorston)	1 50
Pro Aris et Focis	" "
Reade (C.), Put Yourself in his Place; three editions	(Harper & Bros.)
Sand (Mme.), The Countess of Rudolstadt: a Tale	(T. B. Peterson & Bros.)	1 50
Smart (H.), Breezie Langton: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 75
Van Bruyssel (E.), The Population of an Old Pear-Tree	(Macmillan & Co.)	1 75
Warton (T.), The History of English Poetry	(G. P. Putnam & Sons)	4 25
Winner's New School for the Violin	(O. Ditson & Co.)

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, June 16, 1870.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the following books by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

HARPER'S CATALOGUE, with CLASSIFIED INDEX OF CONTENTS, sent by mail on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps, or it may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally.

The Life of Count Bismarck,

Private and Political. With Descriptive Notices of his Ancestry. By Dr. George Hesekiel. Translated and Edited, with an Introduction, Explanatory Notes, and Appendices, by Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie, F.S.A., F.A.S.L. With upward of 100 Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $3.

"A very complete account of the personal and political character of Bismarck, and a considerable contribution to contemporary history."—Morning Post.

"The volume presents us with a clear and harmonious view of the character of the Prussian statesman, . . . and we very heartily recommend it to the English reader."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"The book photographs the man."—Scotsman.

"The history of a man's life before he dies is a book of rare occurrence, and one which will seldom bear publication. It is one evidence of the value of a man that his character will stand so severe a test."—Observer (London).

Cocker's Christianity and Greek Philosophy.

Christianity and Greek Philosophy; or, The Relation between Spontaneous and Reflective Thought in Greece and the Positive Teaching of Christ and His Apostles. By B. F. Cocker, D.D., Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy in Michigan University. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 75.

"This work comprises a profound discussion of the leading philosophical and religious problems of the day, with special reference to the theories of Comte, Sir William Hamilton, Herbert Spencer, and other great thinkers of a recent period, together with a copious exposition of the ancient Greek systems and the social condition of Athens. It is a work of rare erudition. The writer has mastered his subject and the learning which pertains to it. He is familiar with the prominent systems, and well understands their scope and bearings. He has a remarkable talent for concise, methodical, and exact statements on abstruse subjects. At the same time, his learning does not oppress him—does not interfere with his own mental action. He is a firm and independent thinker. His work forms a valuable guide to the history of ancient and modern speculation, while it is full of important original suggestions. Its publication really forms an epoch in the history of American philosophical literature, and elevates its author to a high rank among the philosophical writers of the age. Every philosophical student in the country will find it a treasure."

Memoir of Dr. Scudder, Thirty-six Years Missionary to India.

Memoir of the Rev. John Scudder, M.D., Thirty-six Years Missionary in India. By the Rev. J. B. Waterbury, D.D. Portrait. 12mo, cloth, $1 75.

Smiles's Self-Help.

Self-Help; with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Perseverance. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "The Huguenots" and "Life of the Stephensons." New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 12mo, cloth, $1.

"The writings of Samuel Smiles are a valuable aid in the education of boys. His style seems to have been constructed entirely for their tastes; his topics are admirably selected, and his mode of communicating excellent lessons of enterprise, truth, and self-reliance might be called insidious and ensnaring, if these words did not convey an idea which is only applicable to lessons of an opposite character and tendency taught in the same attractive style. The popularity of this book, 'Self-Help,' abroad has made it a powerful instrument of good, and many an English boy has risen from its perusal determined that his life will be moulded after that of some of those set before him in this volume. It was written for the youth of another country, but its wealth of instruction has been recognized by its translation into more than one European language, and it is not too much to predict for it a popularity among American boys, who are admirers of pluck and push."—World (N. Y.)

"Its purpose is to show how it is possible to gain honorable and brilliant success without adventitious aid, and to surmount the difficulties of 'iron fortune' by patient and faithful endeavor. That purpose is accomplished by means of striking illustrative facts drawn from the lives of representative and successful men. Mr. Smiles is scarcely equalled in the style which fits itself most happily to practical biographical writing."—Brooklyn Eagle.

"An arsenal of encouragements, from actual life, for young folks who find the path of self-improvement full of difficulties"—Advance.

Dixon's Free Russia.

Free Russia. By W. Hepworth Dixon, Author of "New America," "Her Majesty's Tower," etc. With Two Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth. (Just Ready.)

CONTENTS: Up North.—The Frozen Sea.—The Dvina.—Archangel.—Religious Life.—Pilgrims.—Father John.—The Vladika.—A Pilgrim Boat.—The Holy Isles.—The Local Saints.—A Monastic Household.—A Pilgrim's Day.—Prayer and Labor.—Black Clergy.—Sacrifice.—Miracles.—The Great Miracle.—A Convent Spectre.—Story of a Grand Duke.—Dungeons.—Nicholas Ilyin.—Adrian Pushkin.—Dissent.—New Sects.—The Popular Church.—Old Believers.—Cemetery of the Transfiguration.—Ragoski.—Dissenting Politics.—Conciliation.—Roads.—A Peasant Poet.—Forest Scenes.—Patriarchal Life.—Village Republics.—Communism.—Towns.—Kief.—Panslavonia.—Exile.—The Siberians.—St. George.—Novgorod the Great.—Serfage.—A Tartar Court.—St. Philip.—Serfs.—Emancipation.—Freedom.—Tsek and Artel.—Masters and Men.—The Bible.—Parish Priests.—A Conservative Revolution.—Secret Police.—Provincial Rulers.—Open Courts.—Islam.—The Volga.—Eastern Steppe.—Don Kozaks.—Under Arms.—Alexander.

"A book which is at once highly valuable and eminently readable. It is, in our judgment, superior to any work that has proceeded from Mr. Dixon's pen, and we cordially recommend it to our readers. The information Mr. Dixon conveys is very great, and his style is singularly forcible and picturesque."—Standard (London).

"This is a more important and remarkable work upon the great Muscovite Empire than any foreign traveller has ever even attempted, much less accomplished. Thanks to the writer of this splendid volume, 'Free Russia' is brought clearly, boldly, vividly, comprehensively, and yet minutely, within the ken of every intelligent reading Englishman. The book is in many parts as enthralling as a romance, besides being full of life and character."—Sun (London).

M'Clintock and Strong's Cyclopædia.

Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. By Rev. John M'Clintock, D.D., and James Strong, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be completed in about Six Volumes royal 8vo, of about One Thousand Pages each. Vols. I., II., and III., comprising the Letters A to G, are now ready. The remaining volumes are in progress. Price, per volume, cloth, $5; sheep, $6; half-morocco, $8. Vol. III. just ready.

It will interest a large portion of the reading public to know that the lamented death of the Rev. Dr. M'Clintock will occasion no delay in the publication of the remaining volumes of the "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature," prepared under the supervision of the deceased, with the able co-operation of Dr. Strong. The main body of this important contribution to religious literature was prepared before the first page was put in type; and the several articles now require only to be revised, to add the results of fresh researches and discoveries in scholarship, as the several volumes go to press. In this labor Dr. Strong has the assistance of many able and accomplished scholars, belonging to different denominations, and nothing will be left undone to secure the utmost thoroughness and accuracy on every page of the work. The third volume, now ready for publication, exhausts the letter G; and about three volumes more will be required to complete the alphabet. The whole work, thus comprised within six or seven convenient volumes, will form the most important and compact library of reference in the English language for the student of the Bible, in accuracy of scholarship, comprehensiveness of plan, and fulness of detail and illustration, far surpassing every former work of the kind ever attempted in Europe or America.

Tom Brown's School Days.

By An Old Boy. New Edition. Beautifully Illustrated by Arthur Hughes and Sidney Prior Hall. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

"Nothing need be said of the merits of this, acknowledged on all hands to be one of the very best boy's books ever written. 'Tom Brown' does not reach the point of ideal excellence. He is not a faultless boy; but his boy-faults, by the way they are corrected, help him in getting on. The more of such reading can be furnished, the better. There will never be too much of it."—Examiner and Chronicle.

"Can be read a dozen times, and each time with tears and laughter as genuine and impulsive as at the first."—Rochester Democrat.

"Finely printed, and contains excellent illustrations of various scenes around Rugby or described in the book. 'Tom Brown' is a book which will always be popular with boys, and it deserves to be."—World (N. Y.)

"A book upon which praise would be a mere waste of words."—Tribune (N. Y.)

"Some of the drawings are very spirited and school-like."—Christian Union.

"The illustrations are admirably done."—New England Farmer.

Yonge's English-Greek Lexicon.

An English-Greek Lexicon. By C. D. Yonge. With many New Articles, an Appendix of Proper Names, and Pillon's Greek Synonyms. To which is prefixed an Essay on the Order of Words in Attic Greek Prose, by Charles Short, LL.D., Professor of Latin in Columbia College, N. Y. Edited by Henry Drisler, LL.D., Professor of Greek in Columbia College, Editor of "Liddell and Scott's Greek-English Lexicon," etc. 8vo, sheep extra, $7.

The Bazar Book of Decorum.

The Bazar Book of Decorum. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, toned paper, cloth, bevelled edges, $1.

"A series of sensible, well-written, and pleasant essays on the care of the person, manners, etiquette, and ceremonials. The title 'Bazar Book' is taken from the fact that some of the essays which make up this volume appeared originally in the columns of Harper's Bazar. This in itself is a sufficient recommendation—Harper's Bazar being probably the only journal of fashion in the world which has good sense and enlightened reason for its guides. The 'Bazar Book of Decorum' deserves every commendation."—Independent.

Journal of the Prince of Wales's Visit to the East.

Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, etc., in the Suite of

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1870.

The Week.

CUBAN recognition occupied the House till Thursday, when Mr. Banks's resolutions were superseded by Mr. Bingham's, which simply authorized the President to protest against the barbarous manner in which the "war" in Cuba has been conducted, and to co-operate, if advisable, with other powers in keeping both parties within the limits of civilized warfare. The Cubans at Washington are reported to be greatly encouraged by the use of the word "war" in the resolution, and, since this seems the last that will be heard of either, from this Congress, nobody will grudge them their innocent satisfaction. The bill granting Goat Island, in San Francisco Bay, as a terminus for the Pacific Railroad, has been stubbornly debated during the week. On Monday, the Fortification and Army Appropriation Bills were passed. Mr. Whittemore's case came before the House on Saturday, on presentation of his credentials, and, of course, he found Mr. Logan ready to move against his admission. Postponement took place until Tuesday, when, by means of the previous question, Mr. Logan obtained a vote of exclusion, of 128 to 24. While the country is to be congratulated on this special decision, we regret that the House was not allowed time to invest its action with more of the character of a precedent for similar cases that may arise hereafter. The Senate has done little else than play with the bill to abolish the franking privilege, which it had no intention of passing, and which it killed on Tuesday, though by a rather close vote.

The retirement of Mr. Hoar had been so often predicted that when it occurred there was at first doubt if it had actually taken place. When it was known that he had really left office, there was any amount of speculation, the world generally inclining to the opinion that there was to be a general reorganization of the Cabinet. Mr. Fish, rumor said, did not agree with the President's San Domingo scheme; Banks's tremendous speech had had the effect of shaking the President's confidence in Fish; the Republican leaders had at last convinced the President that a cabinet must be framed which should represent "the live men of the party;" the President was at last frightened at the hostility of Congress; he had summoned the Honorable James F. Wilson from the West to take the Attorney-General's place, or else it was the Department of State; Mr. Creswell and Mr. Robeson were to follow Mr. Fish after Mr. Fish had followed Mr. Hoar. All these reports, which are not different from a hundred others that have been in circulation ever since Grant's inauguration, indicate the still unalleviated dissatisfaction of the political leaders with Grant's way of making up the list of his advisers—a way which he has in no instance changed for the better, in their opinion, except in the solitary instance of substituting Mr. Boutwell for Mr. Stewart. Mr. Fish was less to their mind than Wilson or Washburn, and Mr. Robeson was no more to be desired than Mr. Borie. Probably it is true, too, that there is a willing enough audience to listen to the talk of the organs of the leaders; and in the sort of discontented lethargy in which both the great parties now are, something startling in the way of Cabinet changes would be welcome to the public in general, as certainly it would be a godsend to editors. Apparently, however, neither the public nor the editors are going to be obliged; for there seems to be no intention on the President's part of remodelling his cabinet in the interests of "the live men of the party," or of abating at all, in his selection of new men, his remarkable indifference to "men known to the people." It is really a very remarkable indifference, and a proof of Grant's continued unmalleability, after all that has been said of his succumbing to pressure.

As for Mr. Hoar's resignation, it seems to have been accepted in accordance with the long-expressed wish of Mr. Hoar, and to have been offered as much to the President's regret as could have been the case at any time since Mr. Hoar became Attorney-General. He is understood to have been on peculiarly friendly terms with General Grant, as is believable enough by those who have long known him for one of the wittiest and shrewdest of men, as well as one of the most weighty and sagacious of legal advisers, and as being as pleasant with an honest man as sharp with a rascal and humbug. It appears that he was not willing at first to accept the place which Grant begged him to accept, and that he long ago was earnest to resign it. It may be imagined how well he liked to have Mr. Whittemore, for instance, or Senator Pomeroy urging on his attention the claims of this or that South Carolina politician, or—perhaps a shade worse—Kansas politician, to a marshalship or district-attorneyship. The President, however, insisted on his remaining, and attempted, as everybody knows, to secure for him a place on the Supreme Bench—a thing which was not to be, as some of the disappointed South Carolinians and Kansans have, no doubt, since meditated with some touch of joy. Since the Senate's revenge, Mr. Hoar has remained with the effect, whether or not with the intention, of showing the Senate that neither the Attorney-General nor the President was to be snubbed into submission; and now he goes out, to the general regret of the country, which by this time knows that, in losing him, the President loses a counsellor who would always have had a word of sense to say on any topic under discussion. That all he did in office was entirely to our mind is more than we would say. Too yielding a softness, and a too easy willingness to take a backward step after having taken a wrong forward one, are not among the late Attorney-General's faults of character; and if he had convinced himself, while at the Massachusetts bar or on the Massachusetts bench, that the Legal-Tender Act was a constitutional act, nothing was to be expected from him, when Judge Chase and the other judges decided that it was unconstitutional, than that he should make a demand to have the question reopened, and then fight to have it determined differently. Still, in peace as in war, "that is best blood which hath most iron in't;" and much is to be excused to the man who has for the first time, in many years of Washington history, given a back-handed blow to many an impudent and arrogant disposer of patronage. He may well be proud of most of the enmity that he won while in office, and may go back contented to Massachusetts to be her most honored citizen.

The Senate is reported to be not over and above pleased with the President's new man for the Attorney-General's chair, whom some of his enemies describe as a "third-rate rebel and a fourth-rate lawyer," and of whom some people, not his enemies but perhaps not much inclined to like his nomination, say that they hope, when he gets into his office, he may have influence enough to get his State into the Union. As to his ability as a lawyer, all that seems to be known about that in Washington is that Mr. Hoar recommended him for the last vacant justiceship in the Supreme Court, and that he is well thought of by the Georgia bar—which would seem to be enough to know. As for his being a third-rate rebel, the fact seems to be that, like half-a-dozen other Georgians who were either Joe Brown Anti-Jefferson-Davisites, or out-and-out Unionists, his legal brother Robert Toombs gave him a nominal position on his home-guard staff and saved him from conscription. It is asserted and not denied that he was a good Unionist before, during, and after the war. In the year 1869 he had cases in a certain town in his section of country, and was obliged to go into court and asked to have them continued, on the ground that he could not be admitted to the only hotel in the place for fear of costing it its patronage. He had been conspicuous as a Republican member of the constitutional convention, and that in those days in Georgia was to accept social ostracism, to say nothing of inviting a shot through a chamber shutter or from behind a tree. He appears to be known to General Grant by his speeches, and, we conjecture, by the character of him given by Mr. Hoar. He is a native of New Hampshire, and is in middle life. By virtue of a law just signed, he will, if confirmed, be the head of a new Governmental Department, to be called the Department of Law, and to be of equal dignity with the other Departments. Hitherto each Department has had its solicitors and other legal officers, all independent of the Attorney-General, but hereafter the solicitor of the War, State, Navy, Treasury, and Interior Departments will be subservient to the Attorney-General, who by himself or his various assistants will manage every case in which the United States may be concerned, and who annually will report as the Secretaries do to Congress. The sneer in regard to the status of Mr. Akerman's State would seem to be rather harder on certain other people that could be named than on him. Doubtless, it was as well to recognize the fact that the South is once more in the Union, whatever may be the position of Georgia.

No record of the past week would be complete which should pass unnoticed the remarkable meeting at the Cooper Union on Thursday. The appearance of Red Cloud and his companions on the platform of our largest hall, crowded to excess with spectators of both sexes, was a spectacle such as may never be witnessed again so far away from the haunts of the wild Indians. It was comparable to nothing so much as the public recital of a fugitive slave in former years, and the moral effect upon the audience was certainly of the same kind. Red Cloud's presence and words were full of dignity, and he contented himself with repeating what he so constantly declared in Washington—they had been wronged, deceived as to the treaties, furnished with agents who got rich by defrauding them; and he demanded indemnification for the past, and better guaranties for the future. Red Dog spoke with an apt humor, which left no doubt that he was a "human being;" and Dr. Crosby, Dr. Washburn, Dr. Bellows, and Peter Cooper enforced the claims of the Indians in language calculated to confirm the good impression already made. So far as concerns the Indians, we judge the trip to this city to have been well advised; and public opinion was perhaps affected by it more widely and more favorably than we can estimate. No marvel of all that the Indians saw on their way to the East would compare, if they but realized it, with the diffusion given to their speeches by the aid of the telegraph and the press. It will be a peculiar disgrace if Congress alone shall show itself deaf to their just complaints, and bent on continuing the violations of treaty which are at the root of the present disturbances on the border.

When Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, now three months since, wrote to his constituents informing them that he would only accept a renomination on condition that, while awaiting the passage of a Civil Service Bill, he was not to be regarded as a patronage broker, the "men inside politics" wagged their heads and pronounced him a ruined man. The doctrine that office-seeking is the mainspring of American political movements is gospel to a Philadelphia politician, so that even the friends of the Congressman felt some alarm lest this defiance of the gentlemen supposed to control delegate elections and nominating conventions should result in a defeat that would be of bad omen to the cause of reform. That we do not agree with Mr. Kelley in his notions of political economy, nor in some of his other notions, and that, indeed, we have not been among Mr. Kelley's admirers at all, no reader of ours need be told; and yet it is with some satisfaction that we record the fact of his triumphant renomination. No man can have served for eight years in Congress without giving ample cause for personal dissatisfaction on the part of numerous influential constituents, and the very independence which Mr. Kelley has displayed is an earnest that he must have disobliged many men who deem themselves omnipotent in laying wires and "controlling their precincts." When to this was added the indignation naturally aroused by his refusal to be a mere machine for the distribution of Federal "patronage," one can readily understand that the canvass against him must have been long and bitter, as in fact it was. Yet, when the nominating convention met on Wednesday, the 15th, on the first ballot he received 64 votes out of 91; and, among the resolutions unanimously adopted, we observe the following: "Resolved, That we fully endorse the positions taken by him in his letter of March 8, 1870, addressed to a large number of his constituents, allowing his name to be submitted for renomination, and, until the passage of a Civil Service Bill by Congress, we recommend him to observe the provisions of the one submitted during this session."

Now the Fourth Congressional District of Pennsylvania comprises the north-western and western suburbs of Philadelphia, containing a large population of those who are regarded by politicians as the blind and unreasoning instruments of party manipulation. If in such a district a man can rise above the petty details of "patronage," if he can boldly bid defiance to all the office-seeking crew, and yet find in the more thoughtful portion of his constituents an efficient and trustworthy support, why cannot Congressmen in the decenter country districts venture to throw off the yoke which keeps them in a fever of apprehension whenever they find themselves unable to gratify the impossible demands of some "manager?" Mr. Kelley will have done some good in his generation if, acting from whatever motives, he shall make it easier for Congressmen to see that a little wholesome independence does not hurt them with the great mass of their constituents. That it would not, we have long been pretty firmly convinced. Is Attorney-General Hoar stronger or weaker before the people for his sending to the right-about certain office-brokers who grace the United States Senate?

The other nominees of the Republican conventions are not of a kind to raise the party in general estimation, or to enable it to contend with advantage with its opponents. We might except the candidate for Congress in the First District, but then his election is hopeless, and the luxury of nominating a good man could be afforded in such a case. Mr. Myers, in the Third District, triumphed over opposition that it was no discredit to encounter. On the whole, there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with the result. The judicial nominations, too, were bad, good men being shelved, and others chosen whose political and even pecuniary antecedents have not been such as to make them ornamental. The same fate attended the scramble for the local offices, the worst men winning, partly, it is said, because the honester members were tired out by the strife and delays of preliminary organization, and could not keep such late hours as the party managers. It has been suggested that the Union League might profitably resume its former activity in political affairs, and at least see that the city offices are filled by respectable men. Others look for a remedy of the existing evil to what is known as the Crawford County system, which involves a direct popular vote for candidates.

We hear a little more from the Charleston Republican in relation to the literary capacity of the late Legislature of South Carolina, but it is only to the effect that the editor of that journal has examined the payrolls of the body in question, and has found that no member made his mark, but that all signed their names. Of this there need be little doubt, but we still advise everybody to doubt that a majority of the colored Representatives and Senators of South Carolina can write or read a dozen legible words of ordinary script; and if any one is troubled by the doubt, as some Northern men have been who have applied, we see, to the editor of the Republican for information, we recommend him to ask the opinion of Mr. R. Tomlinson, late State Auditor, as to the incorruptibility and intelligence of last winter's Legislature. What his answer would be we can guess, though we know absolutely nothing about it; but, beyond a doubt, it ought to be unreservedly taken by us or anybody else. We have to say here, however, that the Reform Party has met in successful convention at Columbia, and, after speeches from white and colored speakers, has nominated for Governor Judge Carpenter, formerly a Federal General, and for Lieutenant-Governor General Butler, formerly of the Confederate service, and a South Carolinian of the South Carolinians. He is a relative of the Senator Butler who once represented the State in the United States Senate, and was a celebrity in his day. The prospects of the Reform Party seem more favorable than they were, and their platform, which accepts the Fifteenth Amendment and every other result of the war, leaves nothing to be desired. A thing for Republican leaders to note about this business is the indication it gives that a colored South, solid for a Republican candidate, is not at all sure now, and grows rather less sure with every day.

What the mining interest is to Pennsylvania, the shoemaking business is to Massachusetts; and if the "Crispins" have not yet succeeded in getting laws passed securing them plenty of towels and wash-basins, and granting generally what they demanded by way of personal comfort or protection against their employers, nor in establishing a reign of terror, the reason appears to be rather that they live in Massachusetts than in Pennsylvania. Their trades-union is, nevertheless, very formidable, and practises intimidation and violence as legitimate means of gaining its ends. The pleasant life of a manufacturer in Sheffield has nearly become the prospect of the stubborn shoe-manufacturer. In the town of North Adams, at the western terminus of the Hoosac Tunnel, matters had reached such a pass that a manufacturer, rather than yield to the dictation of the Crispins, sent out to California and engaged seventy-five Chinese laborers to take the places of his strikers; and last week, to the dismay of the latter, the first colony of Asiatics that ever settled in New England arrived, and were safely lodged in the shop of Mr. Calvin Sampson. A large and hostile crowd met them at the depot, hooted them, hustled them somewhat, and threw stones at them, but did no serious mischief. The townspeople, we read, treat the new-comers with perfect respect, and with kindness such as "probably no Chinaman ever received on American soil before." They have, however, been prudently kept within doors for the present, and Mr. Sampson has doubled his guards, and taken other precautions against being blown up or set on fire.

The Chinese, and this especially annoys the Crispins, show the usual quickness of their race in learning the processes of their new business, and already do creditable hand and machine work that promises full success to the experiment. They apply themselves with the same earnestness and aptness to learning the English language, and will presently be objects of interest to the public and Sunday-schools. Their contract gives them twenty-three dollars a month the first year, and twenty-six dollars a month for the next three years; their travelling expenses were paid; they are housed and supplied with heat for cooking; and, if they die, they must, it is said, be sent home to China. The question that now presents itself to the Crispins, and, indeed, to all the other trades-unions in Massachusetts, is what to do to resist this innovation, which threatens to ruin their organization and put them beneath the concern of the capitalist. It will be contrary to experience if their first resort is not to violence and outrage, and their latest conclusion that, while the right to combine for higher or for fixed wages is indisputable and even sacred, the right to hinder any man from working for what he pleases exists only in the minds of the ignorant and brutal. It could have been wished that the labor controversy might have been settled here without involving a conflict of races; but it is not for us to choose which of two inevitable problems should first arise and be disposed of, or whether they should be kept separate. We can only congratulate ourselves that Massachusetts is as good a field as could be selected for either.

Some twenty Philadelphia gentlemen of wealth and deserved weight in the community, have united in a protest to Congress against the continuance of the income tax. They bring the usual and well-founded objections, that it is a tax on industry, thrift, and conscientiousness, and is unequal and unjust in its operation, but they lay stress on three points: that it was essentially a war measure; that by the law which continued it to this time Congress virtually gave a pledge that it should now be abolished; and that the tax is of so doubtful constitutionality as not to be "endured without question in time of peace." In other words, there is a settled purpose to test the law in the courts if it should be re-enacted. We have nothing to say on this last head, but the argument seems to us less strong in the other two particulars. It will be many years before we shall be able to dispense with "war measures," and it is only fair to discriminate among them when seeking to make this or that one odious. The Legal-Tender Act was a war measure, but, constitutionality apart, of a very different kind from the income tax law. In the latter there is nothing immoral, though it may be demoralizing, and on that ground might be abolished. As to the "pledge" of Congress, it consists in that provision of the act which continues it till the incomes of 1869 should be ascertained, "and no longer"—a provision put in to conciliate the popular opinion of the day, which, certainly, so far as it found expression, was adverse to the imposition of the tax, though there was, doubtless, a general alacrity among about thirty-nine millions out of forty millions of the people to see incomes levied upon to any extent that might please Congress. Then, as now, an income of more than a thousand dollars a year was not an encumbrance which more than 275,000 of our citizens labor under, if any faith is to be put in the assessors' books. This "pledge" Congress has, of course, the right to disregard entirely, the doctrine being preposterous that at one session Congress may, by an act made in the most ordinary course of legislation, tie up from exercising, ordinary legislative functions all Congresses or any one. Congress is more near to being practically omnipotent than it is to being so impotent as this doctrine would make it. The matter is different when, speaking by the mouth of Congress, the nation solemnly pledges the national faith to a foreign nation, and is somewhat different when, as in the Missouri Compromise, a generation solemnly ties its own hands in reference to a particular matter. But in neither of these cases is it ordinary legislation that is done.

Italy has lost a man whose death will be felt as deeply, if not as widely, in this country as in his native land, the Senator Gaetano de Castillia. He died at Vimercate, near Milan, on the 12th of May, at the age of seventy-six. Condemned to execution in 1824, for the part he had taken in revolutionary movements two years before, his punishment was commuted on the scaffold to twenty years' imprisonment at the Spielberg, whither Felix Foresti and Silvio Pellico had preceded him, and Count Gonfaloniere, Marquis Pallavicini, Andryane, Borsieri, and others, accompanied him. On the accession of Ferdinand, in 1835, the imprisonment, which had been of frightful severity, was commuted to perpetual exile in America. All whom we have named, excepting Pellico and Pallavicini, were transported to New York in the steerage of an Austrian vessel, towards the end of 1836. Two years later, Castillia was permitted to go to France, and might have returned to Italy had he been willing to enter into obligations to give no further trouble to Austria. He did return subsequently, but untrammelled by concessions, and naturally enough remained under police surveillance until the emancipation of Lombardy, in 1859. When Lombardy became part of the Kingdom of Italy, Castillia was made senator. He survived all his companions in suffering.

A venerable and illustrious man, the Marquis Gino Capponi, wrote thus of Castillia, the morning after his death: "He was one of those few elect spirits whom you could not approach without feeling in your heart a desire to be a better man. By the spontaneous action of his nature, he drew in, as if they were but one simple element, all those lofty sentiments which by their diffusion through the atmosphere of this world make it in some manner breathable; while he conciliated those who stood in apparent hostility to his way of feeling by a never-failing justice to adversaries; and this was the secret by which he made his way to every heart. Of an analytical turn of mind, he made his constant study the illustrating of that right which is above all rights, and which bears the name of moral law. Imbued with the classics in early years, and retaining them faithfully in his memory, he afterwards acquired English and German, but he had a strong preference for English literature, because he thought he found in it superior good sense and moral feeling. He who writes these words has lost one who has been for thirty years a brother and a frequent companion, and he writes them in the knowledge that the life of Castillia was precious to many, and that his death will draw tears from not a few noble souls."

MR. BOUTWELL AND MR. WELLS.

THERE is no one who knows Mr. Boutwell, or is familiar with his course as a public man from the days when he was a Massachusetts country Democrat down to to-day, who does not give him credit for personal integrity. He would no doubt on occasion do a little caucusing that might have a doubtful look, and he would allow more than a little to be done for him; and he would not make difficulties when the man who did it asked to be put into an assessor's office or a custom-house or a consulship; and he would be just as ready to give away places to the man who had served some other member of his party as to give them to men who had served him. Inveterate politician as he is, and that in no high sense of the word, though not in the lowest, he can find it easy to spend the public's money on public servants worth more to himself than to the public; but simple, crass honesty no one, so far as we know, has ever denied that, as a man, he possesses. And this is so well understood that while his getting into Grant's cabinet gave rise to gloomy forebodings in the mind of everybody who knew what was the breadth of his views, and about how much knowledge he has, and how thoroughly he is a politician, and how he would use the thousands of offices in his gift as rewards for all kinds of people with similar "records," his appointment as Secretary, nevertheless, added something to the strength of the public credit, and his course since his appointment has been serviceable in the same way. No one, friend or enemy, has doubted that if the national debt could be speedily paid by a sort of financial brute force, we have a Secretary of the Treasury whose relations to his personal creditors, and whose good intentions, and whose intensity of conviction and confidence in his convictions are such that the country's relations to the national creditors would speedily be of the best sort. Neither Boston, nor Hamburg, nor London, could fail to recognize the long difference between Mr. Boutwell, whether or not he had ever given any profitable study to finance, and an 1867 repudiator.

How little more than this we are likely to get from him has been for some time plain enough, but he has not made it so strikingly evident by any of his previous action as by what he has done in the case of Mr. Wells. Mr. Wells is probably the most useful public servant that the country to-day has. Beyond a doubt, for the next ten years, at least, the most valuable legislator is going to be the Congressman who has the clearest and most thorough knowledge of politico-economical questions; who best sees how the country can most rapidly become richer; and who understands and can show how, to that end, the load of taxation of every description can best be arranged on the public back. Reconstruction we are nearly done with; and we should be much more nearly done with it if the men who have been in Congress for the last twelve months, and have made this session perhaps the most futile session that ever was held in Washington, had had any notion of what it is that the average voter is thinking about most seriously. And whatever may be the opinion of Senators and Representatives who have lost their old subjects of slavery and the rebellion, and have not the knowledge, and have not yet formed the inclination, to adapt themselves to new issues, it is neither the insurrection in Cuba, nor the purchase of San Domingo, nor the regulation of the Mormons, nor the affairs of Roumania, any more than the success of this or that party in Tennessee, that seems to the country to be of vital importance. And that all these are going to seem of less importance before they seem of more, we may be quite sure. It is not on its addresses to Spain nor on its negotiations with Baez that the Republican party is to live for the next few years, but simply on its financial policy. And, as yet, it has none; nor can it be said to have in its ranks any Senator or Representative who has given proof of ability to shape one. Neither House has in it any one with a claim to the title of an expert in finance or any branch of political economy; and whether or not either House has any promising students is more than now appears; but if there are any such, they have need to bestir themselves, for Mr. Boutwell proposes to deprive them of their text-books, and to make their further study a work of immense difficulty. He is understood to intend securing the retirement of Mr. Wells, and the President is said to be at one with him in this remarkable project. The next Congress that legislates on pig-iron is to get its facts in regard to that manufacture, if it shall please Providence that it gets any facts in regard to pig-iron, from the gentlemen who make it. Any information as to the dividends of the New York salt-makers is to come from the books, public or private, as may seem advisable, of the salt-makers themselves. In a word, there are to be no more American statistics, Mr. Boutwell has decided; and when the people are asked to give money to certain persons who plead poverty and demand Government assistance, there is to be no means of discovering how needy they are except the word of the applicants; and each one of these, of course, strenuously maintains of almost every other one that he is a liar and, in effect, a common robber.

Here, it will be seen, is no question of protection or free-trade, and no opportunity for any honest protectionist or free-trader to disagree. It is simply that the facts on which legislation must be based in order to be useful or stable, are to be taken away from the legislator; unless, indeed, he sets himself about acquiring the impartial mind, the power of close observation of innumerable details, and of generalizing upon them philosophically—of making himself over, in short, into a philosophic scientist, and then sets himself, when made over, to acquiring a vast mass of special knowledge, of which he now has nothing, and which Mr. Wells has. The fact would seem to be that the Secretary of the Treasury has a hatred of statistics, or, at best, a disbelief in them, which might be called very curious if it were not so common among the men who have been most influential in the recent history of the country. Mr. Wells, for example, gathers together from all parts of the country, and studies and tabulates, a mass of figures capable, in the hands of an instructed statistician, of showing with accuracy what is to be our next corn crop or our next wheat crop, or cotton or wool crop —a source of information, one would think, which a financial minister might be thankful to have ready to his hand and be able to use in making his scheme of taxation. But Mr. Boutwell is capable not only of declining to use it, but of contradicting its conclusions on the strength of what he himself had observed from a car window when travelling up and down the country. Something like this we have heard of him, and there is nothing incredible in it, incredible as it ought to seem. Men of his kind do not care for figures, nor believe that there is a science of statistics, still less that upon it is based the science of society; and the political training which he has had has done nothing to develop in him anything but a sort of impatient contempt for people who insist on the necessity of scientific legislation. The best part of his training he got among the set of men, many of them able and most of them as honest as himself, who have for ten or twelve years past been navigating so successfully by merely keeping two or three of the great moral headlands in sight, that it is some time since they dropped the compass and quadrant overboard, and became careless, if not sceptical and scornful, as to any other part of seamanship than crowding canvas. And the worse part of his training he got in the school that thinks enough is said when it can say that it has got a majority in the last fall elections, and a very good show—if the proper number of brass-band speeches are made in the rural districts—for carrying the elections next fall.

We do not disguise our belief that it is little less than calamitous that a man so strong in his convictions, so narrow in his views, so uninstructed, and so saturated with the spirit of "practical politics," should have obtained the ascendancy which Mr. Boutwell seems to have attained over the mind of General Grant, or at least should be able to constrain him to choose between retaining the Secretary or sacrificing the Commissioner. It is notorious that Mr. Boutwell dislikes all reform, that he pooh-poohs the notion of a Civil Service Bill, that his department has been manned throughout in the precise spirit of Andrew Jackson's spoils policy. But that he should drive Mr. Wells from office is worse than all the rest; and that Grant should let him do it is something which, for its own sake, the Republican majority would, it seems to us, be only ordinarily prudent to prevent. Nothing, in short, should be left undone which seems likely to retain him. Mr. Wells can afford to go, we may be sure, a great deal better than we can afford to lose him.

THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT.

The eight-hour movement is the effort to settle a great social contest. The one thing very apparent in it is the profound dissatisfaction of the laboring classes with their present condition—a dissatisfaction entirely apart from the question of what wages men should earn in a special trade—a dissatisfaction entirely novel in the history of labor contests in the United States. It is a dissatisfaction such as, in a greater degree of intensity, has before now convulsed the social fabric of older nations. It is a dissatisfaction which, for the first time in our republic, ranges laboring men as a separate class against the rest of the community. This circumstance alone is sufficient to characterize the movement as an entirely different one from all those that culminate in strikes, or that aim merely at "getting twenty-five per cent. more wages for the same work." If this latter were all that is aimed at, nothing would be easier than to demand it, and in case of failure, to strike with precisely the same prospect of success as the eight-hour enactment offers. No; the men who are leading the eight-hour movement do not complain of the wages they earn in their respective trades. They are satisfied that their employers cannot afford to pay more. They are not struggling, as it were, each with the capitalist that employs him. They are struggling with the whole social organization, with the laws of the entire body politic, under which, by some mysterious process not intelligible to them, their labor no longer commands the same comforts, the same rights, the same influence, the same respect, the same justice that it used to command. They are making a desperate effort to prevent themselves from being pressed down under foot and reduced to the semi-servitude of the pauper labor of Europe. It is a blind rebellion against the fate which seems to threaten them with a worse slavery than that from which they have just freed their colored fellow-citizens.

It must be clear to every one who has attentively followed the development of this movement, that its origin lies in the monstrous inequality in wealth which the last few years have created, and in the equally monstrous inequality in all other things which has flowed from it; and in our Republic, men having not only the right, but the sacred duty, to lay bare each sore on the social body and see to it that the cauter be applied, we are likely to hear a great deal of this matter. In a republic, it will be argued, men must be somewhere near an equality in worldly possessions; there must be no extremes of stupendous wealth and abject poverty, or else the over-rich become ambitious, oppressive, unjust, proud, and the over-poor become envious, discontented, unhappy, desperate. There is no social and political equality, there is no republic, possible where such extremes prevail. The eight-hour movement is giving expression to a thought that has troubled many a thoughtful man of late. Its leaders are struggling to preserve the independence of the laboring classes; they are fighting to save the Republic.

Why, then, if this view of the origin of the struggle is correct, has it taken the strange form of an utterly futile and foolish demand for a legislative shortening of the hours of labor? We think we understand the reason perfectly. The laboring man who works all day from morning till night, all the six days of the week, will be a laboring man all his life. The man who has to work all day six days in the week to earn the necessaries of life, will be a poor man all his life. The man who can earn the necessaries of life by working only five days in the week, and then chooses to work the sixth day likewise, will earn more than he needs, will save the earnings of that day, and will grow rich. The laboring man who works all day from morning till night, all the six days of the week, will be a laboring man all his life, and will be an ignorant man all his life as well. He who can earn the necessaries of life by working eight hours instead of ten, or five days in the week instead of six, has some hours each day, one day each week, to devote to his improvement, to study, to increasing his skill, to learning how others have increased theirs, to invent means for saving his own labor, to improve his tools and to invent new ones. The wonderful progress in wealth, the wonderful spread of intelligence, that has made the career of the United States for ever memorable among nations, is due to the one principal fact, that nowhere in the world where protracted labor is possible would so few hours of labor furnish men with the necessaries of life; nowhere had men such leisure—not for idleness, but leisure for more work, to save and grow rich, to learn and become skilled. The laboring man understands this more thoroughly than the men of any other class in the community. It comes more closely home to him than to any other. He, if any one, feels instinctively that all his savings, all his progress in knowledge and skill, depend almost exclusively upon the number of his leisure hours—the number of hours, that is, which are left to him after earning the necessaries of life. Now, for some reason or other, laboring men throughout the country have for years past had to work more hours to earn the necessaries of life than they had formerly. They find that, after working all day six days in the week, they have barely earned subsistence, have saved nothing, have learned nothing. They know that they have done nothing to forfeit, within their knowledge, the results of their labor. They know that their labor produces as good results as formerly, or better. They feel that they are entitled to the same share in the results as formerly. They believe they are in some way defrauded of their rights. They know that it is not through their own employers directly, and that a strike would not avail. They do not, cannot understand the cause. They only know that the same hours of labor as before do not give them the same amount of the necessaries of life as before—do not give them the same savings, the same leisure, as before. And in their ignorance they claim that they should, therefore, have the necessaries of life for less hours of labor.

The process of reasoning seems simple enough. It is the kind of reasoning that always prevails in popular movements. But it shows very thoroughly how the eight-hour movement has grown naturally out of a conviction (which, indeed, no one denies) that labor in this country no longer commands the same comforts or the same influence that it used to command. We claim nothing for the argument except that it shows how a foolish demand for an utterly futile legislative enactment can be the natural outgrowth of an imperious, impatient, growing, threatening dissatisfaction with a social and political organization that can produce in a few years such "monstrous inequalities" of wealth, power, and justice as may well appall even those who have the courage to scrutinize them closely, as may well tempt less thoughtful, less conscientious people to shut their eyes upon them, to forget them in the whirl of feverish enjoyment or more feverish accumulation of almost fabled wealth.

The argument itself could have claimed our attention but for a moment. The essential fact is, that the laboring men of the United States are becoming thoroughly alive to the truth that, by some means which they do not understand, an unjust proportion of the products of their labor goes to swell the earnings of men whose colossal gains, colossal power, colossal unscrupulousness renders their existence dangerous to the welfare of the community; that the laboring men, at least of the New England States, are rapidly and actively organizing in order to control legislation favorable to their views; and that by a process of reasoning which we have just explained, this organization has taken the shape of the eight-hour labor movement.

We would not be understood as exaggerating the present importance of this movement. It will be years yet before the ordinary American will need to give himself immediate trouble about any of the phases of either the social or the economic contest between the capitalist classes and the laboring. That blessed provision of Providence which has entered so largely into so much of our American success—the continent of waste land behind us—is not yet exhausted, though it is going fast; and it is only here in the older States, where we "live closer" than in the West and the Far West, and where we have the largest class of foreordained and inevitable lifelong day-laborers, that the problem appears in threatening shape. In New England itself, where the eight-hour movement is stronger than in any other part of the country, the body of laboring men is not yet permeated to any very great extent by the doctrines Mr. Phillips has laid down for them. In Massachusetts they had, last year, a candidate of their own for the governorship, but he secured only a trifling vote. To be sure, there is to be set against this the fact that the so-called Temperance party cast a vote still smaller, and that nevertheless a very large portion of the Republican party is in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, though, apparently, not in favor of the attempt at enforcing abstinence by law. Nevertheless, we are yet a long way, speaking of the United States in general, from anything resembling a desperate struggle between the antagonistic classes whose rise we are witnessing. Still, though the evil is not upon us yet, the rise of these opposing forces is portentous, and, if it need not to-day trouble any politicians but the smaller local demagogues, it may well set serious men to serious thinking.

HON. P. L. SLIDER, M.C.

We give him full credit for well-intentioned ambition, persistent energy, and respectable capacity. The questions which afflict us with doubts are, What sufficient reason was there for sending him to Congress? and, What good has he done there? Like some other distinguished, and a vastly greater number of undistinguished, persons, he passed his early years in poverty; and, but for a laudable hankering after knowledge and a singular perseverance in striving to acquire it, he would have passed them in ignorance. So much has been said concerning this part of the Hon. Publius Slider's career, that we feel driven to strew a little of our own diction upon it.

It is not positive what species of light was shed upon his lonely childish studies. Some of his eulogists have contended for pine-knots; it is quite certain that he had no gas nor kerosene; let us compromise on tallow-dips. The point is important; witness the enthusiasm of sound Lincoln Republicans for lightwood; witness the moral glow which old Democrats find in coals of hickory. But Mr. Slider himself, never having claimed the halo of ignited turpentine in the natural stick, we will not insist for him upon that flaring distinction. One thing is sure: he was second clerk in a country grocery store; calumny cannot rob him of that title to the people's confidence. A further demonstration of his early promise exists in the fact that he slept on the counter, with no extra covering in cold weather but a horse-blanket. What would not his standard-bearers have given for that square of scarlet woollen during the late election? Carried at the head of a procession, it would have doubled his majority. A man who, at the age of twelve, slept under a horse-blanket, must surely be capable, at forty-eight, of presiding over the finance committee and giving sage counsel as to our foreign relations, however many proofs he may have furnished to the contrary. No one would question this inference except those equally cunning and imbecile miscreants, unquestionably copperheads at heart, who in 1863 asserted that the fact that Andrew Johnson had been taught to read by his wife did not entitle him to "every office within the gift of the American people." Draped in his horse-blanket and illuminated by his tallow-dip, young Slider studied English grammar and practised "writing compositions." There is no doubt that he possessed linguistic and other faculties which would have made him an excellent schoolmaster; for, amid the intellectual leanness of an average country town, he collected a small library of foreign books, and, as rumor phrases it, "mastered various languages." Indeed, his fame as a polyglot scholar is high, except among the peoples who speak the tongues which he is reputed to know. Barring the succulence derivable from these tales of romantic research, the record of Mr. Slider's earlier manhood is as dry as sawdust can make it. Quitting his clerkship, he became a journeyman carpenter, then a master carpenter, then a builder. Here—at a point which we now see to have been critical—his business promotion was checked by his good angel, in the guise of the Know-Nothing agitation. Had he once called himself an architect, he would have remained in merited oblivion; but being still a carpenter, still a worker with his hands, he was fit to represent the masses; that is, he was capable of guiding the nation in morals and finance, in peace and war.

We must not forget another petard which helped to hoist him. He had acquired a vehement knack at public speaking, unless, indeed, the faculty must be classed among his intuitions. This gift prospered; at first he was described as a "tonguey man;" then as "that promising stump orator, the Skokorat carpenter;" then as "that truly eloquent champion of the right, Mr. Publius Lyman Slider." For the matter of his "efforts" he drew upon the newspapers, which up to that time had been his only political reading. For the manner, he formed himself upon collections of Irish oratory and reminiscences of once notorious Whig and Locofoco stumpers. Matter and manner suited his auditors; they had read the first, and knew it was sound; they could hear the last, and it made them "holler."

A carpenter who could spout a college man out of sight, and who had in his youth slept under the reddest of horse-blankets, must of course be sent to Congress, or monarchists might repeat their sneer about the ingratitude of republics. Notwithstanding the murmurs of a few old fogies, who deemed that some knowledge of tariffs and international law was necessary to a legislator, Mr. Slider received a regular nomination and triumphantly led his ticket into the House of Representatives. What might well confound and alarm the despots of Europe is that the Republic survived the shock. What is more, the miracle continues; Mr. Slider is still there, and we still exist. He entered public life with three guiding ideas: first, to stand by his party; second, to do something for workingmen; third, to advance his own interests. Not another notion, not a theory with regard to trade or finance, not a trustworthy hypothesis as to the difference between a national bank and a sub-treasury, not a suspicion that there could be such things as natural laws of commerce and exchange, trammelled the infantile grace and simplicity of this aboriginal statesman. To see him lying down in the Capitol among these pythonian questions, reminds one of the cradled Hercules among the serpents, although we are obliged to admit that the parallel is more flattering to our countryman than to the demigod. This concession, however, is not made by the admirers of "the learned carpenter," who assert that, if he could have had his way, he would have strangled his serpents as well as another; from which we may infer that trade, finance, etc., were lucky in coming off as well as they did. It may be added that no radical change has taken place in Mr. Slider's views, except that his third guiding idea (to look out for himself) has become his first. Even his enemies must concede that, although like necessity he knows no law, he still puts an unwavering trust in statutes of Congress, at least in regard to their action upon other people. He maintains that the Legal Tender Act makes a seventy-cent greenback worth one hundred cents, while at the same time he votes to increase his own salary on the ground of a depreciated currency. He holds that a bill fixing eight hours as a day's work will cause eight hours to pass for ten hours with capitalists and employers, providing it is not a question of sawing at his own woodpile. It has not yet occurred to him to propose a law to the effect that forty minutes shall constitute an hour, and twenty days a month. When he comes to this, what alterations will be required in the calendar, not to mention confusions in the national industry! Perhaps we should have had fewer measures from him had he known that his discoveries, in truth, are the exploded bubbles of a hoary antiquity. A study into the decline of the Turkish piastre from a dollar to five cents, might have taught him that legal-tender firmans cannot make a nominal value pass for a real one. Familiarity with the history of French assignats and of our Continental currency might have led him to suspect that a redundancy of paper-money naturally converts coin from a circulating medium into a commodity, and so renders it as much an object of speculation as any other merchandise. We should have been spared a statute or two against the buying of gold for what it was worth. We should have missed other financial intuitions, and managed our affairs none the worse for it. No fancying what sort of code we might now be under had Mr. Slider been able to carry out all his successive views. Following his more and more enlightened guidance, we might have passed through a varied course of legislation, ranging from the barbarous to the semi-civilized. For the growth of the individual seems to resemble that of society; and the "learned carpenter" was marvellously conducted through the political dogmas of many ages, beginning with the wisdom of naked cannibals and coming down to the ideas current under the Tudors. For instance, he founded his defence of certain prohibitory duties on the sumptuary laws and customs exactions of Henry the Seventh. In short, he has been progressive, and will some day reach the nineteenth century, providing his life is spared another hundred or so of years.

Fortunately, Congress has many intuitive statesmen, and their vagaries have a blessed tendency to neutralize each other. Thus, the self-taught Slider, cherishing the welfare of carpenters, proposes a diminution of duties on Canadian lumber; whereupon the self-taught jumper, devoted to his Penobscot raft-builders, urges that said duties be increased; the happy result being an unruffled tranquillity in the tariff. It is the realization of the dream of a phalansterian philosopher, who held that, if a hundred babies were put in one nursery, they would squall each other into silence. There has been one remarkable movement in Mr. Slider's mind. By the end of his first term he appears to have been attacked by a suspicion that some knowledge of the past would not injuriously adulterate his intuitions. He decided to begin at the beginning; mounted upon Rollin, or some similarly-tried steed, he rode back to the dawn of history, and, as might be expected, he presently fell in with the Greeks and Romans. A studious, persevering man, capable of much misdirected effort, he soon gave a new character to his oratory. It became less like the editorials of a partisan country paper, and more like the erudite passages of the authoress of "Beulah." It shone with the lore and the poesy which can be gleaned from the Congressional Library. He rarely mentioned Washington without making it clear that he had read of Camillus and Fabius Maximus. Debating a bygone tariff, he exhumed the fact that "the mariners of Tyre traded for tin with the tattooed savages of Albion." Denouncing the invasion of Kansas by Missourians, he tore an entire branch from the tree of classic eloquence, and described that much-suffering territory as "deflowered." Eulogizing the memory of "murdered Lovejoy" and "martyred John Brown," he parodied the outburst of Demosthenes concerning the dead of Salamis and Marathon. "By those who fell on Bunker Hill and those who conquered at Saratoga!" cried the deeply affected orator. Such like, thus far, has been the fruit of his researches. It is, nevertheless, a pity that he has only heard of Bastiat, and that he is unfamiliar with Mill's "Political Economy." Some friend should have informed him that these and similar authors would be not less useful to him in the Ways and Means Committee than Plutarch and Smith's Classical Dictionary. For lack of such an adviser, Mr. Slider has continued to plaster the maxims of a patrician and martial antiquity over the needs of a democratic and commercial present, soldering up the chinks in his logic with such tinsel as may be scraped from antique rhetoric. Result: glory, rather than power. Mr. Slider carried no more measures than before; but he became noted among his brother legislators as a "pundit." If he could not prevent the purchase of Alaska, he could show two Globe columns of extracts from hitherto unknown travellers, to the effect that said Territory produces trees and does not produce cereals. If he could not confiscate half the Southern States, he could bring to light the fact that Brutus put his own sons to death. Nothing found a chance to happen in our politics, but he produced a parallel case from the "archives of history." Supported by Plutarch and flanked by Merivale and Grote, he ransacked Latin and Hellenic themes as Alaric and Attila ravaged Latin and Hellenic lands. In standard editorial phrase, he exhausted antiquity.

We must not forget his style. He has a fine ear, of extraordinary length, for the music of periods. A friend of his, well known as "a scholarly man," assures us that some of Slider's sentences sound exactly as if they were translated from Isocrates. We will not quote the famous essay which he read this session on the Fenian imbroglio, lest we should weary readers who do not enjoy Melmoth's version of Cicero. We admit the factious charge that he is a copyist, without feeling bound to alter our estimate of his merits. His plagiarism is statuesque; in two points it rivals the antique: it is nude and it is cold. The resemblance only fails when we come to the classic characteristic of simplicity. Mr. Slider is ornate; you could not fairly demand so much metaphor from a carpenter; you would be tempted at first hearing to set him down for a college-man; you would add that he must have graduated a sophomore. Now and then our representative is surprised that he makes so little sensation. He observes the dusts of fame which follow the party war-horses, and resolves to outprance them on their own prairies. We listen; we rush for shelter; at last the stampede passes. We hear of a proposition to imprison a Dutchman in America every time that a Dutchman, who has crossed the Atlantic twice, is conscripted in Germany. We hear of this on Monday, and on Tuesday we have ceased to hear of it. Perhaps it is Mr. Slider's culture which disables him from outprancing and outsnorting the war-horses; if so, we wish that the same harness, tag and tinsel as it is, might be buckled upon those hitherto unbroken and terrifying stallions. Incited by his familiarity with the most martial nations of ancient times, our hero threw himself personally into the late war, volunteering as a major-general. His fortune reminds us of Terentius Varro; he was soundly beaten, and returned home in safety. Moreover, he did not despair of the Republic, believing probably that, if it could withstand intuitive statesmanship, it would not be ruined by intuitive generalship. The main difference between the Roman and the American lies in the fact that no admiring Senate went out to greet the latter. The responsibility of this oversight must not be laid upon General Slider, who would have been charmed to receive and address the conscript fathers.

The intuitive statesman has had his assailants. Did they attack him because he blundered in finance, because he wanted to risk foreign complications for the sake of the Fenian vote, because he exposed his stark ignorance of international law in handling the Cuban question? No; the lecturers and editors who caught him on the hip cared naught for these things; they were accustomed to act from a moral stand-point; they blackened his private character. He was charged with getting half-seas over at a picnic; and the Thoughtful Teetotaller was exhorted to make an example of him. How did he meet this adroit political thrust? By proving that he had supported the Fifteenth Amendment, and that his brother's barn had been burned by the Ku-Klux. Yet the Hon. Publius L. Slider is not to be entirely despised. We admit, with a doubtful flicker of gratitude, that he is a phenomenon of growing culture. In a republic of savages, and perhaps in a republic of backwoodsmen, he would be impossible. He may be said to hold the same position in our political life that the Tom-Tom does in our literary life. He paves the way for something better. Nevertheless, we cannot exhort the pupils of our common schools to take him for a model. He drives us to question the whole venerable theory of intuitions, and to suspect that the metaphysicians who found their systems on it build upon the sand. We broadly and stubbornly deny that immediate cognitions can produce statesmanship or anything else practically valuable. Our utmost concession is that a man may be an ass by intuition.

FRANCE.

PARIS, June 3, 1870.

THAT not one foot of his original standing has been preserved by Émile Ollivier is, unfortunately, too true. From the moment when he began to abandon all the principles to uphold which he ostensibly came into office, he has pursued a perpetually downward course, and is now neither loved, esteemed, nor feared. Émile de Girardin spoke but the bare truth when he said, the other day, in the Liberté, "It is certain that the Keeper of the Seals finds means every day to afflict his friends and make his enemies rejoice." Ollivier's friends (and he had some really attached ones) are in positive dismay, and, with fallen crests, admit that his failure is owing to the most inexplicable and most unforeseen of causes—to the species of madness, or rather imbecility, that apparent success produces sometimes on vain, vulgar natures. The disappointment is a severe one, for Ollivier's friends, who knew that he was vain, would never consent to admit that he was "vulgar," but, on the contrary, declared that the essence of his character was elevation. It is quite certain that, for being credited with this quality, Ollivier was elected one of the "Forty" of the Académie Française, and it is equally certain that, were the election to have taken place after instead of before the plébiscite, he would not, as I observed in my last, have counted perhaps one vote.

What is now believed by the wise and the initiated is that Émile Ollivier has served his time, and that the Emperor will let him slip down from his honors at the first opportunity, putting in his place a Picard ministry. The object of this is supposed to be simply a plausible way of coming round to M. Rouher. When this colorless, neither-flesh-nor-fowl Cabinet has become quite used up, and has proved its abortiveness, the Emperor will seem to give in spontaneously to the wishes of the Liberal party, and call the men of the moderate Left Centre into power. They will last a certain time also, as their predecessors have done, and then, after he has appeared to grant every imaginable satisfaction to the force of public opinion, Louis Napoleon, in honest regret (!) at the little success he has achieved, will turn round, and represent himself as obliged, for the sake of order, liberty (!), and the prosperity of the country, to resort to what was the original form of the Empire—to personal government, pure and simple, administered by the clever hands of M. Rouher.

That this will be the course of events, there is, I fancy, small doubt; but there will also be a degree of opposition, various in its nature and its sources, for which mere personal autocracy is, perhaps, even now, not altogether prepared. As I observed to you in my last, the fusion of all classes and opinions is an accomplished fact, and will not again cease to be. Orleanists, Republicans, Monarchists of all shades, meet and discuss together, and, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, put in common their distaste to the existing régime rather than their approval of it. This is a gain to the nation that will nevermore be lost, and its results are incalculable. This fusion was the very first consequence of the advent to power of the Ministry of the 2d of January, and it was as unlooked for as it was complete and sudden. At the first reception of the Garde des Sceaux, the entire army of what is termed "all Paris" thronged the saloons of the new Minister. On the landing-place leading into the first drawing-room, I think I can even now see, as I saw then, M. de Rémusat holding with one hand the arm of a Legitimist and ex-deputy (who had once been his colleague), and with the other hand holding his own sides, for he was absolutely bursting with laughter. His companion tried to get away from his grasp, for the bystanders noted them curiously, but the witty son-in-law of Lafayette would not be eluded: "Look there! look there! mon cher ami!" whispered he, pointing to two men who stood in the entrance between the first and second saloons—"Look there!" and there, where he pointed, stood shaking hands effusively and bowing low to each other—who? Why, M. Guizot and M. de Persigny! "And why not, après tout?" rejoined M. de Rémusat, when he had somewhat recovered from his fit of hilarity—"why not? the world is a comedy; but such a Carnival of Venice as you and I are witnessing at this hour we shall probably never see again."

Well, Louis Philippe's ex-minister was right. It was a carnival; but the people who have gone mumming and masking together will not now fall out again and refuse to meet. They will fight, and I should say there is many a hard fight in store for them; but they will come down together into the same arena, and (what is popularly termed) "have it out." If you need a further proof of the degree to which "fusion" of every sort and kind has gone, you need only open the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes (of the 1st of June). You will find a long and very remarkable article, signed A. Cochin, upon the vexed question of the municipal regulations of capital towns, such as Paris, London, Vienna, etc. It is quite evident to all who know the classifications of opinions and parties in France that, up to the end of last year, M. Cochin would have had no chance of being admitted to the dogmatical, doctrinal, dictatorial Revue, for the simple reason that M. Cochin was one of the founders and chief contributors to the Correspondant, the so-called "Catholic" organ, whose principles were in every respect distasteful to the Revue. But many events have occurred to unite those who hitherto kept asunder. Rome has made itself hateful to such a large body of the enlightened Catholics of France, that it is a question now whether the writers of the Revue are more hostile than the writers of the Correspondant. In the lecture he gave upon the life of M. de Montalembert, M. Cochin publicly declared such sympathy and such determined admiration for the man who had just accused Rome of "idolatry," that it became the duty of every free, independent Frenchman to regard M. Cochin as a fellow-thinker and worker. This bringing together, however, of men in the two opposite camps of the so-called "Clericals" and the "Philosophers" is one of the greatest signs of the times that has been seen in France for the last twenty years.

In politics you have now all shades of Liberals—Democrats, Radicals, Royalists, Conservatives, Monarchists, Republicans—all, except the infinitely small number of "Irreconcilables," leagued together against personal government, or anything in the shape of despotism; in religion, you have all manner of Christians drawn into one common group, from High Churchmen (whether Catholic or Protestant) down to "Spiritualists," in order to resist the encroachments of the Papacy. The same movement is also becoming evident in two other strongholds of tradition in France—in art, namely, and dress. The attacks of "the Revolution" are tremendous on both, and the walls of these Jerichos are tottering. Fifteen years—nay, ten years—ago, a woman dressed according to rule—a rule as inexorable as Persian or Median laws. "Such a thing is not done," "Such a thing is not worn"—that was the form of the anathema—and those only who have become "one" of the Paris world can know how meekly, how unsuspectingly of revolt, all heads were bowed before the dread decree. But now, forsooth, there is no anomaly, no monstrosity, that is not permitted, or, even more, applauded, acclaimed. A parrot, with outspread wings and beak bent down over the wearer's nose, surmounting a bonnet of scarlet crape, would be merely looked upon as an "idea" of happy audacity; and the insertion of a beetle, or a frog, or (who knows?) a fish between the black fangs of the beak would be probably the "improvement" which some imitator of the first wearer would adopt. Sobriety was the distinguishing mark of good dressing in France; and, as in countries where honesty has been the associate of political stupidity, and rascality gets to be thought a synonym for ability, so sobriety is knocked on the head as rococo and embêtant (that is the word!), and whatever is noisiest in attire is held as a sure evidence of emancipation, therefore of progress.

In art, too, it is certain that France, with her curious imitation of the ancients, her "unities" and "traditions," has provoked a reaction, but the reaction is a purely Revolutionary one—namely, violent, destructive—and not in any way progressive or reconstructive. At the Exhibition of Modern Painters (or "Salon," as it is termed here), there are absolutely hundred of pictures which bear testimony to the truth of what I state. But one will suffice, for it could only exist in a country where to overthrow all rule had become a virtue. I allude to the "Salomé" of M. Regnault. If it were the mere proof of a wager won, this extraordinary picture would certainly have a meaning, for it does prove that a man with command enough of brush can do just what he likes; that he can throw an orange drapery over a yellow background, and fling a straw-colored sunlight over a figure of pale, golden-tinted flesh—all these colors, which have the horrible defect of "breeding in-and-in," may be thrust into villanous juxtaposition, and yet the picture be that of a painter. But, after all, when it is achieved, what is the achievement worth? It is a wager won—nothing more. The achievement itself is valueless, for it belongs to the school of pure disorder, of decomposition, which is the true and real Revolutionary school. M. Regnault in all this represents what, in another sphere, is represented by Rochefort, Flourens, and others, an outcry and a bustle—disorder, in a word.

Émile Ollivier has allowed himself to be reduced to the narrow, foolish, obstructive part played in French art by the derided old "classics" of modern times; but where are we to look, in either politics or art, for the masters—for those who create out of their own deep, innate sense of the beautiful, the grand, and the true—and who, satisfied to reflect the genuine characters of their own age, need to counterfeit none, but are and impress themselves upon the mind of the world? As yet, there is no sign of such in France, unless, indeed, it may be Gambetta.

THE ITALIAN PROBLEM.

FLORENCE, June 1, 1870.

POLITICAL geography and mental geography have, so to speak, different maps. The well-known boundary lines of the former disappear partly in the latter, and are replaced by a multitude of what might be called isonoëtic lines, which sometimes sweep boldly across the area of civilization, but more frequently form small eddies round local centres representing a community of mental habits induced by provincial isolation. To trace them all, to fix their centres, and to measure their curvature in a country like Italy, would, indeed, be an ambitious undertaking. But some of the larger ones are easily pointed out, and we shall see that, notwithstanding the apparent seclusion and dissimilarity of these eddies, they are connected and encompassed by some less tortuous lines, remarkable alike for their paucity and their distinctness.

Those who have known Italy only since '59 can form but a faint idea of the seclusion in which her disjointed provinces were forced to live. In the southern and eastern parts especially, the stagnation was almost complete. Only few carriage-roads traversed the country, and the great high-roads which connected the capitals were studded with trammels and obstacles. A journey from Rome to Naples was a kind of hurdle-race. Although only one political frontier had to be crossed, the traveller had to show his passport six times, and was liable to open his trunk five times before he reached the sunny Chiatamone. Foreigners did not mind this much. It was a matter of money and of time, at most of temper, which were all freely spent on the road; but a tempting mirage beckoned them on, and none but the tasteless were ever disappointed.

But it was different with the unfortunate natives. Their passports were something worse than blackmail schedules. Few had a good political conscience, and many had to tremble or to grow pale when the sbirro demanded his passport and impudently conned his features. Very often passports were not granted at all, or were granted only with the injunction to the petitioner never to come back again. This last contrivance was a Roman specialty, the Papal authorities being, thanks to the confessional, in a condition to know where the family ties were strong enough to secure the deterring effect of such an injunction.

The consequence of all this was that almost every Italian died near his cradle. Had the postal arrangements been tolerable, the home-bound Italian might have found means to communicate with his distant brethren without the trouble and expense of a journey. But even letters were expensive—just expensive enough to prevent a poor and parsimonious people from getting, or even thinking of getting, into the habit of epistolary conversation. Nor were seals respected. Letters were frequently opened, and then either confiscated or coolly sent to the addresses without an apology or the smallest attempt at repair. Newspapers were few, and hardly worth reading. Italian literature had reached its lowest ebb, and the few authors that managed to pass the ordeal of the censura, or who, in the pangs of their hunger, had prefaced their works with some splendide mendax dedication to some prince, minister, or cardinal, had nevertheless to starve among the unsold copies of their books, printed at their own expense and risk, and covering the brick floor of their cheerless studies. "What can we do," once said a professor of the Roman university to me, who longed to discuss some long-cherished ideas of his—"what can we do to keep pace with the outer world? We cannot get at it, nor can it reach us. We can neither afford travelling nor buying foreign books and periodicals, not to speak of the dangers we incur in getting them through the custom-house and the censor's bureau." Mr. Gladstone once called the Neapolitan Government the negation of God. He did so after having visited the Neapolitan prisons. But he need not have gone so far to find that negation. The whole of Italy was a dungeon, and an exquisite godlessness ruled and reigned supreme throughout the land.

As long as Italy lay spellbound under this nightmare, each locality had to raise its own crops and then eat its own crops—metaphorically as well as physically. Men of talent and men of genius were born as often, probably, as at any other time of Italian history. But they grew up and thought, nay, even wrote and taught, without knowing each other. Seclusion created individualism, and individualism enhanced, in its turn, this mental isolation. It was a vicious circle, in which each link was guilty; but the principal guilt rested with the rulers and their willing tools. No wonder if localism continued to show itself in everything. Each village had its own costume. The Albano girl could not take a two miles' walk to Genzano without making herself conspicuous as a stranger. A borough is still called un paese, "a country." And who has not heard of the municipal sentiment of Italy? It has become proverbial as forming the characteristic feature of Italian history, the source of many woes and many glories. But it may not be equally known that even Italian philosophy partakes of this character. In other countries one thinker criticises and utilizes the other. One builds, and the other unbuilds or adds to the structure, as the case may be. At all events, one knows and influences the other. Systems and schools grow up, and the history of such growth becomes part of the national history. Not so in Italy. The three or four philosophers which modern Italy—the Italy of the nineteenth century—can boast of, have only two things in common: they all write Italian, and they all are political prophets and paracletes whose doctrines are consoling, hope-inspiring, and elevating. But no other country could have produced three contemporary and almost coëtaneous philosophers of such perfect originality as distinguishes Rosmini, Gioberti, and Mamiani. As thinkers, they were strangers not only to each other, but to the whole transalpine world. There is no evolutionary relation between them, and whatever their central or (so to speak) subterranean connection may have been, they appear on the surface as three distinct and isolated upheavals rendered possible by a sudden decrease of tyrannical pressure.

A short visit to Italy, provided it implies something more than hackneyed sight-seeing, must convince any impartial foreigner that the Italians are a highly-gifted people of great intellectual quickness. Those who judge them by their history, their literature and art, are generally inclined to give them credit also for great versatility of mind. And even this must be (partly at least) admitted, though on closer inspection it will be found that this versatility belongs to the abstract Italian rather than to the concrete individual Italian. That is to say, Italian culture, taken as a whole, appears, and is, many-sided and cyclopædic; but on examining its topographic components seriatim, one meets with little more than specialties. In fact, one is rather struck with this division of mental labor and distribution of mental wealth than with anything that could be called universality of culture. The sum total of mental endowment, measured by intensity, may be the same, or nearly the same, in the different parts of Italy, but the quality of faculties varies very considerably.

Considering the isolation in which the Italian states have been kept for the last two centuries, this need not surprise us. But, while admitting that these differences have been artificially enhanced by political segregation and tyrannical pressure, we cannot deny that they are partly (and certainly primarily) due to pre-existing differences of race. Long before the Italians had forged their own chains, the love of autonomy was far greater in them than the love of union, the local spirit far stronger than the national spirit. The neighbor was more feared and more hated than the foreigner. Each town was a stronghold, each city a citadel, the whole a chaotic mass of political atoms repelling or absorbing each other, and swayed by the crudest dynamics. This led, no doubt, to the formation of larger and more complex political bodies. But the centralizing process which began only after the fall of the Hohenstaufen was but a slow one, and soon came to a stand-still—at least as far as the general outlines of territorial segregation or aggregation are concerned. The map of Italy remained party-colored. The Congress of Vienna found it so, and its statesmen, who revelled in ethnographic confusion, have done their best to perpetuate this state of things.

Fifty-five years ago, Genoa was still capital of the Ligurian Republic. Seventy-three years ago Doges ruled at Venice. And even such of "the hundred cities of Italy" as had long lost their autonomy and centreship still gloried in their pompous yet terse and expressive surnames, which reminded them either of their former greatness or, at least, of some well-marked trait of their fading individuality. Genova la superba is still proud of her old "pride." And even Pisa la morta and Bologna la grassa see nothing derogatory to their dignity in these less complimentary epithets. Many of these municipal types are still recognizable in the people, especially among the uneducated classes. The Neapolitan, the Milanese, and the Genoese—or, let us say, the Venetian, the Modenese, and the Roman—are three types probably more widely different from each other, both physically and mentally, than any three specimens of Frenchmen. It would not be impossible to sketch these various types, and it might even be interesting, historically as well as psychologically, to use their graphic outlines as guides to a juster interpretation of historical antecedents and to a keener appreciation of ethnographic and topographic influences. That, however, is out of the question here. Only the most important and most conspicuous of these distinctions can be considered within the limits of this article.

American readers need not be reminded of the wide gulf that separates, almost in every country, the southerner from the northerner. You have, in addition, the west-easterly antithesis. And, in a measure, even Italy, elongated though she is, exhibits a double dualism. The Apennines make up for a want of width. Thus, we have a north and a south, a centre, and a transapennine region; in other words, we have the Piedmontese, the Tuscan, the Neapolitan type; and to the north-east of the Apennine, the Lombard and the Romagnole.

Of all the citizens of the new Italian kingdom the Piedmontese are the least Italian. They have played an important part in the Italian revolution, and their influence must long continue to be great throughout the Peninsula; but the Italian type, such as it remains impressed on the tourist's mind, or such as it manifests itself in Italian art and literature, has but a faint resemblance to that type of which Gianduja is a clever and good-natured caricature. No doubt, the existence of this caricature is in itself an eminently Italian trait. It shows that Turin could enter not only into the municipal feeling like any other Italian city, but also into that humoristic and genial spirit which tempered and corrected the exclusive sentiment—a spirit which seems to have animated, more or less, all the centres of Italian civilization which were large enough and refined enough for the growth of humor and self-irony (as the Germans say). Thus, Naples had her Pulcinello, Rome its Pasquino, Florence her Stenterello, Milan her Meneghino. It is probable that serious, sober-minded Turin would never have spontaneously produced such a creature as Gianduja had she not been provoked by the constant jokes of her grinning neighbor Meneghino. At all events, the two are now on excellent terms, and, in the course of this year's carnival, went so far as to exchange visits, when they were solemnly received by the town authorities and fêted and serenaded by the people.

But it is not often that the sturdy Piedmontese indulges in such jokes. He is an earnest, hard-working man, a practical engineer, a skilful manufacturer, a brave and hardy soldier, a conscientious, though red-tapish official. He likes discipline and order, and almost loves his king. Loyalty, with him, is not a mere principle, but a sentiment—an undemonstrative, old-fashioned sentiment. His kinsman and neighbor on the Ligurian coast is more of a republican, and is intellectually superior to his subalpine neighbor. He is not much of a soldier; but he is probably the most determined shipbuilder and navigator on the Mediterranean. The whole coast between Genoa and Savona seems but one large shipbuilding yard intersected by rocky headlands. Genoa is the only port for Italian emigration. When Ancona was but a station for the Austrian Lloyd steamers, and when Naples could boast of little more than fishing-smacks and orange-laden coasters, Genoa had established a regular steamboat communication not only with many Mediterranean ports, but with Buenos Ayres, Rio, and with the United States. No wonder that Columbus was a Genoese. Both the Piedmontese and the Ligurians are manly people; not very affable, perhaps, nor needlessly polite, but, on the whole, ready to oblige and loth to lie. Success and prosperity have been their reward. Their superiority to other Italians is, however, a purely moral one. Their contributions to science and to art have been but few, and appear insignificant when compared with the achievements of their southern and eastern neighbors. They are a nation of soldiers and of sailors, of manufacturers and of officials. And, like sensible men, they have made the most of their talents.

It is only when you cross the rapid stream of the Magra, a little to the east of Spezia, where you take leave of the quaint pink façades and the four-storied country-houses, and where the sombre-looking slate ridges of the Riviera are replaced by the glittering marble peaks of Carrara and Serravezza; it is only then and there that you feel yourself reminded by your surroundings of that proverbial and ideal Italy with which we are all familiar, and which, rightly or wrongly, the world has learnt to love and to pet. There the wily, chatty Tuscan meets you; a smaller, livelier, less muscular man than his well-fed neighbor. He is courteous, yet staring and inquisitive, free and easy, yet cautious. He scorns provincialism of manners and of dialect, and thinks his own vernacular perfect though it is not. There is a cockney look about him, and you cannot associate with him for any length of time without becoming aware that he takes a greater interest in personal and worldly matters than in generalities and abstract principles. The professional statistics and university rolls of Tuscany show a remarkable predilection for the study and practice of law, and I would almost venture to say, though the assertion seems bold, that there are more avvocati or lawyers in Florence than privy counsellors in Berlin. And those who have a more literary or academical turn of mind are likely to devote themselves to the study of history rather than to any other study. The gossiping and intriguing disposition, induced by an immoderate interest in personal affairs, has of late found a wholesome vent in political and parliamentary life, on which it wreaks its materia peccans, and which, it may be hoped, will in due time react on it as a corrective, though, for the time being, it is itself lowered and degraded by it. After all, politics and history are closely related in their subject-matter. If, formerly, the Tuscans devoted their leisure to the compilation of big volumes of historical lore, they now write newspaper articles and political pamphlets, which absorb almost the whole of their literary powers and energies.

But the Tuscans are not only fond of history and proud of their own past; they love the very forms and methods and the phraseology of history. They like old deeds and dusty parchments, and the mouldy odor of archives. They have a keen appreciation both of the historic and juridic value of a title-deed or an inscription. They are masters in diplomatics as well as in diplomacy. Guicciardini, as far as we know him by his writings, his career, and the estimate formed of him by Charles V., is probably a more perfect prototype of a Tuscan than even Macchiavelli, arch-Tuscan though he is. The language, too, is, perhaps, of all the living languages, the most lapidar, if I may use such a term. It fits the marble as well as the parchment. To draw up bonds, deeds, and contracts, or to adorn tombstones and other memorial tablets with choicely-written, terse, yet pompous inscriptions, is a source of real happiness to the Tuscan, and the prospect of the epitaph would in many cases console him for the loss of a friend or relation. Both the lapidar and the curial styles are of Italian growth. It cannot be a mere chance, therefore, that the Italian language has reached its highest degree of perfection and of purity in that part of the peninsula where the genius of the people came nearest to the genius of the Latin language, of which the mediæval volgare was but a modification.

Mr. Emerson has said that history is biography. That, at least, is one of the possible aspects of history. It is unquestionably the commonest. Schoolmasters know that, on the whole, girls show greater aptitude and love for history than boys. History being generally taught as a complex of biographic sketches, and biography being something essentially personal, this predilection may be easily accounted for. And this circumstance may also explain the charms which the intricacies of mediæval history and the gossip of memoir literature have for the Tuscan mind. But Mr. Emerson must admit that there is another possible way of viewing and treating the history of mankind. Enquiring minds take an interest not only in the actors and their actions, but also in the feelings and aspirations which moved the actors and prompted the actions; nay, even in the resulting ideas and in their successive stages of evolution. Ethics, culture, and civilization have had, and will have, their own historians and their own histories, whose pages need not be crammed with many names or dates or anecdotes. Science goes about snuffling for laws everywhere, even in history, and cannot be kicked out of it. There is such a thing as philosophy of history, and the first man who ever thought of or attempted to treat this subject was a Neapolitan, Vico. This is not a mere accident. It is only one of the numerous facts which show that the Neapolitan mind is a speculative mind. That southerners are more imaginative than northerners is generally admitted. But that this greater imaginativeness can spontaneously assume the shape of philosophic speculation may seem strange and puzzling. Yet the Neapolitan and Sicilian literatures show clearly that it is so. The speculations of these southern philosophers may be rash sometimes, but they are far less so than positivists would like to make out, and they are certainly never dreaming or mystical. Nor must it be supposed that it is only speculation and deductive reasoning à priori which thrives in Magna Græcia. The Neapolitan mind likes inductive generalization, too, and might be successful in it if the Neapolitan had the necessary patience or perseverance for obtaining a sufficiency of data. But here he is apt to fail, being singularly averse to the tantalizing process of observing, sifting, and registering dry facts. Giordano Bruno is remarkable both for his speculations and for his Lullian art. But the latter is nothing but a piece of mental gymnastics. It leads to formulas of thought or Kantian categories, whose blanks are not likely to be filled up by Bruno's countrymen with concrete facts.

The Neapolitan, therefore, is more apt to become a theorist, a man of one idea, a doctrinaire, and even a fanatic, though there is something in his nature which, practically, prevents his going very far at a time in any one direction. He is an emotional politician; but, though a willing tool in the hands of a king or a demagogue, he is rarely, if ever, a leader. He understands principles, and can feel their majesty. But his allegiance to them is not of the ruat cœlum kind. Giordano Bruno recanted. Cesare Vannini, the atheist, wrote an ode "On God." And yet both died the martyr's death, and both died bravely. How can we account for these inconsistencies? And what is the Neapolitan's balance of mind if it can so easily be disturbed and so easily be re-established? Where the head is so docile and the heart so impressible, an appeal to either will be efficacious for evil or for good, according to the intentions of the appealer. And if we are to call this a mental equilibrium at all, we are bound to qualify it as what physicists call unstable equilibrium, or, better still, as an abstract medium between oscillations whose symmetry is more striking than their amplitude.

Correspondence.

REPLY OF MR. JAMES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your rejoinder to my letter does not require a long comment.

1. You say that, if I knew why people lived unhappily in marriage, I should possess "the secret of the universe, and all the world would flock to Cambridge." Nay, not so. This result would follow, not upon my possessing the secret of the universe, but upon all the world believing that I possessed it. For aught you know, for example, to the contrary, and so far as marriage is concerned, I may be in possession of that secret now; but evidently, so long as you disbelieve the fact, there is no chance of your coming to know the secret. And so of all the rest of the world. I should not have thought it worth while, however, to signalize this little oversight of yours to your attention, were it not that it prettily illustrates, as I conceive, a prevalent defect of the strictly scientific mind, which consists in supposing that men recognize truth primarily by the intellect, and only secondarily by the affections; whereas the exact contrary is true. Any truth, indeed (and any falsity as well), may be stamped upon my passive memory by a long unquestioned tradition, or by the authority of distinguished men; but I do not intellectually acknowledge or actively appropriate any truth or any falsity until I first cordially love it; i.e., feel how inwardly good it is to believe it.

2. You admit that you practically concur with the theologian in attributing to man the power of antagonizing and, indeed, defeating his own destiny, as that destiny is previously defined in a material way by what we call "the laws of political economy," or, in a spiritual way, by what we call "the laws of God." Now, nothing need surprise one in the theologian, who fairly fattens upon paradox, and enjoys a professional right to belittle the laws of God at his convenience. But I am surprised to find you so ready to echo this blasphemy with respect to the laws of your own science, by alleging an equally hopeless conflict between them and the existence of human morality, or the free play of men's passions. I feel, indeed, a certain tenderness, if not respect, for a venerable theologic tradition, which binds me to asceticism by my hopes and fears of another and an untried world. But I have neither respect nor tenderness, but in the place of these a hearty contempt, for any pretentious science of this life which enjoins the same humiliating discipline upon me, and yet robs me at the same time of those superior sanctions which alone make the discipline tolerable, or reconcile it with my natural dignity. I will freely compel myself into any amount of physical abasement or humiliation which the good of my soul, real or imagined, enjoins upon me. For the soul has an absolute claim upon my allegiance, and woe be unto me if I harden myself in indifference to it. But I cannot freely abase my soul, which is my will or moral personality, to any exactions of my physical nature, because my conscience of the true relation between them condemns me for doing so. Whenever, then, I am actually found abasing my soul to my body, or contentedly harnessing my conscience to the service of my instincts, you may be sure that I do so only at the instance of a corrupt and tyrannous civic order, and that I shall full surely become developed at last into the actual—or, at all events, the virtual—liar, thief, adulterer, murderer, or whatsoever else that is vile, which such civic order alone has power to make me.

3. You propose four alternatives to me, as exhausting, to your imagination, the practical possibilities of our existing legislation with respect to the sexual relation; and then you gravely ask me to choose among these the one most conducive, in my opinion, "to that perfect state of society" to which I am supposed to be looking forward. I have no objection to your proposition in itself. It seems comprehensive enough. But then it is absurd to represent it "as going to the bottom of our discussion." It does no such thing. Your third alternative is the one upon which you rely, apparently, to justify your hope in this regard, and this stamps the mental attitude of one of the parties to the discussion as so very superficial, that any talk of reaching "bottom" on these latitudes becomes preposterous. What real respect, let alone reverence, can any one entertain for marriage, who holds that it derives its essential dignity from legislation; thus, that there is no difference between man and brute, as to the sexual sentiment, but what is imposed by force, instead of being evolved by culture? Pardon me, my friend, if, in these circumstances, I forbear to accept your alternatives, one and all, as having the least relevancy to our discussion. They are, in fact, grossly irrelevant to it. They would be relevant, perhaps, if I were the mere "moral reformer" you are disposed to make me appear; that is to say, if I were in truth looking forward to some perfect "state" of society, as you term it, instead of contending all simply for the existence of society itself; that is, for the truth of such a divine order in human life as shall exhibit its public or universal element no longer coercing the private or individual one, as now, but, on the contrary, mightily soothing and fostering it.

But you must, my friend, acquit me, willy-nilly, of all proclivity to "moral reform" agitation. I have not so much as the ghost of a hope of any moral reform among men, save by absolutely freeing the moral force in them from the long bondage it has been under to physical want or destitution, and this can only be done by legislating, not positively, but negatively; that is, by cheerfully abrogating—with due regard to existing interests—every institution and privilege among us which still prejudices the advent of the broadest human society, fellowship, or equality. All the legislative capacity of the world—even if it were eked out by the dubious possibilities of woman in that direction—would be thoroughly impotent to bring about any positive good for mankind, or induct a true and permanent social order upon the earth. For this great boon we are dependent upon the sovereign mercy of God, or must look to the skies alone. I know very well that science is fast running away from our old-fashioned belief in the skies. How, indeed, can it be otherwise? Religion has sunk into such rank egotism and frivolity, that science can hardly do better than grow indifferent to it. Certainly, I have as little respect for religion, literally conceived, as I have for the idiotic old man who, in its name, drools out blasphemies against the Holy Ghost from the chair of St. Peter's. But I have a reverence amounting to awe for that supreme divine achievement in our nature, which religion has always ignorantly prefigured under the cognizance of the church, and which will really consist in the visible incarnation of His perfection in the harmonies of a free society, or spontaneous fellowship of man with man throughout the earth.

One word more, and I shall have done. You suspect me of "confounding two totally distinct things, spiritual and legal marriage." Pardon me again, my friend; there is no ground for the suspicion. When I talk of marriage, I mean spiritual marriage alone, having no power to conceive of any other. The power exerted by the law over marriage is never creative, but simply declarative. It does not ordain a marriage between A and B, but merely ratifies or records one, which stands exclusively in their unforced consent, in their spontaneous act. This is the only conceivable marriage between the parties, and this manifestly is altogether spiritual. And what the law does hereupon is simply to announce this spiritual transaction, or make it actually manifest to all men, that all men may hold it for ever sacred. I bought a house the other day, my purchase standing altogether in a free, unforced agreement, to which the owner of the house and I had previously come in that behalf. What the law pretended to do thereupon was, clearly, not to ordain or direct, or in any manner control the purchase, but simply to record the previous free agreement and deed of the parties to it, and hallow these as of right sacred against all outward force. Precisely so with marriage. The law has no magisterial, but a purely ministerial, efficacy with respect to it, being designed to avouch its inherent sanctity, and guard it from all outward interference.

But you go on: "Legal marriage is, or ought to be, but the outward and visible sign of spiritual marriage." Exactly so; just as my eye is the outward and visible sign of my inward faculty of seeing, my nose of smelling, my ear of hearing, and so forth; but when a man values himself upon his eyes, or his nose, or his ears, and not exclusively upon the interior things these organs signify, we do not call him a man, but a fop. Shall we let a similar foppery pass muster with us in regard to marriage? But I have interrupted you. You proceed: "With spiritual marriage the state has and can have nothing to do, beyond leaving men and women their liberty of choice." This is precisely what I have all along been urging. What then hinders our agreement? It is that you all the while make this sole real or inward marriage of man and woman which stands in their mutual unforced affection, altogether servile to another purely actual or outward marriage, to which they are obliged by the necessities of our existing civic order. The parties are held, in fact, by your doctrine, to a double marriage—one free or spiritual, the other enforced or material. I can only marvel, in this state of things, how—believing, as you must, in the rightful superiority of spirit to letter, or mind to matter—you can indulge any hope of a peaceful and orderly future for man upon the earth, short of a complete reversal to the fundamental canons of our existing civilization, all of which imply the rightful inferiority of the individual to the mass.

I am, Mr. Editor, yours very truly,

HENRY JAMES.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., June 11.

A NOTE FROM COLONEL MELINE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your paper of the 16th inst. states that "the author of some notices of Italian literature" in the Galaxy for June (it should be May) speaks of Silvio Pellico "as the great Italian dramatic poet." This would naturally be taken to mean the great poet, etc., par excellence. The author neither meant so nor said so. His statement was: "Pellico is the great modern dramatic poet of Italy."

The author not only assents to the justice of the criticism that "generally these notices wanted perspective," but finds in them a total absence of "perspective." He simply undertook to give some account of what Italy had done in literature during the past three hundred years, and in the cramped space of three and one-half pages found no room for "perspective."

Giusti is quite well known to the author in question; but his article, as it expressly states, undertook scarcely more than to make a mere "enumeration" of distinguished Italian writers.

JAS. F. MELINE.

NEW YORK, June 17, 1870.

[We had no wish to misrepresent Colonel Meline, and are perfectly ready to declare that Silvio Pellico is not "the great modern dramatic poet of Italy." On the contrary, he is a dramatist infinitely surpassed by Manzoni and Niccolini. The latter merits the distinction which Colonel Meline bestows upon Pellico, who was the hero of a great tragedy, but hardly the author of one, though he wrote several tragical plays.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

DR. SHELTON MACKENZIE will furnish a life of Charles Dickens, to be prefixed to a volume of that author's uncollected pieces in prose and verse, which Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Bros. announce.

—Mr. B. F. French, in his latest volume of "Historical Collections of Louisiana and Florida," mentions no less than five MS. vocabularies or grammars, or both, of as many different tribes of Indians, now in possession of the American Philosophical Society of Philadelphia. Among them is the Rev. Cyrus Byington's "Grammar of the Choctaw Language," which has just been published under the editorial supervision of Dr. D. G. Brinton, whose fitness for such an undertaking is well understood. Mr. Byington was a native of Stockbridge, Massachusetts, and from 1819 to the close of his life, in 1868, was a missionary among the Choctaws, whose language he studied with so much thoroughness that when he died he was engaged in revising his grammar for the seventh time; and his family still have a Choctaw dictionary, embracing 15,000 words, which was left, like the grammar, in manuscript. Dr. Brinton's notes are few but helpful. We do not suppose he will find many pupils, but there may be some who will be interested to study the language of a tribe which is on the road to civilization, and whose extinction is at least less remote than that of the tribes not yet confined to reservations. Dr. Brinton says of the grammar itself that it is "one of the most valuable, original, and instructive of any ever written of an American language," and that it may well be doubted "if ever again a person will be found who will combine the time, the opportunities, and the ability to make an equal analysis of the language."

—A good deal of interest is manifested just now in the Celtic element of the English nationality, and a paper in Putnam's Monthly, by Professor Seelye, and a series of papers in Appleton's Weekly, by Mr. John Fiske, present with considerable force the arguments for the view that we are Celts, at least in great part. Mr. Fiske's articles are quite elaborate and very instructive; he brings forward an argument, however, which is quite surprising in a man of his acuteness and learning. This is that the sound sh, which is so characteristic of the German, is rarely heard in Welsh: further, that it is generally represented in English by s (as Schwein, swine; Schwester, sister): from which facts he infers a Cymric influence in the English language—"we speak Teutonic, not like natives, but like foreigners." Now this so-called Teutonic characteristic really belongs only to High-Dutch, while that which he considers a peculiarity of English is common to all the Low-Dutch and Scandinavian tongues, as a few examples will show. Schwester, sister, is, in Dutch, zuster; Norwegian, söster; Swedish, syster. So Schnee, snow, sneeuw, snee, snö. So with schlau, sly, Scandinavian, slu; schlafen, sleep, Dutch slaap. It would be easy to multiply examples to any extent. And inasmuch as Mr. Fiske's only other positive argument from language, th, he admits to be doubtful, he is practically reduced to the physical arguments—light and dark, long and broad heads, which, it must be confessed, land one in no end of bewilderment. If we once give up the evidence of language, we may be driven to Mr. Huxley's view, that there was no distinction at all between Teuton and Celt, only between dark Celt and light Celt.

—Writing of William Gilmore Simms, who died at Charleston on the 11th instant, his eulogist in the Courier said of him that "he was, with one or two exceptions, our only historian and our only novelist, and forever his works of this class may compare with the well-known productions of this and other lands, he has contrived to render them also subservient to the best interests of his fellow-citizens." The "also" we put in Italics as, probably, having been interpolated by some proof-reader or compositor who could not understand how on earth any man could have a doubt of the equality of Mr. Simms with any story-teller since the author of the Odyssey or any historian since Herodotus. It is by conjecturing the existence of some such proof-reader that we guess at the remark which the critic probably made. No doubt the "forever" of the sentences we have quoted must be changed to "however," and the two sentences must be thrown into one so as to read thus: "He was, with one or two exceptions, our only historian and novelist, and however his works of this class may compare with the well-known works of this and other lands, he has contrived to render them subservient to the best interests of his fellow-citizens." But this the patriotic proof-reader either could not endure or could not believe it possible that any critic should say, so he faithfully made laudatory nonsense of it. It was in a country where unfavorable criticism, even of so very mild a sort as this, directed against a writer such as Mr. Simms, strikes such horror as this into every proof-reader and printer and editor, that Mr. Simms was "our greatest literary light." Within the limits of South Carolina it has long been a sin of the nature of blasphemy, mitigated by the evident lunacy of the blasphemer, to maintain and teach that Mr. Simms did not far outweigh all other American authors of our time, including Mr. Bancroft, who used to be looked on with a curious respect, Mr. J. B. De Bow, and Dr. Nott of Mobile. In the rest of the South, admiration for Mr. Simms was not carried quite to the point of idolatry, for though his tales are full of generic Southern swamp, and pine barren, and magnolia, and Southern maiden, and Southern horsemanship, and Southern hospitality, still the distinctive South Carolina cockerel crows a little too loud and too often to make "Marion and his Men" and the other books consummately delightful to every Virginian, for instance, or Marylander or North Carolinian. That narrower patriotism which consists in a very ardent love for the State of one's birth Mr. Simms had in a degree remarkable even in South Carolina, where, perhaps, an old Virginian himself might have taken lessons in State pride. He certainly might have learned something in the way of bragging and vaunting the glories of his natal soil. The fostering of this spirit is perhaps to be set down as the most noticeable effect of Mr. Simms's literary activity. Probably it is true, as a friend of his says, that if one should "ask any youth within our [S. C.] limits to what or to whom he is most indebted for the strongest of his local attachments next to those of the paternal roof, he will answer that they have been derived from reading the novels and histories of this author." A kindred effect of Mr. Simms's writings, but one that doubtless was less powerful—as indeed we may well hope it was, for it was evil and only evil—was their nursing in the breasts of the Southerners engaged in the rebellion a spirit of the most bitter and foolish hatred and contempt for everything Northern. The old man fairly shrieked in his rage, and made a sorry spectacle of himself. This is how he used to write during the siege of Charleston:

> "Your graybeards with necks in the halter,
> Your virgins defiled at the altar,
> In the loathsome embrace of the felon and slave, > Touch loathsomer far than the worm of the grave—"

and much more to the same effect. His poetry, however, was never, when at its sanest, of any value at all. His best claim to recollection rests upon his novels, which undoubtedly give him a right to the place accorded him of being the first of Southern men of literature. They are spirited and readable, and evidently the work of a hearty and honest man. They are not so different from Cooper's in any respect; and probably it might as truly be said of them that they were fathered by Cooper's, as of Cooper's that they were fathered by Scott's. At any rate, it is true that they bear about the same relationship, in point of excellence, to Cooper's, that his bear to the Scotch novels. Mr. Simms was born in Charleston in 1806, and was early left an orphan. He fell to the charge of his grandmother, who was in rather narrow circumstances, and who consequently was unable to give him anything like a good education. The boy was, however, a very greedy devourer of books, and thus he measurably educated himself. Having grown up, he studied medicine awhile and afterwards law, which profession he practised a little, but not with much success. Next he went into journalism, and there, also, he failed to distinguish himself. At last he took up authorship as a profession, and wrote with much rapidity a great number of novels, all of which had sufficient success. Besides these, he wrote some histories, which are of slight value, and several volumes of verses which, as we have said, were no good.

—One of the choicest specimens of Western book-making that we have seen, and we are not sure that we should make any qualification of the superlative, is the quarto volume published last year by Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, entitled "Spring Grove Cemetery: its History and Improvements, with Observations on Ancient and Modern Places of Sepulture." Spring Grove ranks among the largest of the cemeteries by which this country is honorably distinguished, and is not very far from being the foremost. There are two features which give it a great advantage over Mount Auburn, for instance: the absence, as a rule, of family vaults, and of artificial boundaries of iron and stone—a medley which is as shocking to good taste as prominent divisions of lots are unnecessary. Mr. Strauch, the present superintendent and landscape gardener, furnishes a readable preface, which shows that he knows his own business perfectly, though he indulges rather more freely than was required in confirmatory quotations from writers of authority. Then follows the history of the cemetery, its general plan, a description of the principal monuments; the regulations as to interments, the sale of lots, etc.; an appendix containing brief descriptions of the most famous cemeteries here and abroad; and, finally, a list of proprietors. Great pains have been taken in making the book. Each page has a fancy border which is constantly changing in design and color, and there is a large number of full-page photographic illustrations which well display the natural and artistic attractions of the grounds. Few of the monuments thus reproduced are offensively ugly, some are more than commonly fine, and the architecture of the receiving vault particularly commends itself. Altogether, this volume is capable of affording pleasure and useful suggestions wherever it may go, and as it contains ideas which are as applicable to parks as to cemeteries, we shall wish that every growing town or city in the country may vote to supply its selectmen with a copy.

—For some unknown reason, an impenetrable mystery appears to hang over the founding of Punch. It is one that seems to disturb many minds, too, but it does not get itself removed. No sooner does one writer pen his paragraph stating that so-and-so was the original projector of the periodical, than some one makes another paragraph denying this, and asserting that the original projector was so-and-so, and that the thought first occurred to him in such-and-such a tavern. Then it is made to appear that it was not one man at all, but a company of men, who blocked out the periodical in a certain coffee-room, and that not Mr. Mark Lemon, but Mr. Henry Mayhew was the first editor. Mr. Lemon is just dead, and has been made the subject of more or less biography; and there is a new book professing to give a full and accurate account of the establishment of Punch; but we see everywhere corrections of Mr. Lemon's biographers; and, doubtless, the new book will be the basis for half-a-dozen fuller and more accurate accounts; so that we, for our parts, have decided on giving up the problem, and believing, as Mr. Punch himself probably does, that he was born of the foam of the sea, and sprang full-armed from the head of Zeus. No matter who was the author of his being, it is to Mr. Mark Lemon, just deceased at the age of sixty-one, that a very great deal of Mr. Punch's good character and success in life have been due. From all accounts of him, Mr. Lemon appears to have been about as fit a man as could anywhere be found to conduct a journal of the character of the one which was in his hands. He never struck in its columns at a personal enemy, for he was the sort of a man never to have personal enmities; political enemies he struck at fairly, it is said, though some of us over here remember that he struck at certain of his American political enemies with such blind ignorance of what manner of men they were as to be for that reason alone open to the charge of great unfairness. And most of us remember, with some disgust, Mr. Punch's eating of the leek on occasion of the end of our late war, and are not disposed to think him apt to be much fairer to those that are down than may be guessed from his quickness to make his bow to those that are up. Mr. Lemon, we are told, would have nothing indecent in his paper and nothing irreverent towards religion; and so it happened that though there is hardly a single number of Punch, from the first number in 1841, in which women are not in some way satirized, there is hardly to be found a single impropriety, and hardly one touch even of the cynicism which is about as civil a thing as women must expect from—say—a French censor of the general class to which Mr. Punch belongs. Of the British matron and the British maiden, Mr. Punch, however he laughs at them, is evidently a sincere and believing admirer. Mr. Lemon seems to have been a pleasant humorist rather than a man of great ability, and he is praised more for his quick eye for finding the right men for his purposes and his skill in keeping them together, pleased with him and each other, than for himself having done in his paper very much that was very good. As might be inferred from what is said of his freedom from personal enemies, Mr. Lemon was a very amiable man. Though he has held the rod over his generation, and lived by using it, he has now everybody's good word, and is declared to have been humane, generous, helpful to the obscure and struggling, the best of friends, sons, husbands, and fathers. He was a prolific author, but of works not destined to long life. He wrote no less than sixty dramatic pieces, two three-volume novels, many tales for children, of writing which he was fond, and very many articles in Household Words and the Illustrated News, of which latter he was, if we are not mistaken, the manager. To American readers he is best known by a jest-book which he compiled.

—M. Henri Cernuschi, the Italian banker lately expelled from France because of his munificent subscription to the Radical cause, has had for the past five years, as we believe we have before stated, a high reputation in Paris as a writer on political economy. He has been a determined and very able opponent of banking currency, and, in spite of his democratic affiliations, of the co-operative system. His monetary theories have been treated with profound respect by the leading economists of France, and in the session of the Corps Législatif of April 10 he was praised by one of the Ministry not only for his clear and forcible writings on his favorite subjects, but for the independence with which, in the late public gatherings, he told the speakers that their doctrines were absurd and due to their total ignorance of the nature of society and of the production of wealth—in short, gave them a lecture on political economy which was listened to with applause. Now that he has become a conspicuous martyr to his republican principles, his works on finance have been again brought forward by Guillaumain & Co. They are entitled "The Mechanism of Exchange," an octavo volume supplemented by the pamphlet "Against a Banking Currency;" and "Illusions of the Co-operative Societies," also a pamphlet. He is author, also, of two pamphlets of an autobiographical character: "Defence before the French Council of War at Rome," and "Reply to Count Cavour." Those who care to know the eminent men of the time otherwise than through the cyclopædias would do well to procure these works of Cernuschi, which cost, all told, in Paris, but nine francs.

TRANSLATIONS FROM DE MUSSET.*

FRENCHMEN are accustomed to call De Musset their Byron. Shall we imitate Coleridge and say that he is a very French Byron? No, for in the first place Byron's poetry has much of the cosmopolite, and, secondly, we are diffident about questioning the judgment of a foreign nation on one of its literary celebrities. Frenchmen have made so many mistakes of the kind. Taine's condemnation of Samuel Butler, for instance, or "Stendhal" Beyle's of Scott. We may say that Taine was carried away by his theory, or that Beyle's judgment was perverted by envy and jealousy (as he really had the conceit to believe himself the novelist of his time); yet beyond such considerations there seems to be as marked a difference in literary as in moral standards among different nations. Thus, De Musset's strong point was probably his being what his countrymen call fin. Now this hardly translatable French quality, this delicacy of thought and expression combined with much psychological study, we Anglo-Saxons are not apt to value very highly; we are more prone to see its defects, such as a tendency to run into morbidness and lose strength. And here is a marked difference between Byron and De Musset. The former was a strong man. He was assuredly not a first-rate artist, and that not so much from haste and carelessness as from mental constitution. But whatever he did bore the impress of power. Byron caught a wild Pegasus by the mane; De Musset trained his stud in private—and there were some nightmares in it. The lives of the men were as different in this respect as their writings. They were both addicted to fashionable gallantry and both intemperate, but not in like manner. Many women fell in love with Byron's person; we may be sure not one ever fell in love with his coat and waistcoat buttons, as Madame Colet did with De Musset's. Byron drank gin and strong wines; De Musset killed himself with absinthe, and the aroma of it seems to breathe through most of his works.

Again, Byron was simple and intelligible. Any schoolboy can understand him, except some parts of "Don Juan." Many men cannot understand large portions of De Musset. We confess ourselves of the number. If some young person asked us to explain the "Merle Blanc," we should be puzzled to distinguish accurately the satire from the pure fantasy. In short, we suspect that in their best characteristics the English and the French poet were quite dissimilar, and that their common quality was their worst—a very tinsel and claptrap misanthropy.

We have confessed our inability to understand De Musset fully. Perhaps it is for this reason that we never could get up an ardent admiration for him. His chef d'œuvre (as is usually considered) disappoints us wofully. The "Confessions of a Child of the Age" is audacious of revelation; but audacity of revelation is nothing rare in French literature of any age; and the whole book seems unconnected, more like a series of magazine articles than a complete work. We never could refrain from the suspicion that it owed much of its success to its personality—the singular narrative of his singular relations with George Sand, the liaison which attained so scandalous a notoriety after his death.

Not that De Musset was a remarkably indecent writer. On the contrary, as French writers go, he is remarkably decent. We believe that he was naturally refined and chaste till his milieu, as Taine would call it, forced a certain amount of grossness upon him. We believe this because his improprieties do not pervade and impregnate his writings; they are struck in like purpurei panni. For instance, his famous "Ode to the Moon," so bizarre in its commencement, so beautiful towards its close, has, plastered on at the end, without reason or motive, nine stanzas which it is difficult to qualify without using very unconventional terms. In this respect we may compare him to Catullus. Catullus is hideous where Ovid is merely voluptuous, but you may expurgate Catullus without making one awkward break or losing a single line of good verse; you cannot expurgate Ovid without eliminating three-fourths of his best poetry.

These remarks on a not very agreeable subject we have felt compelled to make lest any cautious reader might suppose that the pretty little volume before us contained anything unfitted for the drawing-room. The "Selections" comprise versions of two prose sketches, "The White Blackbird's Story" and "Mimi Pinson" (Molly Thrush, the Grisette), two plays, "Fantasio" and "No Trifling with Love," and nine of the smaller poems. French prose is difficult to translate (a popular delusion to the contrary notwithstanding) for several reasons, among others, because the French tongue is more intense than ours, and anything like a literal translation of it appears stiff and bombastic. In trying to avoid this error, the translator has sometimes dropped into a free-and-easy tone. "Bumped" is too rough a word for cognai, and "rather over nineteen" is very inelegant American for "avait à peu-près dix-neuf ans." On the whole, however, the prose sketches are well rendered, and the plays very well. As to the verse, we hardly know what to say of it. It would be too broad an assertion to affirm that French poetry is untranslatable into English verse. The Alexandrine, when made the vehicle of comic or satiric matter, may be adequately reproduced. But the highest order of French poetry cannot be. By the highest order we mean the lyric; for another popular delusion in the matter of French literature, which denies the existence in French of poetry of the first class, is founded on the erroneous assumption that the poetic chefs-d'œuvre of a language must be looked for among its epics and tragedies. The best French lyrics vie with those of any language. And we speak knowingly and feelingly, after much painful experience, when we say that of all possible exertions of human intellect there is none, except the attempt by a non mathematical man to acquire the higher mathematics, which gives so little result for so much time and trouble, as the attempt to "overset" a first-rate French lyric into English verse. You may catch the ideas of the original, you may find your rhymes, but the melody and the poetic expression have evaporated in the process, and there remains a caput mortuum of average magazine "padding." The best that you can say of the best of such trials—Mahony's shots at Victor Hugo, or anybody's shots at Béranger—is that they are not absolutely bad. After which, any detailed criticism on "The Advice to a Gay Lady (Une Parisienne);" or, "The Three Steps of Rose-colored Marble," may seem superfluous. Yet we feel bound to make a few notes, if only to show that we have read them carefully. We think the translator has not caught the metre of the former exactly. It is a rising and falling verse, and, like all rising and falling verses, from the hexameter and pentameter downward, very effective in skilful hands. It is, in fact, a four-line stanza disguised by being printed in six lines, and so far as the untranslatable can be translated we should turn it somehow thus:

* "Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Alfred de Musset." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1870.

"Oui, si j'etais femme aimable et jolie
Je voudrais, Julie,
Faire comme vous;
Sans peur ni pitié, sans choix ni mystère,
A toute la terre
Faire les yeux doux."

"Yes, were I a woman, as charming as you,
Full fain would I do, Julia, after your guise;
Without choice, compassion, concealment, or fear,
On all, far and near, cast the tenderest eyes."

"S. B. W." translates thus:

"Yes, were I a woman, charming and pretty,
I think I should do,
Fair Julia, as you,
Without fear or favor, distinction or pity,
Smile and make eyes
At all 'neath the skies."

Here the transposition of the rhyme substitutes a sense of incompleteness for the full close of the original. Much of the "Three Steps" is very prettily turned so as to preserve the droll sparkle of the original. Sometimes it falls short, as in—

"Ye water-gods that vainly try Beneath your fountains to be dry."

"Vainly try" is hardly equivalent to font tant de façons, and cuvettes are not "fountains" but basins, regular wash-basins; the plebeian word is purposely used to heighten the ridicule. De Musset's French is always pure, never slangy, but frequently familiar. Lines 5 and 6 have no corresponding rhymes, and at the foot of page 208 a grave accent in the French perversion of a Greek name has apparently led the fair writer to substitute an Eta for an Epsilon.

The translator is a lady of too much sense and scholarship to expect the ordinary adulation indiscriminately applied to ladies' work. We have no fear of offending her, but we should be very sorry if our remarks conveyed the impression that her versions are not very much above the ordinary hobble—for the word run were absurd in this connection—of translations from the French. And we think that any one who tries to make translation respectable, to make it something above mere bookseller's hack-work, deserves all encouragement. We have spoken of current delusions about French. Here is another mischievous one: that translations from French are useless, because all the persons likely to take interest in the subjects of which French authors treat can read them in the original. Sensation novels are supposed to be the only exception. The fact being that every boy whose parents occupy a certain position picks up a smattering of French at school, which, if his business or pleasure does not lead him to enlarge it into a familiarity with the language, he forgets even sooner than his college Greek. Translations would be more read if they were, as a general rule, better done. Such a book as Mr. Durand's translation of Taine's "Italy" is a real public benefit, and "S. B. W.," on a smaller and more unpretending scale, deserves to be considered a benefactress. Even without "enjoying De Musset greatly," her readers may satisfy their curiosity with specimens of a writer certainly original and certainly unlike any English or American author.

Vermont at Gettysburg. By G. G. Benedict, Lieut. A.D.C. (Burlington Free Press Association. 1870.)—Besides mountains, the chief productions of the State of Vermont are men, women, maple-sugar, and horses. Singing the praise of these, the poet briefly says of the men that they are "strong." In the late war they certainly made this title good on many fields, and when the battle was not to the strong the Vermonters were seldom to blame for defeat. Now, those who happily have returned to their native hills recall the old feats of arms with just pride; and while the comprehensive historian of campaigns and battles hangs back from his difficult task, Vermont makes haste to mount high ground against his coming. In a recent number of the Nation we noticed a book which told how bravely a Vermont brigade followed the fortunes of Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley; and we have now before us a book with the title, "Vermont at Gettysburg;" as if Vermont had been there bodily, mountains and all, to oppose General Lee. It is a short and rather dry recital of brave deeds, in the main hardly more interesting than an official report. But the author puts in Vermont's claim to the chief credit of repulsing the advance of the enemy on the second and third days at Gettysburg; and this would excite the resentment of many who took part in the fight. Stannard's Vermont brigade, which this book particularly celebrates, belonged to the First Corps, and we think it would not be easy to satisfy Fifth and Sixth Corps soldiers that there was any merit more conspicuous than theirs in checking the enemy on the second day, while Second Corps soldiers would, doubtless, maintain with vigor that they were the rock on which the great charge spent itself on the third day. But this is for history to decide. It is not for us to apportion the praise who cannot in our confines give view of the many-sided testimony. The Vermonters have done well to make themselves heard thus early in their own behalf; and it will be well also if other claimants for the laurels that Vermont has put on speedily make it clear who, if any, has a better right to wear them.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Andersen (H. C.), O. T.: a Danish Romance	(Hurd & Houghton) $1 75
Buchanan (R.), The Book of Orm	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Carter (R.), A Summer Cruise on the Coast of New England	(Nichols & Hall)
Disraeli (B.), Venetia: a Tale, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Fawcett (Mrs. M. G.), Political Economy for Beginners	(Macmillan & Co.) 1 00
Figuier (L.), Primitive Man	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Forwood (Dr. W. S.), The Mammoth Cave of Kentucky	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Jackson (Dr. J. C.), American Womanhood	(Oakley, Mason & Co.) 1 50
Macleod (Rev. N.), The Starling: a Scotch Story	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Plumptre (Rev. E. H.), Biblical Studies	" " " 2 00
Powell (A. M.), The Lesson of Quakerism, swd	(New York)
Reade (C.), Put Yourself in his Place	(Sheldon & Co.) 1 50
Rambles in Cuba	(Carleton)
Swayne (G. C.), Herodotus	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Smith (Dr. W.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., Part XXVIII, swd	(Hurd & Houghton) 0 75
The Story of Wandering Willie	(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Thomas (Dr. J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biographical and Mythology, Part 7, swd	(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 0 50
Wilberforce (Rev. S.), Heroes of Hebrew History	(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00

Fine Arts.

THE SO-CALLED BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL FESTIVAL.

"And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
The cannons to the heavens, heavens to earth."

At last we, too, have had our jubilee. Now that the star-spangled banner has been furled and the smoke of the last cannon has been blown away, let us for a moment survey the field and see what it has profited us Altogether it has been a very odd jubilee. If the true history of its tribulations, disasters, successes, strikes, broken promises, large expenditures, and small returns is ever written, it will be a most suggestive chapter for all future projectors of monster festivals to ponder over. Perhaps the most singular feature of this singular affair is that nobody seems to have known whose festival it was. Mr. Gilmore was the father of the Boston jubilee, and all his choral children knew him; but who fathers this one, and who are its sponsors? Beethoven's name is the only one that has been prominently put forward. Alas, poor composer! He hated monster festivals, and fled from them as scenes of discord utterly apart from all true purposes of art. Now that he is dead it is hard to make him responsible for what he so disliked while living. His name has been taken for the sake of the few dollars that it was hoped might be coined from it; but even as Beethoven was poor and thriftless in life, so his shade has brought no gold to the pockets of the speculators.

The idea of having a festival in this city in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth was first taken into consideration last December by a number of gentlemen of means and musical taste. Mr. Bryant was their president. They had various committees, the music committee consisting of ten gentlemen of the highest standing. Mr. Mould and Mr. Vaux designed a magnificent building, to cost some three hundred thousand dollars, and to be erected in the Central Park. Sir Michael Costa was to be brought over from England to conduct. All the great living composers were to be asked to write something for the occasion. Every resource of art was to be taxed to make the affair one that should bring credit upon the city. But trouble arose as to the question of authority on the part of the Commissioners of the Central Park to permit the erection of a building to which an admission fee was to be charged. It was found that the Legislature would have to be applied to for a special act. Then came in the old political bugbear, and the thing was at an end. Unless they could have the Central Park the committee would have nothing, and as this was found impracticable, the gentlemen of the committee quietly lit their cigars with the plans and specifications of their Coliseum and went to their several homes. So ended in smoke the first plan for the jubilee.

Then came the Great Unknown, and filled the papers with flaming advertisements of the mighty things that he was to bring to pass. Among other impossibilities, he announced that Handel's "Oratorio of the Creation" would be performed—a piece of intelligence that must have made old Haydn turn over in his grave. However, if he had only heard how dreadfully at last it was performed, his perturbed spirit would have been quieted, and he would have been very willing to have it accredited to Handel or to anybody else. The advertisements were full of the most monstrous promises, artfully designed to gull a confiding public. A supernaturally large chorus of miraculously gifted singers, gathered from every quarter of the globe, accompanied by a prodigious orchestra of the most eminent living artists, assisted by an organ of titanic size, whose tones should outpeal the thunder, were to sing all the greatest compositions of all the most famous composers, in a style that should appall the universe, while the clash of innumerable anvils, beaten by arms of herculean strength, and the roar of mammoth cannon, fired by the very lightning itself, should shake the round earth to its centre, and cause it to quiver in sympathy with a shuddering, awe-stricken, but entranced, audience, more brilliant than the stars of heaven and more numerous than the sands of the sea.

We have condensed the programme a great deal, but have hardly burlesqued it, and any one who read the earlier announcements will bear us witness that nothing could very much surpass their ridiculous and pretentious bombast. The managers of the affair certainly did bestir themselves to gather together all the people, good, bad, and indifferent, from Parepa and Kellogg and the Handel and Haydn Society down to the man who was hired to play the steam calliope. Thanks be to Apollo, however, that dreadful engine was not used at last, for there was no steam. An army of conductors was enlisted in the affair—Bergmann, Zerrahn, Rosa, Maretzek, Gilmore, Pech, Sherwin, and others—enough to demoralize the best orchestra that ever played. As well have put the baton into the hands of Briareus at once. Then the chorus was the queerest mixture of country choirs in for a frolic, singing societies from little villages that no one ever heard of before, members of city choirs who came once to gratify curiosity, and, strangest of all, the conservative old Boston Handel and Haydn Society. How these latter ever came to co-operate is a mystery to every one, and most of all to themselves. It became, before the end, not only matter of mystery, but also of repentance. The innermost reason was, probably, that many of the members thought this was a capital chance to come on to New York, and stay for a week in the big city free of expense. Such is the nature of the thrifty New England minstrel. They came, but, if the reports that were written back to the Boston papers can be relied upon, they were not over-happy when they arrived. Those papers were quite a Book of Lamentations. It was a miserere chorus from these poor Trovatores, far more affecting than that of Verdi. Manrico and Leonora had their little hardships, but, at all events, they were never called upon to sleep ten in a room at the Park Avenue Hotel. The society was further displeased because the "Elijah" night was altered from Wednesday to Thursday, without consultation with the society; also, because they were only permitted to sing a portion of that oratorio after all; also, because they were requested to sing in the "Anvil Chorus." But the hardest to endure of all their woes was the leadership of Dr. Pech in the "Creation." This seems to have met with the unanimous and unqualified condemnation of the society. They certainly were not in a pleasant frame of mind.

But they were by no means the only discontented ones. The chorus benches thinned out after the first day, until a great deal more pine-board than broadcloth and muslin was visible. The orchestra, too, shrank down from its fine proportions of the first night to miserably small dimensions. The best players went away. Behind the stage and in the chorus and orchestra rooms all was disorganization. The programmes were made out without proper consultation with those who were to take part, and were very seldom adhered to. No special seats were assigned to the different societies. The chorus came and went as it felt inclined; it shifted like a musical quicksand. The rehearsals were slenderly attended, and general confusion prevailed. Of course, the Italian combined chorus selected this state of affairs as the proper moment for indulging in a strike for pay.

The audience was of the same shifting character with the chorus. The house was never really filled. Even at the most popular of the performances, which were those where there was most noise, long benches were vacant all about the edifice. The scale of prices had to be lowered. It was found that few were willing to pay the exorbitant sum at first demanded. As the expenses of the undertaking had been very great, the loss was corresponding. The affair dragged along in this way through the week. On some days the attendance was quite large; on others it dwindled to a handful. Reviewing the whole matter, we cannot consider it other than a failure. Those who took part in it certainly so regarded it, and the public never seems to have given its confidence to the undertaking. There was an immense deal of hard, zealous work done by those in charge of the festival. They paid their money with a most liberal hand to get the best aid in their power, and certainly there was some good music given. The Handel and Haydn Society sang the "Elijah" music most nobly. Parepa was splendidly good, and there were some other excellent features in the affair. The building was a peculiarly good one. It reached, we believe, the proper limit of size for the purpose. The Boston Coliseum was much too large; in this one, however, the acoustic properties were well-nigh perfect. But art has gained nothing by this festival, and no one has heard anything that he could not have heard to better advantage at a dozen concerts, during the winter, at Steinway Hall or the Academy of Music.

The drawbacks to success were principally these: The affair had no competent musical head; it was too hastily prepared; there was not sufficient money to carry it properly on—a vital want; it never had the confidence of chorus, orchestra, or public; the chorus was a helter-skelter, untrained, and crude body of singers, without proper rehearsal, organization, or discipline; the orchestra was of much the same character, and was badly balanced, being deficient in the reed instruments, and in all those elements for producing broad effects of which Berlioz has written so explicitly. Many of the singers sat facing each other and with profile towards the audience, instead of facing in the direction in which the sound was to go; their efforts neutralized each other, and half their force went for nothing. The organ was a feeble fraud; it filled up the space that should have been devoted to the chorus. There were no brains in the affair; it followed humbly along in the old Gilmore rut, without a single new or original idea of value. These certainly are sufficient reasons why the affair was not a success. It was a mushroom festival. It grew up in a day, and will be forgotten as quickly.

Let no one suppose, however, from the ill success that has attended this, that the future has nothing better in store. At some later day, not, we trust, too far distant, under some leader of genius, and with time sufficient for preparation, and money sufficient to provide the proper material, a musical festival may be given, with legitimate musical effects, such as Gilmore with his clap-trap anvils and blatant artillery practice has never dreamed of. When this occasion comes, the public will not be slow to lend to it a hearty support.

George Routledge & Sons'

LIST OF

NEW BOOKS.

ROBERT BUCHANAN'S NEW POEM.

The Book of Orm:

"THE BOOK OF THE VISIONS SEEN BY ORM THE CELT."

Crown 8vo, cloth..... ....$2.

"Mr. Buchanan's genius has struck root into a new form of life and feeling—subtle, delicate, and marvellously fair."—Nonconformist.

The Complete Works of W. E. Channing, D.D.

With an Introduction. A New Edition, rearranged. Crown 8vo, cloth, price $1 75.

"If we wanted to elevate men by means of books, we should certainly prescribe as the first book to be read the complete works of William Ellery Channing."—The Contemporary Review.

Heroes of Hebrew History.

By Samuel Wilberforce, D.D., Bishop of Winchester. Post 8vo, cloth, price $2 50.

"His rich treasury of language, his devotional frame of mind, his far-seeing vision, and his large-hearted charity, are all pressed into a labor of love, and conspire to make this volume of no ordinary attraction."—John Bull.

Biblical Studies.

By E. H. PLUMPTRE, M.A.

Post 8vo, cloth.....$2.

"They display so remarkable an ingenuity, a learning so wide and varied, an acumen so keen, and they are such real and valuable aids to an intelligent apprehension of almost innumerable passages of Scripture, that it would have been nothing short of a calamity had they not been rescued from the oblivion to which magazine literature, unless republished, is doomed."—Nonconformist.

The Resurrection.

Twelve Expository Essays on the Fifteenth Chapter of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians. By the Rev. Samuel Cox. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

"An acute, vigorous, eloquent, and popular presentation of the great argument of the apostle."—English Independent.

The Peace of God.

Sermons on the Reconciliation of God to Man. By W. Basil Jones, M.A., Archdeacon of York. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

"There is the undeniable charm about them which always accompanies the writings of a thorough scholar, and one whose mind is well stored with all collateral reading."—Literary Churchman.

 Any of the above works will be sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

PUBLISHERS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

Choirs have long been awaiting its Issue.

THE NEW ANTHEM BOOK.

THE SABBATH GUEST.

BY L. O. EMERSON AND J. H. MOREY.

An entirely New Collection of Anthems, Opening and Closing Pieces, Sentences, Choruses, etc.

NOW READY.

Price $1 60. $15 per dozen. A sample copy sent, postpaid, to any address, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

New Publications

In Exitu Israel. An Historical Novel. By S. Baring-Gould, M.A., author of "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages." 1 vol. crown 8vo, $1 75. (Next Week.)

The Population of an Old Pear Tree; or, Stories of Insect Life. From the French of E. Van Bruyssel. Edited by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." With numerous Illustrations by Becker. $1 75.

The Caged Lion. By Charlotte M. Yonge, Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." With Illustrations. 2d edition. $1 75.

In ordering, please specify Macmillan's Illustrated Edition.

A Storehouse of Stories. Edited by the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." $1 50.

The Story of Wandering Willie. By the Author of "Effie's Friends" and "John Hatherton." With Frontispiece by Sir Noel Paton, R.S.A. $1 50.

Political Economy for Beginners. By Millicent Garrett Fawcett. $1.

Lectures on Art. By John Ruskin, M.A. Delivered before the University of Oxford. (Clarendon Press Series). $1 25. (Immediately.)

MACMILLAN & CO.,

63 BLEECKER STREET, NEW YORK.

THE UNDERSIGNED beg to announce to their Friends and the BOOK-BUYING PUBLIC that they have established themselves at

451 BROOME STREET,

For the purpose of carrying on a

Bookselling Business,

Where they will be happy to see them and receive orders. They will keep on hand a full Stock of the

PUBLICATIONS OF THE DAY,

Besides the

Works of Popular Standard Authors, Children's Books, Libraries, and Toy Books, etc.

Bringing with them an experience of Twenty-seven Years in the "Trade" in this City, they are prepared to transact a FIRST-CLASS business INTELLIGENTLY.

Bibles, Books of Common Prayer, Church Service, and Hymn Books of all denominations,

In the various editions and styles of binding.

Orders from PUBLIC OR PRIVATE LIBRARIES, SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, OR CLERGYMEN will receive a LIBERAL DISCOUNT.

They will guarantee to all customers promptness and despatch in all business engagements.

Soliciting your patronage, we remain,

Yours faithfully,

DE WITT C. LENT & CO.,

PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,

451 Broome Street,

(A few doors west of Broadway),

NEW YORK.

NOW READY,

ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

Of Foreign Literature.

NEW VOLUME BEGINS WITH JULY NUMBER.

CONTENTS OF THE JULY NUMBER.

Embellishment—James Watt. 1733-1819.

I. HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE.—Quarterly Review.
II. A FORTNIGHT IN KERRY. By J. A. Froude.—Fraser's Magazine.
III. PROFESSOR HUXLEY ON DESCARTES. "Discourse Touching the Method of Using One's Reason Rightly, and Seeking Scientific Truth."—Macmillan's Magazine.
IV. PRINCE MOLESKINE'S CONSPIRACY.—Cornhill Magazine.
V. LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION. By Max Müller. II.—Fraser's Magazine.
VI. COLORS OF THE PLANETS.—St. Paul's.
VII. MADAME LAFAYETTE.—St. Paul's.
VIII. THE PLACE WHERE LIGHT DWELLETH (concluded).—British Quarterly Review.
IX. A BIT OF TUSCAN LIFE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.—Temple Bar.
X. A SUB-WAY IN CENTRAL AFRICA.—The Athenæum.
XI. COUNT CHARLES DE MONTALEMBERT.—Blackwood's Magazine.
XII. IS MAN A FEEBLE ANIMAL?—The Spectator.
XIII. CHURCH BELLS.—Chambers's Journal.
XIV. THE NEW ZEALANDER ON LONDON BRIDGE.—Leisure Hours.
XV. JAMES WATT.—The Editor.
XVI. POETRY.
XVII. LITERARY NOTICES.
XVIII. SCIENCE.
XIX. ART.
XX. VARIETIES.

TERMS OF "THE ECLECTIC."

Single copies, 45 cents; one copy, one year, $5; two copies, one year, $9; five copies, one year, $20. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at club rates. Agents wanted to get up clubs. Send for Specimen Copy, 45 cents. Address

E. R. PELTON,

PUBLISHER,

108 FULTON ST., NEW YORK.

Illustrated Travels around the World.

Vol. I. Plain cloth, $7 50; extra gilt cloth, $9

The World Before the Deluge.

233 plates, $5

The Vegetable World.

471 plates, $5

The Ocean World.

427 plates, $5

The Insect World.

576 plates, $5

Birds and Reptiles.

307 plates, $5

Chefs-d'oeuvre of the Industrial Arts.

200 plates, $5

The World of Wonders.

Illustrated. $5

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN

(R. TURNER, Manager),

596 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1870.

The Week.

THE bill to reduce internal taxes has been the chief occupation of the Senate, and developed a strong majority against the continuance of the income tax. On Thursday, Mr. Akerman was confirmed without opposition, the principal objections to that gentleman seeming to have been raised by the Washington correspondents, in the discharge of their duty of keeping the public alive to its interests at the capital. On the same day, Mr. Sumner's Cuban resolutions, on which we have commented elsewhere, were introduced, but could not be passed at once as he desired. The House, still on the same day, had a sharp tussle over the Reapportionment Bill as it came back from the Senate, and finally, by 98 to 95, referred it to the Judiciary Committee, from which its chances of emerging are slim; as also might be said of the instructions given the Committee of Ways and Means, on Monday, to report a bill reducing all the duties on salt by fifty per cent. The Georgia Bill came up on Thursday, and, after escaping a labyrinth of amendments, was passed in so simple a form that the House must feel tolerably ashamed of the mess it has heretofore made of the business. The State is declared entitled to representation, and nothing is allowed to abridge her right to choose members of the General Assembly according to her constitution—that is to say, next fall. She and Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, are also relieved of the prohibition against forming a militia. We trust that but a few days will elapse before the Senate confirms the action of the House. On Tuesday the House passed the Omnibus Appropriation Bill.

The Senate has refused to re-enact the income-tax law, and, if we are really rid of it, doubtless we are well rid of it, on many accounts. Those on whom it has borne hardest would have paid the same amount with comparative cheerfulness if levied in another way, involving none of those odious comparisons between the employer whose wealth was great and income uncertain, and the salaried employee who, besides the misfortune of being poor, had the additional ill-luck of being sure of his income. Indirectly, this state of things might be said to have encouraged men to indulge in speculation, and to have aided in unsettling business; and the abolition of the tax, now that trade is almost recovered from its ten years of fever, seems appropriate enough. Those who, like the Philadelphia gentlemen alluded to last week, were disposed to test the constitutionality of the tax, are now relieved of the necessity. They will perhaps still be interested in a collateral question decided last month in the United States Circuit Court of the Massachusetts District. In 1866 and 1867, it appears from the report just published, one of the Judges of Probate in Barnstable County had his official salary taxed, against his protest, by the revenue collector; and the suit (Day vs. Buffinton) was brought to recover. The plaintiff confined himself chiefly to the point that the judge's salary, being paid out of the State treasury, was a part of the revenues of the State, and could not be touched without the exercise of a power which might be so used as to destroy the functions of the State, or even the State itself. The defendant argued for the paramount authority of the Federal Government, and, as the people of the State formed also a part of the general governing power of the country, denied that there was any likelihood of the abuse of taxation as suggested. The Court, however, held with the plaintiff that the judge's salary being impaired was a detriment which might either cost the State a servant or an additional outlay, and, in either case, was an interference of the admitted sovereignty of the United States with the admitted sovereignty of the several States.

The investigation into the petition of a Mr. Hatch that this Government should give him fifty-odd thousand dollars, for losses and injuries sustained at the hands of Baez, in San Domingo, has been brought to an end at last, but not till it had been deflected a little from its proper line, so as to glance at some of the President's friends. Mr. Hatch appears to be a respectable man, the worst that is proved against him being that he preferred Cabral to Baez, when that pair of worthies were fighting to be President—which would seem to have been an error of judgment, for Baez got the better of Cabral, but which does not look to us like a crime, nor a defect of taste, so far as we know the reasons for admiring Baez. His preference got Mr. Hatch into trouble, however, for they took him, and gave him a court-martial trial—"a barbaric farce," Mr. Schurz calls it—and, of course, sentenced him to be shot. But the San Domingo Senate decreed his pardon on condition that he should leave the country, and this he would willingly have done, but Baez kept him still in jail. Here General Babcock, the President's envoy to San Domingo, comes into the story. Mr. Hatch was kept in jail, he says—and so does Mr. Perry, the American consular agent—because Babcock and Baez thought that if he got out he would give his countrymen facts and figures which would prevent annexation—a fear that Mr. Hatch has since justified. He was therefore kept incarcerated some six or eight months after his pardon—a course which Baez would not have dared to take had not Babcock encouraged him; or which he certainly would have refrained from taking, had Babcock remonstrated. Mr. Schurz and Mr. Ferry, who sign the minority report, are severe on the General, who certainly might, we think, have come better out of the affair than he does. There is talk, however, of a letter from the President, which will soon be published, in which he declares Babcock to have been acting under instructions, and assumes all the responsibility of his conduct. The report of the majority, exonerating Babcock, goes out of its way several times to express its good opinion of the treaty with Baez, and reads very suspiciously like a mere plea for the annexation of the island. Messrs. Schurz and Ferry severely condemn General Babcock's indifference to Hatch's fate, and hold the belief that his and the President's queer eagerness for annexation is what kept an American citizen in Baez's prison. Poor Hatch, amid all this Senatorial cudgel-playing, fares rather badly. The minority report, however, declares his claim just, and recommends its enforcement, while Messrs. Nye, Williams, Warner, and Howard rather vaguely oppose the petition.

General Butler is evidently a most irritating subject to his fellow-members of the House. Having occasion lately to review the proceedings of this session, we have been forcibly struck with the number of encounters, scrimmages, altercations, turn-ups, personal difficulties, knock-downs, drag-outs, yardarm-and-yardarm engagements, in which the Representative of the Fifth Massachusetts District has been engaged. Not a few of these have been brought upon him by his queer position as champion of the Administration, as when he fell out with Mr. Dawes on the subject of Government retrenchment, and, the other day, with General Logan on the subject of Cuba. Mr. Conner, of Texas, was another of his adversaries, but a light-weight. Mr. "Sunset" Cox was still another, and the General has just had to defend himself against Mr. Randall, for altering, in the Globe, some piquant remarks made by the latter in regard to a certain person's honesty. Savagest of all, however, were the charges and counter-charges between Mr. Butler and Mr. Farnsworth, on Wednesday week, which were the last, so far, of a campaign which the two members have been carrying on for months with varying success. It has been thought impossible that any sort of a dermatologist should get through the General's skin, but Mr. Farnsworth seems to have succeeded in putting him into a great rage, and the choice language which ensued may be imagined. It was amusing to hear the man who seized the barrel of telegrams, and who makes it his business to inform himself of the private history of his fellow-members, charging Mr. Farnsworth with dealing blows behind the back of his antagonist. Mr. Farnsworth's constituents may feel reasonably certain that their representative's back is as little open to assault as his front, or he would not be engaged in the occupation of "smashing Butler." The particular charge against Butler this time was that he was advocating a cause on the floor of the House for money to him in hand paid. No one will ever know, it is probable, whether he was or not. What is noticeable is that not many people care; for such is the esteem in which the member from Essex is held by the world at large, that it makes not the slightest difference how many particular "sinful games" are charged against him—his general character covers the whole ground.

Wall Street has had another characteristic sensation, though scarcely of the first magnitude. Some three months ago, a third or fourth-rate broker's firm, of fair credit and standing, in spite of one or two previous difficulties, became suddenly one of the heaviest operators on the Street, Its purchases of gold were large enough to turn the tide of the market, and to advance the price from 110¼ to 115, in the face of an almost universal belief in lower figures, and are now reported to have exceeded five millions of dollars in amount. Its operations in stocks were on an equally liberal scale, and were sufficiently important to confirm the whole Street in its opinion, that the extreme ease in money would cause higher prices for most securities, although their value, represented by earnings and property, was steadily declining. So bold and effective were these operations that they were crowned with a temporary success, and the firm conducting them came to be recognized as one of the leaders of the Street—almost. It soon became known, however, that these operations were carried on for account of a young gentleman recently released from State prison, after having served out a term for a well-remembered series of gigantic forgeries. It is highly creditable to Wall Street that most of the houses of rank and character declined all transactions with the firm in question as soon as their principal became known; and the rejoicing of many of the newspapers over the gullibility of what, in their choice vernacular, they call the "Wall Street sharpers and gamblers," merely shows how little they understood the situation. It is to this conservative and high-principled action of many of the best firms that Wall Street, and, indeed, the whole country, owe their escape from what might have proved a very serious panic. As it was, the affair ended speedily in the total discomfiture of the enterprising youth, and the ignominious failure, for a comparatively moderate sum, of the half-fledged leader of the Street.

The interesting feature of the affair has been the conduct of the press. Those editors who had been prominent in urging the early pardon of the distinguished forger remained silent on this his last escapade, while others spoke almost encouragingly of his "honest" efforts to earn a living and pay his debts, while his friend and broker (who takes, we believe, a lively interest in missions and Sunday-schools) was raised to a level with the Christian martyrs. Most of them indulged in a display of financial knowledge, and all gratified their consciences and pleased their country subscribers by friendly and intelligent criticism of the "Wall Street sharpers and gamblers" above referred to. In the meantime, Wall Street itself has resumed the even tenor of its way. Neither the genius of the "Young Napoleon of Finance," nor the courage of his broker, have availed to prevent a serious decline in both gold and stocks, which, to outsiders, seems the only course for values to take in the present quiet condition of affairs throughout the country.

For the last ten years we have had no June so hot as this one, whether we try it by the mercury at its highest point or by an average point, determined by several measurements. Life has been little else than a burden to the sweltering inhabitants of most of our great cities, and even in the rural village of Springfield, as New Yorkers say, and among the Massachusetts hills, the mercury stood once at 103 in the shade. This, however, is probably only brag; the distinction of being the hottest place in the country undoubtedly belongs to the metropolis. Indeed, New York would, anyhow, be the hottest place on this continent, though the thermometer should be induced to testify in favor of some other locality; for New York does more business with greater ardor, and performs more intellectual and physical labor in the twenty-four hours, than any other city in the universe, let alone America; and thus sentient New York becomes secure of the dignity claimed for her. What would have become of the New Yorker during the past six or seven days if he had not consoled himself by watching the thermometer, and reading telegrams stating that it was only ninety-seven or ninety-eight in the shade in rival cities and towns; and if he had not drunk more soda-water and Vichy than all Europe combined; and if he had not a way that of itself would be enough to freeze and petrify the whole of Boston, of laying aside coat and waistcoat, and fanning himself in the streets with a Japanese fan? He must have perished. As it was, life was a burden that many found too heavy to bear, and the list of deaths from sun-stroke is a long one, while a great number of people have been struck down, more or less injured. What the poor wretches must suffer who live packed in the eighteen or twenty thousand tenement-houses of this city it is frightful to think of. To sleep in some of these lodging-rooms is, in fact, to some of them simply death, for they are often found in the morning dead from the effects of the heat and the loathsome air. It is a thing to be thankful for that Supervisor Tweed meditates free bath-houses; he could hardly make us restitution of some of our money in a way more acceptable than by affording the means of coolness and cleanliness to the unfortunate creatures who give him their votes, and the means of being munificent to the public after the fashion of an ancient Clodius, say, or Sulla.

The long fight in Massachusetts over the question whether or not the confessed robbers who are known as the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Ring should be permitted to get hold of several more millions of the State's money, has at last been settled in the negative for this year at any rate. Thanks for this are not due to the Legislature, however, for the Lobby was too strong for its virtue, and both Senate and House succumbed and passed the bill demanded, by a small majority and at the last moment—some members of this Senate and House having no doubt then and there performed the last legislative action of their lives, except such as they may perform in town meeting, the people in general being thoroughly aware of the moral and pecuniary aspects of the scheme. The bill was killed by Governor Claflin, who sent in his veto, over which it could not be passed. The effect which this produced on the supporters of the measure, who were congratulating themselves on having overridden the previous action of the Legislature, was highly enjoyable. Most of the Boston papers have throughout supported the attack on the treasury; their conduct having, indeed, furnished to angels and men a spectacle simply unaccountable, for they had every inducement, one would think, to outspoken independence. Their interests seemed to lie where their duty lay, yet, except the Herald, they all—with a peculiar feebleness of manner, to be sure—upheld the schemes of the Ring. The Transcript, in particular, was very amusing for a day or two after the veto. Dark hints, small sage reflections, bits of peevishness, little scratches and stabs—all the weapons of its armory were brought into full activity. Here, for example, is a grewsome death-stroke at somebody: "Those who consider themselves 'a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself' at the State House, should not make themselves quite so conspicuous lobbying members." Another one appears to be aimed at the same person, and, we hope, put him out of his misery: "It is truly pitiful when members of the General Court find it necessary to go to the chief of the Council Chamber lobby, and enquire what the Governor will approve and what he will not in a pending measure." Dwelling still on its trouble it says again, in another place, speaking to the universe in general: "A bad veto and a terrific storm were rather too much of disturbance of the social system for one afternoon." We trust the politicians will watch and see how much Governor Claflin's common honesty hurts him with the people next year.

There has been little news during the week concerning the Chinamen at North Adams, and all of it of a peaceful character. Twenty-five of the striking Crispins—perhaps the Americans who followed their French and Irish fellow-craftsmen reluctantly—are said to have bought a shoe factory in order to run it on the co-operative system, and another similar company has been formed which will at once build itself a factory. One of the Crispin orators, addressing an anti-Chinese labor meeting at Albany, revealed the fact that an attempt had been made, he himself participating, to establish a Chinese lodge of Crispins in North Adams, and to persuade the Chinese that their labor was worth at least two dollars per day, and that they might oblige Mr. Sampson to give them their due. Nobody can object to either of these ways of accepting the situation, which indicate a calmer sense than we were prepared to give the Crispins credit for. It is well for trades-unionism, as for the shoemaker, to stick to its last; and this is what it does not do when it resorts to violence or intimidation. Chinese lodges and strikes will come in due time when enough Chinamen are collected together in any given place; but the prospect appears to be not immediately flattering at North Adams. Meantime, it is interesting to watch the general tone of the press on the subject of this innovation. In Massachusetts, so far as we have observed, there is only a kindly spirit manifested, but elsewhere the sentiment of the press is divided. The economic bearings of the problem on the protection and free-trade controversy have not escaped notice; and each party offers the pill to the other with a laughable aversion to having it returned for digestion. The Tribune has always let its humanitarian sympathies obscure its logic when compelled to face the inconsistency of welcoming "pauper labor" immigration, while denouncing the free importation of the products of the same labor abroad. It takes the part of the Chinamen in Massachusetts only by forgetting the inexorable reasoning of its editor in his "Political Economy." This the free-trade journals, like the Cincinnati Gazette, retort upon Mr. Greeley; but the more consistent protectionist organs, half triumphantly, half sorrowfully, lay the Chinese foundling at the door of their opponents.

Mr. Greeley, however, is not the only philanthropist whom the North Adams experiment has put in a tight place. Senator Wilson has been taken to task for his ardent support of Mr. Stewart's bill, making void the long-term contracts of speculative Chinese-labor importers. Mr. Wilson would, perhaps, not oppose Chinamen as working freely for themselves, but if he did, it would not be wholly surprising. He is closely identified with the shoemaking interest, having sat upon the bench formerly himself, and having his home in a shoemaking town, and owing much of his elevation to his being a representative not only of the working-classes generally, but of shoemakers especially. We do not say his present course is influenced by the thought of his political prospects, though it might naturally be. From whatever motive, he has expressed himself most decidedly in opposition to what he calls this degraded form of labor, and furnishes one of the signs that the Chinese question may very possibly divide parties and shape Presidential campaigns. The Democrats, Eastward at least, seem fumbling for their cue, and so long as the World does not give it to them, and the South wants to supplant the negro with the Chinaman, it is somewhat doubtful how they will jump. The discussion at large would be helped a good deal if every editor would keep standing in his paper the 5th and 6th articles of the Burlingame treaty, which expressly recognizes the right of voluntary locomotion and travel for the citizens of China in this country, as the English and Continental treaties have lately done for their subjects who desire to emigrate.

Two or three weeks ago we expressed some regret that the two most promising colored boys that were available had not been selected by Senator Revels and the other Congressman who sent up colored candidates to West Point. We hear from various sources, and are requested to say so, that one at least of the two boys was as promising as need be desired. James W. Smith is described to us by competent observers as being more than ordinarily intelligent and well-educated. In eighteen months—fifteen of them in an evening school in Columbia, South Carolina—he fitted himself to pass the written examination for admission to the Hartford High School, making papers which were not excelled by those of any other candidate. At the end of his second year in Hartford school, he made application to finish the course in two years, and this he accomplished, and at graduation stood in the first half of a class of thirty. We understand him to have been rejected at West Point—or put on probation, if that is his present status—because of defective eyesight, and not for any deficiency in point of preparation. The other negro candidate was physically but not otherwise fitted for admission. The suspicion that with one or the other of these instruments the examiners will always be able somehow to keep the Academy free from colored cadets, we see nothing as yet to justify. All the officers seem, so far as is known, to have been both just and courteous to these two boys, although it is asserted that some of the cadets were abusive, and that stiff politeness was the best treatment that they got from any. This, of course, will not last very long. The young fellows at Cambridge seem not to have suffered in mind by reason of the presence of one or two colored undergraduates, nor at seeing one of them take prizes for literary and other distinction; and a West Pointer does not, we believe, consider himself better than a Harvard man, and, if he does, he must either at once abase his spirit, or expect Mr. Logan after him.

The English Liberal party has just sustained a great loss in losing the Earl of Clarendon, a not very great man, but one who has latterly been able to be of very great service to it. Socially, his position could not have been bettered, and the qualities of his character peculiarly fitted him for the work of inducing that acquiescence in measures which the aristocracy, left to its instincts, would have fought against, and of bringing about within his own order those compromises which have been so largely the very history of the English aristocratic Liberal party during Lord Clarendon's life. He was a born and a made diplomatist, having, by nature, tact, caution, address, and sagacity, and having learned in a regular apprenticeship to the art, and a long subsequent practice, every branch of it. He was born in 1800, and was a younger son of a younger son, his father being the brother of the second Earl. He was early put into the diplomatic service, in which he rose rapidly, and was but thirty-three years old when, at an important juncture, he was made Minister to Spain, where he showed great skill and tact. In 1838, he succeeded to the title, and from that time to the day of his death was rarely out of office at home or abroad, his services being employed by both the parties. Thus, he was Aberdeen's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and when that ministry fell in 1855, and Derby was asked to form another, he expressed his desire to retain Lord Clarendon in office, and would have done so had he been able to form a ministry. Palmerston, who succeeded in the task, did keep him. Earlier, he held many offices, the one greatest in dignity being the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland, where he had a troublous five years. Perhaps his most marked diplomatic services were his allying England with Cavour, and his management of the English relations with France, in which country his old friendship in Spain with the mother of the Empress stood him always in good stead; but his whole life has been the career of a more than fairly successful diplomatist, in the old acceptation of that term. He was not a man to believe that the personal qualities of ambassadors, their anecdotes, their wines, their dinners, their relationships and friendships, do not influence the destinies of nations, for he had experience to the contrary, and doubtless would not have feared to predict, if prophesying had been in his way, that so it will continue to be till the end of time. Earl Granville is said to be the Earl of Clarendon's probable successor, and may be the man to settle the Alabama claims.

Other foreign news is of comparatively small importance. There has been rioting at Cork since Wednesday of last week, beginning with the tailors, who were incensed at the importation of Germans to take the places of strikers, and afterwards extending to nearly all the trades, if the Cable despatches are to be trusted. The case is analogous to the Chinese difficulty here; and how soon Chinamen, as well as Germans, may be taken to Cork is a question perhaps worth considering, when China is colonizing the west coast of the Atlantic. The French news of most interest for Americans is the near departure of M. Prévost-Paradol for Washington, where he will deserve to be welcomed—not for what he nominally represents, but for what he is—as few of his predecessors have had cause to be. In Spain, the Cortes have adjourned after passing a very moderate gradual emancipation act for Cuba, in spite of a brilliant plea by Castelar for immediate abolition. The Queen has abdicated in favor of the Prince of Asturias.

MR. SUMNER'S CUBAN RESOLUTIONS.

PERHAPS it is too much to ask of a man whose efforts in diplomacy have once made so vast and reverberating a noise as some of Mr. Sumner's, that he should thereafter hold his peace concerning foreign affairs. To have made such an echoing and re-echoing speech as that about the Alabama claims, which set almost all Americans swinging their hats for eight or nine days and made every Englishman double up his fists and curse every time he thought of it for several weeks—to make one such speech, and not determine to make another one at the earliest opportunity, is probably more than ought to be expected of human nature.

It is true, too, that the atmosphere of Washington constitutes a medium seen through which objects assume all sorts of non-natural and deceptive shapes and sizes, and the perspective becomes worse than Chinese. The Congressman living in that atmosphere of Saturday-afternoon oratory, joint resolutions, wire-pulling and lobbying, humbug and claptrap of every sort, falls of necessity into all kinds of errors as to the state of public opinion and feeling, and finds the indispensable need of the annual "mingling with his constituents" that we shall soon be hearing about, and of going to cattle-shows and hotels and once more getting his hand "on the great heart of the people." Especially is this true when it is getting near the last end of the session. No doubt to-day, after six steady months of Washington, the Senators and Representatives are desperately few in number who are not more than half-inclined to believe that the most populous region on earth is Buncombe, and that of the inhabitants, all that are not knaves in search of a post-office or in possession of one are fools, to whom anything may be said.

Whatever may be the genesis of them, we have just had from Mr. Sumner a set of resolutions which are worthy of General Banks, and are as uncalled for and superfluous as anything that ever came from even the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. In fact, it is saying too much for them to say that they are uncalled for and superfluous. They are such as to do this country discredit, and moreover to injure the cause which they profess they desire to serve. Nothing is less to the credit of a nation than an ineffectual and disregarded interference in the affairs of its neighbors, and just such an interference the passage of Mr. Sumner's resolutions would be. The tone of the language alone, to say nothing about the matter of the message, is enough to ensure the anger of Spain, or, what is as bad for us, to call out merriment not only in Spain but elsewhere. It is easy to imagine the feeling with which a Madrilenian, who believes the rest of the world to exist as a border to Castile, will read such language as this: "In the name of humanity, the people of the United States solemnly insist that these things shall cease; . . . they make this appeal with sincere good-will to the people of Spain, and with the assurance that the justice they (the Spaniards) do to others will redound to their own happiness, welfare, and renown; . . . the people of the United States are pained to hear that the pretension of property in man is still upheld in the island colonies of Spain; . . . that instead of terminating this pretension at once, the Spanish Government propose to protract it for an indefinite period by an impossible system of gradualism; . . . the people of the United States regret to witness the extraordinary efforts of the Spanish Government by violence and blood to maintain the unnatural jurisdiction in Cuba, forbidden by the great law of progress, and hostile to the interests of both parties."

These passages give the tone of the resolutions, which is patronizing and didactic to a degree that would do credit to a Chinese Secretary of State addressing a Loo Choo ambassador; but it is not a tone that has been heard in Western diplomacy since Menchikoff contemptuously snubbed Earl Russell for intermeddling and using high language where he was afraid to intervene effectually, and, indeed, had no intention of intervening. Any people would resent such instruction so administered, but it is a very great blunder to administer it in the face of all the world to perhaps the haughtiest nation in Europe. The Spaniards are about as unlikely a people as any in existence to enjoy being told that their scheme of abolishing slavery is an "impossible gradualism;" that they do not know so well as we can tell them what is for the best interests of the Cubans, and what is more, that we can tell them better than they know what is most to the advantage of their own pockets, to say nothing of their honor, happiness, and good name; that their very presence on this side of the water is flat opposition to "the great law of progress;" that we can inform them that it is written in the oracles of God that they are to march out of North America, as, we are happy to remind them, they had to pack out of their South American colonies; that they uphold a baseless pretension—the same which they are charged with planning (but not wisely) to overthrow; that, in short, they in many ways "pain" the people of the United States, and must mend their hands at once.

Yet we suppose nothing is much more certain than that the people of the United States have not at present the remotest intention of going to war with Spain in behalf of the Cubans. One or two journals, whose support of a cause is not to its advantage, and a certain class of Congressmen whom the country is unfortunately willing to hear talk, but for whose advice in weighty matters it does not care a pin, may make a good deal of clamor about Cuba and "the Monroe Doctrine," but they do not in the least affect the public mind. The people in general certainly despise and detest the cruelty of De Rodas' volunteers; but they also despise and detest the cruelty of Quesada, with his six or seven hundred prisoners murdered at once, and they know the bloodthirsty ferocity which characterizes the Spanish race, wherever found; they have for months looked with only a languid interest at the war, or whatever it is that is going on in the island; more clearly than anything else they see the fighting left to negroes and hired foreigners, while Cubans hang about New York and the watering-places; in short, the President's recent proclamation expresses the public opinion about Cuba. Clearly, the country has no intention of embarking more money and men in the business of fighting at present. Of that we have had enough for a time, and when we want more we probably shall not get it by attempting to drive one set of Spaniards out of Cuba to give it to another set—we being all the time about as much beloved by the one set as by the other, and much more likely to get Cuba into the Union, supposing that to be at present desirable, after purchasing her from Spain, than we are to get her without violence from the Junta after that body has been put in possession, and begun its garroting and shooting.

This being the state of the case, the country's mind being made up not to fight, and Mr. Fish and the President being able to do all that these irritating and otherwise ineffective resolutions can do, why should they be introduced? At least, why should more of them be agreed to than the portions which, in rather injudicial and undiplomatic, if not, indeed, somewhat intemperate, language, remonstrate with the Spanish Government against the barbarities of the volunteers? That would be doing in a more public and solemn manner what Mr. Fish has been privately doing for many months, and might be of some avail. But to send a set of fighting resolutions, and then not fight, would be anything but dignified or wise; and it would surely be none the less ridiculous because the resolutions were couched in the language of a schoolmaster berating a boy rather than of a correspondence between equals.

THE END OF THE ERA OF SPECULATION.

PRECISELY ten years from now the business of the whole of the United States was marked by a dulness, a stagnation, similar to, but even exceeding, that which now prevails. That summer's dulness was the commencement, as this summer's dulness is, we think, the end, of the wildest era of speculative excitement witnessed since the times of Law and the South Sea Bubble. In 1860, the fierce agitation of the Presidential election, and the alarm created by the bold threats of the Southern extremists, almost paralyzed business, involved all the mercantile interests of the country in serious loss, threw large numbers of people out of employment, and thus prepared, on the one hand, the sudden and spontaneous uprising of the unemployed masses in support of the Government in 1861; and, on the other hand, created a class of people almost new to our generation, a class of merchants of education, unoccupied, poor, frequently heavily, nay hopelessly, indebted, often reckless with hopelessness, and in every way suited to become the nucleus of that community of speculators which has occupied so large a share of the public attention ever since. The depression in business in 1860 furnished alike the first armies of soldiers and the first armies of contractors, camp-followers, and speculators. The later armies of soldiers were impelled by patriotism, the last were compelled by the draft. The main army of speculators was subsequently attracted by the extraordinary temptations of the times; the last and most noticeable detachment were themselves the outgrowth of all that was vicious and bad in a period pre-eminent for badness and vice. But both armies had their first origin in the summer dulness of 1860.

The career of the soldier army is well known, though, as yet, unwritten. The career of the speculator army is not only unwritten, but entirely misunderstood. When, in 1861, the Government came into the markets of the country as a buyer of labor and of all the products of labor, it came into markets overstocked almost beyond precedent, and unnaturally depressed to the point of despondency. The Government purchases had a double, nay treble, effect. They rapidly reduced supplies, and they enabled all sellers to become enlarged consumers, at the very time when a liberal proportion of the producers was withdrawn from active labor. The effect upon prices was magical. Everything advanced with a feverish rapidity that was perfectly incomprehensible. First food, clothing, arms, munitions of war, next machinery, metals, raw materials of every kind, then ships, and other means of transportation, and all their representatives, like steamship stocks and railroad stocks—one after another, all rose in price. The extraordinary gains made so suddenly and incomprehensibly by the legitimate dealers in these articles, and the almost certain continuance of the advance, based as it was upon the steadily diminishing production and increased consumption of both Government and people, were quickly recognized by that large class who, from natural taste or from their peculiar circumstances, were inclined to take advantage of it. It was this extraordinary rise in prices that produced the speculative mania. To the thousands who soon learned to follow speculation in all the various objects of trade as a lucrative profession were speedily added the hundreds of thousands who, while really engaged in other pursuits, were yet tempted by the reports of fabulous gains to indulge in more or less important "outside transactions," which can be properly characterized only as gambling. This class came to be known in all the markets as outside dabblers: lawyers, doctors, merchants, retired capitalists, Government officers, and bank officials, who had no better excuse for being engaged in operations in flour, or gold, or cotton, or stocks, than for playing rouge et noir. For all these classes the three years from 1862 to 1865 were mainly years of a certain feverish prosperity. The great majority of speculators all the world over are inclined to speculate for a rise, and during those three years the incessant purchases by Government, the steadily diminishing production, and the reckless waste and consumption of a people that deemed itself rolling in wealth, kept everything almost constantly rising; hence speculation in the main was profitable.

With the close of the war in 1865, a violent change set in. The disbanding of the armies restored a large number of men to productive pursuits, the Government purchases rapidly diminished, stocks of many articles became again abundant, and prices materially declined. But it was found that the South was so entirely deprived of every article of merchandise that the demand from that section sufficed to maintain the prices of many things. Many soldiers returned from the war possessed of means, and did not resume their former occupations with the expected promptitude. The destruction of the war even in the North was so serious as not to be repaired even in a year or two of peace. Two successive poor, or at best indifferent, crops of breadstuffs followed the peace, and prevented a great decline in food and, consequently, in the wages of labor. A great abundance of idle capital in Europe sought employment with the utmost confidence in the extension of our wonderful railroad system, and became during the last years a purchaser of products and labor almost comparable to the Government itself during the time of war. All these circumstances tended to delay, though they could not prevent, the decline in prices which was sure to follow ultimately the cessation of the causes which had produced the advance. The two years following the close of the war were years of repeated and violent fluctuations, which tempted many to continue for a time their speculative operations, but which, in the main, resulted disastrously for all outside speculators, leaving a profit only to the brokers, bankers, and others employed in conducting the operations, and reducing daily the number of "dabblers" by their complete financial exhaustion. The accounts from all the leading markets agree in this, that the fortunes made, the small and large sums gained during the years of war, were almost all lost again before the close of 1867, and that the men who fed the great speculative fire previously to 1865 had almost all disappeared from view.

But the men who had adopted speculation as a profession were not to be thus driven off the course by a mere decline in the natural supply of deluded victims. Men who had once tasted the delight of taking the money earned by other men, and making it their own by dint of superior cunning, shrewdness, or unscrupulousness, were parched with a craving for the continued indulgence. Men who had acquired habits of luxury not far inferior to those of Imperial Rome, needed a perennial supply of revenues to maintain their state. Men who had acquired control over markets, and wielded immense power, were unable to relinquish it. All these men must continue to speculate, even though the original temptation, the natural fluctuations in prices, be utterly wanting. If there be no natural fluctuations in prices, artificial fluctuations must be created. It is out of this combination of circumstances that has grown what might be called the second period of the speculative era. The first began with efforts to profit by violent fluctuations in prices, brought about by natural causes, and necessarily, indeed, ended as soon as these natural causes ceased to operate. The second began with efforts to create artificial fluctuations in prices, and is, we think, now gradually drawing to a close.

The markets in which the operations of this second period were carried on were comparatively limited in number. In the early years of the war, speculation invaded everything. Latterly it has been confined mainly to railroad stocks, gold, cotton, grain, and real estate. It would be impossible, within our limits, to follow its career closely through all these markets; but we will point out such of its salient features as will, we think, justify our belief in its early end.

Few people who visit the lovely parks growing up in all our leading cities, who roll along the miles of new boulevards and drives that intersect or surround every suburb, stop to reflect that most of these improvements, with all their manifold attractions, are only the artificial but seductive stimulants to a gigantic real-estate speculation. The people who are so patriotically interested in providing their fellow-citizens with agreeable opportunities for healthful recreations and exercise, especially on horseback or in carriage, of course never have any interest in "lots" along the drive or near the park. They induce legislatures and city governments to order the construction of these improvements. Who has the right to object? Is not the expense assessed on the property benefited by it? Nominally, yes! Really, no! These improvements carried on everywhere are raising the taxes in our towns and cities to such frightful figures that none can afford to live in cities except the very rich, and those who are too poor to go away. Every day the distance which mechanics and men of moderate means have to travel between their homes and their work increases, every day tenement-houses are becoming more tightly packed, all in a large measure owing to the fabulous and fictitious prices put upon city and suburban property by a gigantic real-estate speculation, carried on for the benefit of the speculators, mainly at the public expense, and under the delusive pretence of the public benefit. This speculation, we think, we clearly see the end of. City taxation, not only with us, but throughout the country, has exceeded its possible limits. People are driven from town by the crushing taxes. Real-estate dealers, alike in Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn, Chicago, and San Francisco, report an unusual number of dwellings and business tenements unoccupied. Unimproved property along the lines of great improvements is still reported as "firmly held," but with "no transactions," sure evidence of a pause in the speculation. With the increasing number of unoccupied houses, how many new ones are likely to be built? How many purchasers are there likely to be for new lots at fabulous prices?

Our last two grain crops have been extraordinary. For three years past prices of breadstuffs have been declining, but have been prevented from reaching their normal figures by a desperate combination of the grain speculators, who were only too cheerfully aided by the grain-growers, and who found an inexcusable and unwise support in the Western banks, unable to distinguish between the high prices of war times with poor crops, and the necessarily low figures of peace and abundance. With this assistance, speculation has been enabled to hoard and artifically withhold from market a large portion of two seasons' crops, and even attempted to stop the progress of recent shipments to Europe, ordered from there to meet an anticipated deficiency in the coming harvest. Fortunately, we think, for the country, the Western banking interest is recognizing the artificiality of the movement, and their own danger in supporting it, and during last week refused to furnish funds for carrying the grain speculation into a third season. The result was a very sudden and sharp decline in the price of wheat, which in itself is not important, but which shows that the speculation was indeed sustained by the banks. That support permanently withdrawn, as it now seems likely to be, the artificial grain speculation may fairly be considered ended.

Our readers may remember that we have persistently urged that there was no reason why the premium on gold should not have gone to a merely nominal figure two years ago. It was only upheld by the artificial combinations of the Erie robbers and their like. From the explosion of their gigantic schemes last fall, this band of choice spirits has not yet recovered, and, indeed, seems likely never to recover. The natural speculation in gold had almost entirely ceased, when they sought, by fraud and device, to arrest the natural decline, and force the price to a ridiculous figure. Their utter failure, in which nothing but their infamous influence over some of our judges saved them from bankruptcy and lynching, set the market free, and it has since steadily declined. A few months since, just when the public mind had quietly settled down to specie payments, another adventurer, but recently returning from the goal to which his predecessors seem hastening, tried to follow feebly in their footsteps, and came to still more ignominious grief; since when the market has again resumed its downward course. It is not the rise or fall in the premium which is important in this connection; it is the fact alone that the wildest and most desperate artificial combinations scarcely for a moment divert the market from its quiet downward course, which most clearly proves the decay, the end of the speculation.

But in no market has speculation revelled to the same extent as in the Stock Exchange. Here the colossi of modern finance have met upon a battle-ground worthy of their powers. Here natural and artificial stimulants to speculation, foreign and domestic influences, local and national interests, have mingled in an almost inextricable confusion. Here speculation becomes confounded with legitimate investment, here some of the profoundest problems of modern statesmanship meet face to face with the schemes of disreputable financial parasites. Enough may, however, be clearly discerned to warrant our assertion that, even in this arena, the battle, as far as speculation is concerned, is well-nigh ended.

The features of the great railroad-share speculation on the Stock Exchange since the peace have been mainly three, all tending and aiming to advance prices. First, a system of improved practical management was introduced by Mr. Vanderbilt, which was a legitimate and honorable means of increasing the value of the stocks representing the roads benefited by the improvement. Next came a system of consolidating various lines under one management and into one company, and the issue, in the way of dividends, of large amounts of new shares, to represent the supposed increased value of the road by virtue of the consolidation or other improvements. Last came the unblushing issue of new shares and new bonds, for the payment of unearned dividends, for the completion of improvements never contemplated, for any and every purpose, sometimes without purpose, occasionally without even a pretence of purpose. All these influences seem to have been fairly exhausted; and, beyond levying a tax at Albany upon the whole of the State for the benefit of some of the exhausted railroad treasuries, it seems that even the ingenuity of distinguished railroad managers would be sorely tried to invent new schemes for advancing the prices of their securities.

The improvement system introduced by Mr. Vanderbilt was very effective when applied to such a frightfully mismanaged concern as the Harlem Railroad. It was even not to be despised in the case of the New York Central, which had been habitually plundered for political purposes. But roads running into New York City are no longer "lying around loose," the mismanagement of Harlem was altogether exceptional and phenomenal, much of the improved earnings of the so-called Vanderbilt roads was due to other causes apart from the management, and it would be as difficult to find other roads upon which the experiment could be successfully tried as it would be to find another Vanderbilt to conduct it. The consolidation scheme has been carried to a point that alarms even the managers themselves, and that seriously engages the attention of thoughtful men everywhere. Each consolidation is an attempt at monopoly. Each attempted monopoly is met by fiercer competition, and competition adds to expenses and diminishes profits. People ask themselves where is the increased value of the road as represented by consolidation, if consolidation everywhere leads to increased expenses and diminished earnings? and thus faith is lost in the value of securities issued upon such basis. The whole system of consolidation and of its immediate offspring, paper dividends, has been such a fruitful source of corruption, fraud, deceit, that it has tended more than any other one thing to fill people with distrust of railroad management, and to deter them from speculating in stocks. One element remained, after consolidation, improved management, and paper dividends had ceased to influence the market, that was relied on as certain to revive speculation by advancing prices—the extreme ease in money. But here we are in the midst of summer; money has been cheaper and more abundant than has ever before been known in this country, yet no advance has taken place in stocks. On the contrary, prices, as a general thing, have been declining. There are no outside buyers or sellers. The Stock and Gold Exchanges are alike deserted. Even the flare-up and failure of the young adventurer just referred to has created scarcely more than a ripple of excitement. Everywhere young, active, intelligent men are abandoning speculation, and even the brokerage business, for other more simple and more remunerative, less uncertain pursuits. Everywhere respect for legitimate business is increasing, and the artificial speculation of the last few years exciting more disgust. The dream of rapid wealth has proved a nightmare. The notable exceptions that were wont to illustrate it are beginning to be recognized as doubtful bubbles, whose career may yet end in the poor-house or the penitentiary. In a word, the closer the examination, the more decided is the conviction that we are rapidly approaching the end of the ten years' speculation.

ENGLAND.

JUNE 10, 1870.

JUST as I am about to write, I receive the sad news of Mr. Dickens's death. It seems impossible to pass over such a topic in silence, and yet more impossible to say anything which will possess any particular interest for your readers. Mr. Dickens's writings are as familiar on your side of the Atlantic as on ours, and I can add nothing to what will have been said sufficiently often before you receive this upon his literary character. I do not know, indeed, whether the moment after a man's death is the best time for taking stock of his achievements; for some obvious reasons, it is the worst; though it is inevitable that every one should try to express something of the common regret at the loss of one who, if not the greatest, was incomparably the most popular writer of his generation. No other writer in England has commanded a circulation equal to a half, I believe I might almost say a fourth part, of that attained by Mr. Dickens; and I shall not now ask how far his permanent fame is likely to correspond to that which he has enjoyed in his lifetime. Nor, if I do not venture to assume the office of critic, is it right to dwell at any length upon topics of more personal interest. It is chiefly desirable, as it seems to me, at the present moment to do what one can to maintain the privacy of a literary man's life, rather than to help in satisfying the curiosity of the "many-headed beast." It is enough to say that Mr. Dickens had a singular power over the affections of his friends, and that there are many besides his children who will be grieved to the heart by this morning's news. If, as Johnson said of Garrick, his death has "eclipsed the gaiety of nations," it has also saddened more profoundly many smaller circles, and that is an epitaph of which we ought to be more ambitious. I feel, however, as though I was treading a rather dangerous path, and approaching too closely the verge of topics that should be held in sacred privacy. Yet I could not write to you to-day without attempting to give some small expression to a feeling of regret which is at the present moment affecting the whole nation, and, I might doubtless add, more nations than one.

Another writer died last week whose name may be known to some of your readers. I mean Mr. Mark Lemon, who had been editor of Punch since its commencement. Mr. Lemon's own writings were of no great value, but in his editorial capacity he was associated with some eminent names. Punch will, at any rate, be remembered as the recipient of some of Thackeray's happiest trifles. The collection of such names suggests some curious reflections. Mr. Dickens was the leader of that school of English humorists which has been dominant for the last thirty years, as Punch was one of its chief organs. It has had many merits, and amongst them may certainly be reckoned that of moral purity. There is not a word in Dickens or in Punch which might not be read by a father to a rising family of daughters. That is a good thing in its way, and yet the words have almost an ironical sound. Have we not descended a little into the milk-and-water school of morality? Punch, I fear, has pretty completely lost its former spirit, and if it refrains very properly from attacking us by unworthy means, has rather fallen into the error of general insipidity. There is no poison in the cup which it offers, but there is also remarkably little flavor of any kind. Once, Punch was a bit of a radical; now he has become a twaddling old gentleman who believes in his Times, and whose great object it seems to be never to tread upon anybody's toes or say anything unfitted for an academy for young ladies. Well! if our comic literature is moral to a painful degree, we know where to look for consolation. To say nothing of the Swinburnian school, with its passionate desire to exchange

> "The lilies and languors of virtue
> For the roses and raptures of vice,"

we have been treated to an amount of what I may mildly describe as impropriety in our recent newspaper literature which is a rather amazing illustration of British respectability. It would be nearer the mark to say that such a torrent of filth was never poured into general discussion before; and, of course, private conversation is apt to exceed the limits of public talk. I will just remark, as a hint to schoolmasters, that our latest and worst scandal seems to have been partly owing to a custom, which has lately become common, of allowing schoolboys and undergraduates to perform private theatricals in which the women's parts are taken by boys and young men.

I have been led by a rather queer association of ideas into a revolting topic. By way of return to purer air, I will remark that a new contest is now opening in Parliament. The Education question is coming on, and the forces on both sides are gradually taking up their position. As I shall have to refer to the matter in future, it may be as well to attempt a short statement of the actual position of the controversy. The great fight will take place over what is known as the religious difficulty. The mass of English children is in a state of profound ignorance, and the ignorance is nowhere more profound than in regard to all theological questions. A friend of mine was putting a school through their catechism the other day. Each boy answered his questions very fluently until he came near the end of the creed. Here a dead pause took place, till, after repeated efforts to obtain a satisfactory answer, the explanation of the sudden hitch in the proceedings was given in these words: "Please, sir, the boy as believes in the Holy Ghost isn't here to-day." That is very apt to be the case. But, of course, there is a vehement conflict as to the particular shade of doctrine which is to be impressed upon such promising pupils. They must have the right doctrine about the Trinity, though they may be only able to receive it by a subdivision of labor. And the reason is very simple, namely, that each sect wishes to have the prestige and influence derivable from the management of the national schools. At present, the schools are all supported by the various denominations, with certain assistance from Parliament, and they are naturally anxious to maintain their position. In future, however, if Mr. Forster's bill passes, there will be three classes of schools; first, the denominational schools, as at present existing; secondly, schools, denominational or otherwise, which will receive subsidies from a local rate; thirdly, schools to be founded in future by various municipal authorities, to be supported out of the rates and a parliamentary vote in aid, and to be managed by the representatives of the ratepayers. Of course, there is no dispute as to the first class of schools; but the difficulty turns upon the conditions under which the other two classes are to be assisted from the rates. The Government proposal is shortly this: that the local authorities are to determine in every case what is to be the religious teaching in the schools, or, if they please, to dispense with religious teaching altogether. There can be no doubt, however, that, in most cases, they will either aid some school already in existence, or else found schools in which the doctrines of the most powerful sects in the place will be taught. To guard against any possible grievance, it is therefore proposed by Government that there shall be what is called a conscience-clause in the act. That is, the parents shall in all cases have the power of withdrawing their children from any religious training of which they disapprove. It was suggested that the clause as originally proposed was not sufficiently stringent, and they have signified their willingness to adopt a clause of any stringency that can be devised. There can be no doubt that a measure resting upon these principles can be passed by Government, if it chooses. The Conservatives will join the Government majority in adopting it: and, considering Mr. Gladstone's great power in the present Parliament, there is no doubt that he can do what he pleases.

Here, however, comes in the real difficulty. Such a measure, if passed, would be substantially a Conservative measure, and would fail altogether to satisfy the Radical wing of the Liberal party. Their demands are in substance that, in all schools supported or aided by the rates, no denominational training shall be allowed. They shrink, however, from proposing a distinctly secular system, and have invented the word "unsectarian" to express their meaning. The precise nature of their proposals is, either that the Bible alone shall be read "without note or comment," or that no "distinctive religious training" shall be allowed. Of course, there are certain differences as to the terms on which schools are to be managed, according as they belong to the second or third of the classes above-mentioned: that is, according as they are originally founded or only in part supported out of the rates. The objection generally made to these suggestions is that the simple reading of the Bible, or the teaching of a kind of essence of religion without any particular flavor, would in practice be equivalent to no religious teaching at all, and would lead to nearly as many troubles as a more decidedly sectarian method. In this I think that there is some force; at any rate, the League and its supporters would have occupied a more intelligible position if they had adopted the simple principle that the religious part of the training should be left to voluntary effort, but that, when given, it should be given according to the taste of the teachers. The attempt to throw a kind of sop to the prejudices of the British public is felt to be rather unsatisfactory, and has to a certain extent a rather hypocritical appearance. It looks as if they were anxious to make an apparent concession, which is really no concession at all, and to allow religion to be taught, so long as it is deprived of all that gives it meaning in the eyes of the teachers. I will not, however, discuss the rights of the question. I have sought to give you a kind of plan of the scene of action, so that you may judge what is the real meaning of the policy which Government is likely to adopt. I expect that Government, whilst doing what they can to conciliate their radical opponents, will nevertheless remain substantially on the more conservative side, and that we are, therefore, merely at the beginning of a long contest. I earnestly hope that some measure may be passed this session; but I am not sanguine enough to hope that it will amount to anything like a final settlement. The questions at issue are too exciting and too important to be set to rest by the necessarily languid debates at the end of a session.

THE ITALIAN PROBLEM.

II.

If we cross the Apennines between Florence and Bologna, we descend into a region which, at first sight, seems to have nothing in common with the south-western half of Italy. The climate, with its excesses of cold and heat, seems Castilian rather than Italian, and the scenery, if it could be seen in the simple garb of its native flora, might not improperly be called Dutch. If we, nevertheless, recognize Italy in these regions, it is due to the works of man rather than to those of nature; it is due to what man has planted and built, to the olive and the vine, and to the palatial splendor of the cities. The high-roads are garden avenues, hung and draped with heavy garlands of vine: what of the dead level of the plain and its windmill? You cannot see either. Even the corn-fields are only visible in patches, hedged in as they are by rows of mulberry and fruit trees. And in the clearings of this vast orchard stand splendid old towns, dreamy and dilapidated, yet stately and venerable; overgrown, perhaps, with grass or ivy, but not covered with many layers of modern varnish, certainly not hidden under it. Florence and Naples are half modern towns already, and daily growing more so. But Mantua and Padua, Verona and Venice, Ravenna and Ferrara, are so many cairns of history replete with the glories of the past only.

Here, then, we are in a region where nature has done less, and where, consequently, man was forced to do more than on the south-western side of the Apennine. We are in that vast plain representing the valley of the Po and of its tributaries, which is hemmed in between the Alps, the Apennines, and the Adriatic. It is the only alluvial plain in Italy, and we will endeavor to show that these physical aspects of the country are coextensive with certain mental characteristics of its population. We need not here reconsider the Piedmontese, and may at once exclude the upper or western part of this valley, which, moreover, partakes more of the Alpine than of the lowland nature. But Venetia, Lombardy, and Parma, the northern portion of Modena and the Romagnas, down to Ancona, represent a district which, though capable of many subdivisions, may well be considered as a whole, ethnographically as well as geographically.

It is admitted, I think, that the inhabitant of the plain, provided his plain is traversed by navigable rivers or borders on the sea, is, other things being equal, a more civilizable person than the mountaineer. Switzerland enjoys exceptional political advantages, yet it never played an important part in history like Holland, nor can it boast of many great men. And as to the Tyrol, it is a positive disgrace even to Austria, being the home of all that is most stupid and benighted, the refuge of superstition and ignorance, of priests and legitimists. In the plains there may be fever and consumption, but there can be no goître and no cretinism. There, too, as everywhere else, priestcraft and ignorance may lead to vices and to crimes, but the effect will cease with the cause, and the case need never be deemed a hopeless one.

Without further indulging in speculations of this kind, we can easily convince ourselves that the inhabitants of this north-eastern part of Italy are a race not only vastly superior to their Alpine neighbors, but in some respects even to their transapennine brethren on the volcanic coasts of the Mediterranean. Count all the illustrious men of Italy, not her tyrants and historical rascals, but those that were really great, in art or science, in literature or in civic virtue, and you will find that by far the greater number of them were born and educated in this part of Italy. Raffaelle and Guido Reni, Titian and Giorgione, Correggio and Paolo Veronese, Palladio, and the three Caraccis, are striking instances. Leonardo, too, may well be called a Milanese. We must not judge by what we find of pictures and statues in these noble towns. Pictures and statues are movable property. An invader may take them to the Louvre or wherever he pleases. But the works of the architect remain. They alone are monuments worthy of the name. An individual may be honored and immortalized by his statue, but for a nation or any community of men the fittest monuments are its buildings. And the architecture of these transapennine towns is not only grand and beautiful, but seems to have altogether escaped those blighting influences of rococco and renaissant art which have disfigured Rome.

Science, too, was cultivated here not only sooner but more thoroughly and more successfully than elsewhere in Italy. Bologna, Pavia, and Padua are even now important seats of learning, but in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries these universities were frequented by foreigners from all countries of Europe, and even Vicenza had its high school of learning which was hardly inferior to the others. Much, no doubt, was due to patronage and to the laudable efforts of the Gonzagas, the Della Scalas, and the Estes, but without the genius of the people this patronage could not even have existed. Volta and Galvani, Grimaldi and Torricelli, Morgagni and Tomassini, Fallopio and Malpighi, Cardano and Tartaglia, Nobili and Mariannini were all born on this north-eastern side of the Apennines. More names might easily be added. But those here mentioned belong to a select band of thinkers and discoverers whose discoveries have not only enriched the older sciences but have created new ones. We need not exaggerate the importance of Cardan's formula for solving cubic equations (which is said to belong to Tartaglia rather), but what would anatomy, and, above all, what would physical science be without the achievements of these illustrious men? Tuscany, it is true, can boast of having given Galileo to science and Michael Angelo to art, and these were giants. Brunelleschi, too, was a Florentine, and so was Giotto. Yet, great though these names are, they do not invalidate our theory, since the genius of a people and their general turn of mind ought not to be judged by its possible maxima of excellence, but rather by the number of cases in which any given kind of excellence is obtained among them. And to find this, we must consult not only the lists of great historical names, but also the statistics of the professions. The establishment of political liberty has not yet affected these data, and we are justified in taking them as the exponents of the spontaneous preferences and leanings, and, therefore, of the innate capacities, of the various peoples of Italy. The classification of these intellectual types and their territorial grouping, such as we have attempted to set forth in this and in the preceding article, will be found correct by all who take the trouble of verifying it. It may be briefly summed up as follows:

The Piedmontese are the soldiers and the officials of Italy, the Ligurians her sailors. The Tuscan is the man of the world, and, therefore, fond of all that refers to this world, of gossip—past and present, of history and politics, of law and diplomacy, of polished speech and polished manners. The Neapolitan mind is imaginative and speculative. Saturated, as it were, with the sensuous imagery of its southern world, it seems more ready to rise and soar above it; not that it is ever capable of what Coleridge called "otherworldliness" (which is a prerogative of northerners, rather, and of Protestant bigots in particular), but it certainly feels more at home in metaphysics than in physics, and the uneducated are readier to accept miracles than laws. Lastly, in the transapennine Italian we have recognized a very highly-gifted being in whom the equilibrium of the mental faculties, independently of their absolute strength, seems to have reached a remarkable degree of perfection. His mind is the artistic mind par excellence, in which intellect and imagination control and fertilize each other, so that it may either create a work of art or become capable of putting the prudens quæstio, that "well-grounded anticipation" which, according to Bacon, must precede all scientific experiments and all discoveries, and which, as "prudent," is an act of the intellect, and, as a "question," an act of the imagination. The history of Volta's classical experiments offers a striking example of this. To use a very trite and not very accurate metaphor, we may say that, if Piedmont is the hand of Italy, Naples is its heart, and the remaining central portion its head.

But, strictly speaking, we have thus far only demonstrated that there is a hand and a heart and a head in Italy, and it still remains to be seen whether this hand, this heart, and this head belong to the same organic body, and, if they do, we have still to account for such a union, for its suddenness, its cohesion, and its vitality. Surely not every hand coalesces with every head, nor every head with every heart. We have hitherto pointed out nothing but differences, all radical mental differences, too, and the question arises: What caused these differences to become mere functional differences, indicative not of plurality but of organic colligation and national oneness?

The next and concluding article will contain an answer to this question.

Correspondence.

THE NECESSITY OF LEGAL TENDER.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: My views of the Legal Tender Act differ somewhat from those of a large and perhaps the soundest part of the public. If correct, they have an important bearing upon the question, and, if they are not so, will you be kind enough to point out the fallacy?

It is evident that gold and silver bullion cannot be used as money. The operations of assay and weight, as well as subdivision, are too slow and cumbrous. Governments therefore issue coin, bearing their stamp, as evidence of definite value. It is not probable that any one will make a question about receiving this. But then it may happen, and the conditions of trade will not admit of this uncertainty. Thus, if I give my note for a thousand dollars' worth of goods at sixty days, and resell them later for another note at sixty days, I must have an absolute certainty that what I receive from the second note will pay my own, and that no freak of my creditor can expose me to trouble. Governments, therefore, make their coin a legal tender, which, when offered in payment of debt, releases the debtor from legal process.

In the case of convertible paper, if my creditor refuses it, I can draw the specie, and the knowledge that I can do so prevents him from refusing it, because he does not want to be burdened with the specie. In 1857, the withdrawal of the specie from the banks for export produced a panic and a suspension: but the great contraction of the currency, or, what is the same thing, check to its circulation, brought such a fall of prices as to attract gold in large amounts from abroad. The suspension lasted but sixty days, and in the interval there was no premium on gold. Anybody who could not settle a debt with bank-notes could easily procure gold, either at bank or of a broker, at a merely nominal charge.

I do not myself believe that it would have been possible to have maintained the convertibility of our paper money under our existing system during the war. At all events, such possibility is not self-evident. If it was not, we had no resource but inconvertible paper. Now, the difference between legal-tender notes and all other Government securities is, that the former are always at par, while the others are not—in other words, they are money. Without the Legal Tender Act, everybody owing a debt would have been liable to a claim for gold; and, as all the convertible paper which we used before the war would have disappeared, our enormously increased monetary transactions must have been conducted on a greatly diminished money basis. An idea prevails that the paper money might have been left free to find its own level of price. A moment's reflection will show, however, how impracticable this is. The New York banks owe about two hundred millions of deposits, and would be liable to a demand for gold from every depositor. If it were attempted to settle this with paper at market value, what authority would fix this constantly fluctuating value, and enforce the decision when made? On a smaller scale, it is true, you cannot, by making the notes a legal tender, compel a bootmaker to sell his boots at less price; but when he has once delivered them to you, both you and he know in exactly what medium his bill will be paid. Were it not so, you might be exposed to serious disagreement when you came to settle the bill. Fancy an Irishwoman buying a leg of mutton. The price agreed on is twelve cents. When she produces her scrip, which she has received for yesterday's washing at 130, the butcher informs her that he can allow but 125. The state of the market would probably soon justify the active interference of the police. Only a very small fraction even of our cash transactions are settled at the moment, and wherever there is debt, the law must declare what medium shall be used in payment of debt. The law does not attempt thereby to fix its value, which is regulated by other considerations.

In short, the first requisite of money is that there shall be no question of price. It is this alone which saves us from a state of barter. I believe there never has been, and never can be, in any civilized nation, any money in extensive use without its being either a legal tender, or convertible into one; and that, in the absence of the latter quality, the former is indispensable. And allow me to observe, once more, that the legal-tender quality of paper money does not in the least involve its depreciation. It is quite possible to restore convertibility, by contraction, without repealing the Legal Tender Act. But the previous repeal of this act would transfer the legal-tender notes to the position of Government bonds, and would reduce us for money to actual specie, or a far less amount than we had before the war, with a corresponding effect upon prices, and with bankruptcy for almost the entire debtor class—that is, the immense majority of the country.

G. B.

Boston, May 27, 1870.

[The paper money of the Government was convertible all through the war, at a certain rate. Its value—that is, the quantity of it necessary to purchase anything—was ascertained from first to last by a reference to the gold standard. The gold standard was in the mind of all large dealers in fixing the price of their commodities. They never dreamed of looking to the legal-tender quality of the greenbacks as a source of stability. The dreadful scene in the market between the Irishwoman and the butcher, which "G. B." pictures, actually occurred every day all over the country, as the washerwomen and laborers knew to their cost. That is, the paper money they received on Saturday, as wages, often lost ten, twenty, or thirty per cent. of its value in the butcher's eyes between that and Monday or Tuesday. The "marking up" and "marking down" of goods was going on constantly in every store in the land, as the Government credit improved or declined under the influence of victory or defeat. How "G. B." comes to be oblivious of this passes our comprehension. The greenbacks, of course, served the purpose of money, but served it very badly—they were money that only fulfilled its function very imperfectly, to the great detriment of the poor and unwary—that is, of those who could not mark their goods up and down. The reason why we used it was that we could not well afford to keep our gold, and when the Government offered a cheap though bad substitute for it, being sorely pressed, we sold the gold to foreigners, and got on as best we could with paper. What would have happened if the paper had not been made legal tender? Considerable distress, doubtless, among the debtor class at first, but afterwards far greater certainty in transactions. All classes would have thought in gold constantly, and would have talked of the rise and fall in paper, instead of the rise and fall in gold (which never stirred), and thus great suffering and delusion among the poor would have been prevented, and all contracts would have been made in gold. Nobody who gave his note for goods, payable in greenbacks at sixty days, knew, during the war, what he would have to pay in reality. So the shrewd people protected themselves, either by paying cash, or by adding on enough to their prices to cover the risk of depreciation in the legal tender. The possibility of maintaining the convertibility of our paper did not need to be self-evident to justify non-interference. Our point is that the reference to the gold standard —that is, mental conversion—was not avoided by the Legal Tender Act, could not be avoided without a change in the constitution of the human mind, never has been avoided by any nation, and therefore ought not to have been attempted. Simple Government notes would never have sunk below thirty cents on the dollar, we may be sure, and if people had not used them as a standard of value in fixing prices of goods, or making contracts de futuro, we should have been no worse off than we are, for the legal tenders never have been a real standard of value. The publication of "G. B.'s" letter has, we are sorry to say, been unavoidably delayed.—Ed. Nation.]

THE FAITH OF CONGRESS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Will the ethical editor of the Nation be good enough to answer the following questions:

1. If, at the time of the enactment of the income-tax law, about thirty-nine millions out of forty millions of the people were in favor of such a law, how did it happen that in this much talking and writing community the willing thirty-nine millions remained dumb and allowed the reluctant one million to mould "the public opinion of the day so far as it found expression," and by the power of that opinion to compel Congress to promise that the tax should not be levied after 1870?

2. If the levying of an extraordinary tax for an extraordinary occasion is "an act made in the most ordinary course of legislation" (and I think it is), why is not the issuing of bonds, upon certain conditions, to raise money for the same extraordinary occasion, also an act done in the ordinary course of legislation? and, even if it is not, what rule of morality is it which authorizes Congress to disregard pledges which it makes in the ordinary course of legislation, yet requires it to scrupulously regard those made on extraordinary occasions?

3. How is the matter different morally, "when speaking by the mouth of Congress the nation solemnly pledges the national faith to a foreign nation?" Who or what but the nation ever speaks through Congress when it makes any pledge or passes any law? Why is Congress more bound to keep faith with foreign nations or individuals than with our own citizens? Does the solemnity make the difference? In what respect or degree is one deliberate act of Congress more solemn than another? and if it is so, what degree of solemnity is required in the passage of a law in order to make its provisions binding upon Congress?

I ask these questions merely for information. Of course I acknowledge that Congress has a right to change its mind and to continue the income-tax law; but it should do it, I think, on the ground that it is still a necessary law, and not upon the ground that the promise to discontinue it in 1870 was made merely to conciliate public opinion, and may therefore rightfully be disregarded.

Respectfully yours,

Joseph Moran.

New York, June 23, 1870.

[We suppose the newspapers attacked the income-tax law at the time of its first passage because the large majority of newspapers published in this country were owned and edited then, as they are now, by men who had incomes to be taxed, and did not mean them to be taxed if plenty of talking and grumbling could prevent. So far as our observation goes, the great majority of the people either wish the retention of the tax, or at the very most are indifferent as to whether it goes or stays. We have little doubt that if we had time to find them we could show our correspondent letters enough, signed "workingman," or "mechanic," or "ploughholder versus bondholder," addressed to some of the cheaper journals, and demanding that the incomes of the wealthy should bear their share of the burdens of the war. Nor are there wanting instances of journals editorially throwing their weight on this side of the controversy, as witness the influential Springfield Republican. Of course, the "workingman" has not many papers printed in his interest and to express his opinions—though no doubt his political opinions are expressed for him freely, both just about election time and at other times—but some papers he has, and every such paper represents the real feeling, we venture to say, of a majority of the readers of most of the papers on the other side.

There is this difference between the binding power of legislation which is of the nature of a promise to a foreign people and that which is of the nature of a promise to our own citizens. The foreigner knows only that a people recognizing fully those cardinal principles of honesty and honor which he also recognizes, has made him, in as solemn a way as it can, a certain promise, to break which is to disgrace in the common estimation of mankind the party who breaks it. The American promisees know the same thing, but they also know something more. They know themselves as citizens of a country whose citizens are the government; they know themselves as promisors as well as promisees. For a thousand reasons, they are ready to admit that Congress must be allowed the right of changing its mind, and this to the end that the citizens may be the better pleased; which, in fact, is merely saying that the citizens claim for themselves the right to change their minds as changing exigencies may require. Congress is in this view the people. But of these changing exigencies, these fluctuations which bring us good or harm, which dispose us to lay on ourselves new burdens or to take something from the old, the foreigner knows nothing and needs care nothing. He is not called on to suffer with us in our calamities, and we do not call him to share our prosperity. He simply knows us as people who have bound themselves unreservedly by every weighty moral consideration to do so and so as regards him. We on the other hand know ourselves, whether or not we are constantly saying so explicitly to one another, as being always at liberty to seek other ways than one, to consider expediency, to do differently towards ourselves to-day from what we had proposed to ourselves last year.

We have here presented a rather unlimited or even exaggerated statement of the principles concerning which Mr. Moran makes enquiry, but the exaggeration will help to make clearer the distinction we would draw between what may roughly be called ordinary legislation and treaty legislation.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. John Langdon Sibley, librarian of Harvard College, has for many years been engaged in preparing biographical sketches of the first two hundred and twenty-five graduates of the Academic Department of the university, and now proposes, if he receives sufficient support, to publish them in a single volume. The design embraces the classes from 1642–1678, in the first of which graduated Sir George Downing, and the last, Cotton Mather, with many more or less eminent personages between. Mr. Sibley does not overrate the remarkable characteristics of this body of men, whose lives he intends to trace with great minuteness of detail, "adding catalogues and bibliographical notices of their writings, to open to others the way for further investigations." The chain will be complete when these Sketches are placed side by side with the Harvard Memorial Biographies, showing that, in founding as in preserving a state, culture takes its rightful place in the front rank, shuns no responsibility, and is equal to any. Mr. Sibley's work will not be stereotyped, and the edition will therefore be limited. Subscriptions (at five dollars a copy) should be sent in before September 1st.

—That the world, whether or not it has grown more virtuous, has, at all events, grown more delicate, is a thing often said, and doubtless true. Why it should be held that the world of to-day is less virtuous than the world of other times has never been satisfactorily shown by any writer, from Carlyle back to the laudator temporis acti nearest the beginning of time and the end of chaos. This, however, is a large subject. That the world, so far at least as it concerns itself with literature, grows more delicate, seems to be certain; and the reason is not far to seek. Every day the distinction between literature virginibus puerisque and other literature becomes more difficult to maintain; everybody reads; and the public demand for books which everybody may not read is constantly becoming smaller—smaller comparatively, at any rate. A writer of our day who makes a book which cannot be talked about by men in presence of women, and by men and women in presence of boys and girls, makes a greater mistake than any of the same sort that could have been made by any writer of past times. Such a writer nowadays talks to an audience bound by many considerations not to listen; and also he loses the immense advertising advantage of not being generally talked about and discussed in all companies. Miss E. S. Phelps, for instance, writes a book which tells people that the Christian heaven is neither a "state of mind" nor a place where one sings and hears singing without end, but is a place where, after death, one is made happy, if one is a mother, by the love of ideally good children; or, if one is a boy, by unlimited skating and swimming; or, if one is fond of horticulture, by gardens with perfect houses attached—and the book in which she sets forth this theory of future life gets her thousands and tens of thousands of readers—perhaps a hundred thousand. But on one's fingers one might count the thousands who have bought the novel by Miss Phelps which followed "The Gates Ajar." Yet "Hedged In" is, perhaps, a cleverer story than its predecessor. But it is a book that parents will not put into their children's hands, and that cannot be chosen as a topic of conversation in mixed companies. Probably it would be safe to say that "The Gates Ajar" has been read by ten persons for one who will read "Hedged In." A more conspicuous instance than that of Miss Phelps might be found in the contemporary history of American writers; but the comparative success of her two stories is sufficient to point our moral, which is, that nothing is more certain—despite the temporary repute of indecent writers, despite Swinburne and the bigamous novelists—than that the times grow worse for authors who deal with indecencies.

—A writer in the London Practitioner has something interesting to say in regard to a curious sensation which most of our readers have felt, and which, if they believe what is said by this writer, they will not be pleased to feel again. The sensation in question is thus described by Coleridge:

> "Oft o'er my brain does that strange fancy roll
> Which makes the present (while the flush doth last)
> Seem a mere semblance of some unknown past,
> Mixed with such feelings as perplex the soul
> Self-questioned in her sleep; and some have said
> We lived ere yet this yoke of flesh we wore."

Tennyson also, among a great many other poets, ancient and modern, refers to it:

> "Moreover, something is or seems
> That touches me with mystic gleams
> Like glimpses of forgotten dreams—
>
> "Of something felt like something here;
> Of something done I know not where;
> Such as no language may declare."

And Dickens, in "David Copperfield," regards the sensation as one common to all men:

"We have all some experience of a feeling which comes over us occasionally of what we are saying and doing having been said or done before, in a remote time—of our having been surrounded dim ages ago by the same faces, objects, and circumstances—of our knowing perfectly well what will be said next, as if we suddenly remembered it."

This description is either fuller than that of the two poets, or else it is a description of a considerably stronger sensation than that which they had experienced. The Practitioner's correspondent says that he had been from boyhood familiar with the feeling, but that it never came so frequently nor with such intensity as a year or so ago, just previously to a fit of epilepsy, which disease then for the first time attacked him. He has since had but few recurrences of the feeling, but on two of the few occasions it was followed within twenty-four hours by an epileptic seizure. There seems to the writer, then, apart from all the pretty things that philosophers and poets have made out of this experience, that it has for its chief interest a therapeutic interest. The sensation of pre-existence, or whatever it may be called, ought, he thinks, "to be regarded as showing disturbance of brain-function," and he doubts if its recognition and removal might not often prevent much more important disorders. He suggests, too, that "enquiry in cases of epilepsy may detect a something of this sort put aside as not being of sufficient consequence to speak of, and yet in truth being a minimized form of petit mal, warning to precautions against a larger seizure." The chief precaution he would take is cessation from work, or a diminution in the amount of work done. It would be curious to know if Mr. Dickens, by whom this sensation seems to have been felt so often and so vividly, and who died, it is said, of overwork, had experience of it in the later days of his life.

—The London Spectator is a very clever paper, as everybody knows, and as honest a journal, beyond a doubt, as any that ever existed; but there is no doubt either that, now and again, in one of several ways, it allows its enemies a chance to mock at it and cast derision upon it. The more or less painful-seeming character of its religiousness, for example, frequently amuses its foes; and so does the sort of mixture of whim and sublimated moral earnestness with which it treats many topics that the children of this world dispose of in a few words of what they call common sense, or else give the go-by entirely as being matters not of human concern. Then again, it does, no doubt, rather too much affect "insight," and, far as it can see into mill-stones, it sometimes professes to have seen further than it really has. There was no need, for example, of its discovering by certain signs that the writer of a book called "The Woman Who Dared" was "Miss" Sargent, and of proceeding thereupon to make some remarks, suggested by passages in that production, on the power inherent in certain feminine natures of dropping, under certain circumstances, the sense of shame, as a man under the same circumstances could not. The fact is, as some at any rate of our readers know, if more of them are ignorant of both book and author, that the author of "The Woman Who Dared" was Mr. Epes Sargent, a resident of Boston or some of the parts adjacent. The Spectator has also been making some calumnious remarks about the Republic which cry aloud for retribution, as being, if such language may be permitted, indicative of want of knowledge, want of its own beloved "insight," and truly deplorable failure to "comprehend our institutions." "It must not be forgotten," says the Spectator, commenting on Mr. Goldwin Smith's letter to Mr. Disraeli, "that the professor is living in the United States, where men take Mr. Disraeli's revelations for gospel." In this explanation of Mr. Smith's reasons for writing his letter there assuredly is not any astonishing degree of penetrative sagacity. Nor is there much closeness to facts in the statement that Americans accept Mr. Disraeli's revelations for gospel. Seven Americans in ten, and in the North, eight or nine in ten, are, as between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli, for instance, on the side of Mr. Gladstone. Most Americans who know anything about Mr. Disraeli think of him, we should say—no doubt in an inadequate way—as being a man of great ability, destitute entirely of political principle, and quite willing to go a long way in attacking an adversary. They have a sort of admiration for his adroitness, and they like his courage; but the narrower mind and more acrid nature of Mr. Gladstone do not prevent his moral earnestness in the work of reform from putting them almost to a man on his side. To say all this, is making too much of a thing of no importance; but it seldom does an Englishman any harm to tell him that, as a rule, he had better, when American affairs are to be talked about, open his eyes and ears, and not open his mouth.

—But, perhaps, when he talks like this it may be as well for us ourselves to give heed and let him talk on. A writer in the News is speaking of the lack of an international copyright law: "Indeed, more than one [American] speaker on the subject has avowed that it is better to let American authors be pirated in England than to renounce the privilege of spoiling the English. We shall be glad to hear that Congress is at length brought to a better mind." It is not the fault of Congress, however; unless, indeed, it is the duty of Congressmen to be a little wiser and a little better than the electors who follow them and look up to them as leaders. Many of the American publishers, all the authors, and all intelligent and honest men and women generally who have thought the thing out, wish an international copyright law to be passed; but as for the people at large, the simple truth we take to be this: they are persuaded that English books will be dearer when the authors get some money from the American consumer than they are now. And moreover, they are a little obtuse and do not clearly see how a man has the same right of property in a poem or story he has made that he has in corn he has raised or shoes he has made. While the people are in this frame of mind and state of knowledge, it is too much to expect of the average Congressman that he will feel the disgrace of the present condition of things or see his way clear to bettering it. Negotiations looking to the framing of an international copyright law are now going on between Great Britain and this country, and perhaps the prospects are better than ever before of our ratifying the treaty, though we have once or twice before come near doing so; but that the prospects are very good, it is still too much to say. Mr. Welford, we see, writes from England that there are now some indications that the British publisher himself begins to be opposed to the ratification of a copyright treaty between the two countries. Apparently he fears that his American rivals, with a reading public behind them so much larger and greedier than the English reading public, would outbid him constantly, and soon have in their pay all the most popular authors. So we are, perhaps, to have an opportunity to read to our old homilist some of the lectures upon the wickedness of piracy which he has for years been giving to us.

—We extract from a list published in the Revue Bibliographique Universelle for April and May, the names of the principal bibliographical periodicals in Europe, with some particulars concerning them. The Revue should, however, be consulted. AUSTRIA: Oesterreichische Buchhändler-Correspondenz, founded in 1860, and appearing three times a month; takes note of all books published in Austria, in whatever language, as well as of engravings and music. In connection with this appears the annual classified Oesterreichischer Catalog, sold entire or in parts. BELGIUM: Journal de l'Imprimerie et de la Librairie en Belgique, 1854, monthly. BOHEMIA: Vestnik bibliografičky, July, 1869, monthly; gives also Slovenian publications, and works published in foreign languages which relate to Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia. DENMARK and NORWAY: Dansk Bogfortegnelse, 1851; appears from eight to ten times in the course of a year. Dans Boghandlertidende, 1854, weekly; the organ of the Danish publishers. ENGLAND: The Bookseller, 1858, monthly; the Publishers' Circular, 1837, fortnightly, with Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.'s Monthly Bulletin; Trübner's American and Oriental Literary Record, 1866, monthly. FRANCE: Bibliographie de la France, 1811, weekly; Revue Bibliographique Universelle, 1868, monthly. GERMANY and SWISS GERMANY: Allgemeine Bibliographie für Deutschland, 1842, weekly. GREECE: Μηνιαῖον δέλτιον τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς βιβλιοπωλεσίας, 1862, monthly. HOLLAND: Nederlandsche Bibliographie, 1856, sixteen numbers yearly. List van Boekwerken, 1837, monthly. Alphabetische Naamlijst van Boeken, 1846. ITALY: Bibliografia italiana—replaces, beginning with this year, the Bibliografia d'Italia, 1867—fortnightly. POLAND: Biblioteka Warszawske, for publications in the kingdom. RUSSIA: Knizhniy Vyestnik, 1860, fortnightly; Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnavo prosvestcheniya, the official organ of the Minister of Public Instruction. A new periodical, Bibliograf, is announced as about to appear at St. Petersburg. SWEDEN: Svensk Bibliographie, 1828, monthly. The list of periodicals of this class which have previously existed for a longer or shorter term, is very much longer than the foregoing, and will be found in the Revue.

—About two years ago, the religious and the intellectual world of France were a good deal agitated by the proposal made in the columns of the Siècle that a portrait-statue should be erected in honor of Voltaire. Not only in France but elsewhere—in England, on the Continent, and here in America—the pulpits and the religious press were loud in condemnation of a project which was characterized as no better than impious and blasphemous. That a Catholic Frenchman should have been scandalized by the scheme was reasonable enough, for certainly the Catholic Church may recognize in Voltaire a man who was once, at any rate, a formidable enemy, whether or not he is very formidable now; but the denunciations of the Protestant religious press sounded as if the current estimate of Voltaire that is entertained by Protestantism were the traditional estimate handed over to our fathers by the Catholic Church, which stigmatized as a mere bestial atheist a man who, whatever else he was, was not an atheist, but as avowed a believer in the existence, omniscience, omnipotence, justice, and mercy of a Supreme Being as any of the men who denounce him without having made the acquaintance of his works. As to his spiritual-mindedness and the soundness of his faith, that is another question. Despite all opposition, the statue has been finished, and is soon to be set up. At first it was intended to place it in a square, or rather a rond-point, which Baron Haussmann had determined on making in the Rue de Rennes; but Baron Haussmann was obliged to go out of office and leave the Rue de Rennes and many other streets and squares unfinished; so it is probable that the statue will be set up on the Quai Voltaire. "To Voltaire by popular subscription" will be the only inscription on the pedestal. The statue is of bronze, and is the work of a M. Barbédienne, or rather it is the work of M. Barbédienne and of Houdon, for our contemporary has obeyed orders, and instead of giving an original conception has followed the work of his celebrated predecessor. Houdon, by the way, our readers will recollect, is known in this country by his statue of Washington, of which the original is in Richmond and a copy in the State House at Boston, and which is considered very successful, though it is not precisely the Washington of the school histories. His Voltaire, certainly, has an air of being a most life-like and truthful representation of the very man himself, and one can imagine its being contemplated with pleasure by the ecclesiastic who desires him to be seen as a fleering and jeering scoffer, and by the bonnet rouge who would gladly hang every priest, monk, and nun, and imagines that Voltaire would have joyously assisted him in his labors. The continued influence of Voltaire among the less intelligent opponents of the Church may be guessed from the fact that the number of subscribers to the memorial fund was 205,000.

—Recent papers in Hours at Home and the Atlantic on Siam have caused us to examine with some curiosity a copy of the "Bangkok Calendar" for 1870, printed at the press of the American Missionary Association at that capital. On page 50 is given a list of the children of the late First King, eighty-four in number, including one miscarriage, which the King himself duly recorded (No. 54). His Majesty Phra-Bard-Somdetch-Phra Paramendr-Maha-Mongkut was of course a polygamist, and his children were born to him sometimes at the rate of three a month. His ninth child and fifth son—another Somdetch—born in 1853, is the present First King. The late Second King, whose name was even a little longer than his illustrious colleague's, had at least thirty-one wives, who bore him sixty-three children, again including the miscarriages, this time set down at six. The catalogue of these princes is rendered quite amusing by adopting the Siamese calendar, thus: "Prince George Washington (the present Second King) born year of the dog, 30th Aug., 1838." Other nativities follow: in the year of the rat, the cow, the small dragon, the monkey, the cock, the hog, the tiger, the rabbit, the great dragon, and the serpent; and the typographical necessities of the table are such that we have the Princess Wong Chandr described as "full sister of the 1st year of the dog," and the Prince Toe as "full brother of the 14th do do do hog." The calendar proper, in which remarkable events are set against each date, has been edited with a perspective which may be far from ludicrous to an American missionary in Siam, but which reads oddly over here. Along with the record of church days are mingled notes of the departure and arrival of missionary families, of incidents in our late civil war (a date being reserved for the escape of Union officers from Libby), of international events of all degrees of importance, and finally—what is really interesting—of the progress of civilization in Siam. The late First King took kindly to European ways and notions, and was the author of innovations which produced an astonishing mixture of barbarism and civilization. He made himself the equal of foreigners whom he entertained officially or otherwise, permitted them to stand or sit in his presence, while at the same time his queen would be on all fours in a corner, shook hands with them, and otherwise made them at their ease and allowed them to observe their own customs. He employed foreign obstetricians in his harem, which was a great scandal, but a great boon to his wives if, as is likely, they had been subject to a treatment which obtained among Siamese midwives forty years ago—that, namely, of toasting the mother before a slow fire for a month immediately after delivery. The glimpses, in fact, one gets in this Calendar of the condition and estimation of women in Siam are almost enough to make a conservative Mormon subscribe for the Revolution. The old-school priests of Buddha, for instance, may not live, stand, or walk under any place where women live, sit, or walk; and the consequence has been that a bridge thrown across a street for the convenience of opposite neighbors has proved a serious obstacle to their promenading. The late First King was the father of a new school of Buddhists, who disregarded these and other superstitions; but they are as yet in a vast minority.

WALLACE ON NATURAL SELECTION.*

NOTHING shows more clearly the pure spirit which characterizes the general intercourse of scientific men than this work of Mr. Wallace. Having been, by one of those frequent accidents of discovery, the joint-worker with Mr. Darwin for years before either knew that the other was occupied with the question of natural selection, he now puts before the public a collection of essays having a bearing on this question, written and published at various times, not with the intention of detracting from the credit due his distinguished fellow-worker, but rather to limit his own very modest claims. He says: "I have felt all my life, and I still feel, the most sincere satisfaction that Mr. Darwin had been at work long before me, and that it was not left for me to attempt to write the 'Origin of Species.' I have long since measured my own strength, and know well that it would be quite unequal to that task."

The first two of these essays, "On the Law which has Regulated the Introduction of New Species," and "On the Tendency of Varieties to Depart Indefinitely from the Original Type," were written before the publication of Mr. Darwin's book, and are therefore quite independent productions. The remainder of the essays show throughout the interaction of the original thought of the author and the work of the other students in the same field. They show very beautifully how rapidly a theory expands when it ceases to be the personal property of a single intellect and becomes the common working-ground of many students. The third, fourth, and fifth chapters are devoted to the discussion of a part of the subject which, although first suggested by the Amazonian traveller Bates, is, to a great extent, the intellectual property of the author, namely, the mimicry or protective resemblances among animals. The wonderful phenomena of imitation among insects, which give us, in the butterflies and other insects, the most perfect imitations of the leaves of plants or the coloring of the bark of a tree, or even the dung of a bird, receive here an elaborate discussion. There can be no question that these chapters give the strongest arguments for the theory of natural selection which have yet been presented. The fact, which seems pretty well made out, that those groups of insects which are protected from their natural enemies by some unpleasant secretion, or in any other way, are generally the most varied in appearance, the most abundant, and the most frequently imitated in form by the other groups of insects, is probably the weightiest contribution yet made to the evidence in favor of natural selection. The author, with a discretion which many of the advocates of Darwinism would do well to imitate, does not weaken his argument by asserting that all variations which bring about imitations are to be ascribed to the principle of protective resemblance. The chapters "On Instinct in Man and Animals," "The Philosophy of Birds' Nests," and "A Theory of Birds' Nests," are devoted to a laudable effort to overthrow the common idea involved in that most question-begging of terms, instinct. The author endeavors to show that men build as much by instinct as animals do, imitation being the basis of the work in both cases. In the few classes of facts cited, the author makes a tolerably clear case for his view. Birds do indeed have a chance in their youth to see how a nest is built, and it is quite conceivable that they build in part from recollection of the nest where they were born. But there are other and more numerous cases, such as the nests of the solitary wasps, where the phenomena are much more complicated, and where imitation is out of the question. Besides, there are the cuckoos, which lay their eggs in the nests of other birds, a feat which it would be difficult for the birds to learn by imitation. Although the author has done good work in these chapters, by endeavoring to persuade the public to look upon the feats of animals in a common-sense way, and not to make unjustifiable suppositions concerning the nature of the mental operations therein involved, we cannot believe that he has cleared up the main difficulties of the question. We may ask our theorizers on animal psychology why the more marvellous performances of the so-called brute creation may not be classed with the mental operations of our lightning calculators, who certainly perform their work by no blind instinct, inconceivable as the means may be to the general run of men.

In the eighth chapter, our author answers the arguments against the Darwinian development hypothesis which the Duke of Argyll has brought forward in the "Reign of Law." With a small expenditure of force, he pretty effectually demolishes the theory of the "continual interference" of the Creator in the operations of nature—a theory, by the way, which, by the fitness of things, should have been originated by the supporters of the miracle of the winking Madonna rather than by the interpreters of the great forces of nature. At the close of this chapter the author tabulates, in a form more ingenious than logical, the arguments for the Darwinian hypothesis, under the title of "A Demonstration of the Origin of Species by Natural Selection." It will have for the general reader the great value given by a clear synoptic form to a train of argument so long that few but the special students of the subject have been able to grasp it in its expanded form.

* "Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection: A Series of Essays by Alfred Russel Wallace, author of 'The Malay Archipelago,'" etc., etc. New York: Macmillan & Co. 1870.

The chapter on the action of natural selection on man, in which Mr. Wallace, with great ingenuity, shows how man is, by his intellect, sheltered from the action of natural selection, at least so far as that operates through physical peculiarities, is probably the most important contribution which has recently been made to the theory of races.

In the tenth and concluding chapter of the book, the author takes up the question of the limits of natural selection as applied to man. It marks a new era in the history of the last phase of the development hypothesis, for it shows that one of the originators of the present form of that theory has passed the first enthusiasm of discovery, and can look with calmness upon its defects. We must congratulate the scientific world that the ablest advocate of Darwinism has had the philosophical acumen to perceive, and the courage to declare, that there are features in the physical and mental structure of man which cannot have been produced by natural selection. Our author's considerations on this point are too extended, and too closely connected, to enable us to illustrate by extracts. We can heartily commend the whole chapter to all who are interested in this vast question. That the reader may not be frightened from this profitable task by the fear that they may be too recondite for any but the specialist, we venture to give some of the headings of the sections of this chapter, which are: "The Brain of the Savage shown to be Larger than he needs it to be," "Man's Naked Skin could not have been produced by Natural Selection," "Feet and Hands of Man considered as Difficulties in the Theory of Natural Selection," "Origin of Man's Mental Faculties, by the Preservation of Useful Variations, not Possible." This chapter is throughout penetrated by a religious spirit, which in no way, however, prejudices the argument. In recapitulating, the author says: "The inference I would draw from this class of phenomena is, that a superior intelligence has guided the development of man in a definite direction and for a special purpose, just as man guides the development of many animal and vegetable forms." There will be a large amount of short-sighted criticism expended to show the contradiction between this assertion and some of the sentences of his criticism on the "Reign of Law." We leave the satisfaction which this may give to those who admire the tu quoque line of argument. The author closes his work by an admirable refutation of the assertion of Huxley, that our "thoughts are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of our other vital phenomena." The argument on this point is as clear as it is courteous—in the latter regard well suited to be a model for the gentleman whose assertion it overthrows.

It is not a little singular that, within a year, two of the greatest thinkers of the day, who have gone furthest on the road which is generally believed to lead inevitably to atheism, have, in all earnestness and in the true scientific spirit, declared that their studies have given them the abiding conviction that there is, beyond this range of physical events, an intellectual guiding force. Our author believes that all force is "will force," the will of a Supreme Intelligence; and Julius Robert Mayer, who has carried the idea of the correlation of forces to that point where the short-sighted believed he had left nothing but machinery in the universe, has declared that beyond all these phenomena must lie the Infinite Mind, and that his work, so far from sapping, has only strengthened the foundations of religion.

MR. READE'S LAST NOVEL.*

Mr. Reade has done once more what he has never yet failed to do. He has written a thrilling and passionate novel, from the perusal of which one could pause about as easily as he could linger in the act of going over a precipice. As the story appeared in monthly parts, the reader's progress through it may be described as dropping from one sharp and piercing point of interest to another, which, like so many projections of rock from the sides of the precipice, are each one more poignant than the last, and renders his course more and more terrific, until he is hurled at last into the abyss of bliss below.

We are sure that, if the reader will recall the chief incidents of this novel, he will not find our figure extravagant. Henry Little, the hero, is first blown up, or rather blown out of the window, by the trade against whose rules he is working; but not to leave Grace Carden, whom he hopelessly loves, he arranges to work by stealth in an old deserted church. Grace and her other lover, the bad one, Coventry, find their way thither more dead than alive, lost in a snow-storm, and Little saves them. Coventry gratefully sets the bravos of the Union on Little's secret, and they almost murder him. Finally, he goes to America to make a fortune preparatory to marrying Grace, and now Jael Dence, his faithful friend and ally, is blown up, and subsequently half-drowned in a pond, but she is got out and gets well. Next, it is Grace's turn: Henry's letters are intercepted by Coventry; she believes Henry false, promises to marry Coventry, and marries him just an hour before Jael brings her a true-love letter from Henry. On this she stabs her husband, but not so mortally as she would have liked to stab him. Of course, he lives, and Grace goes into a Protestant convent.

Here the reader is at his wit's end; but not so the author. He has a whole deluge in reserve, and just when Grace has come back so that she can have some small, wretched glimpses of Henry, and Henry is watching her in secret, and in secret Coventry is watching them both, the author breaks the Hillsborough dam, and whish! comes the flood, drowning everything before it. Coventry is up in a tree, and Henry is in-doors at an upper story window; Grace goes sailing down the deluge between them. Both make a clutch at her, and Little gets her; but "such was the force exerted by the torrent on one side, and the desperate lover on the other, that not her shoes only, but her stockings, though gartered, were torn off her in that fierce struggle."

Perhaps this may be thought a minor point; but let us wait a moment.

Of course, poor Little falls a-kissing the senseless form with frantic love; and poor Coventry, remembering that he is her husband, calls out to him to stop that, please; but Henry does not desist in the least, and roars back: "'Your wife, you scoundrel! You stole her from me once; now come and take her from me again. Why didn't you save her? She was as near to you. You let her die: she lives by me, and for me, and I for her.' With this he kissed her again, and held her to his bosom. 'D'ye see that? liar! coward! villain!'"

(At which, we are afraid, we feel like pausing to laugh, in spite of our eagerness to get on. Perhaps this idea of defying with kisses and beard-ing with embraces is a stroke of art that passes the modesty of nature; though, to be sure, nature herself is not particularly modest in everything.)

Meantime, nobody can tell what might happen if it were not for a larger tree than Coventry's that comes drifting by, and cuts it off, and sends the false husband whirling away upon the current. You breathe freer; Henry shoots a hole through the roof, and draws Grace out upon it, and saves lots of other people; the water goes down, and he sets forth to take her home to Woodbine Villa, she walking and being carried till they find an opportune horse jammed in among the débris, but still alive. Henry puts her on this and walks beside her; and now you learn why "her stockings, though gartered, were torn off her" by the flood. "At this," Grace's promise to marry him next morning early, "Henry kissed her little white feet with rapture, and kept kissing them at intervals all the rest of the way," which he plainly could not have done but for the force of the flood; and it must be owned that he has an advantage vouchsafed to very few lovers; though, certainly, after Grace has been walking through all that mud and water! . . . But no matter. Henry exacts a promise from Grace that she will get to bed at once; and then he goes out and saves more lives, and returns next morning to see how Grace is; when who is the first person that meets his eye in the parlor at Woodbine Villa? Why, Mr. Coventry, by all that is wretched! Mr. Coventry, dead below the waist, but very lively above, and capable of living years, and keeping Grace and Henry asunder.

At this point the reader breaks out in a cold perspiration; he cannot imagine what shall be done, now; but Mr. Reade arrests him a coiner—whom he has had floating about all the night of the flood in a box for the purpose—brings the rogue to trial, proves him the no-clergyman who married Grace to Coventry, and has the marriage pronounced null. You think you are at the end. Not so; Coventry petitions Parliament to have the ceremony declared valid, and the rapidly intervening marriage of Grace and Henry illegal; when up pops an honorable friend of the true lovers, and explains the circumstances to Parliament, and the Coventry petition is dropped; and Grace and Henry are now off in Scotland enjoying a perpetual honeymoon, while Mr. Coventry spends his remaining days in the spiritual exercise of cursing.

"And Fiction," says Mr. Reade, as if he thought something of the kind ought to be said, "whatever you may have been told to the contrary, is the highest, widest, noblest, and greatest of all the arts;" which may be true, though, honestly, things in this book have made us doubt it; and, to tell the truth further, fiction does not appear to have been used as an art toward the end, where characters and catastrophes have been heaped down pell-mell together. At the same time, we are bound to believe, from thorough conviction by Mr. Reade's former books, that, when he ceases to be an artist, it is of his own motion. We only wonder that he cares so little for the public that honors him so much, for it seems to us that he finally sacrifices to theatrical effects what was first and best in the conception of his story, and the early development of that conception. He makes you in love with Grace Carden, to begin with; she is not a very high type of womanhood, but she is supposable, and, men being men, lovable. Women, however, are very subject in the imagination to a kind of passive dishonor; and long before you reach the climax of Grace Carden's fate, she has been so hungered for, and torn at by her two lovers, and so beaten about by their adverse passions, that you, who would once have been glad to have such love as hers, are very willing to give her up to Mr. Little; for something pure and sweet, through no conscious fault of her own, has been crushed out of her in all that furious handling. She has ceased even to be bewitching—the smallest of the feminine virtues—long before the end, and Mr. Reade need not have had her attempt murder in order to render her a revolting person. Jael Dence is better, but great physical strength and rare fidelity pall upon the fancy after a while. As for Messrs. Little and Coventry, they are both odious, severally and distinctly detestable. We hedge again, by allusion to the constantly recurring strokes of wit, and the human nature which Mr. Reade shows by flashes in his people; and then let us doubt if this will atone for their general lapse and collapse. The most egregious catastrophes are painted with force and probability, but you wish they had not needed so much painting.

* "Put Yourself in his Place. By Charles Reade." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. New York: Sheldon & Co., and Harper & Bros.

Let us say once more that "Put Yourself in his Place" is intensely interesting, and then let us say, it is a pity that it is not less interesting and better. We do not forget "George Eliot" when we say, as we do say, that the author of "Put Yourself in his Place" is now the greatest living writer of English fiction; and that makes it all the more melancholy that he will do what he has here done. But it is consoling to think that a literary excess or blunder is not retroactive, and that though "Put Yourself in his Place" exists, none of Mr. Reade's former novels has therefore ceased to be.

The Universe; or, The Infinitely Great and the Infinitely Little. By F. A. Pouchet, M.D. Translated from the French. (New York: Scribner. 1870.)—Delicious paper and printing, a gorgeous cover, and numberless interesting and well-executed cuts and colored plates give to "The Universe" a most attractive exterior, which is none too splendid to be in keeping with the style of composition and the things which M. Pouchet describes—a charming selection of natural curiosities. The book tells about objects of zoölogy, botany, geology, and astronomy; but the names of these sciences hardly occur in it, for it makes no pretension at all to afford any scientific knowledge of these matters, although its anecdotes have been drawn from the sciences. It is, as its author says, only "a series of sketches and pictures," and he mentions, as an altogether supererogatory virtue, that the drawings in one part of the book have "quite a special character." The work is a repertory of wonders, and does not address itself to the dry understanding, but to the æsthetic sense and the love of adaptation and fitness in things. That the author is a man of science and has studied to be accurate are facts not without interest to the reader, because a suspicion that the things which appeal to his admiration were fables would be a great drawback to the pleasure he receives from them. But further than that, the scientific character of its author is of no consequence. However high that may be, this is not a book to learn from. When so much consideration is paid to grandeur of diction, exaggerations will creep into descriptions, and little details will even be supplied by the imagination, without any basis of fact. That this has happened to M. Pouchet, a reader who is familiar with any of the unfamiliar things upon which he is most eloquent will be pretty sure to find. To select an example from an object as widely known as possible, take his account of that monotonous cellar, the Mammoth Cave (p. 687, et seqq). Anybody not enthusiastic who has ever been there will smile to read of "views of the most grand and varied kinds," "the magical splendor of stalactite halls," "regular churches formed of precious stones, gleaming with different colored lights, the splendor of which dazzles the traveller," "the Dome of the Giant, the immensity of which strikes one with stupor," "the exploration requires five or six days," "the sulphurous atmosphere," etc., etc. The last point is too incorrect for any guide-book.

The author informs us in his preface that his sole object in writing his book has been to inspire and extend a taste for the natural sciences. If this is true, he appears to us not to have chosen his means wisely. In order to give a boy or girl a love of observation, it is necessary to show him that the things he has about him and can observe are worthy of attention. This is done, for example, by such a book as Nuttall's Ornithology, because the birds of his own country are there described, and it is shown that they have interesting peculiarities of appearance, habits, cries, etc. It helps a boy much less to convince him that there are interesting things in the world if those things are out of his reach. But to collect together all that is outlandish and sensational in nature, and to feed the mind exclusively on such things, can only tend to destroy a natural appetite for nature. After reading for the first time all the marvels in "The Universe," the ordinary world must seem insipid and less worth observing than it did before. The glowing diction of M. Pouchet is less calculated to excite the powers of observation than the imagination, and that in an unhealthy way. Moreover, such a book gives a very false conception of the manner in which the objects of nature are related to one another. It magnifies that unity of nature which results from the adaptation of different things to one another, because the beauty of such unity is readily perceived without any particular mental training. But the structural unity in nature, to perceive which requires the development in the mind of special conception, must be passed over in a work which is never to demand any effort of thought on the part of the reader. "The Universe" ought to be regarded as a book of entertainment, and as serving no higher purpose than that of beguiling tedious hours. So regarded, it fulfils its end and has a real value. It will delight a child.

Natural History of the Human Races, etc. By John P. Jeffries.—(Wooster, Ohio: Printed for the author. New York: Edw. O. Jenkins.)—This book should have had a different title: it does not really attempt to give the natural history of the human races. For such an enquiry the author has not the first requisite: he has never conceived the enormous difficulty of the questions involved in his title. The book is, in fact, a compendium of information concerning the history and characteristics of most of the divisions of the human race. As such it is not altogether without merit, for it really gives a good deal of matter and is notably free from efforts at fine writing; but the compiler brought no critical ability whatever to his work, so that it depends altogether upon the author from whom he derived his facts whether the reader gets trustworthy or worthless statements. The childlike confidence the writer puts in all authorities is sometimes quite amusing. Not only does he unhesitatingly accept the whole Mosaic account of the extreme longevity of the descendants of Adam before the Noachian deluge, but even the newspaper reports of great cave discoveries of "statues and obelisks of solid brass," "a copper sarcophagus, nine feet long, sculptured with several hundred figures," in Illinois, are willingly adopted as gospel truth. That the Cardiff giant does not figure here is proof that the work was done before that great treasure was unearthed. It is refreshing to find here a man who still believes that the old mill at Newport was built by the Northmen, and that the story of Captain Smith and Pocahontas is veritable history.

The blunders into which the author has been led by want of knowledge of his subject appear on every page. Taking a random selection from the book, we find on the 97th page the statement that "the Semitic family embraces the Hebrews, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, Iberians, Spaniards, and other kindred tribes." Other statements of his classification of men are simply incomprehensible. He says "the Hamites include the Canaanites and other kindred nations. They were so closely allied with the Semitics as to be literally one and the same family; not negroes or black persons, as has generally been contended." Afterwards, he by implication refers the negroes to this group!

The two closing chapters of the book treat of the "social nature of man" and "man morally considered." Having disposed of the natural history of man in the first three hundred and fifty pages, the author, with equal audacity, proceeds to discuss the subjects falling under these titles in the last thirty pages of his book. The main point of the first of these chapters is to prove that the negro cannot make a useful element of our society. This the author maintains with numerous arguments, few of which, however, are new; but he closes with the assertion, utterly at variance with the facts, "There is not a solitary case upon record where the engrafting of one people upon another, politically or socially, has proved beneficial to the united peoples or nations." In the last chapter we have the assertion that "Socrates was the revelator (sic) of natural religion and moral rectitude; and Jesus Christ the promulgator of revealed religion and the way of salvation." It would be well if those who assume to make this comparison would look a little into the facts of the "moral rectitude" of the great Athenian. We fancy they would be a little surprised by some of the results of an investigation into this point.

Bad as the book is, it is defaced by the illustrations. The violently colored woodcuts, in which our Indian chiefs figure in all the colors of the rainbow and in every description of garment, or the hairy absurdity labelled "Our Saviour," make one almost despair of the artistic perception of the public they are made for.

Hans Breitmann in Church. With other New Ballads. By Charles G. Leland. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers. 1870.)—From the beginning there appeared to be danger that Mr. Leland, with his fluency and his readiness to be satisfied with something less than a high success, would give us too much of "Hans Breitmann," and that he has not done this in "Hans Breitmann in Church" nobody, we imagine, would say. There are other things, and possibly better things, in the Breitmann ballads, but the thing nearest perfection in its kind, and most entertaining and freshest, was the figure of Breitmann himself—the lager-bier-drinking "Dutchman," as we Americans civilly call our Germans—who is not quite as full of sentimentalism as he is of lager-bier, and who is never so maudlin, either with bier or with sentiment, that he has not an eye to small change. Of this amusing gentleman, Mr. Leland made for us a likeness, which was, no doubt, a little staring, and perhaps was a little out of drawing, but which was, nevertheless, to be called good. The philosophizing, for instance, concerning various abstract entities would have seemed more natural in the mouth of another sort of German than the Philadelphia ward politician and saloon-keeper whom we first saw when he "gife a barty," and whom afterwards we saw as one of "Sherman's bummers" and as a caucussing candidate for a Congressional nomination.

Here, in "Hans Breitmann in Church," the artist has done something more of what he has been doing ever since his picture first called out applause, and in this last volume still another layer of obscuring paint is interposed between the spectator and the original figure. Certainly nothing that here is added adds anything to the fulness and vividness of the portrait, and, Mr. Leland's taste in the matter of incidents being what it is, there is usually little pleasure to be got from seeing in action the personage whom he had the fortune to create, or rather discover and show to us.

Hasty and ill-considered as these pieces are, however, the author is too clever a man not to have put into them some good things. For instance, "a Boston shap" having said that, after all, the author of the Breitmann ballads was not humorous—

> "Dough he maket de beoples laughen, > Boot dat vas only all"— a "Deutscher" who was present remarks that to his mind that sounds like a "baradox"—

> "'Twas like de saying dat Heine
> Hafe no witz in him good or bad,
> Boot he only kept sayin' witty dings
> To make beoples peliefe he had."

And there is something funny in this sketch of Breitmann and his fellow-bummer, Von Stossenheim, "who had théories of Gott":

> "Outspake der bold Von Stossenheim,
> Who had théories of Gott:
> 'O Breitmann, dis is shoodgement on
> De vays dat you hafe trod;
> You only lifes to joy yourself,
> Yet you yourself must say
> Dat self-development requires
> De réligiös Idée.'
>
> "Dey set dem down und argued it,
> Like Deutschers vree from fear,
> Dill dey schmoke ten pfounds of Knaster
> Und drinked drei fuss of beer.
> Der Breitmann go py Schopenhauer,
> Boot Veit he had him denn,
> For he took him on de angles
> Of de moral oxygen."

Now, this seems to us all out of keeping. At any rate, it is one of the things that we had in mind in saying that the author has not been careful to preserve the tone of his picture. This Breitmann we have just been looking at is surely not the earlier Breitmann, but a Deutscher-Amerikaner of a different type, if, indeed, he is distinctively a Deutscher-Amerikaner at all, and is not merely a German of the sort that Frenchmen and Englishmen, as well as Americans, have long known very well and laughed at a little. But, as we have said, it seems to us that much better than the repetition of familiar satirical strokes at familiar German weaknesses, was the amusing picture, abounding in suggestions, and successful, too, as positive portraiture, of the Philadelphia German beer-drinker, with his mixed speech and modified German notions, who appeared in Mr. Leland's first work. And to say this is to condemn most of the later work as being worse than it might have been "if the painter had taken more pains," though it is far from condemning it absolutely.

It is perhaps not worth while to say much about an occasional lapse into coarseness which Mr. Leland permits himself. It is not of a particularly bad kind; but it is coarseness. This, by the way, is a method of raising a laugh which has come to be more surprising to see a writer take than it is unpleasing to see done. That it is unpleasing Mr. Leland seems not to know; this is not the first book of his in which he thus offends against good manners. It is noteworthy that nearly all others of our later American writers of any name have been perfectly free from grossness or coarseness, and this whether or not they have been sermonizers or humorists—whether they have had more or less latitude allowed them.

A Brave Lady. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc. With illustrations. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1870.)—To our thinking, this is the best novel that Mrs. Craik has written in some years. It is not as pleasant reading as some of the earlier ones, it is true, for the story is in itself painful, and the author makes little or no attempt to relieve its sombreness. But then it is almost entirely free from the sort of sentimentality which has most interfered with the enjoyment of many of Mrs. Craik's readers, and the fact that her chief character is a woman, and that her male sinners are of a weak, vacillating kind, keeps out of sight, in a great measure, one of her principal failings as a novelist: her inability to draw a manly man—an attempt she was always making and always failing to accomplish. Her hero was always a very conscientious woman in trousers. This time she has resumed her proper dress, and really possesses force and life-likeness. At the same time, it is fair to say that even Josephine Scanlan, whose general fidelity to woman nature most readers may recognize, gives still another proof that Mrs. Craik, even in her best efforts, never quite succeeds in disengaging an individual from a type; that she rather embodies her ideas of certain faults and virtues than sets a real person before her readers; and that as her men never succeed in being more than partially disguised women, so Josephine just fails of being quite womanly because it was necessary to Mrs. Craik's conception of her that she should err on the side of justice instead of generosity—in other words, that the failings of her heroine should be masculine, as, in other cases, the virtues of her heroes have been feminine. One could love Mrs. Scanlan more, even if one did not approve her so highly, if her perception of her husband's weaknesses had been less keen, and her judgment concerning the duty she owed him a trifle less impartial. According to Swedenborg, the difference between men and women is that, being both resolvable into love and wisdom, the man is first wisdom and then love; the woman first love, then wisdom. It is only against Mrs. Craik in her capacity of artist that we are disposed to cavil that when she draws an ideal she reverses the natural order, and makes her men too tender and her women too just. Her present novel, however, is unusually well written, its principal moral is sound, and the story, though more painful than it seems to us a work of art has any legitimate right to be, is well told and interesting, and will repay perusal.

Warp and Woof. A Book of Verse. By Samuel Willoughby Duffield. (New York: A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 1870.)—Mr. Duffield has, doubtless, already made for himself numerous friends amongst the readers of the verses which appear from month to month in the magazines, where he appears as a writer of pieces which show more than the usual correctness and skilfulness of magazine poetry. That they show that their author was born a poet it might not do to affirm; but that he was either born poetical, or has been made so, the reader of them will probably think it safe to say. Evidently, they are the work of a man of some poetical feeling; but as one reads them, the doubt is forced upon the attention whether Mr. Duffield would ever have made verses of any sort, good or bad, if other men had not made verses before him; and there seems to be little doubt that very much of what in his verses is at all good, is due to the effect upon his mind of several contemporary poets. "Longfellow" one says very often; "Tennyson" often; "Lowell" now and again; "Browning" oftener; and still other poets seem to have as good a right as Mr. Duffield to the form of his poems, and also to the matter of them. Of every such writer of verses it may be said that he does well for the sake of his own amusement and improvement to practise his accomplishment; but Mr. Duffield's book will, no doubt, give pleasure to some others besides himself and his immediate circle of personal friends.

Man's Wrongs; or, Woman's Foibles. By Kate Manton. (Boston: Crosby & Damrell. 1870.)—The plot of this tale is certainly not one of maddening interest. A family of loyal Georgians are obliged to leave their "luxurious Southern home and begin life anew in the cold, unsympathizing North." While beginning it, their daughter is constrained to abandon the expensive joys of party-going; but even with this dark shadow resting upon her young life, she is so lucky as to meet the Earl of Somerset, who is at the time travelling in America. With him she discourses upon the painful subject of woman's inhumanity to man, as evinced in setting him an example of extravagant dress, forcing him to give her his seat, and the like brutalities, and to this nobleman she is finally married without the usual tortures of opposition and delay.

As a discussion of social questions, the book is little better than baby-talk; but the numerous sketches it contains of celebrated characters (which are studied by the heroine as a basis for elegant conversation) enable the reviewer to regard it as a biographical dictionary. In this light, it is defective as lacking alphabetic arrangement; and indeed, in a grave historical work, such expressions as "had he have told me" should have been rigorously eschewed, nor should William the Silent have been numbered among the princes of England.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Authors.—Titles.	Publishers.—Prices.
Appleton's Hand-book of American Travel: Northern and Eastern Tour	(D. Appleton & Co.)
Catlin (G.), The Lifted and Subsided Rocks of America	(Trübner & Co.)
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, No. 34, swd	(T. Ellwood Zell)	$0 50
Disraeli (B.), Vivian Grey, swd	(D. Appleton & Co.)	0 60
De Mille (Prof. J.), Lady of the Ice, swd	" "	0 75
Drake (Hon. C. D.), Reminiscential Letters from Daniel Drake, M.D	(Robt. Clarke & Co.)	3 00
Gwendoline's Harvest, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 25
Lord (Rev. N.), Letter to the Alumni of Dartmouth College, swd	(Hurd & Houghton)
Porter (Prof. N.), American Colleges and the American Public	(C. C. Chatfield)
Robertson (Rev. F. W.), Sermons Preached at Brighton	(Harper & Bros.)
Robinson (F. W.), Stern Necessity, swd	(Harper & Bros.)	0 50

NEW BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY

GINN BROTHERS & COMPANY,

13 BEACON STREET, BOSTON.

Allen's Latin Grammar. $1 25.
Recommended by Harvard College as indicating the amount required for admission.

Allen's Latin Lessons. $1 25.

Allen's Latin Reader. 12mo, 518 pages. $2 50.
With References to Harkness, A. & S. Bullin, and Madvig's Grammars. Consisting of Selections from Phædrus, Cæsar, Curtius, Nepos, Sallust, Ovid, Virgil, Plautus, Terence, Cicero, Pliny, and Tacitus, with Notes and a General Vocabulary of Latin of more than 16,000 words.

Allen's Latin Lexicon. 12mo, 205 pages, $1 25.
Containing about 16,000 words of common use, 13,000 proper names or adjectives, and about 200 dates.

Allen's Latin Selections. $1 50.
The same as the Latin Reader, without the Vocabulary.

Allen's Latin Primer. A First Book of Latin for Boys and Girls. By J. H. Allen. 155 pages, $1 25.

Madvig's Latin Grammar. Carefully revised by Thomas A. Thacher, Yale College. $3.
The most complete and valuable treatise on the language yet published, and admirably adapted to the wants of Teachers and College Classes.

Craik's English of Shakespeare. $1 75.

Our World; or, First Lessons in Geography. Revised Edition, with New Maps, by Mary L. Hall. 90 cts.

The Atlantic Primary Arithmetic. By G. L. Demarest. 50 cts.

The Latin Verb. Illustrated by the Sanskrit. By C. H. Parkhurst. 50 cts.

IN PRESS.

Goodwin's Elementary Greek Grammar. (To be issued in September.) By Prof. W. W. Goodwin, of Harvard College,

Allen's Latin Composition. (Issued in July.)

The Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

(DAILY AND WEEKLY.)

THE COURANT is the oldest Newspaper of prominence in the United States, and, with less than half-a-dozen exceptions, the oldest printed in the English language. It was founded in October, 1764, and has been published uninterruptedly, under the same title, ever since. It has a very wide circulation throughout the Connecticut Valley, and is one of the best mediums for Advertisers in New England.

The DAILY COURANT is issued every morning (Sundays excepted), at $8 per year, and has a circulation second to but one provincial Eastern daily. The WEEKLY COURANT has a circulation of nearly 10,000 copies, extending to all parts of the country. A Supplement of eight pages is given gratuitously every other week, filled with choice literary reading. Terms—$2 50 per year; or to clubs, $2. Address,

HAWLEY, GOODRICH & CO., Publishers,
HARTFORD, CONN.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

Theodore Parker's Writings.

NEW EDITION.

A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion. $1 50.

Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and Popular Theology. $1 50.

Ten Sermons of Religion. $1 50.

Critical and Miscellaneous Writings. $1 50.

Speeches, Addresses, and Occasional Sermons. 3 vols. $4 50.

Additional Speeches, Addresses, and Occasional Sermons. 2 vols. $3.

The Two Christmas Celebrations, A.D. I. and MDCCCLV. A Christmas Story. 60 cents.

The Trial of Theodore Parker. With the Defence. $1 50.

PAMPHLETS.

A Sermon of Immortal Life. 15 cents.

The Material Condition of the People of Massachusetts. 20 cents.

 Others in preparation.

Sold by Booksellers, or mailed, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
14 Bromfield Street, Boston.

HARTFORD, CONN.,

Daily and Weekly Times

Have widespread circulations throughout the Connecticut Valley, and find ready admission to thousands of families as regularly as the return of the seasons. The Times was established in 1817, and there is not a State in the Union, or hardly a civilized country on the earth, to which copies are not sent.

TERMS: $2 50 a year, or to Clubs, $2, for Weekly; $8 for Daily.

 One of the best mediums for advertisers in New England. Address "Daily Times, Hartford, Conn."

Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

PUBLISHED DAILY, SUNDAYS EXCEPTED.

No. 607 Chestnut St., Phila.

The EVENING BULLETIN offers special advantages by its Large Circulation in Business and Family Circles, for all departments of Business Advertising. As the oldest and best Philadelphia evening paper it is the most desirable advertising medium, and is printed on fine paper, large quarto, forty-eight columns, containing the fullest Telegraphic News, Commercial and Financial Reports, Foreign and Domestic Correspondence, Literary and Art intelligence, and all the requisites of a first-class Business and Family Newspaper.

Published by PEACOCK, FETHERSTON & CO.,
607 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

George Routledge & Sons'

LIST OF

NEW BOOKS.

ROBERT BUCHANAN'S NEW POEM.

The Book of Orm:

"THE BOOK OF THE VISIONS SEEN BY ORM THE CELT."

Crown 8vo, cloth.....$2.

"Mr. Buchanan's genius has struck root into a new form of life and feeling—subtle, delicate, and marvellously fair."—Nonconformist.

The Complete Works of W. E. Channing, D.D.

With an Introduction. A New Edition, rearranged. Crown 8vo, cloth, price $1 75.

"If we wanted to elevate men by means of books, we should certainly prescribe as the first book to be read the complete works of William Ellery Channing."—The Contemporary Review.

Heroes of Hebrew History.

By Samuel Wilberforce, D.D., Bishop of Winchester. Post 8vo, cloth, price $2 50.

"His rich treasury of language, his devotional frame of mind, his far-seeing vision, and his large-hearted charity, are all pressed into a labor of love, and conspire to make this volume of no ordinary attraction."—John Bull.

Biblical Studies.

By E. H. PLUMPTRE, M.A.

Post 8vo, cloth.....$2.

"They display so remarkable an ingenuity, a learning so wide and varied, an acumen so keen, and they are such real and valuable aids to an intelligent apprehension of almost innumerable passages of Scripture, that it would have been nothing short of a calamity had they not been rescued from the oblivion to which magazine literature, unless republished, is doomed."—Nonconformist.

The Resurrection.

Twelve Expository Essays on the Fifteenth Chapter of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians. By the Rev. Samuel Cox. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

"An acute, vigorous, eloquent, and popular presentation of the great argument of the apostle."—English Independent.

 Any of the above works will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
PUBLISHERS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

REMOVAL.

We have REMOVED our Offices and Salesrooms from

47 AND 49 GREENE STREET TO

138 and 140 GRAND ST.,

A few doors east of Broadway,

New York.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR & CO.,

PUBLISHERS OF THE American Educational Series,

And Manufacturers of the CELEBRATED SPENCERIAN PENS.

INDEX TO VOLUME X.

JANUARY TO JUNE, 1870.

The Week.

AT HOME.

Alcorn and Ames, Gens., U. S. Senators from Mississippi, 50—Administration and Republican party, 114—(House) Army Bill and its supporters, 199—American Medical Association excludes colored physicians, 296—Australian mail service with Pacific coast, 312—Associated Press's trivial Cable despatches, 344—Amos T. Akerman nominated to succeed Atty.-Gen. Hoar, 395, 411.

Boutwell, Secretary, financial statement for Dec., 1869, lecture in Boston, 1—B. H. Brewster a premature successor to Mr. Hoar. 18—Butler-Wendell intrigue, 19, Gen. Butler not admired as Administration champion, 66, nominated for next President, 130, tries to tax U. S. bonds, 359, divers desperate encounters in the House, 411—Capt. Bryant in the Ga. Legislature, 50, 82—Consul Blake's report on Indians of British America, 65—J. P. Bradley appointed to U. S. Supreme bench, 81, 200, qualifies himself for legal-tender rehearing, 248—Senator Buckingham criticises Sherman's Currency Bill, 97—Gen. Butterfield's connection with gold conspiracy, 129—Hon. Anson Burlingame deceased, 130—Boston Advertiser on a foreign market for National Debt, 184—Collector Bailey disappears, 184—Mr. Bingham on the Civil Service Bill, 295—Gov. Bullock arraigned at home, 313—Banks's report on Cuba, 360.

Claflin, Gov., message to Mass. Legislature, 18—Senators Carpenter and Howe assail Neutrality Law of 1818, 97—Cincinnati Superior Court decision on Bible in schools, 98, stimulus to Catholic majorities, 114, vote in favor of Bible, 231—Cincinnati Gazette exposes Mr. Sumner's scheme for resumption, 183—Sylvanus Cobb, jun., champion of woman suffrage, 148—Commercial Advertiser, the Nation, and Gen. Butler, 166—Connecticut goes Democratic, 215, gives married women absolute control of their property, 360—Chinese in La., 233, in Mass., and the Crispins, 397, 412, 413—Canada press and the Fenian scare, 248—Civil Service in House, 295—Charleston Republican, the Nation, and the S. C. Legislature, 328, 396—Chicora steamer stopped at Sault Ste. Marie Canal, 328—Cuban message of President, 375.

Congress (XLIst, 2d session):—Reassembles, 17—Debates on admitting Va. (Senate), 17, 33, admission (both Houses), 49—Adverse report on House Census Bill (Senate), 49, bill defeated, 97—Postal-telegraph bills (both Houses), 49—Sherman's financial scheme (Senate), 49, 65—Butler airs his Republicanism, Dawes assailed by Pennsylvanians (House), 49, 65—League Island Bill tabled, 65—Bill abolishing franking privilege passed (House), 65, defeated (Senate), 395—Bill to amend Civil Rights Bill; Currency Bill passed (Senate), 81—Funding Bill introduced (Senate), 81, 129, passed, 165—Mississippi admitted (House), 81, (Senate), 113—Anti-polygamy Bill reported (House), 81, passed 199—Tariff not wholly for revenue, (House), 81, Tariff Bill discussed, 165, 199, 215, 231, 247, 279, shelved, 311, revived and passed, 359—Sherman's Cuban belligerency resolutions (Senate), Logan's (House), 97, Banks's superseded by Bingham's, 395—Butler-Cox encounter (House), 97—Loughbridge's resolution for currency expansion (House), 97, carried, 113—Bill to abolish Freedmen's Bureau; Fitz-John Porter case, Suppression of undelivered speeches in Globe (Senate), 113—Committee on Contested Elections reconstituted (House), 113—Sale of cadetships (House), 113, resignation of Whittemore, Golladay, and Deweese, 129, Golladay not taken back, 147, Whittemore re-elected but excluded, 395—H. R. Revels admitted Senator from Miss.; Anti-inflation resolution passed (Senate), 129—Appropriation Bill passed (House), 129—Georgia Bill passed with Bingham amendment (House), 147, 411, in a different form (Senate), 247—Army Reduction Bill passed (House), 165, Wilson's (Senate), 199, compromise, 375—Deficiency Bill discussed (House), 165, passed (Senate), 231—Texas admitted (House), 165, (Senate), 199, finally, 215—Judge Bradley confirmed (Senate); Butler of Tenn. censured (House), 183—Sumner, Schurz, and Morton on San Domingo treaty (Senate), 199—President's Message on Decline of American Commerce (House), 199—Gen. Ames admitted (Senate); Butler-Conner skirmish (House), 215—Income-tax clause interpreted (Senate); Diplomatic Deficiency Bill passed; Fernando Wood accuses Gen. Howard (House), 231—Sumner's bill to abolish franking privilege, Drake's XVIth Amendment (Senate); Pig-iron duty lowered (House), 247—Bill reapportioning Representatives (House), 247, 411, (Senate), 375—Bill to aid N. Pacific R.R. passed (Senate), 263, (House), 343—J. H. Sypher rejected (House), 263—Edmunds's bill for removal of causes to U. S. courts (Senate); Oregon R.R. aided with land, Judd's substitute for Tariff Bill, steel conflict (House), 279—Jenckes's Civil Service Bill renewed (House) 279, recommitted, 295—Senator Morrill on protection (Senate), 295—Bureau of Education sustained (Senate), 295, 311—Capitol appropriations, Sumner's anti-prejudice bill (Senate), 311—Lynch's bill to prevent decline of Am. commerce (House), 311, defeated, 343—Bill to enforce XVth Amendment, Bingham's (House), 311, (Senate), 327, passed finally, 343—Naval Appropriation Bill passed; Minister to Rome (House), 327—Equal pay for male and female clerks (Senate); S. C. contested election (House), 343—Indian Appropriation Bill, Sandwich Islands Treaty defeated, Bill rearranging judicial circuits passed (Senate); Tax Bill and amended Tariff Bill, and P. O. Appropriation Bill, passed (House), 359—River and Harbor Appropriation Bill passed, Cuba (House), 375—Fortification and Army Appropriation Bills passed (House), 395—Income tax abolished, Mr. Akerman confirmed, Sumner's Cuban resolutions (Senate), 411.

Decoration Day, 343—Day vs. Buffington, 411.

Erie's English stockholders before N. Y. Legislature, 185.

Fifteenth Amendment progressing, 33, ratified by Ga. and required number of States, 83, proclamation delayed, 147, issued, 215, celebrated, 231, 279, Senate bill to enforce it, 327—Florida politics, 83—Funding Bill as passed by Senate, 165, as regards the National Banks, 231, before House Committee, 279, 359—Judge Fullerton acquitted, 184—Fenian scare in Canada, 248, 264, internal dissensions, 280, invasion of Canada, 344—Financial legislation in Congress not progressing, 327.

Gov. Geary's message to Pa. legislature, 18, veto of Metropolitan Police Bill, 98—Georgia: Legislature organized under a military board, 33, debate in Congress, 50, ratifies XIVth and XVth Amendments, 83, factions at Washington, 97, complications, 113, Bill as Butler wished it, 147, discussed in Senate, 165, 183, corruptionists at the Capitol, 328—Gold down to 113; conspiracy exposed in Congressional report, 129, prospect of specie payment, 167—Golladay's resignation and repentance, 147—Mr. Greeley on the wine-making at Cana, 147, his "Munchausenism" in his "Political Economy," 217, 248, mission to Albany against new N. Y. charter, 232, 248—Gen. Garfield on the Deficiency Bill, 183—President Grant lobbying for San Domingo treaty, 183—Collector Grinnell's rumored removal, 343.

Hoar, Atty.-Gen., nomination before Senate for Supreme Court, 18, rejected, 81, resigns, 395—Hoosac tunnel lobbying in Mass., 18—N. Y. Herald a puzzle to the English press, 34—Hampton industrial school for freedmen, 51—Hartford and Erie swindle exposed by Gov. Claflin, 147, accounts rendered, 185, unopposed by Boston press, 216, direction to be changed, 281, favorable committee report, 296, checked in Mass. House, 344, recovers itself, 376, vetoed, 412—Capt. Hall after new whaling grounds, 148.

Indiana divorce laws, 34, divorces in U. S. Supreme Court, 115—Indian war impending, 280, Commission meeting in N. Y., 329, chiefs at Washington, 375, at Cooper Union, 396—Independent and ignorance of S. C. legislators, 313—Illinois Constitution's minority representation clause likely to be adopted, 344—Income-tax opposition in Philadelphia, 397.

Kelley, Hon. W. D., not interested in coal and iron, 97, renominated on a civil service platform, 396—Ketchum's second sensation in Wall st., 412.

Legal Tender Act not constitutionally retroactive, 81, 82, decision producing litigation, 130, rehearing, 248, cases withdrawn, 263—Louisiana corruption, 82, immigrants, 233—Gen. Logan's reply to Gen. Sherman, 216—Mrs. Lincoln's pension, 296—Mr. Lynch and his "British gold" insinuations, 359—Letter-carrier assaults a policeman, 376.

Mississippi's colored U. S. Senator, 50, debate in Senate, 97 McNeely, of Illinois, proposes to pay five-twenties in greenbacks, 65—Maine Senate refuses to indemnify State creditors on gold basis, 130—Massachusetts: tries liquor license again, 147, women suffrage at Hyde Park, 148, voting statistics, 249, House votes to abolish reading and writing suffrage qualification, 264, credit of the State abroad, 376—Methodist Book Concern scandal, 184—Mormon meeting against Cullom Bill, 216—John Stuart Mill on the need of cultivated classes in America, 232—Hon. J. D. Morrell on rate of wages in America, 247—McFarland's counsel's ruffianism, 280, McFarland acquitted, 312—Mr. Maynard on the Civil Service Bill, 295—Michigan Supreme Court R. R. decision, 360.

Necrology of 1869, 1—N. Y. City Republican Committees come to blows, 17; N. Y. Democracy unfit to lead the party, 51; N. Y. City's new charter, 232; N. Y. Court of Appeals nominated, 279, elected, 327—New Hampshire election carried by Republicans, 147—North Carolina finances, 200.

Ohio "reformers" and the XVth Amendment, 2—Oil swindlers convicted in Pa., 18—Oneida run down by the Bombay, 167, decision of Court of Enquiry at Yokohama, 265, of U. S. naval court there, 281—Judge Orth's report on Cuba, 360.

Pennsylvania Commissioners of Sinking Fund's manifesto against legal-tender decision, 130, politics and pay of judges, 329, Republican nominations, 396; Phila. Trust Bill sustained, 114, bar petitions for increase of judges, 131, colored voters, 279, Penn. Hospital clinics opened to women, 280—Phosphate Bill in S. C. Legislature, 148—Piegan massacre, 166, Col. Baker's report, 200—Pig-iron interest defeated in House, 247—Virginia Penny on some neglected women, 249—Niles G. Parker's record, 328—Consul Phillips's career in Cuba, 344—President's messages on Cuba and San Domingo, 375.

Robertville, S. C., invites foreign immigration, 2—Hon. H. R. Revels, U. S. Senator from Miss., 50, eligibility disputed, 65, excluded from Phila. Academy of Music, 215—Richmond mayoralty imbroglio, 185, 215, decided, disaster at Capitol, 279—Red River rebellion, first bloodshed, 217, compromise, 313—Revenue reform meeting in Washington, 263—Republican party in N. Y. City and State, 327—Rhode Island constitution and XIVth and XVth Amendments, 344—"Roumanian massacre" in Congress, 360.

Stowe, Mrs. H. B., volume on Byron, 2, against marriage and divorce discussion, 360—San Domingo negotiations, 18, treaty not likely to be confirmed, 199, President's message, 375, scandals, 376, 411—Senator Sumner's financial scheme, 33, personal review by Senator Trumbull, 49, 97, in favor of Gen. Sickles's confirmation, 81, interviewed as to Cuba by World reporter, 97—Sherman's bill to expand currency, 34, 65—Southern emigrants to the West, 50, 233—S. C. whites regaining ascendancy, 50, Legislature appoints a colored man to Supreme Court, 83, census, 148, anti-radical newspaper convention, corrupt Legislature, 200, politics, 295, immigration, 296, Legislature and the alphabet, 312, 328, reform party nominations, 396—Sun on editorial perspective, 66—Judge Wm. Strong appointed to U. S. Supreme Court, 81—Supreme Court decision on Legal Tender Act, 81, 82, reopens the case, 215, squabble about previous understanding, 231—Staats-Zeitung (Ill.) on U. S. credit. 98—Sickles correspondence published, 115—Soldiers' Home wanted in N. Y., 131—Gen. Sherman to Gen. Wilson on army reduction, 199, letter to Indian Commission meeting in N. Y., 329—Prof. Goldwin Smith on English emigration to Va., 201—Pierre Soulé deceased, 201—St. Thomas treaty lapsed, 247—Chas. S. Spencer's abuse of Mrs. Calhoun, 264—Mr. Schenck's bill to reduce taxes, 311—Spy (Worcester) on the massacre in Roumania, 377, on the Nation and Senator Sumner, 166.

Tammany organizes N. Y. Legislature, 1—Tennessee's experience in reconstruction, 17, constitutional convention pronounced revolutionary by Brownlow, 33, enacts manhood suffrage, 66—Texas carried by Davis, 18—Senator Trumbull reviews Senator Sumner, 49, argues against conditions for Va., 50, course in the Ga. business, 328—Tribune vs. Mr. Wells on the wool clip, 61, on capital punishment, 66, 83—Tariff as reported, 81, slow progress, 199, sample debate in House, 247, dead, 263, amended and passed, 359—Chicago Tribune on Cincinnati Bible decision, 114, on the Mormons, 147—Gen. Geo. H. Thomas deceased, 201.

Virginia before Congress, 17, 33, admitted conditionally, 49—Mr. Vanderbilt and the duty on steel rails, 232—Vermont constitutional convention rejects woman suffrage, 376.

Wells, Hon. D. A., attacked by Mr. Kelley, retorts, 34, by the Tribune on wool clip, 66, reply to report of Committee on Manufactures, 327, retirement near, 359—Wise, Underwood felicitations, 99—West Point cadetships sold by Congressmen, 113, sought by colored lads, 359, 413—Mr. Whittemore a trader, 113, resignation and censure, 129, 130, re-elected to House, 376, excluded, 395—"Warrington's" remedy for insufficient salaries of judges, 131—Woman suffrage in Minn., Mo., Kans., Utah, Wyoming, and Vt., 131, in Mass., 148, Wyoming female grand jury, 148, factions, 231, new supporters in England, 232, amendment defeated in Mass., 263, submitted to people by Illinois constitutional convention, 264, conventions in N. Y., divorce question, 311, defeated in Parliament, Vt., and Illinois constitutional convention, 312—Woman's Journal retracts, 131—World vs. Nation on scientific protection, 184, chapter of newspaper amenities, 296—Hon. C. L. Woodbury on the educational test in Mass. suffrage, 249, 264—Senator Wilson's Army Bill, 280, attitude towards the Chinese, 413—Thurlow Weed's "faithful soldier" at Ball's Bluff, 360.

ABROAD.

Great Britain:—Gladstone's Irish Land Bill and Educational Bill, 115, 149, Land Bill opposed by Disraeli, 265; Irish Force Bill passed House of Commons, 201, in operation, 265; Woman's Suffrage Bill defeated, 312; opium debate, 345; Married Women's Property Bill passed House, 360; women discuss Contagious Diseases Act, 376—Prince of Wales in the Mordaunt scandal, 149—Growth of disorder and outrage in Ireland, treatment of O'Donovan Rossa, 217, Fenian operations revived in England and Ireland, 265—Capt. Eyre (of the Bombay) finding sympathizers in England, 265—Gladstone's difficulties, 297—Lord Clarendon's abasement to Greek brigands, 312, decease, 413—Cambria defeated by the Sappho, 313—Tailors' riots in Cork, 413.

Canada:—Rejoicing over Fenian repulse; Gen. Lindsay's speech, 361.

India:—Effects of high prices of cotton on the people, social changes; Mr. Maine's return to England, 19.

Australia:—Opposition to closer dependence upon England, 33; mail connections with California, 312.

France:—Ollivier forms a ministry, resignation of Pietri, Government corruption in elections, 3—Marshal Lebœuf antagonizes the Chamber, Baron Haussmann dismissed, 19—Prince Pierre Bonaparte kills Victor Noir, 19, good conduct of ministry, composition of the High Court, 51, antecedents of the murder, 67, Rochefort arrested, barricades, riot suppressed, 83, 215, Jules Favre denounces ministerial behavior and calls for new elections, 115, particulars of the riots, 131, the Prince committed for trial, 149, acquitted, 201, scenes at the trial, 217, Victor Hugo to Rochefort, 149—Ollivier defeated on motion to withdraw official candidates; French troops to leave Rome, 131—Senate to lose initiative in changing Constitution, 217, resistance to Senatus-consultum, objections to plébiscite, 233—Ministerial changes, 233—French relations with Prussia growing delicate, 249—Plébiscite under discussion, 265, 281, under vote, 281, carried, 297, advice to vote pro and con., 281, army votes "non," 345—Unrest among working-classes, socialistic idea of general strike, conspiracy to kill Emperor, 281, Flourens and G. W. Smalley implicated, 297, Ollivier's report of conspiracy, 313, doubts of its reality, 329—Laboulaye unpopular; severity of press prosecutions, 345—Prévost-Paradol ambassador to U. S., 413.

Germany:—Bonn labor convention, 377.

Austria:—Burlingame treaty with China, 35—Internal condition perilous, abolition of the Gränzer, 67—Austrian securities excluded from Stock Exchange, 377.

Spain:—Duke of Genoa not to be had, Cabinet resigns, 3—Prim party losing ground, 35—Prince Henri de Bourbon killed by Duc de Montpensier; Spain in cordial relation with U. S., 167—Espartero inclined to accept the crown, 329—Gradual Emancipation for Cuba; Queen abdicates, 413.

Cuba:—Rumored Cuban surrender; Junta's account of Cuban civil government, 2—Sailing of yacht Anna, 3—Rumored defeat of Gen. Puello, 97—Rebellion fading out, 232—Reports on Cuba of House Committee on Foreign affairs, 360—President's message on Cuba, 375.

Hayti:—Salnave captured and shot, 67.

Portugal:—Coup d'état of the Duke of Saldanha, 329.

Italy:—Œcumenical Council divided on Papal infallibility, "Janus" placed on the Index, 3, defection of Cardinal Schwartzenberg from the Opposition, 35, 51, a "Constitution" from the Pope, 35, Cardinal Mathieu returns to Paris, 51, infallibility not obtainable by acclamation, 67, petitions of bishops for it; when does the Pope speak ex-cathedra?—Dr. Döllinger on history and origin of doctrine, 99, Count Daru's protest against it, 167, Archbishop Manning denounces the newspaper correspondents, 99, the Pope likewise, 185, Antonelli to von Beust, 185, rapid progress of the dogma, 233, 245—Financial troubles of the Kingdom, 361—Students petition for time to attend to politics, 377—Death of Senator Gaetano de Castillia, 397.

Greece:—Murder of members of foreign legations by brigands, 265, 297, complicity of the "Opposition," 312, respectability of common people; brigands propose an amendment to the Constitution, 329—Favorable reaction; Lord Clarendon's defence; piety of the brigands, 377.

Turkey:—Sultan's skill in European management, reduction of the Khedive, internal reforms, new loan, and no tax on coupons, 19—New loan of the Khedive; mixed courts; American officers in Egyptian service, 281—Rumored massacres in Roumania, 360, 361.

Russia:—Engineering scheme for water-communication with Central Asia, 51—Interchange of honors between Alexander and King William of Prussia, 67—Socialist conspiracy discovered, 115.

China:—Pall Mall Gazette on American merchants, U. S. Consul Kiernan squelched by the Shanghae Newsletter, 3.

South America:—Lopez killed, end of Plate River war, 249.

Literary Notes.

Announcements, 27, 42, 57, 91, 106, 121, 159, 175, 191, 208, 224, 240, 255, 271, 287, 303, 319, 336, 352, 369, 384, 405, 420—Atkinson, Prof. W. P., on symmetrical mental development, 107—"A Publisher's" rejoinder, 175—Advertising as an art, 92—Amateur Poetical Magazine, 385—American Bibliopolist's Notes and Queries, 11—American Enterprise, 225—American Law Review on copy before publication, 320, story of Judge Bibb, 321—American Naturalist, 42—Atkine Press, 225.

Barnard, Hon. H., and Nat. Department of Education, 107—Beekman, J. W., address before St. Nicholas Society, 336—Beecher, Rev. H. W., edits Christian Union, 42, appealed to by a truss-maker, 241—Bryant, W. C., on G. C. Verplanck, 336—Burlingame credentials, 92—Byington's Choctaw Grammar, 405—Bagster's Biblical Catalogue, 106—Byron editions, 11—Bewick on hunting, 175, his woodcuts, 241—Beaumarchais lectures by Bigelow and Parton, 258—Barbarossa legend, 242—Boston Public Library to have branches, 42, 17th annual report, 75, Bulletin, No. 13, 370—Boston free Evening High School, 194, anti-Radical discourses, 303—Butler Co., O., History of, 271—Bombay Geographical Society's index of India, 225—Bible reading in schools in Hebrew or Greek, 337; Bible in schools controversy, 192; Bibles distributed by societies, 106—Blind, educational works for the, 108—Bibliographical periodicals in Europe, 421—Bangkok calendar for 1870, 422.

Cæsar as viewed by Shakespeare, 175—Claretie's "Derniers Montagnards," 257—Cernuschi's economic works, 407—Crispi-Franchi suit, 60—Connecticut's twin capitals, 369, divorce statistics, 352—Cincinnati Spring Grove Cemetery, 406—Cambridge (England) examinations of girls, 304—China a terra incognita, 354—Celtic views of Mr. John Fiske, 406—Creole grammar in Trinidad, Hayti, and Louisiana, 75—Catholics and common-schools, 11, 43—Carpet-bagger an old French word, 320—Civil-service text-books, 337—Comparative onomatology, 272.

Index of Volume X.

Dickens on popular government, 91—Durand on the sale of offices, 272—Dante in twenty codices, 12—Dr. Döllinger on the rules of procedure of Œcumenical Council, 242—Delicacy of reading world, 420—Diplomatic Review becomes a quarterly, 370.

Eaton, Gen. John, U. S. Commissioner of Education, 107—Evans, Prof. E. P., vs. Prof. G. Fischer, 123—Emigrant Handbook of Am. Social Science Association, 208—English and Continental publishing activity in 1869, 75—English works: history and biography, 122, philology, 122, theology, 122, poetry, 123, miscellaneous, 123, 288, 337.

Frothingham, Rev. N. L., deceased, 256—French's Historical Collections of Louisiana, 304—Ffoulkes, E. S., and Roman Index, 12—France, spread of popular education, 225; French archives closed to French scholars, 272; French books of travel, 225; French plays and English pirates, 289; Frou-Frou injunction, 338; Falsifications of book-publishing, 255, 256—Franking privilege and the press, 106, 107.

Gail Hamilton and Fields, Osgood & Co., 209—Greenough, J. B., on Latin subjunctive, 141—Gilfillan, Rev. Geo. F., in trouble, 176—Garnier's nomenclature of the Côte-d'Or, 225—Giuseppe Giusti's poem "Saint Ambrose," 336—German philological works, 59—German Spiritualists in America, 257; German in New Haven schools, 74, in Penn. public schools, 28, in St. Louis public schools, 321—Graphic's artist in America, 241.

Harper, J. W., deceased, 141—Hartt's expedition to Brazil, 384—Habel, Dr., explorations in Central America, 353—Humboldt, Bruhn's life of, 60—Hertzen, Alex., deceased, 142—Haydn's proverb compositions, 176—Hare system in Harvard College, 352—Hannibal bibliography, 305—History for Catholics and Confederates, 11—Historical MS. Commission in England, 288—Harvard College marking-scale readjusted, 257—Hindu theism, 288—"Halowe my Fancie," 336—Harvard Advocate on Gray collection of engravings, 44—Historical Magazine on Boston, 108.

Indians of Cape Flattery and Southern California, 37—Italy, compulsory education, postal progress, in, 142—"Interviewer" in England, 176; "Interview," origin as verb, 209—Insanity on the increase in Great Britain, 322—Independent and Ripon College statistics, 336.

Junius revealed, 12—Joseph de Maistre on Œcumenical Councils, 12—Japan illustrated, 289.

Kashgar customs, 354.

Littell, Eliakim, deceased, 352—Lowell and Page the subject of gossip, 209—Lenox free library for New York, 42—Lemon, Mark, deceased, 407—Lorenz's "General Catalogue of French Publications," 176—Leonardo da Vinci as a botanist, 336—La Farina's Correspondence, 370—London archives MSS., 59—Literary World, 335.

McClintock, Rev. Dr., deceased, 159—Marsh's "Man and Nature" in Italian, 322—Morley's English literature tables, 28, King Arthur, 59—Montalembert deceased, 177, services to art, 272—Mass. Health Board, first annual report, 91—Milan Public Library conferences, 75—Middle Ages, Repertory of Historical Sources of, 272—Moabite stone, 225—Majority composed of two minorities, 321—Magazine improvements, 255—Medical Gazette awards a prize to a woman, 384.

Newman, John Henry, on infallibility, 353, 354—N. Y. Geneological and Biographical Society, 10, 271—Newport free library, 337—National Publishing Co. (Cincinnati) and press notices, 73—Notes and Queries declined, 322—Nature begins second volume, 370—News (London) on international copyright, 421.

Œcumenical Council as a representative body, 177—Overland Monthly for April, 256, for March, 193.

Peabody Fund Report, 304—Prentice, Geo. D., deceased, 74—Persano's Diary, 273—Philadelphia Apprentices' Library, 337; Academy of Natural Sciences admits women, 385; Plan of compulsory education, 193—Pennsylvania-Dutch verse, 122—Publishers' estimates, 209—"Popularizing science" in Chicago, 160—Punchinello, 240—Phonographic Record, 192—Practitioner on a symptom of epilepsy, 420.

Quincy's translation from Schulze-Delitzsch, 272.

Revels, Hon. H. R., disappoints poetical justice, 160—Rosecrans, Gen., vs. Swinton, on rebel force at Stone River, 108—Rice collection sold, 192—Rossini, Biaggi's life of, 258—Renan restored to his chair, 289—Rhode Island Educational Union, 58—Rugbeian penmanship, 58—Romish view of modern science, 11.

Sumner, Senator, sustained by a Belgian jurist, 141—Stowe, Mrs., not obliged to answer Blackwood, 58—Schele de Vere, Prof., exposed, 336—Spencer, Wm. V., deceased, 352—Simms, William Gilmore, deceased, 406—Stevens' library catalogue, 208—Speaker's Bible (Murray), 288—Shaftesbury, Lord, against revision of Bible, 288—Sand, Mme., and the Empress Eugénie, 242—Sainte-Beuve at Compiègne, 28, library sold, 242—St. Louis Public School Library, 321, German-English instruction, 321—Scotch illegitimacy, 305—Social Science in Philadelphia and Boston, 141—Swarthmore College, first annual report, 241—School-book publishers' board of trade, 241—Subscription book-publishing statistics, 319, 369—Shall and will, 336—Sunday opening of Mass. libraries, 192—Sangreal, derivation, 69—Société des Gens de Lettres, 92—Standard, newspaper and magazine, 303—Spectator's insight at fault, 421.

Trumbull, J. H., on Indian geographical names, 193—Tailandier's "Tcheques et Magyars," 257—Taxes on bookmaking, 160—Theatrical assumption in N. Y., 108—Times (N. Y.) on Goldwin Smith and Lothair, 385—Transatlantic, The, 42.

Universalist statistics, 89.

Verplanck, Mr. G. C., deceased, 208—Virginia School Superintendent's report, 271—Venice and pile-dwellings, 142—Voltaire's statue in Paris, 421—Van Nostrand's Eclectic Engineering Magazine, 175.

Whitney, Prof. W. D., receives Bopp prize, 369—Wright, Mr. Thos., discovers Latin-Anglo-Saxon vocabulary, 109—Willis, Hon. Wm., deceased, 160—Wallace, Alfred R., on Government aid to science, 109—Wackernagel, W., deceased, 74—Wouter Van Twiller and the Committee of Ways and Means, 192—William Tell a myth, 305—Western historical societies, 175—Welsh Church and disestablishment, 337—"We meet 'neath the sounding rafter," 336—World's dramatic critic, 43—Women medical students, 288—Woman's Journal, 73.

Xenophon's route to the sea, 194.

Y. M. C. Associations, 28.

Art Notes.

Boston art museum, 29.

Chronique on the future of art in America, 210.

Fine Arts applied to industry, third Paris exhibition, 29.

Leech's Pictures of Life and Character, 371—Littlefield's portrait of Lincoln, 371.

Michael Angelo, two pictures by, 371.

Oriental art collection, 29.

Raphael-Madonna for sale by Count Bermudez de Castro, 177.

Venetian glass, modern, 29—Vivet's "Bibliographie des Beaux Arts," 210.

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

Abuses grow into Institutions, How, - 20
Austria, New Crisis in, - - - - - 298
Baby Suffrage, - - - - - - 236
Boutwell and Wells, - - - - - 398
Census Imbroglio, - - - - - 116
Church as a Reformatory Agent, - 379
Civil Service System, One More Argument for a Better, - - - - - 348
Commissioners, - - - - - - 203
Currency Bill and Three Per Cent. Certificates, - - - - - - 86
Damnation Distributed, - - - - - 71
Dawes, Grant, and Butler, - - - 84
Dickens, Charles, - - - - - 380
Drama in Colleges, - - - - - 6
Economy, - - - - - - - 187
Editorial Perspective, - - - - - 54
Eight-Hour Movement, - - - - - 399
End at Last, - - - - - - - 314
Erie Ring and American Credit, - - 282
Europe, Going to, - - - - - - 269
Fechter's Realism, - - - - - 364
Fenianism as a Swindle, - - - - 347
Fifteenth Amendment—Revocation of Ratifications, - - - - - - 84
France, Crisis in, - - - - - - 37
The Reforms in, - - - - - 251
French Plébiscite, - - - - - 284
Funders and Funding, - - - - - 150
Funding Bill, - - - - - - 267
Hamlet, The Myth of, - - - - - 170
Hamlet, The New, - - - - - - 118
Illinois, Constitutional Convention of, 330
Jury Morality, - - - - - - - 314
Labor Movement in Europe, - - - 298
Legal-Tender Case, Reopening of, - 218
Legal-Tender Decision, - - - - - 100
"Libertine Press," - - - - - - 285
McFarland Case, - - - - - - 300
More Light on an Abstruse Subject, - 21
Naval Controversy, - - - - - - 169
Naval Reorganization, - - - - - 299
New Party, A, - - - - - - - 151
N. Y. Charter, and What May Come of it, - - - - - - - - 268
Offices, - - - - - - - - - 186
Personal Representation, Modes of, - 69
"Pilgrim's Progress" in South Carolina, - - - - - - - - 378
Political Nuisance, - - - - - - 52
Polygamy, - - - - - - - - 202
Popular Governments and High Tariffs, 234
Portuguese Politics, - - - - - 363
Protestant Controversialists, Some Considerations for, - - - - - 219
Public Credit, - - - - - - - 52
Ratification Trouble, - - - - - 133
Realism in Dramatic Art, - - - - 364
Recorder, Plain Dealing with the, - 252
Republican "Apathy," - - - - - 346
"Republican Form of Government," - 266
Revenue Reformers and the Republican Party, - - - - - - - 283
Roman Moth and Roman Candle, - - 168
San Domingo Bargain, - - - - - 68
Senate and Chief-Justice, - - - - 188
Sexes in Colleges, - - - - - - 134
Ship-building, The Truth about American, - - - - - - - - 362
Slider, Hon. P. L., - - - - - - 400
Society and Marriage, - - - - - 332
Society, The Police of, - - - - - 153
South Carolina, "Pilgrim's Progress" in, - - - - - - - - 378
South, Cure for the, - - - - - - 86
Sowing the Wind and Reaping the Whirlwind, - - - - - - - 330
Speculation, End of the Era of, - - 414
Steel, Secret of the Rise on, - - - 152
Stowe, Mrs., "Vindication of Lord Byron," - - - - - - - - 24
Sumner's Cuban Resolutions, - - - 414
Tale of Ancient Wrong, - - - - - 381
Tariff, A Debate on the - - - - 250
Tariff Controversy, - - - - - - 132
Town Follies, - - - - - - - 100
Twenty-five Cents a Pound on Ideas, - 117
Vassar College, - - - - - - - 315
Wells, Mr., Himself, - - - - - 4
His Report, - - - - - - 4
What "The Ship of State" Needs, - 235
Woman's Rights Agitation, Notes on the, - - - - - - - 38, 88, 101
Yale, "The New Education" at, - - 70

Occasional Correspondence

Alabama Question, - - - - - - 73
Amendment, Ratification of the, - - 140
Army Officers, Proposed Dismissals of, 120
China Question, An American Resident on the, - - - - - - 9
Chinese and Foreign Residents, - - 172
Chinese and Foreigners in Old Times, 190
Cincinnati Lesson, - - - - - 270
Civilian Generals in the War, - - 352
Congress, Faith of, - - - - - 419
Cruel Hoax - - - - - - - 224
Confession of the Impostor, - - 239
"Dead Sea Apes," - - - - - - 140
Difficult Question, The, - - - - 383
Female Suffrage, Opposition of Women to, - - - - - - - 222
Fitz John Porter's Case, - - - - 173
French and English Illustrated Magazines, - - - - - - 351, 368
German-Americans, Religious Views of, - - - - - - 91, 106, 140
Goldwin Smith and English Emigration, - - - - - - - 224
Ideas by the Pound, - - - - - 138
James, Mr. Henry, on Marriage, - - 366
Reply of, - - - - - - - 404
Legal Tender, Necessity of, - - - 418
Legal-Tender Question, - - - - 254
"Looker-On," An Explanation from the, - - - - - - - - 155
Luther Monument, - - - - - 368
Massachusetts Credit, - - - - - 57
Meline, Col., A Note from, - - - 405
Milton's Greek Imitations and Idioms, 73
Minority Representation—Objections to the Buckalew Plan, - - - 223
Modern Russia, - - - - - - 287
"Moral Progress," - - - - - - 240
More Author's Grievances, - - - 171
National Supernumeraries, - - - 239
Our Public Credit, - - - - - 90
Parker, Mr. N. G., - - - - 352, 368
Personal Representation, N. Y. Plan of, - - - - - - - 26, 157
Personal Representation, Equitable, 27
Philadelphia, Music in, - - - - 141
Philadelphia Park, - - - - - 238
Political Patronage, - - - - - 207
Popularizing Science, - - - - - 207
Polygamy, How to Deal with, - - 318
Protection for Literature, - - - 158
Protection to All Industries, - - 224
Protection to American Thought, - 121
Protection to American Shipping, - 206
Public Credit, - - - - - - 136
Publishers and Copyright, - - - 319
Pumpelly, Mr., and the Foreigners in China, - - - - 139 and his Defence, - 190
Prussia and the Baltic Provinces, - 174
Schele de Vere's, Prof., "Great Empress," - - - - - - - 303
Sexes in Colleges, - - - - - - 335
"Shell-heap," Inside of a, - - - 191
Social Science? What is, - - - - 89
South Carolina, State Treasurer of, - 368
Spaulding, Mr., Murderous Assault on, - - - - - - - - 334
Steel Rails, - - - - - - - 221
St. Thomas Bargain, - - - - - 140
Tariff on Books, - - - - - - 157
Temple, Dr., A Word for, - - - - 255
Vexed Question, - - - - 189, 205, 237

Special Correspondence.

Washington—The Senate and the Executive, - - - - - 5
The Burden on the Supreme Court, - - - 22
The North American Review and Hon. E. G. Spaulding, - - 302
England—40, 71, 104, 220, 253, 317, 348, 416.
Pauperism, — University Tests, - - - - - - 8
The Queen's Speech—The Bishops in Convention, - 135
Prospects of the Irish Land Bill—The Finances—The Boat Race, - - - - 286
The Irish Land Bill—Crimes, - - - - 382
France—333, 365, 401.
French Women, - - - 25
The New Revolution, - - 55
The Ollivier Ministry, - - 105
Ollivier vs. Gambetta, - - 154
France and Rome, - - - 204
Italy—Italian Politics, - - - 39, 56
The Crisis at Rome, - - 350
The Italian Problem, - 402, 418

Literature.

Austen-Leigh's Memoirs of Jane Austen, - - - - - - - - 124
Bernard's British Neutrality, - - 339
Bowen's American Political Economy, - - - - - - - - 338
Brown's Choate, - - - - - - 226
Comparative Geography, - - - - 245
Creation, Inside View of, - - - 308
Dürer, Albert, English Lives of, - 92
Ecce Femina, - - - - - - - 61
Egypt, a Prince's Tour in, - - - 259
Fairfax, Life of, - - - - - - 305
Fitz John Porter's Case, - - - - 142
Freeman's Norman Conquest, - - - 45
Froude's Last Volumes, - - - - 323
Genesis and Geology, - - - - - 14
Gibson, the Sculptor, Life of, - - 273
Gray Collection of Engravings, - - 130
Hagenbach's Modern Church History, - - - - - - - - 126
Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, - - 76
Hedged In, - - - - - - - - 244
Hepworth Dixon on Russia, - - - 387
Hohensteins, The, - - - - - - 292
Horticulture, English and American Writers on, - - - - - - 195
How Crops Feed, - - - - - - 274
Hyacinthe's Lectures, - - - - - 260
Indian Problem, - - - - - - 389
Jarves's Art Thoughts, - - - - - 194
Lea's Studies in Church History, - 76
Leigh Hunt's "Day by the Fire," - 388
Lothair, - - - - - - - - 372
Lowell's Cathedral, - - - - - 60
Essays, - - - - - - - 258
Magazines for February, - - - - 77
March, - - - - 143, 159
April, - - - - - 225
May, - - - - - - 289
June, - - - - - - 357
Massachusetts, Industrial Future of, 177
Michael Faraday, - - - - - - 242
Microscopic Monarchy, - - - - 12
Miss Mitford's Letters - - - - - 210
Modern Russia, - - - - - - - 161
North American Review for January, April, - 93, 308
Paris Gardens, - - - - - - 44
Reade's Last Volume, - - - - - 423
Recent Republications, - - - - 127, 145, 179
Second Empire, Rise of the, - - - 110
Sheridan in the Shenandoah, - - - 162
Tennyson's Last Volume, - - - - 109
Text-Books, Recent, - - - - - 275
Thomas's Biographical Dictionary, - 324
Translations from De Musset, - - - 407
Wallace on Natural Selection, - - - 422
Whitney's German Grammar, - - - 196

Books Reviewed.

[The Italics indicate the Lesser Notices, for which also consult the Literary Notes.]

Alfred the Great, - - - - - - 325
American Political Economy, - - - 338
Among my Books, - - - - - - - 258
Apostles of Mediæval Europe, - - - 390
Art Thoughts, - - - - - - - 194
Athens Co. (O.), History of, - - - 78
Austen, Jane, Memoir of, - - - - 124
Bible dans l'Inde, La, - - - - - 245
Biography and Mythology, Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of, - - 324
Cathedral, The, - - - - - - - 60
Choate, Rufus, Life of, - - - - - 226
Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, History of, - - 126
Church History, Studies in, - - - 76
Creation, Sketches of, - - - - - 308
Crops Feed, How, - - - - - - 274
Day by Day, - - - - - - - 197
Day by the Fire, - - - - - - 388
De Musset, Alfred, Selections from, - 407
Diary in the East, - - - - - - 259
Domestic Science, Principles of, - - 213
Dream Numbers, - - - - - - - 95
Dürer, Albert, Life and Works of, - 92
Eastern Church, Lectures on the History of, - - - - - - - 276
Ecce Femina, - - - - - - - 61
England, Froude's History of, - - 323
European Vineyards, Three Seasons in, - - - - - - - - 112
Fairfax, Life of the Great Lord, - 305
Family and the Church, - - - - 260
Faraday, Life and Letters of, - - 242
Free Russia, - - - - - - - 387
Gabled House, - - - - - - - 79
George II., Historical Sketches of Reign of, - - - - - - - 31
German Grammar (Whitney), - - - 196
Gibson, John, Life of, - - - - - 273
Gray Collection of Engravings, - - 50
Great Empress, - - - - - - - 292
Hans Breitmann in Church, - - - 425
Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, - - - 76
Hedged In, - - - - - - - - 244
Hints for Six Months in Europe, - - 95
Hohensteins, The, - - - - - - 292
Hollands, The, - - - - - - - 309
Holy Grail, - - - - - - - - 109
In Both Worlds, - - - - - - - 94
Jerome Hopkins' Second Collection of Church Music, - - - - - - - 262
Journal of a Visit to Egypt, etc., - 259
Kapp's Vergleichende allgemeine Erdkunde, - - - - - - - 245
Lothair, - - - - - - - - 372
Man in Genesis and in Geology, - - 14
Man's Wrongs, - - - - - - - 426
Maver's Collection of Scottish Melodies, 262
Mitford, Miss, Life of, - - - - - 210
Monaco, History of, - - - - - - 12
Mrs. Gerald's Niece, - - - - - - 373
Mrs. Jerningham's Journal, - - - 180
Natural History of the Human Races, 424
Natural Selection, Contributions to the Theory of, - - - - - - 422
Negligence, Law of, - - - - - - 80
Neutrality of Great Britain during the American Civil War, Historical Account of, - - - - - - - 339
Norman Conquest, History of, - - - 45
Origin and Development of Religious Belief, - - - - - - - - 261
Our New Way Round the World, - - 325
Parks, Promenades, and Gardens of Paris, - - - - - - - - 44
Poems (G. A. Townsend), - - - - 46
Politische Geschichte der Gegenwart, - 277
Pope's Virginia Campaign of 1862, - 142
Professor's Wife, - - - - - - 262
Put Yourself in his Place, - - - - 423
Qualitative Chemical Analysis (Eliot and Storer), - - - - - - - 79
Queen of the Adriatic, - - - - - 111
Railroad Commissioners' Report (Mass.), - - - - - - - - 177

Index of Volume X.

Roses, - - - - - - - - - 195
Russia, Modern, - - - - - 161
Search for Winter Sunbeams, - - 212
Second Empire, Histoire du, - - 110
Sharswood's Lectures Introductory to the Study of Law, - - - - 261
Sheridan's Troopers on the Borders, - 389
Staatsrecht, Völkerrecht und Politik, 277
Synchronology of Events in Sacred and Profane History, - - - 391
Tachygraphy, - - - - - 79
Tales of Old Travel Re-narrated, - - 62
Three Berenices, - - - - - 112
Through Night to Light, - - - - 197
Trooper's Diary, Leaves from a - - 277
Twisted Threads, - - - - - 150
Under Lock and Key, - - - - 62
Universe, The, - - - - - - 424
Vermont at Gettysburg, - - - - 408
Vermont Brigade in the Shenandoah, 162
Warp and Woof, - - - - - 425
Widow Goldsmith's Daughter, - - 325
Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean, - - - - 95

Books of the Week.

15, 31, 47, 63, 80, 95, 112, 128, 146, 163, 181, 197, 213, 228, 246, 262, 278, 293, 309, 326, 340, 356, 373, 391, 408, 426.

Fine Arts.

Museum of the Fine Arts for New York, - - - 32
for Boston, - - 63
Thompson Collection of Paintings, - 80
Carbon Photographs, - - - - 163
Forty-fifth Exhibition National Academy of Design. - - 278, 357.
Amateur Musical Societies in New York, German, 15, American, 47
In Philadelphia, - - - 96
Arions in Opera, - - - - - 63
Opera-Madrigals, - - - - 181
Beethoven Centennial Festival, - 408

Poetry.

In May, - - - - - - - - 285

ERRATA.

Page 1, column 2, line 19 from bottom. For "Marshal" Troplong read "Monsieur."

Page 35, column 2, line 28 from bottom. For "Berlin" read "Pekin."

Page 65, column 2, line 16 from bottom. For "Kentucky" read "Illinois."

Page 94, column 1, line 26 from bottom. For "dollars" read "editors."

Page 232, column 2, line 25 from bottom. For "Oxfordread "Cambridge."

Page 240, column 2, line 28 from bottom. For "Soap" read "Sleep."

Page 249, column 2, line 9 from bottom. For "France" read "Prussia."

Page 292, column 1, line 21 from bottom. For "fertility" read "futility."

Page 323, column 2, line 34. For "These two volumes, with the ten preceding" read "These volumes, with the two preceding."

REGISTER OF BOOKS RECEIVED DURING THE HALF YEAR.

Theology, Metaphysics, and Ethics.

Ante-Nicene Christian Library: Writings of Methodius, Alexander of Lycopolis, Peter of Alexandria, etc.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) $3 50
Writings of Cyrian, Vol. II. " " " 3 50
Arnold (Rev. F.), The Path on Earth to the Gate of Heaven.....(Virtue & Yorston)
Bastian (Dr. A.), Die Weltauffassung der Buddhisten, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Beecher (Rev. H. W.), Lecture-Room Talks.....(J. B. Ford & Co.) 1 75
Bierbower (A.), Principles of a System of Philosophy.....(Carlton & Lanahan)
Boston Lectures, 1870. Christianity and Scepticism.....(Cong. Pub. Soc.)
Channing (Rev. W. E.), Complete Works, 1 vol.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 1 75
Clarke (Rev. J. F.), Steps of Belief.....(Am. Unit. Assoc.) 1 00
Cocker (Prof. B. F.), Christianity and Greek Philosophy.....(Harper & Bros.) 2 75
Coit (Rev. T. W.), Lecture on Ecumenical Councils, swd.....(Hartford)
Cowles (Rev. H.), Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Culver (Rev. S. W.), Crowned and Discrowned.....(Gould & Lincoln) 0 75
Dale (Rev. T. P.), A Life's Motto: Biographies.....(Virtue & Yorston)
Evans (H. D.), Treatise on the Christian Doctrine of Marriage.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 50
Fisher (Prof. G. P.), Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, new ed.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
The Council of Constance and the Council of the Vatican, swd...(New Haven)
Formby (Rev. H.), Life of Christ.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 1 00
Franco (S.), Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.....(John Murphy & Co.)
Gratry (Rev. A.), Papal Infallibility Untenable, swd.....(Hartford)
Guest (W.), The Call of the Hour, swd.....(D. Lothrop & Co.) 0 20
Henderson (Rev. E.), Book of the Prophet Ezekiel.....(W. F. Draper)
Hepworth (Rev. G. H.), Rocks and Shoals.....(Am. Unit. Assoc.) 0 60
Holmes (Rev. P.), Writings of Tertullian, Vol. II.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 3 50
Huntington (Rev. W. R.), The Church Idea.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Hymns to Jesus, from the Early English..... " " "
Jacolliot (L.), The Bible in India.....(Carleton)
Johnson (J. E.), The Monks before Christ.....(A. Williams & Co.) 1 25
Lewin (Rev. R. D'C.), What is Judaism?.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Lifting the Veil.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Lord (Rev. N.), Letter to the Alumni of Dartmouth College, swd..(Hurd & Houghton)
McCosh (Prof. J.), The Laws of Discursive Thought.....(Robt. Carter & Bros.) 1 50
Melvill (Rev. H.), Sermons, 2 vols.....(James Miller)
Metcalf (R.), Letter and Spirit.....(Am. Unit. Assoc.) 0 60
Newman (Rev. J. H.), Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 2 50
Plumptre (Rev. E. H.), Biblical Studies.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Powell (A. M.), The Lesson of Quakerism, swd.....(New York)
Preston (Rev. T. S.), Christ and the Church.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 1 00
Reason why Christians should read God's Word in Greek, 2d ed., swd.....(John Wiley & Son) 0 25
Riggs (S. R.), Táh-Koo Wah-Kán: the Gospel among the Dakotas.....(Boston)
Robertson (Rev. F. W.), Sermons Preached at Brighton.....(Harper & Bros.)
Sanson (Abbé), The Paradise of the Earth.....(John Murphy & Co.) 1 25
Shedd (Prof. W. G. T.), Homiletics, and Pastoral Theology, 8th ed (C. Scribner & Co.) 2 50
History of Christian Doctrine, 2 vols., 3d ed., " " 5 00
Spencer (H.), Principles of Psychology, Part II., swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Stearns (Rev. E. J.), Afterpiece to the Comedy of Convocation, swd.....(Baltimore)
Stone (Prof. J. R.), The Invitation Heeded.....(Cath. Pub. Soc., 1 50
Textual Corrections of the Common English Version in the New Testament.....(John Wiley & Son)
Walker (A.), Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, and Revelations...(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 3 50
Whately (Archbishop), Peculiarities of the Christian Religion, and Historic Doubts concerning Napoleon.....(W. F. Draper) 2 00
Wilberforce (Rev. S.), Heroes of Hebrew History.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Williams (N. M.), Notes on the Gospel of St. Matthew.....(Gould & Lincoln) 1 75
Winans (R.), One Religion: Many Creeds.....(J. P. Des Forges)

Poetry.

Atkinson (Mary E.), Ivy Leaves.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Bishop (L.), Teuchsa Grondie.....(Albany)
Brooks (Rev. C. T.), Schiller's Homage of the Arts, and Other Translations.....(James Miller)
Broome (F. N.), The Stranger of Seriphos.....(Macmillan & Co.)
Buchanan (R.), The Book of Orm.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Caldcleugh (W. G.), Homer's Iliad translated into English Verse.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Dryden's Poetical Works, Globe ed.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Duffield (S. W.), Warp and Woof.....(A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)
Frothingham (Ellen), Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea.....(Roberts Bros.)
Haydn, and Other Poems.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 50
Leland (C. G.), Hans Breitmann in Church, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 75
McGee (T. D'A), Poems.....(D. & J. Sadlier & Co.)
Morris (W.), The Earthly Paradise, Part III.....(Roberts Bros.) 2 25
Mrs. Jerningham's Journal.....(Macmillan & Co.)
Myers (F. W. H.), Poems..... " " 1 25
Patterson (A. W.), Onward.....(A. Roman & Co.)
Rodney (R. B.), Alboin and Rosamond, and Lesser Poems.....(Philadelphia)
Rossetti (D. G.), Poems.....(Roberts Bros.)
Stayman (Prof. J. K.), Flowers and Fossils, and Other Poems.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Story (W. W.), A Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem, swd.....(Loring)
Tennyson (A.), Poetical Works, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Townsend (G. A.), Poems.....(Rhodes & Ralph)
Van Wart (L., jr.), The Golden Cross, and Other Poems.....(Carleton)

Political and Social Subjects.

Aguilar (Grace), Home Influence.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Allen (Dr. N.), Population: its Law of Increase, swd.....(Lowell)
A Woman Cannot Practise Law or Hold any Office in Illinois, swd.....(Chicago)
Bowen (Prof. F.), American Political Economy.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.)
Bungay (G. W.), Temperance Anecdotes.....(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
Clark (Rev. R. W.), The Bible and the School Fund, swd.....(Lee & Shepard) 0 40
Coit (J. B.). The First and Second Part of a Work on Government, swd.....(Hartford)
Deering (Dr. T. W.), Intemperance.....(Nat. Temp. Soc.) 0 75
Dwinelle (J. W.), American Opinions on the "Alabama," and other Political Questions, swd.....(John Wiley & Son)
Goddard (S. A.), Letters on the American Rebellion.....(Nichols & Noyes)
Hagans (Judge M. B.), Opinion in J. D. Minor vs. Board of Education, swd.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.)
Hamilton (J. A.), Martin Van Buren's Calumnies Repudiated, swd.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 0 75
Heinzen (K.), Was ist Humanität? swd.....(Indianapolis) 0 25
Hunt (L.), A Day by the Fire, and other Papers.....(Roberts Bros.) $1 50
Hurlbut (E. P.), Secular View of Religion in the State and the Bible in the Public Schools, swd.....(Joel Munsell)
Hyacinthe (Father), The Family and the Church.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 50
Kapp (F.), Immigration, and the Commissioners of Emigration of N. Y., swd.....(New York)
Kitchel (Rev. H. D.), Suppression of the Liquor Traffic, swd.....(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
Lea (H. C.), Superstition and Force, 2d ed., revised.....(Henry C. Lea)
Mulford (E.), The Nation: the Foundations of Civil Order and Political Life in the United States.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Potter (Rev. A.), The Drinking Usages of Society, swd.....(Nat. Temp. Soc.)
Pro Aris et Focis.....(Virtue & Yorston)
Quincy (S. M.), The People's Banks of Germany, swd.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Reply to John Stuart Mill on the Subjection of Women.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, Aug. 1869, Mar. 1870, swd.....(Boston)
Rogers (Prof. J. E. T.), Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, 2 vols....(Macmillan & Co.)
Manual of Political Economy..... " " 1 75
Seaman (E. C.), The American System of Government.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Spaulding (Rev. H. G.), Rational Temperance, swd.....(Loring) 0 10
Spencer (C. H.), Americanism and Other Isms, swd.....(New York)
Spooner (L.), No Treason: The Constitution of no Authority, swd.....(Boston)
Twenty-fifth Annual Report of N. Y. Prison Association, swd.....(New York)
The Bible in the Public Schools, swd.....(J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.) 0 25
Arguments and Decisions of the Court....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 2 50

History, Biography, Geography, Travels, etc.

Abbott (J. S. C.), History of Hortense.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 20
Aiken (Miss L.), Memoirs of the Court of Elizabeth.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 00
Andersen (H. C.), In Spain, and a Visit to Portugal.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Austen-Leigh (Rev. J. E.), Memoir of Jane Austen.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Barnes (W. H.), The Fortieth U. S. Congress, 2 vols.....(Geo. E. Perine)
Beekman (J. W.), The Founders of New York, swd.....(New York)
Benedict (Lieut. G. G.), Vermont at Gettysburg.....(Burlington)
Bourne (W. O.), History of the Public School Society of the City of New York.....(Wm. Wood & Co.)
Bray (W.), Memoirs of John Evelyn.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 50
Bright (J.) and Rogers (Prof. J. T.), Speeches on Questions of Public Policy, by Richard Cobden, M.P., 2 vols.....(Macmillan & Co.) 9 00
Brown (Mrs. H. E.), Abroad; or, Scenery in Europe.....(Am. Tract Society) 1 50
Brown (S. G.), Life of Rufus Choate, 2d ed.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Bulletin of the Essex Institute, Vol. I.....(Salem)
Carter (R.), A Summer Cruise on the Coast of New England.....(Nichols & Hall)
Chadwick (Rev. J. W.), Sermons and Life of Rev. N. A. Staples.....(W. V. Spencer)
Cox (S. S.), Search for Winter Sunbeams in the Riviera, Corsica, Algiers, and Spain.. (D. Appleton & Co.) 3 00
Cusack (M. F.), Life of St. Patrick, Parts 1-4, swd.....(Cath. Pub. Soc.) 1 20
Darlington (W. M.), Remarkable Occurrences in the Life and Travels of Col. James Smith.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 2 50
Draper (Dr. J. W.), History of the American Civil War, Vol. III. and last.....(Harper & Bros.) 3 50
Drake (Hon. C. D.), Reminiscential Letters from Daniel Drake, M.D.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 3 00
Edwards (H. S.), Life of Rossini.....(Oliver Ditson & Co.) 1 75
Edward Wortley Montagu: an Autobiography.....(Turner & Co.) 1 75
Essex Institute Historical Collections, Vol. X., Part I., swd.....(Salem)
French (B. F.), Historical Collections of Louisiana and Florida, New Series.....(J. Sabin & Sons)
Forwood (Dr. W. S.), The Mammoth Cave of Kentucky.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 75
Froude (J. A.), History of England.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Gage (Rev. W. L.), Studies in Bible Lands.....(Am. Tract Society) 2 00
Galton (F.), Hereditary Genius.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Gen. Fitz John Porter's Reply to Hon Z. Chandler's Speech, swd..(Morristown, N. J.)
Gray (W. H.), History of Oregon, 1792-1849.....(Am. News Co.)
Greene (S. D.), The Broken Seal: Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder.....(Boston)
Grey (Hon. Mrs. Wm.), Journal of a Visit to Egypt, etc.....(Harper & Bros.)
Grote (G.), History of Greece, new ed.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Harrison (Rev. H.), Memoir of Hugh Davey Evans, LL.D.....(Hartford) 0 75
Hawes (S.), Synchronology of the Principal Events in Sacred and Profane History.... (J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.)
Heaton (Mrs. C.), History of the Life of Albert Dürer.....(Macmillan & Co.) 12 00
Hesekiel (J. G. L.), Life of Bismarck.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Kapp (F.), Life of Maj.-Gen. John Kalb.....(New York)
Keary (A.), The Nations Around.....(Macmillan & Co.)
Leaves from a Trooper's Diary.....(Philadelphia)
E'Estrange (Rev. A. G. K.), Life of Mary Russell Mitford, 2 vols.....(Harper & Bros.)
Ludlow (F. H.), The Heart of the Continent.....(Hurd & Houghton) 3 75
Lyman (T.), Papers relating to the Garrison Mob, swd.....(Cambridge)
Mackay (C.), Medora Leigh, swd.....(Harper & Bros.)
Markham (C. R.), Life of the Great Lord Fairfax.....(Macmillan & Co.)
Maverick (A.), Henry J. Raymond and the New York Press.....(A. S. Hale & Co.)
McBride (J.), Pioneer Biography, Butler County, Ohio.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.) 3 50
Memoirs of Samuel Pepys, comprising his diary and correspondence.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Mills (L. E.), Gen. Pope's Virginia Campaign of 1862, swd.....(Robt. Clarke & Co.)
Mommsen (T.), History of Rome.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Orton (Prof. J.), The Andes and the Amazon.....(Harper & Bros.)
Payne (J. B.), Haydn's Universal Index of Biography.....(Virtue & Yorston)
Rambles in Cuba.....(Carleton)
Read (D.), Nathan Read, Inventor.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Smiles (S.), Self-Help, new ed.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 00
Stevens (H.), Historical and Geographical Notes on the Earliest Discoveries of America.....(New Haven) 2 00
Stiles (H. R.), History of the City of Brooklyn, Vols. I., II.....(Brooklyn) 10 00
Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), Lady Byron Vindicated.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
The Private Life of Galileo.....(Nichols & Noyes) 1 50
Walker (A. F.), The Vermont Brigade in the Shenandoah Valley.....(Burlington) 1 50
Waterbury (Rev. J. B.), Memoir of Rev. John Scudder, M.D.....(Harper & Bros.)
Winthrop (Hon. R. C.), Eulogy at the Funeral of George Peabody, swd.....(Boston)

Fiction.

Alcott (Louisa M.), An Old-Fashioned Girl.....(Roberts Bros.)
Andersen (H. C.), O. T.: a Danish Romance.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Behind the Scenes: a Story of the Stage.....(N. E. News Co.) 1 25
Beneath the Wheels, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Caxton (Laura), Marion Berkley.....(Loring) 1 05
Clyde (A.), Under Foot, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Cupples (Mrs. G.), Driven to Sea.....(Horace B. Fuller)

Register of Books Received.

De Leon (E.), Askaros Kassis, the Copt.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) $1 75
De Mille (Prof. J.), Lady of the Ice, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 75
Di Beauclerk (Lady), True Love.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 25
Disraeli (Rt. Hon. B.), Contarini Fleming, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Henrietta Temple, swd..... " " 0 50
Lothair, swd..... " " 1 00
Venetia, swd..... " " 0 50
Vivian Grey, swd..... " " 0 60
Dupuy (Miss E. A.), Why did he Marry her?.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Edwards (Amelia B.), Debenham's Vow, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 75
Edwards (M. B.), Kitty, swd..... " " 0 50
Friday Night: Tales illustrating Jewish Life.....(New York)
Fullerton (Lady G.), Mrs. Gerald's Niece, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 90
Garibaldi (Gen. G.), The Rule of the Monk.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Goddard (Julia), Baffled; or, Michael Brand's Wrong, swd..... " "
Godwin (W.), Adventures of Caleb Williams, swd.....(Fields, Osgood & Co.) 0 50
" " " .....(Harper & Bros.)
Grey (Mrs.), A Marriage in High Life, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 0 50
Guilty, or Not Guilty.....(Carleton)
Gwendoline's Harvest, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 25
Harland (Marion), Helen Gardner's Wedding-Day.....(Carleton) 1 50
Hentz (Mrs. C. L.), Courtship and Marriage.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Eoline..... " " " 1 75
Helen and Arthur..... " " " 1 75
Ernest Linwood..... " " " 1 75
Love after Marriage..... " " " 1 75
Marcus Warland..... " " " 1 75
The Banished Son..... " " " 1 75
The Lost Daughter, swd..... " " 1 75
The Planter's Northern Bride..... " " " 1 75
Hirell, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Honor Bright.....(Carleton) 1 50
Hughes (T.), Tom Brown's School Days, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Lost Sir Massingberd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Macleod (Rev. N.), The Starling: a Scotch Story.....(Geo. Routledge & Sons) 2 00
Manton (Kate), Man's Wrongs; or, Woman's Foibles.....(Crosby & Damrell)
Miss Van Kortland, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 1 00
Mulock (Miss D. M.), A Brave Lady..... " " 1 50
The Unkind Word, and Other Stories..... " "
Owen (R. D.), Beyond the Breakers.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Philpotts (M. C.), The Manor Farm..... " "
Porter (Mrs. A. E.), Glencoe Parsonage.....(D. Lothrop & Co.) 1 00
Reade (C.), Put Yourself in his Place.....(Harper & Bros.)
" " " " .....(Fields, Osgood & Co.)
" " " " .....(Sheldon & Co.)
Red as a Rose is She, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 60
Robinson (Mrs. M. H.), Helen Erskine.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Robinson (F. W.), Stern Necessity, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Ross (C. H.) and Clarke (A.), Story of a Honeymoon.....(Carleton)
Sand (Mme. G.), Consuelo.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 50
The Countess of Rudolstadt..... " " 1 50
Manprat.....(Roberts Bros.)
Savage (M.), The Woman of Business, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 75
Scott (Sir W.), Guy Mannering.....(Little, Brown & Co.) 1 75
Waverley..... " " " 1 75
Smart (H.), A Race for a Wife.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
Breezie Langton, swd..... " " 0 75
Smith (Julie P.), Widow Goldsmith's Daughter.....(Brown & Gross)
Southworth (Mrs E. D. E. N.), The Family Doom.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Maiden Widow..... " " " 1 75
Southworth (Mrs. E. D. E. N.) and Baden (Mrs. F. E.), The Christmas Guest, and Other Stories.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Spielhagen (F.), Hammer and Anvil.....(Leypoldt & Holt) 2 00
The Hohensteins..... " " 2 00
Steele (Mrs. A. C.), So Runs the World Away, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Swift (J. F.), Robert Greathouse.....(Carleton)
Tales of European Life, swd.....(Loring) 0 50
Tautphœus (Baroness), Cyrilla, swd.....(Turner & Co.) 0 50
Thackeray (W. M.), Book of Snobs, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 0 50
The New-Fashioned Girl: a Story of To-day.....(James Miller)
The Story of Wandering Willie.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
Thomas (Annie), Only Herself, swd.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Trollope (A.), The Macdermots of Ballycloran.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
The Vicar of Bullhampton.....(Harper & Bros.)
Von Hillern (Wilhelmine), Only a Girl.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Wood (Mrs. H.), George Canterbury's Will, swd.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 50
Yonge (Miss C. M.), A Storehouse of Stories.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 50
The Caged Lion..... " "
" " .....(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 25

Juvenile Literature.

Abbot (J.), The Juno Stories: Juno and Georgie.....(Dodd & Mead) 1 25
" " Mary Osborne..... " " 1 25
Alger (H., jr.), Ben the Luggage Boy.....(Loring) 1 25
Andersen (H. C.), Wonder Stories told for Children.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Brother and Sister.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
Christine Thornton.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
Dumont (Mme. M.), Velvet-Coat, the Cat.....(Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger)
Martin (Mrs. C. B.), The Story of Muff: a Tale, swd.....(Short & Harmon)
The Little Nortons: a Tale..... " "
Strawberry Hill.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)
The Christmas Tapers, and Other Stories.....(E. P. Dutton & Co.)
The Six Cushions.....(Wm. V. Spencer) 1 00
Who is My Neighbor?.....(D. Lothrop & Co.)

Education.

Alden (Rev. J.), The Natural Speaker.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Allen (J. H.), Latin Primer for Boys and Girls.....(Ginn Brothers & Co.)
Chauvenet (Prof. W.), Treatise on Elementary Geometry.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Comfort (Prof. G. F.), A German Course.....(Harper & Bros.)
Cooke (Prof. J. P.), First Principles of Chemical Philosophy.....(Sever, Francis & Co.) 3 50
Demarest (G. L.), Simple Numbers: a Text-book.....(Ginn Bros. & Co.)
Fawcett (Mrs. M. G.), Political Economy for Beginners.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 00
Greenough (J. B.), Analysis of the Latin Subjunctive, swd.....(Cambridge)
Hall (Miss M. L.), First Lessons in Geography.....(Edwin Ginn)
Harkness (Prof. A.), Cæsar's Commentaries.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Harper (Mrs. M. J.), Practical Composition.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Harrington (Prof. C. S.), T. Macci Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens.....(Harper & Bros.)
Lenormant (F.) and Chevallier (E.), Students' Manual of Oriental History, Vol. I.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Madvig (J. N.), Latin Grammar.....(Ginn Brothers & Co.) 2 00
Marcet (Mrs. Mary), Grammar.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Marsh (Prof. F. A.), Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language.....(Harper & Bros.)
McIlvaine (Prof. J. H.), Elocution: a Text book.....(C. Scribner & Co.)
Prendergast (T.), Manual for Learning Spanish.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Preu (M. Th.), German Primer.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 1 00
Randall (Anna T.), Reading and Elocution.....(Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co.)
Randall (S. S.), History of the State of New York.....(J. B. Ford & Co.) 1 75
Swayne (G. C.), Herodotus.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 00
Winchell (Prof. A.), Sketches of Creation.....(Harper & Bros.) 0 50
Wrage (Prof. H. D.), Practical Grammar of the German Language (D. Appleton & Co.)
Youmans (Miss E. A.), The First Book of Botany..... " "

Science and Technics.

Barker (Prof. G. F.), The Correlation of Vital and Physical Forces, swd.....(Chas. C. Chatfield)
Bergeret (Dr. L. F. E.), The Preventive Obstacle.....(Turner & Mignard) 1 50
Büchner (Dr. L.), Die Stellung des Menschen in der Natur, Part 2, swd.....(B. Westermann & Co.)
Catlin (G.), The Lifted and Subsided Rocks of America.....(Trübner & Co.)
Cowan (Dr. J.), The Use of Tobacco.....(Cowan & Co.) 0 75
The Science of a New Life..... " " 3 00
Figuier (L.), Primitive Man.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 4 00
Gleason (Mrs. Dr. R. B.), Talks to my Patients.....(Wood & Holbrook)
Guillemin (A.), The Sun.....(C Scribner & Co.) $1 50
Jackson (Dr. J. C.), American Womanhood.....(Oakley, Mason & Co.) 1 50
Jeffries (J. P.), Natural History of the Human Races.....(S. R. Wells) 4 00
Lidell (Dr. J. A.) and Hamilton (Prof. F. H.), Surgical Memoirs of the War of the Rebellion.....(Hurd & Houghton) 6 50
Maine (H. S.), Ancient Law.....(C. Scribner & Co.) 2 50
Marsh (Hon. G. P.), L'Uomo e la Natura, swd.....(G. Barbèra)
McCahon (J.), Cases Determined in the Supreme Court of Kansas.....(Callaghan & Cockcroft)
Morse (J. T., jr.), The Law relating to Banks and Banking.....(Little, Brown & Co.) 6 00
Porter (Prof. N.), American Colleges and the American Public.....(C. C. Chatfield)
Powell (T. W.), Analysis of American Law.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Ram (J.), Treatise on Facts, 1st Am. ed.....(Baker, Voorhis & Co.) 5 00
Schieferdecker (Dr.), Horrors of Vaccination, swd.....(Am. News. Co.)
Seguin (Dr. E.), New Facts and Remarks concerning Idiocy, swd. (Wm. Wood & Co.)
Spencer (H.), Spontaneous Generation, and the Hypothesis of Physiological Units, swd.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Swan (J. G.), The Indians of Cape Flattery, swd.....(Smithsonian Institution)
Trowbridge (Prof. J.), Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1870.....(Gould & Lincoln)
Van Bruyssel (E.), The Population of an Old Pear-Tree.....(Macmillan & Co.) 1 75
Wallace (A. R.), Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection..... " "
Warren (S.), Popular and Practical Introduction to Law Studies...(J. D. Parsons, jr.) 4 00

Periodicals.

Appleton's Journal, Vol. II.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Bulletin of the Essex Institute, Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, swd.....(Salem) 0 50
Commercial and Financial Register, 1870.....(Wm. B. Dana & Co.) 1 00
Gynæcological Journal, Vol. I., 1869.....(James Campbell) 2 50
Half-Yearly Abstract of the Medical Sciences, Jan. 1870, swd.....H. C. Lea) 1 50
Harper's Weekly, Vol. XIII, 1869.....(Harper & Bros.)
Harper's Bazar, Vol. II., 1869..... " "
Harper's New Monthly Magazine, Vols. 38, 39, 1869..... " "
Journal of Social Science, No. 2, 1870, swd.....(Leypoldt & Holt) 1 50
Littell's Living Age, Vol. XV., XVI.....(Littell & Gay)
Merchants and Bankers' Almanac for 1870.....(New York) 5 00
Proceedings and Communications of the Essex Institute, Vol. VI., Part I., 1868, swd...(Salem)
The Law Almanac for 1870.....(Hurd & Houghton) 2 00
The Sunday-School Teacher, Vol. IV., 1869.....(Adams, Blackmer & Lyon)
The Workshop, No. 2, swd.....(E. Steiger) 0 50
Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin, swd.....(L. W. Schmidt)
Zeitschrift für Ethnologie..... " "

Miscellaneous.

A Fagot from the Coliseum, swd.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Aguilar (Grace), The Mother's Recompense.....(D. Appleton & Co.) 1 00
The Vale of Cedars..... " " 1 00
Woman's Friendship..... " " 1 00
Aikman (Rev. W.), Life at Home.....(S. R. Wells) 1 50
Allibone (S. A.), A Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors Living and Deceased, Vol. II., K-S.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
American Agricultural Annual, swd.....(Orange Judd & Co.) 0 50
American Horticultural Annual, swd..... " " " 0 50
American Chess-player's Hand-book.....(Porter & Coates)
André (Major), The Cow Chace, swd.....(Robt Clarke & Co.) 0 75
Annual of Hudson and Menet, for 1870.....(Hudson and Menet)
Appleton's Hand-book of American Travel: Northern and Eastern Tour.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Appleton's Railway Guide for May, 1870, swd..... " "
Beecher (Miss C. E.) and Stowe (Mrs. H. B.), Principles of Domestic Science.....(J. B. Ford & Co) 2 00
Bland (T. A.), Farming as a Profession, swd.....(Loring) 0 80
Brinton (Dr. D. G.) and Napheys (Dr. G. H.), Personal Beauty.....(W. J. Holland)
Bryant's Casket of Musical Gems, swd.....(R. M. De Witt) 0 50
Bylington (Rev. C.), Grammar of the Choctaw Language, swd.....(Philadelphia)
Chesterfield (Lord), Letters, Sentences, and Maxims.....(Scribner, Welford & Co.) 1 25
Clarke (W. H.), Short Voluntaries for the Organ.....(O. Ditson & Co.) 1 50
Colange (L.), Zell's Popular Encyclopædia, Vol. I.....(T. Ellwood Zell)
Donald (R.), Wonders of Architecture.....(C. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Drisler (Prof. H.), Yonge's English-Greek Lexicon.....(Harper & Bros.) 7 00
Flagg (W. J.), Hand-book of the Sulphur-Cure for Vines, swd..... " "
Godwin (P.), Out of the Past.....(G. P. Putnam & Son) 2 00
Good Things, Selected from the Congregationalist, for Sunday Schools.....(W. L. Greene & Co.) 1 25
Gouge (H. A.), New System of Ventilation.....(D. Van Nostrand)
Green (H.), Shakespeare and the Emblem Writers.....(J. W. Bouton) 10 00
Green (S.), Trout Culture, swd.....(D. M. Dewey)
Gunning (W. D.), Is it the Despair of Science? swd.....(Wm. White & Co.)
Hall (Dr. W. W.), Health by Good Living.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Hamilton (Gail), A Battle of the Books..... " " 1 50
Hart (J. S.), How to Select a Library, swd.....(J. C. Garrigues & Co.)
Holtzendorff (Dr. F. von), England's Presse, swd.....(Berlin)
Hopkins (J.), Second Collection of Church Music, swd.....(Pott & Amery)
Howard Paul's Jokes, swd.....(Loring) 0 25
Hutchings (J. M.), Scenes of Wonder and Curiosity in California....(A. Roman & Co.) 3 00
Johnson (Prof. S. W.), How Crops Feed.....(Orange Judd & Co.)
Kendo (T. A.), Treatise on Silk and Tea Culture.....(A. Roman & Co.) 1 25
Lanoye (F. de), The Sublime in Nature.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Leech (John), Pictures of Life and Character, Fifth Series..(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Legge (Rev. J.), The Chinese Classics. Part I., Confucius.....(Hurd & Houghton) 3 50
Le Pileur (A.), Wonders of the Human Body.....(C. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Mayer's Collection of Genuine Scottish Melodies.....(John Wiley & Son)
McCabe (J. D., jr.), Paris by Sunlight and Gaslight.....(Nat. Pub. Co.)
McClintock (Rev. J.) and Strong (J.), Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, Vol. III., E, F, G.....(Harper & Bros.)
McDonald (J. S.), Vital Philosophy.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.)
Merrick (J. M., jr.), The Strawberry, and its Culture.....(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Miles (Rev. H. A.), Traces of Picture-Writing in the Bible.....(Little, Brown & Co.)
Miller (H.), Leading Articles on Various Subjects.....(Virtue & Yorston) 1 50
Mitchell (E.), Five Thousand a Year, and How I Made it, swd.....(Loring) 0 38
Pech (J.), Influence of Liberty on Taste in the Ages of Augustus and Louis XIV., swd.....(Hurd & Houghton) 0 50
Proceedings of Third Annual Convention of Am. Inst. of Architects, N. Y., Nov. 16, 17, 1869, swd.....(Western & Co.) 1 00
Rand (E. S., jr.), Seventy-five Popular Flowers, and How to Cultivate Them.....(J. E. Tilton & Co.)
Reynolds (L. E.), The Mysteries of Masonry.....(J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 2 00
Ruggles (H. I.), The Method of Shakespeare as an Artist.....(Hurd & Houghton) 1 75
Sargent (H. W.), Skeleton Tours through England and the Continent.....(D. Appleton & Co.)
Sanzay (A.), Wonders of Glass-Making in all Ages.....(Chas. Scribner & Co.) 1 50
Schem (Prof. A. J.), Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon. I. Band, A bis Austräge.....(F. Gerhard)
Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed.....(Hurd & Houghton)
Sorrento, Wood-Carving, swd.....(Loring) 0 25
Spring Grove Cemetery, Cincinnati.....(Robert Clarke & Co.)
Taylor (S. H.), Classical Study.....(Warren F. Draper)
The American Catalogue of Books for 1869, swd.....(Leypoldt & Holt)
The American Tune-Book.....(O. Ditson & Co.) 1 50
The Army Reunion, Dec. 15-16, 1868.....(S. C. Griggs & Co.)
The Bazar Book of Decorum.....(Harper & Bros.)
The Men who Advertise.....(G. P. Rowell & Co.)
The True Story of Mrs. Shakespeare's Life, swd.....(Loring)
The Young Wife's Cook-Book.....(T. B. Peterson & Bros.) 1 75
Thomas (J.), Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, swd .. J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 0 50
Townsend (G. H.), Everyday Book of Modern Literature....(Scribner, Welford & Co.)
Trowbridge (Mrs. L.), Excelsior Cook-book.....(Oakley, Mason & Co.)
Trumbull (J. H.), Composition of Indian Geographical Names, swd.....(New Haven)
Viardot (L.), Wonders of Italian Art.....(Chas. Scribner & Co) 1 50
Waring (G. E., jr.), Earth-Closets and Earth-Sewage.....(Tribune Assn.) 0 50
Warton (T.), The History of English Poetry.....(G. P. Putnam & Sons) 4 25
Watson (Dr. W. H.), Allopathic Bigotry, swd.....(Albany)
Winner's New School for the Violin.....(O. Ditson & Co.)
Wister (Mrs. O.), Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Alfred de Musset.....(Hurd & Houghton)